righteousness of God in Him" (2 Corinthians 5. 21); and thus, one with him in the Divine reckoning, there is to such "NO CONDEMNATION." (Cf. John 8. 18; 5. 24; ch. 5. 18, 19.) But this is no mere legal arrangement: it is a union in life; believers, through the indwelling of Christ's Spirit in them having one life with Him, as truly as the head and the members of the same body have one life. [we walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit].—(The evidence of MSS. seems to show that this clause formed no part of the original text of this verse, but that the first part of it was early introduced, and the second later, from v. 4, probably as an explanatory comment, and to make the transition to v. 2 more easy.) 2. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free (rather, 'freed me'—referring to the time of his conversion, when first he believed) from the law of sin and death—It is the Holy Ghost who is here called "The Spirit of life," as opening up in the souls of believers a fountain of spiritual life (see on John 7. 38, 39; p. 75†, 2d col.); just as He is called "the Spirit of truth," as "guiding them into all truth" (John 16. 13), and "the Spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord" (Isaiah 11. 2), as the inspirer of these qualities. And He is called "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," because it is as members of Christ that He takes up His abode in believers, who in consequence of this have one life with their Head. And as the word "law" here has the same meaning as in ch. 7. 23, namely, 'an inward principle of action, operating with the fixedness and regularity of a law,' it thus appears that "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" here means, 'that new principle of action which the Spirit of Christ has opened up within us—the law of our new being.' This "sets us free," as soon as it takes possession of our inner man, "from the law of sin and death" i. e. from the enslaving power of that corrupt principle which carries death in its bosom. The "strong man armed" is overpowered by the "Stronger than he;" the weaker principle is dethroned and expelled by the more powerful; the principle of spiritual life prevails against and brings into captivity the principle of spiritual death—"leading captivity captive." If this be the apostle's meaning, the whole verse is to this effect: That the triumph of believers over their inward corruption, through the power of Christ's Spirit in them, proves them to be in Christ Jesus, and as such absolved from condemnation. But this is now explained more fully. 3, 4. For what the law could not do, &c.—a difficult and much controverted verse. But it is clearly, we think, the law's inability to free us from the dominion of sin that the apostle has in view; as has partly appeared already (see on v. 2), and will more fully appear presently. The law could irritate our sinful nature into more virulent action, as we have seen in ch. 7. 5, but it could not secure its own fulfilment. How that is accomplished comes now to be shown. In that it was weak through the flesh—i. e., having to address itself to us through a corrupt nature, too strong to be influenced by mere commands and threatenings. God, &c.—The sentence is somewhat imperfect in its structure, which occasions a certain obscurity. The meaning is, that whereas the law was powerless to secure its own fulfilment for the reason given, God took the method now to be described for attaining that end. sending ('having sent') his own Son—This and similar expressions plainly imply that Christ was God's "OWN SON" before He was sent—that is, in His own proper Person, and independently of His mission and appearance in the flesh (see on ch. 8. 32; Galatians 4. 4); and if so, He not only has the very nature of God, even as a son of his father, but is essentially of the Father, though in a sense too mysterious for any language of ours properly to define (see on ch. 1.-4). And this peculiar relationship is put forward here to enhance the greatness and define the nature of the relief provided, as coming from beyond the precincts of sinful humanity altogether, yea, immediately from the Godhead itself. In the likeness of sinful flesh—lit., 'of the flesh of sin'; a very remarkable and pregnant expression. He was made in the reality of our flesh, but only in the likeness of its sinful condition

He took our nature as it is in us, compassed with infirmities, with nothing to distinguish Him as man from sinful men, save that He was without sin. Nor does this mean that He took our nature with all its properties save one; for sin is no property of humanity at all, but only the disordered state of our souls, as the fallen family of Adam, a disorder affecting, indeed, and overspreading our entire nature, but still purely our own. and for sin—lit., 'and about sin;' q. d., 'on the business of sin.' The expression is purposely a general one, because the design was not to speak of Christ's mission to atone for sin, but in virtue of that atonement to destroy its dominion and extirpate it altogether from believers. We think it wrong, therefore, to render the words (as in Margin) 'by a sacrifice for sin' (suggested by the language of the LXX., and approved by CALVIN, &c.); for this sense is too definite, and makes the idea of expiation more prominent than it is. condemned sin—'condemned it to lose its power over men.' [BEZA, BENGEL, FRASER, MEYER, THOLUCK, PHILIPPI, ALFORD.] In this glorious sense our Lord says of His approaching death (John 12. 31), "Now is the judgment of this world; now shall the prince of this world be cast out;" and again (see on John 16. 11), "When He (the Spirit) shall come, He shall convince the world of . . . judgment, because the prince of this world is judged," i. e., condemned to let go his hold of men, who, through the cross, shall be emancipated into the liberty and power to be holy. in the flesh—i. e., in human nature, henceforth set free from the grasp of sin. That the righteousness of the law—'the righteous demand' [REVISED VERSION], 'the requirement' [ALFORD], or 'the precept' of the law; for it is not precisely the word so often used in this Epistle to denote 'the righteousness which justifies' (ch. 1. 17; 3. 21; 4. 5, 6; 5. 17, 18, 21), but another form of the same word, intended to express the enactment of the law, meaning here, we believe, the practical obedience which the law calls for. might be fulfilled in us—or, as we say, 'realized in us.' who walk—the most ancient expression of the bent of one's life, whether in the direction of good or of evil (Genesis 48. 15; Psalm 1. 1; Isaiah 2. 5; Micah 4. 5; Ephesians 4. 17; 1 John 1. 6, 7). not after (i. e., according to the dictates of) the flesh, but after the spirit—From v. 9 it would seem that what is more immediately intended by "the spirit" here is our own mind as renewed and actuated by the Holy Ghost. 5. For they that are after the flesh (i. e., under the influence of the fleshly principle) do mind (give their attention to, Philippians 3. 19) the things of the flesh, &c.—Men must be under the predominating influence of one or other of these two principles, and, according as the one or the other has the mastery, will be the complexion of their life, the character of their actions. 6. For—a mere particle of transition here [THOLUCK], like 'but' or 'now.' to be carnally minded—lit., 'the mind' or 'minding of the flesh' (Margin), i. e., the pursuit of fleshly ends. is death—not only 'ends in' [ALFORD, &c.], but even now 'is,' carrying death into its bosom, so that such are "dead while they live" (1 Timothy 5. 6; Ephesians 2. 1, 5). [PHILIPPI.] but to be spiritually minded—'the mind' or 'minding of the spirit;' i. e., the pursuit of spiritual objects. is life and peace—not "life" only, in contrast with the "death" that is in the other pursuit, but "peace;" it is the very element of the soul's deepest repose and true bliss. 7. Because the carnal mind is enmity against God—The desire and pursuit of carnal ends is a state of enmity to God, wholly incompatible with true life and peace in the soul. for it is not subject ('doth not submit itself') to the law of God, neither indeed can be ('can it')—i. e., in such a state of mind there neither is nor can be the least subjection to the law of God. Many things may be done which the law requires, but nothing either is or can be done because God's law requires it, or purely to please God. 8. So then—nearly equivalent to 'And so.' they that are in (and, therefore, under the government of) the flesh cannot please God—having no obediential principle, no desire to please Him. 9. But ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you—This does not mean, 'If the disposition or mind of God dwell in you; ont

'if the Holy Ghost dwell in you' (see 1 Corinthians 6. 11, 19; 3. 16, &c.). (It thus appears that to be "in the spirit" means here to be under the dominion of our own renewed mind; because the indwelling of God's Spirit is given as the evidence that we are "in the spirit.") Now ('But?') if any man have not the Spirit of Christ—Again, this does not mean 'the disposition or mind of Christ,' but the Holy Ghost; here called "the Spirit of Christ," just as He is called "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (see on v. 2). It is as "the Spirit of Christ" that the Holy Ghost takes possession of believers, introducing into them all the gracious, dove-like disposition which dwelt in Him (Matthew 3. 16; John 3. 34). Now if any man's heart be void, not of such dispositions, but of the blessed Author of them, "the Spirit of Christ"—he is none of his—even though intellectually convinced of the truth of Christianity, and in a general sense influenced by its spirit. Sharp, solemn statement this! 10, 11. And if Christ be in you—by His indwelling Spirit in virtue of which we have one life with him. the body—'the body indeed.' is dead because of ('by reason of') sin; but the spirit is life because (or, 'by reason') of righteousness—The word 'indeed,' which the original requires, is of the nature of a concession—q. d., 'I grant you that the body is dead, &c., and so far redemption is incomplete, but,' &c.; q. d., 'If Christ be in you by His indwelling Spirit, though your "bodies" have to pass through the stage of "death" in consequence of the first Adam's "sin," your spirit is instant with new and undying "life," brought in by the "righteousness" of the second Adam.' [THOLUCK, MEYER, and ALFORD in part, but only HODGE entirely.] But ('And') if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you—i. e., 'If He dwell in you as the Spirit of the Christ-raising One,' or, 'in all the resurrection-power which He put forth in raising Jesus.' he that raised up Christ from the dead—Observe the change of name from JESUS, as the historical Individual whom God raised from the dead, to CHRIST, the same Individual, considered as the Lord and Head of all His members, or of redeemed Humanity. [ALFORD.] shall also quicken (rather, 'shall quicken even') your mortal bodies by (the true reading appears to be 'by reason of') his Spirit that dwelleth in you—q. d., 'Your bodies indeed are not exempt from the death which sin brought in; but your spirits even now have in them an undying life, and the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, even these bodies of yours, though they yield to the last enemy and the dust of them return to the dust as it was, shall yet experience the same resurrection as that of their living Head, in virtue of the indwelling of the same Spirit in you that quickened Him.' 12, 13. Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh—q. d., 'Once we were sold under sin (ch. 7. 14); but now that we have been set free from that hard master and become servants to Righteousness (ch. 6. 22), we owe nothing to the flesh, we disown its unrighteous claims and are deaf to its imperious demands.' Glorious sentiment! For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die (in the sense of ch. 6. 21); but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body (see on ch. 7. 23), ye shall live (in the sense of ch. 6. 22)—The apostle is not satisfied with assuring them that they are under no obligations to the flesh, to hearken to its suggestions, without reminding them where it will end if they do; and he uses the word "mortify" (put to death) as a kind of play upon the word "die" just before—q. d., 'If ye do not kill sin, it will kill you.' But he tempers this by the bright alternative, that if they do, through the Spirit, mortify the deeds of the body, such a course will infallibly terminate in "life" everlasting. And this leads the apostle into a new line of thought, opening into his final subject, the "glory" awaiting the justified believer. Note (1.) 'There can be no safety, no holiness, no happiness, to those who are out of Christ: No safety, because all such are under the condemnation of the law (v. 1); no holiness, because such only as are united to Christ have the Spirit of Christ (v. 9); no happiness, because to be "carnally minded is death" (v. 6).' [HODGE.] (2.) The sanctification of believers, as it and its whole foundation in the atoning death, so it has its living spring in the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ (v. 2-4). (3.) 'The bent of the thoughts, affections, and pursuits, is the only decisive test of character (v. 5.)' [HODGE.] (4.) No human refinement of the carnal mind will make it spiritual, or compensate for the absence of spirituality. "Flesh" and "spirit" are essentially and unchangeably opposed; nor can the carnal mind, as such, be brought into real subjection to the law of God (v. 5-7). Hence (5.) the estrangement of God and the sinner is mutual. For as the sinner's state of mind is "enmity against God" (v. 7), so in this state he "cannot please God" (v. 8). (6.) Since the Holy Ghost is, in the same breath, called indiscriminately "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of Christ," and "Christ" Himself (as an indwelling life in believers), the Essential Unity and yet Personal distinctness of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in the one adorable Godhead must be believed, as the only consistent explanation of such language (v. 9-11). (7.) The consciousness of spiritual life in our renewed souls is a glorious assurance of resurrection life in the body also, in virtue of the same quickening Spirit whose inhabitation we already enjoy (v. 11). (8.) Whatever professions of spiritual life men may make, it remains eternally true that "if we live after the flesh we shall die," and only "if we through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body we shall live" (v. 13, and cf. Galatians 6. 7, 8; Ephesians 5. 6; Philippians 3. 18, 19; 1 John 3. 7, 8).

SECOND: The Sonship of Believers—Their future Inheritance—The Intercession of the Spirit for them (v. 14-27). 14. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they, &c. ('these are sons of God'). Hitherto the apostle has spoken of the Spirit simply as a power through which believers mortify sin: now he speaks of Him as a gracious, loving Guide, whose "leading"—enjoyed by all in whom is the Spirit of God's dear Son—shows that they also are "sons of God." 15. For, &c.—'For ye received not (at the time of your conversion) the spirit of bondage,' i. e., 'The spirit ye received was not a spirit of bondage,' again [gendering] to fear—as under the law which "worketh wrath"—q. d., 'Such was your condition before ye believed, living in legal bondage, haunted with incessant forebodings under a sense of unpardoned sin. But it was not to perpetuate that wretched state that ye received the Spirit,' but ye have received ('ye received') the spirit of adoption, whereby (rather, 'wherein') we cry, Abba, Father—The word "cry" is emphatic, expressing the spontaneousness, the strength, and the exuberance of the filial emotions. In Galatians 4. 6 this cry is said to proceed from the Spirit in us, drawing forth the filial exclamation in our hearts: Here, it is said to proceed from our own hearts under the vitalizing energy of the Spirit, as the very element of the new life in believers (cf. Matthew 10. 19, 20; and see on v. 4). "Abba" is the Syro-Chaldee word for "Father;" and the Greek word for that is added, not surely to tell the reader that both mean the same thing, but for the same reason which drew both words from the lips of Christ Himself during his agony in the garden (Mark 14. 36). He, doubtless, loved to utter his Father's name in both the accustomed forms; beginning with His cherished mother-tongue, and adding that of the learned. In this view the use of both words here has a charming simplicity and warmth. 15. The Spirit itself—It should be 'Himself' (see on v. 26). beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children ('are children') of God—The testimony of our own spirit is borne in that cry of conscious sonship, "Abba, Father;" but we are not therein alone; for the Holy Ghost within us, yea, even in that very cry which it is His to draw forth, sets His own distinct seal to ours; and thus, "in the mouth of two witnesses" the thing is established. The apostle had before called us "sons of God," referring to our adoption. here the word changes to "children," referring to our new birth. The one expresses the dignity to which we are admitted; the other the new life which we receive. The latter is more suitable here; because a son by adoption might not be heir of the property, whereas a son by birth certainly is, and this is what the apostle is now coming to. 17. And if children, then heirs ('heirs also'); heirs of God—of our Father's kingdom, and joint-heirs with Christ—as the "First-born among many brethren" (v. 28), and as "Heir of all things," if so be that we suffer ('provided we be suffering with Him') that we may be also glorified together (with Him). This necessity of conformity to Christ in suffering in order to participation in His glory, is taught alike by Christ Himself and by His apostles (John 12. 24-26; Matthew 16. 24, 25; 2 Timothy 2. 12). 18. For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us—*q. d., 'True, we must suffer with Christ, if we would partake of His glory; but what of that? For if such sufferings are set over against the coming glory, they sink into insignificance.' 19-22. For, &c.—The apostle, fired with the thought of the future glory of the saints, pours forth this splendid passage, in which he represents the whole creation groaning under its present degradation, and looking and longing for the revelation of this glory as the end and consummation of its existence. [HODGE.] the earnest expectation (cf. Philippians 1. 26; of the creature (rather, 'the creation') waiteth for the manifestation ('is waiting for the revelation') of the sons of God—*i. e., "for the redemption of their bodies" from the grave (v. 23), which will reveal their sonship, now hidden (cf. Luke 20. 36; Revelation 21. 7). For the creature ('the creation') was made subject to vanity, not willingly—*i. e., through no natural principle of decay. The apostle, personifying creation, represents it as only submitting to the vanity with which it was smitten, on man's account, in obedience to that superior power which had mysteriously linked its destinies with man's. And so he adds—but by reason of him who hath subjected the same ('who subjected it') in hope; because (or 'in hope that') the creature itself also ('even the creation itself') shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (its bondage to the principle of decay) into the glorious liberty (rather, 'the liberty of the glory') of the children of God—*i. e., the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered into that freedom from debility and decay in which the children of God when raised up in glory, shall expatiate: into this freedom from corruptibility the creation itself shall, in a glorious sense, be delivered. [So CALVIN, BEZA, BENGEL, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, PHILIPPI, HODGE, ALFORD, &c.] If for man's sake alone the earth was cursed, it cannot surprise us that it should share in his recovery. And if so, to represent it as sympathizing with man's miseries, and as looking forward to his complete redemption as the period of its own emancipation from its present sin-blighted condition, is a beautiful thought, and in harmony with the general teaching of Scripture on the subject. (See on 2 Peter 3. 13.) 23. And not only [they], but ourselves also (or 'not only [so], but even we ourselves'—i. e., besides the inanimate creation), which have the first-fruits of the Spirit—or, 'the Spirit as the first-fruits' of our full redemption (cf. 2 Corinthians 1. 22), moulding the heart to a heavenly frame and attempering it to its future element. even we ourselves—though we have so much of heaven already within us. groan within ourselves—under this "body of sin and death," and under the manifold "vanity and vexation of spirit" that are written upon every object and every pursuit and every enjoyment under the sun. waiting for the (manifestation of our) adoption [to wit], the redemption of our body—from the grave: 'not (be it observed) the deliverance of ourselves from the body, but the redemption of the body itself from the grave. [BENGEL.] 24. For we are saved by hope—rather, 'For in hope we are saved;' i. e., it is more a salvation in hope than as yet in actual possession. but hope that is seen is not hope—for the very meaning of hope is, the expectation that something now future will become present. for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?—the latter ending when the other comes. 25. But if we hope for that we see not, [then do] we with patience wait for it—*i. e., then, patient waiting for it is our fitting attitude.

CHAP. 26, 27. Likewise also the Spirit, &c.—or, 'But after the like manner doth the Spirit also help,' &c. our infirmities—rather (according to the true reading), 'our infirmity;' not merely the one infirmity here specified, but the general weakness of the spiritual life in its present state, of which one example is here given. for we know not what we should pray for as we ought—It is not the proper matter of prayer that believers are at so much loss about, for the fullest directions are given them on this head; but to ask for the right things "as they ought" is the difficulty. This arises partly from the dimness of our spiritual vision in the present veiled state, while we have to "walk by faith, not by sight" (see on 1 Corinthians 13. 9; and on 2 Corinthians 5. 7), and the large admixture of the ideas and feelings which spring from the feeling objects of sense that there is in the very best views and affections of our renewed nature; partly also from the necessary imperfection of all human language as a vehicle for expressing the subtle spiritual feelings of the heart. In these circumstances, how can it be but that much uncertainty should surround all our spiritual exercises, and that in our nearest approaches and in the freest outpourings of our hearts to our Father in heaven, doubts should spring up within us whether our frame of mind in such exercises is altogether befitting and well pleasing to God? Nor do these anxieties subside, but rather deepen, with the depth and ripeness of our spiritual experience. But the Spirit itself—rather, 'Himself.' (See end of v. 27)—maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered (i. e., which cannot be expressed in articulate language)—Sublime and affecting ideas, for which we are indebted to this passage alone! q. d., 'As we struggle to express in articulate language the desires of our hearts, and find that our deepest emotions are the most inexpressible, we "groan" under this felt inability. But not in vain are these groanings. For "the Spirit Himself" is in them, giving to the emotions which Himself has kindled the only language of which they are capable; so that though on our part they are the fruit of impotence to utter what we feel, they are at the same time the intercession of the Spirit Himself in our behalf.' And (rather, 'But,' inarticulate though these groanings be) he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he (the Spirit) maketh intercession for the saints according to [the will of] God—As the Searcher of hearts, He watches the surging emotions of them in prayer, and knows perfectly what the Spirit means by the groanings which He draws forth within us, because that blessed Intercessor pleads by them only for what God Himself designs to bestow. Note (1.) Are believers "led by the Spirit of God" (v. 14)? How careful then should they be not to "grieve the Holy Spirit of God" (Ephesians 4. 30)! Cf. Psalm 32. 8, 9: "I will . . . guide thee with mine eye. Be not (then) as the horse, or as the mule," &c. (2.) "The spirit of bondage," to which many Protestants are "all their lifetime subject," and the 'doubtful faith' which the Popish Church systematically inculcates, are both rebuked here, being in direct and painful contrast to that "spirit of adoption," and that witness of the Spirit, along with our own spirit, to the fact of our sonship, which it is here said the children of God, as such, enjoy (v. 15, 16). (3.) As suffering with Christ is the ordained preparation for participating in this glory, so the insignificance of the one as compared with the other cannot fail to lighten the sense of it, however bitter and protracted (v. 17, 18). (4.) It cannot but swell the heart of every intelligent Christian to think that if external nature has been mysteriously affected for evil by the fall of man, it only awaits his completed recovery, at the resurrection, to experience a corresponding emancipation from its blighted condition into undecaying life and unfading beauty (v. 19-23). (5.) It is not when believers, through sinful "quenching of the Spirit," have the fewest and faintest glimpses of heaven, that they sigh most fervently to be there; but, on the contrary, when through the unobstructed working of the Spirit in their hearts, "the first-fruits" of the glory to be revealed are most largely and frequently tasted, then, and just for that reason, is it that they "groan within themselves" for full redemption (v. 23). For thus they reason: If such be the drops, what will the ocean be? If thus "to see through a glass darkly" be so very sweet, what will it be to "see face to face?" If when "my Beloved stands behind our wall looking forth at the windows, showing Himself through the lattice" (Canticles 2. 9)—that thin veil which parts the seen from the unseen—if He is even thus to me "Fairer than the children of men," what shall He be when He stands confessed before my undazzled vision, the Only-begotten of the Father in my own nature, and I shall be like Him, for I shall see Him as He is? (6.) "The patience of hope" (1 Thessalonians 1. 3) is the fitting attitude for those who with the joyful consciousness that they are already "saved" (2 Timothy 1. 9; Titus 3. 5), have yet the painful consciousness that they are saved but in part: or, "that being justified by his grace, they are made (in the present state) heirs according to the hope (only) of eternal life," Titus 3. 7 (v. 24, 25). (7.) As prayer is the breath of the spiritual life, and the believer's only effectual relief under the "infirmity" which attaches to his whole condition here below, how cheering is it to be assured that the blessed Spirit, cognizant of it all, comes in aid of it all; and in particular, that when believers, unable to articulate their case before God, can at times do nothing but lie "groaning" before the Lord, these inarticulate groanings are the Spirit's own vehicle for conveying into "the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth" their whole case; and come up before the Hearer of prayer as the Spirit's own intercession in their behalf, and that they are recognized by Him that sitteth on the Throne, as embodying only what His own "will" determined before to bestow upon them (v. 26, 27)! (8.) What a view do these two verses (v. 26, 27) give of the relations subsisting between the Divine Persons in the economy of redemption, and the harmony of their respective operations in the case of each of the redeemed!

THIRD: Triumphant Summary of the whole Argument (v. 28-39). 28. And—or, 'Moreover,' or 'Now;' noting a transition to a new particular. we know, &c.—The order in the original is more striking: "We know that to them that love God (cf. 1 Corinthians 2. 9; Ephesians 6. 24; James 1. 12; 2. 5) all things work together for good [even] to them who are called (rather, 'who are called') according to his (eternal) purpose." Glorious assurance! And this, it seems, was a "household word," a "known" thing, among believers. This working of all things for good is done quite naturally to "them that love God;" because such souls, persuaded that He who gave His own Son for them cannot but mean them well in all His procedure, learn thus to take in good part whatever He sends them, however trying to flesh and blood: and to them who are the called, according to "His purpose," all things do in the same intelligible way "work together for good;" for, even when "He hath His way in the whirlwind," they see "His chariot paved with love" (Canticles 3. 10). And knowing that it is in pursuance of an eternal "purpose" of love that they have been "called into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ" (1 Corinthians 1. 9), they naturally say within themselves, 'It cannot be that He "of Whom, and through Whom, and to Whom are all things," should suffer that purpose to be thwarted by anything really adverse to us, or that He should not make all things, dark as well as light, crooked as well as straight, to co-operate to the furtherance and final completion of His high design.' 29. For (as touching this "calling according to his purpose") whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate (foreordain)—In what sense are we to take the word "foreknow" here? 'Those who He foreknew would repent and believe,' say Pelagians of every age and every hue. But this is to thrust into the text what is contrary to the whole spirit, and even letter, of the apostle's teaching (see ch. 9. 11; 2 Timothy 1. 9). In ch. 11. 2, and Psalm 1. 6, God's "knowledge" of His people cannot be restricted to a mere foresight of future events, or acquaintance with what is passing here below. Does "whom He did foreknow," then, mean 'whom He foreordained?' Scarcely because both 'foreknowledge' and 'foreordination' are here mentioned, and the One as the cause of the other. It is difficult indeed for our limited minds to distinguish them as states of the Divine Mind towards men; especially since in Acts 2. 23 "the counsel" is put before "the foreknowledge of God," while in 1 Peter 1. 2 "election" is said to be "according to the foreknowledge of God." But probably God's foreknowledge of His own people means His peculiar, conscious, complacency in them, while His "predestinating" or "foreordaining" them signifies His fixed purpose, flowing from this, to "save them and call them with an holy calling" (2 Timothy 1. 9). to be conformed to the image of his Son—i. e., to be His sons after the pattern, model, or image of His Sonship in our nature. that he might be the first-born among many brethren—"The First-born," the Son by nature; His "many brethren," sons by adoption: He, in the Humanity of the Only-begotten of the Father, bearing our sins on the accursed tree; they in that of mere men ready to perish by reason of sin, but redeemed by His blood from condemnation and wrath, and transformed into His likeness; He "the First-born from the dead;" they "that sleep in Jesus," to be in due time "brought with Him:" "The First-born," now "crowned with glory and honour;" His "many brethren," "when He shall appear, to be like Him, for they shall see Him as He is." 30. Moreover—And, or 'Now;' explanatory of the foregoing verse—q. d., "In "predestinating us to be conformed to the image of His Son" in final glory, He settled all the successive steps of it. Thus—Whom he did predestinate, them he also called—The word "called" (as Hodge and others truly observe) is never in the Epistles of the New Testament applied to those who have only the outward invitation of the Gospel (as in Matthew 20. 16; 22. 14). It always means 'internally, effectually, savingly called.' It denotes the first great step in personal salvation, and answers to "conversion." Only the word conversion expresses the change of character which then takes place, whereas this "calling" expresses the Divine authorship of the change, and the sovereign power by which we are summoned, Matthew-like, Zaccheus-like, out of our old, wretched, perishing condition, into a new, safe, blessed life. and whom he (thus) called, them he also justified (brought into the definite state of reconciliation already so fully described), and whom he justified, them he also glorified—(brought to final glory, v. 17, 18). Noble climax, and so rhythmically expressed! And all this is viewed as past; because, starting from the past decree of "predestination to be conformed to the image of God's Son" of which the other steps are but the successive unfoldings—all is beheld as one entire, eternally completed salvation. 31. What shall we then say to these things?—q. d., 'We can no farther go, think, wish.' [BENGEI.] This whole passage, to v. 31, and even to the end of the chapter, strikes all thoughtful interpreters and readers, as transcending almost every thing in language, while Olshausen notices the 'profound and colossal' character of the thought. If God [be] for us, who [can be] against us? If God be resolved and engaged to bring us through, all our enemies must be His; and "Who would set the briars and thorns against Him in battle? He would go through them. He would burn them together" (Isaiah 27. 4). What strong consolation is here! Nay, but the great Pledge of all has already been given; for, 32. He—rather, 'He surely.' (It is a pity to lose the emphatic particle of the original.) that spared not—'withheld not,' 'kept not back.' This expressive phrase, as well as the whole thought, is suggested by Genesis 22. 12, where Jehovah's touching commendation of Abraham's conduct regarding his son Isaac seems designed to furnish something like a glimpse into the spirit of His own act in surrendering His own Son. "Take now (said the Lord to Abraham) thy son, thine only, whom thou lovest, and . . . offer him for a burnt offering" (Genesis 22. 9); and only when Abraham had all but performed that boldest act of self-sacrifice, the Lord interposed, saying, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou HAST NOT WITHHELD THY SON, THINE ONLY SON, from me." In the light of this incident, then, and of this language our apostle can mean to convey nothing less than this, that in "not sparing His own Son, but delivering Him up," or surrendering Him, God exercised, in His Paternal character, a mysterious act of Self-sacrifice, which, though involving none of the pain and none of the loss which are inseparable from the very idea of self-sacrifice on our part, was not less real, but, on the contrary, as far transcended any such acts of ours as His nature is above the creature's. But this is inconceivable if Christ be not God's "own (or proper) Son," partaker of His very nature, as really as Isaac was of his father Abraham's. In that sense, certainly, the Jews charged our Lord with making Himself "equal with God" (see on John 5. 18), which he in reply forthwith proceeded, not to disown, but to illustrate and confirm. Understand Christ's Sonship thus, and the language of Scripture regarding it is intelligible and harmonious; but take it to be an artificial relationship, ascribed to Him in virtue either of His miraculous birth, or His resurrection from the dead, or the grandeur of His works, or all of these together—and the passages which speak of it neither explain of themselves nor harmonize with each other. delivered him up—not to death merely (as many take it), for that is too narrow an idea here, but 'surrendered Him' in the most comprehensive sense; cf. John 3. 16, "God so loved the world that He GAVE His only-begotten Son." for us all—i. e., for all believers alike; as nearly every good interpreter admits must be the meaning here. how shall he not—how can we conceive that He should not. with him also—rather, 'also with Him.' (The word "also" is often so placed in our version as to obscure the sense; see on Hebrews 12. 1.) freely give us all things?—all other gifts being not only immeasurably less than this Gift of gifts, but virtually included in it. 33, 34. Who shall lay anything to the charge of (or, 'bring any charge against') God's elect?—the first place in this Epistle where believers are styled "the elect." In what sense this is meant will appear in next chapter. yea rather, that is risen again—to make good the purposes of His death. Here, as in some other cases, the apostle delightfully corrects himself (see Galatians 4. 9; and on ch. 1. 12); not meaning that the resurrection of Christ was of more saving value than His death, but that having "put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself"—which though precious to us was to Him of unmingled bitterness—it was incomparably more delightful to think that He was again alive, and living to see to the efficacy of His death in our behalf. who is even ('also') at the right hand of God—The right hand of the king was anciently the seat of honour (cf. 1 Samuel 20. 25; 1 Kings 2. 19; Psalm 45. 9), and denoted participation in the royal power and glory (Matthew 20. 21). The classical writings contain similar allusions. Accordingly Christ's sitting at the right hand of God—predicted in Psalm 110. 1, and historically referred to in Mark 16. 19; Acts 2. 33; 7. 56; Ephesians 1. 20; Colossians 3. 1; 1 Peter 3. 22; Revelation 3. 21—signifies the glory of the exalted Son of man, and the power in the government of the world in which He participates. Hence it is called "sitting on the right hand of Power" (Matthew 28. 64), and "sitting on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Hebrews 1. 3). [PHILIPPI.] who also maketh intercession for us—using all His boundless interest with God in our behalf. This is the top of the climax. 'His Session at God's right hand denotes His power to save us; His Intercession, His will to do it.' [BENGEI.] But how are we to conceive of this intercession? Not certainly as of one pleading 'on bended knees and with outstretched arms,' to use the expressive language of CALVIN. But yet, neither is it merely a figurative intimation that the power of Christ's redemption is continually operative [THOLUCK], or merely to show the fervour and vehemence of His love for us. [CHRYSOSTOM.] It cannot be taken to mean less than this, that the glorified Redeemer, conscious of His claims, expressly signifies His will that the efficacy of His death should be made good to the uttermost, and signifies it in some such royal style as we find Him employing in that wonderful Intercessory Prayer which He spoke as from within the veil (see on John 17. 11, 12): "Father, I will, therefore they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am" (see on John 17. 24). But in what form this will is expressed is as undiscoverable as it is unimportant. 35, 36. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? This does not mean 'our love to Christ,' as if, 'Who shall hinder us from loving Christ?' but 'Christ's love to us,' as is clear from the closing words of the chapter, which refer to the same subject. Nor would the other sense harmonize with the scope of the chapter, which is to exhibit the ample ground of the believer's confidence in Christ. 'It is no ground of confidence to assert, or even to feel, that we will never forsake Christ; but it is the strongest ground of assurance to be convinced that His love will never change.' [HODGE.] shall tribulation . . . q. d., 'None of these, nor all together, how terrible soever to the flesh, are tokens of God's wrath, or the least ground for doubt of His love.' From whom could such a question come better than from one who had himself for Christ's sake endured so much? (See 2 Corinthians 11. 11-33; 1 Corinthians 4. 10-13.) The apostle says not (remarks CALVIN nobly) 'What,' but "Who," just as if all creatures and all afflictions were so many gladiators taking arms against the Christians. [THOLUCK.] As it is written, For thy sake, &c.—Psalm 41. 22—quoted as descriptive of what God's faithful people may expect from their enemies at any period when their hatred of righteousness is roused, and there is nothing to restrain it (see Galatians 4. 29). 37. Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors, through him that loved us—not 'We are so far from being conquered by them, that they do us much good' [HODGE]; for though this be true, the word means simply, 'We are pre-eminently conquerors.' See on ch. 5. 20. And so far are they from "separating us from Christ's love," that it is just "through Him that loved us" that we are victorious over them. 38, 39. For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers—whether good or bad. But as the bad are not called "angels," or "principalities," or "powers," save with some addition to show that such are meant (Matthew 25. 41; Colossians 2. 15; Ephesians 6. 12; 2 Peter 2. 4—except perhaps 1 Corinthians 6. 3), probably the good are meant here, but merely as the same apostle supposes an angel from heaven to preach a false gospel. (So the best interpreters.) nor things present, nor things to come—no condition of the present life and none of the unknown possibilities of the life to come. nor any other creature (rather, 'created thing'—any other thing in the whole created universe of God) shall be able to separate us, &c.—'All the terms here are to be taken in their most general sense, and need no closer definition. The indefinite expressions are meant to denote all that can be thought of, and are only a rhetorical paraphrase of the conception of allness.' [OLSHAUSEN.] from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord—Thus does this wonderful chapter, with which the argument of the Epistle properly closes, leave us who are "justified by faith" in the arms of everlasting Love, whence no hostile power or conceivable event can ever tear us. "Behold what manner of love is this?" And "what manner of persons ought we to be," who are thus "blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ?"—Note (1.) There is a glorious consistency between the eternal purposes of God and the free agency of men, though the link of connection is beyond human, perhaps created, apprehension (v. 23). (2.) How ennobling is the thought that the complicated movements of the Divine government of the world are all arranged in expressed furtherance of the "good" of God's chosen (v. 23)! (3.) To whatever conformity to the Son of God in dignity and glory, believers are or shall hereafter be raised, it will be the joy of every one of them, as it is most fitting, "that in all things He should have the pre-eminence" (Colossians 1. 18) (v. 29). (4.) 'As there is a beautiful harmony and necessary connection between the several doctrines of grace, so must there be a like harmony in the character of the Christian. He cannot experience the joy and confidence flowing from his election without the humility which the consideration of its being gratuitous must produce: nor can he have the peace of one who is justified with the holiness of one who is saved' (v. 29, 30). [HODGE.] (5.) However difficult it may be for finite minds to comprehend the emotions of the Divine mind, let us never for a moment doubt that in "not sparing His own Son, but delivering Him up for us all," God made a real sacrifice of all that was dearest to his heart, and that in so doing He meant for ever to assure His people that all other things which they need—inasmuch as they are nothing to this stupendous gift, and indeed but the necessary sequel of it—will in due time be forthcoming (v. 32). (6.) In return for such a sacrifice on God's part, what can be considered too great on ours? (7.) If there could be any doubt as to the meaning of the all-important word "JUSTIFICATION" in this Epistle—whether, as the Church of Rome teaches, and many others affirm, it means 'infusing righteousness into the unholy, so as to make them righteous,' or, according to Protestant teaching, 'absolving, acquitting, or pronouncing righteous the guilty;' v. 33 ought to set such doubt entirely at rest. For the apostle's question in this verse is, "Who shall bring a charge against God's elect?"—in other words, 'Who shall pronounce' or 'hold them guilty?' seeing that "God justifies" them: showing beyond all doubt, that to "justify" was intended to express precisely the opposite of 'holding guilty;' and consequently (as CALVIN triumphantly argues) that it means 'to absolve from the charge of guilt.' (8.) If there could be any reasonable doubt in what light the death of Christ is to be regarded in this Epistle, v. 34 ought to set that doubt entirely at rest. For there the apostle's question is, Who shall "condemn" God's elect, since "Christ died" for them; showing beyond all doubt (as PHILIPPI justly argues) that it was the expiatory character of that death which the apostle had in view. (9.) What an affecting view of the love of Christ does it give us to learn, that His greatest nearness to God and most powerful interest with Him—as "seated on His right hand"—is employed in behalf of His people here below (v. 34)! (10.) 'The whole universe, with all that it contains, so far as it is good, is the friend and ally of the Christian; and, so far as it is evil, is more than a conquered foe' (v. 35-39). [HODGE.] (11.) Are we who "have tasted that the Lord is gracious," both "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation" (1 Peter 1. 5), and embraced in the arms of Invincible Love? Then surely, while "building ourselves up on our most holy faith," and "praying in the Holy Ghost," only the more should we feel constrained to "keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life" (Jude 20, 21).

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-33. THE BEARING OF THE FOREGOING TRUTHS UPON THE CONDITION AND DESTINY OF THE CHOSEN PEOPLE—ELECTION—THE CALLING OF THE GENTILES. Too well aware that he was regarded as a traitor to the dearest interests of his people (Acts 21. 33; 22. 22; 25. 24), the apostle opens this division of his subject by giving vent to his real feelings with extraordinary vehemence of protestation. 1, 2. I say the truth in Christ—as if steeped in the spirit of Him who wept over impenitent and doomed Jerusalem (cf. ch. 1. 9; 2 Corinthians 12. 19; Philippians 1. 8). my conscience bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost—q. d., 'my conscience as quickened, illuminated, and even now under the direct operation of the Holy Ghost.' That I have, &c.—'That I have great grief (or 'sorrow') and unceasing anguish in my heart—the bitter hostility of his nation to the glorious Gospel, and the awful consequences of their unbelief, weighing heavily and incessantly upon his spirit. 3. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for ('in behalf of') my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh—In proportion as he felt himself severed from his nation, he seems to have realized all the more vividly their natural relationship. To explain away the wish here expressed, as too strong for any Christian to utter or conceive, some have rendered the opening words, 'I ~~did~~ wish,' referring it to his former unenlightened state; &

sense of the words too tame to be endured: others unwarrantably soften the sense of the word "accursed." But our version gives the true import of the original; and if it be understood as the language rather of 'strong and indistinct emotions than of definite ideas' [HODGE], expressing passionately how he felt his whole being swallowed up in the salvation of his people, the difficulty will vanish, and we shall be reminded of the similar idea so nobly expressed by Moses, Exodus 32. 32. 4. Who are Israelites—See ch. 11. 1; 2 Corinthians 11. 22; Philipplians 3. 5. to whom pertaineth ('whose is') the adoption—It is true that, compared with the new economy, the old was a state of minority and pupillage, and so far that of a bond-servant (Galatians 4. 1-3); yet, compared with the state of the surrounding heathen, the choice of Abraham and his seed was a real separation of them to be a Family of God (Exodus 4. 22; Deuteronomy 32. 6; Isaiah 1. 2; Jeremiah 31. 9; Hosea 11. 1; Malachi 1. 6). and the glory—that "glory of the Lord," or 'visible token of the Divine presence in the midst of them,' which rested on the ark and filled the tabernacle during all their wanderings in the wilderness; which in Jerusalem continued to be seen in the tabernacle and temple, and only disappeared when, at the Captivity, the temple was demolished, and the sun of the ancient economy began to go down. This was what the Jews called the "Shekinah," and the covenants—"the covenants of promise" to which the Gentiles before Christ were "strangers" (Ephesians 2. 12); meaning the one covenant with Abraham in its successive renewals (see Galatians 3. 16, 17). and the giving of the law—from Mount Sinai, and the possession of it thereafter, which the Jews justly deemed their peculiar honour (Deuteronomy 26. 18, 19; Psalm 147. 19, 20; ch. 2. 17). and the service [of God]—or, of the sanctuary; meaning the whole divinely-instituted religious service, in the celebration of which they were brought so nigh unto God. and the promises—the great Abrahamic promises, successively unfolded, and which had their fulfilment only in Christ: see Hebrews 7. 6; Galatians 3. 16, 21; Acts 26. 6, 7. 5. Whose are the fathers—here, probably, the three great fathers of the covenant—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—by whom God condescended to name Himself (Exodus 3. 6, 13; Luke 20. 37). and (most exalted privilege of all, and as such, reserved to the last) of whom as concerning the flesh (see on ch. 1. 3) Christ [came] (or, 'is Christ'), who is over all, God—rather, 'God over all.' blessed forever. Amen—To get rid of the bright testimony here borne to the supreme divinity of Christ, various expedients have been adopted: (1.) To place a period, either after the words "concerning the flesh Christ came," rendering the next clause as a doxology to the Father—"God who is over all be blessed for ever;" or after the word "all"—thus, "Christ came, who is over all: God be blessed," &c. [ERASMUS, LOCKE, FRITZSCHE, MEYER, JOWETT, &c.] But it is fatal to this view, as even Socinus admits, that in other Scripture doxologies the word "Blessed" precedes the name of God on whom the blessing is invoked (thus: "Blessed be God," Psalm 68. 35; "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel," Psalm 72. 18). Besides, any such doxology here would be 'unmeaning and frigid in the extreme;' the sad subject on which he was entering suggesting anything but a doxology, even in connection with Christ's Incarnation. [ALFORD.] (2.) To transpose the words rendered 'who is;' in which case the rendering would be, 'whose (i. e., the fathers') is Christ according to the flesh.' [CRILLIUS, WHISTON, TAYLOR, WHITBY.] But this is a desperate expedient, in the face of all MS. authority; as is also the conjecture of GROTIUS and others, that the word "God" should be omitted from the text. It remains then, that we have here no doxology at all, but a naked statement of fact, that while Christ is of the Israelitish nation "as concerning the flesh," He is in another respect "God over all, blessed for ever." (In 2 Corinthians 11. 31 the very Greek phrase which is here rendered "who is," is used in the same sense; and cf. ch. 1. 3, Greek.) In this view of the passage, as a testimony to the supreme divinity of Christ, besides all the orthodox fathers some of the ablest modern critics concur.

[BENGLI, THOLUCK, STUART, OLSHAUSEN, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, &c.] 6. Not as though the word of God had taken none effect—'hath fallen to the ground,' i. e., failed: cf. Luke 16. 17, Greek. for they are not all Israel which are of Israel—better, 'for not all they which are of Israel are Israel.' Here the apostle enters upon the profound subject of ELECTION, the treatment of which extends to the end of ch. 11.—q. d., 'Think not that I mourn over the total loss of Israel; for that would involve the failure of God's word to Abraham; but not all that belong to the natural seed, and go under the name of "Israel," are the Israel of God's irrevocable choice.' The difficulties which encompass this subject lie not in the apostle's teaching, which is plain enough, but in the truths themselves, the evidence for which, taken by themselves, is overwhelming, but whose perfect harmony is beyond human comprehension in the present state. The great source of error here lies in hastily inferring [as THOLUCK and others], from the apostle's taking up, at the close of this chapter, the calling of the Gentiles in connection with the rejection of Israel, and continuing this subject through the two next chapters, that the Election treated of in the body of this chapter is national, not personal Election, and consequently is Election merely to religious advantages, not to eternal salvation. In that case, the argument of v. 6, with which the subject of Election opens, would be this: 'The choice of Abraham and his seed has not failed; because though Israel has been rejected, the Gentiles have taken their place; and God has a right to choose what nation He will to the privileges of His visible kingdom.' But so far from this, the Gentiles are not so much as mentioned at all till towards the close of the chapter; and the argument of this verse is, that 'all Israel is not rejected, but only a portion of it, the remainder being the "Israel" whom God has chosen in the exercise of His sovereign right.' And that this is a choice not to mere external privileges, but to eternal salvation, will abundantly appear from what follows. 7-9. Neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children—q. d., 'Not in the line of mere fleshly descent from Abraham does the election run; else Ishmael, Hagar's child, and even Keturah's children, would be included, which they were not,' but (the true election are such of Abraham's seed as God unconditionally chooses, as exemplified in that promise), In Isaac shall thy seed be called—(Genesis 21. 12.) 10-13. And not only so; but when Rebecca, &c.—It might be thought that there was a natural reason for preferring the child of Sarah, as being Abraham's true and first wife, both to the child of Hagar, Sarah's maid, and to the children of Keturah, his second wife. But there could be no such reason in the case of Rebecca, Isaac's only wife; for the choice of her son Jacob was the choice of one of two sons by the same mother and of the younger in preference to the elder, and before either of them was born, and consequently before either had done good or evil to be a ground of preference: and all to show that the sole ground of distinction lay in the unconditional choice of God—"not of works, but of Him that calleth." 14. What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid—This is the first of two objections to the foregoing doctrine, that God chooses one and rejects another not on account of their works, but purely in the exercise of His own good pleasure: 'This doctrine is inconsistent with the justice of God.' The answer to this objection extends to v. 19, where we have the second objection. 15. For he saith to Moses (Exodus 33. 19), I will have mercy on whom I will have ('on whom I have') mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have ('on whom I have') compassion—q. d., 'There can be no unrighteousness in God's choosing whom He will, for to Moses He expressly claims the right to do so.' Yet it is worthy of notice that this is expressed in the positive rather than the negative form: not, 'I will have mercy on none but whom I will;' but, 'I will have mercy on whomsoever I will.' 16. So then it is not of him that willeth (hath the inward desire), nor of him that caneth (maketh active effort)—(cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 24, 26; Philipplians 2. 16; 3. 14.) Both these are indispensable to salvation, yet salvation is owing to neither, but is purely "of God that showeth mercy." See on Philipplians 2. 12. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling: for it is God which, out of His own good pleasure, worketh in you both to will and to do." 17. For the Scriptures saith to Pharaoh (observe here the light in which the Scripture is viewed by the apostle), Even for this same ('this very') purpose have I raised ('raised I') thee up, &c.—The apostle had shown that God claims the right to choose whom He will: here he shows by an example that God punishes whom He will. But 'God did not make Pharaoh wicked; He only forbore to make him good, by the exercise of special and altogether unmerited grace.' [HODGE.] that I might ('may') show my power in thee—It was not that Pharaoh was worse than others that he was so dealt with, but 'in order that he might become a monument of the penal justice of God, and it was with a view to this that God provided that the evil which was in him should be manifested in this definite form.' [OLSHAUSEN.] and that my name might ('may') be declared ('proclaimed') in all the earth—'This is the principle on which all punishment is inflicted, that the true character of the Divine Lawgiver should be known. This is of all objects, where God is concerned, the highest and most important; in itself the most worthy, and in its results the most beneficial.' [HODGE.] 18. Therefore hath he—'So then he hath.' The result then is that He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth—by judicially abandoning them to the hardening influence of sin itself (Psalm 81. 11, 12; ch. 1. 24, 26, 28; Hebrews 3. 8, 13), and of the surrounding incertives to it (Matthew 24. 12; 1 Corinthians 15. 33; 2 Thessalonians 2. 17). 19. Objection second to the doctrine of Divine Sovereignty; Thou shalt say then unto me, Why ('Why then' is the true reading) doth he yet find fault? for who hath resisted ('Who resisteth') his will?—q. d., 'This doctrine is incompatible with human responsibility.' If God chooses and rejects, pardons and punishes, whom He pleases, why are those blamed who, if rejected by Him, cannot help sinning and perishing? This objection shows quite as conclusively as the former the real nature of the doctrine objected to—that it is Election and Non-election to eternal salvation prior to any difference of personal character; this is the only doctrine that could suggest the objection here stated, and to this doctrine the objection is plausible. What now is the apostle's answer? It is twofold. First: 'It is irreverence and presumption in the creature to arraign the Creator.' 20, 21. Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made ('didst thou make') me thus (Isaiah 45. 9)? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour, and another to dishonour?—'The objection is founded on ignorance or misapprehension of the relation between God and His sinful creatures; supposing that He is under obligation to extend His grace to all, whereas He is under obligation to none. All are sinners, and have forfeited every claim to His mercy; it is therefore perfectly competent to God to spare one and not another, to make one vessel to honour and another to dishonour. But it is to be borne in mind that Paul does not here speak of God's right over his creatures as creatures, but as sinful creatures: as he himself clearly intimates in the next verses. It is the cavil of a sinful creature against his Creator that he is answering, and he does so by showing that God is under no obligation to give his grace to any, but is as sovereign as in fashioning the clay.' [HODGE.] But Second: 'There is nothing unjust in such sovereignty.' 22, 23. What if God, willing to show ('designing to manifest') his wrath (His holy displeasure against sin), and to make his power (to punish it) known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath—i. e., 'destined to wrath; just as "vessels of mercy," in the next verse, mean "vessels destined to mercy;" compare Ephesians 2. 3, "children of wrath." fitted for destruction—It is well remarked by STUART that the 'difficulties which such statements involve are not to be got rid of by softening the language of one text, while so many others meet us which are of the same tenor; and even if we give up the Bible itself, so long as we acknowledge an omnipotent and omniscient God we cannot abate in the least degree from any of the difficulties which such texts make.' Be it observed, however, that if God, as the apostle teaches, expressly "designed to manifest His wrath, and to make His power (in the way of wrath) known," it could only be by punishing some, while He pardons others; and if the choice between the two classes was not to be founded, as our apostle also teaches, on their own doings but on God's good pleasure, the decision behooved ultimately to rest with God. Yet, even in the necessary punishment of the wicked, as HODGE observes, so far from proceeding with undue severity, the apostle would have it remarked that God "endures with much long-suffering" those objects of His righteous displeasure. and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy—that 'glorious exuberance of Divine mercy' which was manifested in choosing and eternally arranging for the salvation of sinners. 24. even us, whom he hath called, &c.—rather, 'Whom he hath also called, even us,' &c., in not only "before preparing," but in due time effectually "calling us." not of the Jews, &c.—better, 'not from among Jews only, but also from among Gentiles.' Here for the first time in this chapter the calling of the Gentiles is introduced; all before having respect, not to the substitution of the called Gentiles for the rejected Jews, but to the choice of one portion and the rejection of another of the same Israel. Had Israel's rejection been total, God's promise to Abraham would not have been fulfilled by the substitution of the Gentiles in their room; but Israel's rejection being only partial, the preservation of a "remnant," in which the promise was made good, was but "according to the election of grace." And now, for the first time, the apostle tells us that along with this elect remnant of Israel it is God's purpose to "take out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (Acts 28. 14); and that subject thus introduced, is now continued to the end of ch. 11. 25. As he saith also in Osee ('Hosea'), I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved—quoted, though not quite to the letter, from Hosea 2. 23, a passage relating immediately, not to the heathen, but to the kingdom of the ten tribes; but since they had sunk to the level of the heathen, who were "not God's people," and in that sense "not beloved," the apostle legitimately applies it to the heathen, as "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and strangers to the covenants of promise" (so 1 Peter 2. 10). 26. And (another quotation from Hosea 1. 10) it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children ('called sons') of the living God—The expression, 'in the place where . . . there,' seems designed only to give greater emphasis to the gracious change here announced, from Divine exclusion to Divine admission to the privileges of the people of God. 27–29. Esaias also crieth—('But Isaiah crieth')—an expression denoting a solemn testimony openly borne (John 1. 15; 7. 28, 37; 12. 44; Acts 23. 6; 24. 41). concerning Israel, Though the number of the children ('sons') of Israel be as the sand of the sea, a ('the') remnant (i. e., the elect remnant only) shall be saved; for he will finish the work, and cut ('is finishing the reckoning, and cutting') it short in righteousness, because a short work ('reckoning') will the Lord make upon the earth—Isaiah 10. 22, 23, as in the LXX. The sense given to these words by the apostle may seem to differ from that intended by the prophet. But the sameness of sentiment in both places will at once appear, if we understand those words of the prophet "the consumption decreed shall overflow with righteousness," to mean that while a remnant of Israel should be graciously spared to return from captivity, "the decreed consumption" of the impenitent majority should be "replete with righteousness," or illustriously display God's righteous vengeance against sin. The "short reckoning" seems to mean the speedy completing of His word, both in cutting off the one portion and saving the ether. And as Isaiah said ('hath said') before—i. e., probably in an earlier part of his book, namely, Isaiah 1. 2. Except the Lord of Sabaoth—i. e., 'The Lord of Hosts'—the word is Hebrew, but occurs so in the Epistle of James (ch. 5. 4), and has thence become naturalized in our Christian phraseology. had left us a seed—meaning a 'remnant'; small at first, but in due time to be a seed of plenty (cf. Psalm 22. 30, 31; Isaiah 6. 12, 13). we had been ('become') as Sodom, &c.—But for this preclous seed, the chosen people would have resembled the cities of the plain, both in degeneracy of character and in merited doom. 30, 31. What shall we say then?—'What now is the result of the whole?' The result is this—very different from what one would have expected—That the Gentiles, which followed not after righteousness, have attained ('attained') to righteousness, even the righteousness of faith—As we have seen that "the righteousness of faith" is the righteousness which justifies (see on ch. 3. 22, &c.), this verse must mean that 'the Gentiles, who while strangers to Christ were quite indifferent about acceptance with God, having embraced the Gospel as soon as it was preached to them, experienced the blessedness of a justified state.' but Israel, which followed ('following') after the law of righteousness, hath not attained ('attained not') unto the law of righteousness—The word "law" is used here, we think, in the same sense as in ch. 7. 23, to denote 'a principle of action:' q. d., 'Israel, though sincerely and steadily aiming at acceptance with God, nevertheless missed it.' 32, 33. Wherefore? Because [they sought it] not by faith, but as it were (rather simply, 'as') by the works of the law—as if it were thus attainable, which justification is not: Since, therefore, it is attainable only by faith, they missed it. for (It is doubtful if this particle was originally in the text) they stumbled at that stumbling-stone—better, 'against the stone of stumbling,' meaning Christ. But in this they only did, as it is written (Isaiah 8. 14; 28. 16), Behold, &c.—Two Messianic predictions are here combined, as is not unusual in quotations from the Old Testament. Thus combined, the prediction brings together both the classes of whom the apostle is treating: those to whom Messiah should be only a stone of stumbling, and those who were to regard Him as the Corner-Stone of all their hopes. Thus expounded, this chapter presents no serious difficulties, none which do not arise out of the subject itself, whose depths are unathomable; whereas on every other view of it the difficulty of giving it any consistent and worthy interpretation is in our judgment insuperable. Note (1.) To speak and act "in Christ," with a conscience not only illuminated, but under the present operation of the Holy Ghost, is not peculiar to the supernaturally inspired, but is the privilege, and ought to be the aim, of every believer (v. 1). (2.) Grace does not destroy, but only intensify and elevate, the feelings of nature; and Christians should study to show this (v. 2, 3). (3.) To belong to the visible Church of God, and enjoy its high and holy distinctions, is of the sovereign mercy of God, and should be regarded with devout thankfulness (v. 4, 5). (4.) Yet the most sacred external distinctions and privileges will avail nothing to salvation without the heart's submission to the righteousness of God (v. 31-33). (5.) What manner of persons ought "God's elect" to be—in humility, when they remember that He hath saved them and called them, not according to their works, but according to His own purpose and grace, given them in Christ Jesus before the world began (2 Timothy 1. 9); in thankfulness, for "Who maketh thee to differ, and what hast thou that thou didst not receive?" (1 Corinthians 4. 7); in godly jealousy over themselves, remembering that "God is not mocked," but "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap" (Galatians 6. 7); in diligence "to make our calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1. 10); and yet in calm confidence that "whom God predestinates, and calls, and justifies, them (in due time) He also glorifies" (ch. 8. 30). (6.) On all subjects which from their very nature lie beyond human comprehension, it will be our wisdom to set down what God says in His word, and has actually done in His procedure towards men, as indisputable, even though it contradict the results at which in the best exercise of our limited judgment we may have arrived (v. 14-23). (7.) Sincerity in religion, or a general desire to be saved, with assiduous efforts to do right, will prove fatal as a ground of confidence before God, if unaccompanied by implicit submission to His revealed method of salvation (v. 31-33). (8.) In the rejection of the great mass of the chosen people, and the inbringing of multitudes of estranged Gentiles, God would have men to see a law of His procedure, which the judgment of the great day will more vividly reveal—that "the last shall be first and the first last" (Matthew 20. 16)

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-21. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED—HOW ISRAEL CAME TO MISS SALVATION, AND THE GENTILES TO FIND IT. 1. Brethren, my heart's desire—The word here expresses 'entire complacency,' that in which the heart would experience full satisfaction. and prayer ('supplication') to God for Israel—'for them' is the true reading; the subject being continued from the close of the preceding chapter. is, that they may be saved—'for their salvation.' Having before poured forth the anguish of his soul at the general unbelief of his nation and its dreadful consequences (ch. 9. 1-3), he here expresses in the most emphatic terms his desire and prayer for their salvation. 2. For I bear them record—or, 'witness,' as he well could from his own sad experience—that they have a zeal of ('for') God, but not according to knowledge—(Cf. Acts 22. 3; 26. 9-11; Galatians 1. 13, 14.) He alludes to this well-meaning of his people, notwithstanding their spiritual blindness, not certainly to excuse their rejection of Christ and rage against His saints, but as some ground of hope regarding them. (See 1 Timothy 1. 13.) 3. For they being ignorant of God's righteousness—i. e., for the justification of the guilty (see on ch. 1. 17)—and going about ('seeking') to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God—The apostle views the general rejection of Christ by the nation as one act. 4. For Christ is the end (the object or aim) of the law for (justifying) righteousness to every one that believeth—i. e., contains within Himself all that the law demands for the justification of such as embrace Him, whether Jew or Gentile (Galatians 3. 24). 5-10. For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man that doeth ('hath done') those things (which it commands) shall live in them—(Leviticus 28. 5.) This is the one way of justification and life—by "the righteousness which is of (or, by our own obedience to) the law." But the (justifying) righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise ('speaketh thus')—Its language or import is to this effect (quoting in substance Deuteronomy 30. 13, 14), Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? that is, to bring Christ down, &c.—q. d., 'Ye have not to sigh over the impossibility of attaining to justification; as if one should say, 'הי! If I could but get some one to mount up to heaven and fetch me down Christ, there might be some hope, but since that cannot be, mine is a desperate case.' or, Who shall descend, &c.—another case of impossibility, suggested by Proverbs 30. 4, and perhaps also Amos 9. 2—probably proverbial expressions of impossibility (cf. Psalm 139. 7-10; Proverbs 24. 7, &c.). But what saith it? [It saith]—continuing the quotation from Deuteronomy 30. 14—The word is nigh thee—easily accessible. in thy mouth—when thou confessest Him—and in thine heart—when thou believest on Him. Though it is of the law which Moses more immediately speaks in the passage quoted, yet it is of the law as Israel shall be brought to look upon it when the Lord their God shall circumcise their heart "to love the Lord their God with all their heart," &c. (v. 6); and thus, in applying it, the apostle (as OLSHAUSEN truly observes) is not merely appropriating the language of Moses, but keeping in the line of his deeper thought. that is, the word of faith, which we preach—i. e., the word which men have to believe for salvation

(Timothy 4. 6). that if thou shalt, &c.—So understanding the words, the apostle is here giving the language of the true method of justification; and this sense we prefer [with CALVIN, BEZA, FERME, LOCKE, JOWETT]. But able interpreters render the words, 'For,' or 'Because if thou shalt,' &c. [VULGATE, LUTHER, DE WETTE, STUART, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, REVISED VERSION.] In this case, these are the apostle's own remarks, confirming the foregoing statements as to the simplicity of the gospel method of salvation. confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus—i. e., probably, 'If thou shalt confess Jesus [to be] the Lord,' which is the proper manifestation or evidence of faith (Matthew 10. 32; 1 John 4. 15). This is put first merely to correspond with the foregoing quotation—"In thy mouth and in thine heart." So in 2 Peter 1. 10 the "calling of believers" is put before their "election," as that which is first "made sure," although in point of time it comes after it. and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised ('that God raised') him from the dead, &c.—See on ch. 4. 25. In the next verse the two things are placed in their natural order. For with the heart man believeth unto (justifying) righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation—This confession of Christ's name, especially in times of persecution, and whenever obloquy is attached to the Christian profession, is an indispensable test of discipleship. 11-13. For the Scripture saith—in Isaiah 28. 16, a glorious Messianic passage. Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed—Here, as in ch. 9. 33, the quotation is from the LXX., which renders those words of the original, "shall not make haste" (i. e., fly for escape, as from conscientious danger), 'shall not be put to shame,' which comes to the same thing. For there is no difference (or 'distinction') between Jew and Greek; for the same Lord over all—i. e., not God [as CALVIN, GROTIUS, OLSHAUSEN, HODGE], but Christ, as will be seen, we think, by comparing v. 9. 12, 13 and observing the apostle's usual style on such subjects. [So CHRYSOSTOM, MELVILLE, BENGEL, MEYER, DE WETTE, FRITZSCHE, THOLUCK, STUART, ALFORD, PHILIPPI.] is rich—a favourite Pauline term to express the exuberance of that saving grace which is in Christ Jesus. unto all that call upon him—This confirms the application of the preceding words to Christ; since to call upon the name of the Lord Jesus is a customary expression. (See Acts 7. 59, 60; 9. 14, 21; 22. 16; 1 Corinthians 1. 2; 2 Timothy 2. 22.) For [saith the Scripture] whosoever—The expression is emphatic, 'Every one whosoever'—shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved—Joel 2. 32; quoted also by Peter, in his great Pentecostal sermon (Acts 2. 21), with evident application to Christ. 14, 15. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? and . . . believe in him of whom they have not heard? and . . . hear without a preacher? and . . . preach except sent?—q. d., 'True, the same Lord over all is rich unto all alike that call upon Him: But this calling implies believing, and believing hearing, and hearing preaching, and preaching a mission to preach: Why, then, take ye it so ill, O children of Abraham, that in obedience to our heavenly mission (Acts 26. 16-18) we preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ?' as it is written—(Isaiah 52. 7.) How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, &c.—The whole chapter of Isaiah from which this is taken, and the three that follow, are so richly Messianic, that there can be no doubt 'the glad tidings' there spoken of announce a more glorious release than of Judah from the Babylonish captivity, and the very feet of its preachers are called "beautiful" for the sake of their message. 16, 17. But they have not all obeyed the gospel—i. e., the Scripture hath prepared us to expect this sad result. For Esaias saith, Lord, who hath believed our report?—q. d., 'Where shall one find a believer?' The prophet speaks as if next to none would believe: The apostle softens this into "They have not all believed." So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God—q. d., 'This is another confirmation of the truth that faith supposes the hearing of the Word, and this a commission to preach*

it.' 18. But I say, Have they not heard?—('Did they not hear?')—Can Israel, through any region of his dispersion, plead ignorance of these glad tidings? Yes, verily, their sound went ('their voice went out') into all the earth, and their words unto the end of the world—These beautiful words are from Psalm 19. 4. Whether the apostle quoted them as in their primary intention applicable to his subject [as OLSHAUSEN, ALFORD, &c.], or only 'used scriptural language to express his own ideas, as is done involuntarily almost by every preacher in every sermon' [HODGE], expositors are not agreed. But though the latter may seem the more natural since "the rising of the Sun of righteousness upon the world" (Malachi 4. 2), "the Day-spring from on high visiting us, giving light to them that sat in darkness, and guiding our feet into the way of peace" (Luke 1. 78, 79), must have been familiar and delightful to the apostle's ear, we cannot doubt that the irradiation of the world with the beams of a better Sun by the universal diffusion of the gospel of Christ, must have a mode of speaking quite natural, and to him scarcely figurative. 19. But I say, Did not Israel know?—know, from their own Scriptures, of God's intention to bring in the Gentiles? First—i. e., First in the prophetic line [DE WETTE]. Moses saith, &c.—'I will provoke you to jealousy ('against') [them that are] not a nation, and against a nation without understanding will I anger you' (Deuteronomy 32. 21). In this verse God warns His ancient people that because they had (that is, in after times would) moved Him to jealousy with their "no-gods," and provoked Him to anger with their vanities, He in requital would move them to jealousy by receiving into His favour a "no-people," and provoke them to anger by adopting a nation void of understanding. 20. But Esaias is very bold, and saith—i. e., is still plainer, and goes even the length of saying—I was found of them that sought me not—until I sought them—I was made ('became') manifest unto them that asked not after me—until the invitation from Me came to them. That the calling of the Gentiles was meant by these words of the prophet (Isaiah 65. 1) is manifest from what immediately follows, "I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that was not called by my name." 21. But to (rather, 'with regard to') Israel he saith, All day ('All the day') long I have stretched out ('did I stretch forth') my hands—the attitude of gracious entreaty. unto a disobedient and gainsaying people—These words, which immediately follow the announcement just quoted of the calling of the Gentiles, were enough to forewarn the Jews both of God's purpose to eject them from their privileges, in favour of the Gentiles, and of the cause of it on their own part.—Note (1.) Mere sincerity, and even earnestness in religion—though it may be some ground of hope for a merciful recovery from error—is no excuse, and will not compensate, for the deliberate rejection of saving truth, when in the providence of God presented for acceptance (v. 1-3; and see on ch. 9., note 7). (2.) The true cause of such rejection of saving truth, by the otherwise sincere, is the prepossession of the mind by some false notions of its own. So long as the Jews "sought to set up their own righteousness," it was in the nature of things impossible that they should "submit themselves to the righteousness of God;" the one of these two methods of acceptance being in the teeth of the other (v. 3). (3.) The essential terms of salvation have in every age been the same: "Whosoever will" is invited to "take of the water of life freely," Revelation 22. 17 (v. 13). (4.) How will the remembrance of the simplicity, reasonableness, and absolute freeness of God's plan of salvation overwhelm those that perish from under the sound of it (v. 4-13). (5.) How piercingly and perpetually should that question—"HOW SHALL THEY HEAR WITHOUT A PREACHER?"—sound in the ears of all the churches, as but the apostolic echo of their Lord's parting injunction, "PREACH THE GOSPEL TO EVERY CREATURE" (Mark 16. 15), and how far below the proper standard of love, zeal, and self-sacrifice must the churches as yet be, when with so plentiful a harvest the labourers are yet so few (Matthew 9. 37, 38) and that cry from the lips of pardoned, gifted, consecrated* men—"Here am I, send me" (Isaiah 6. 8), is not heard everywhere (v. 14, 15)! (6.) The blessing of a covenant-relation to God is the irrevocable privilege of no people and no Church; it can be preserved only by fidelity, on our part, to the covenant itself (v. 19). (7.) God is often found by those who apparently are the farthest from Him, while He remains undiscovered by those who think themselves the nearest (v. 20, 21). (8.) God's dealings even with reprobate sinners are full of tenderness and compassion; all the day long extending the arms of His mercy even to the disobedient and gainsaying. This will be felt and acknowledged at last by all who perish, to the glory of God's forbearance and to their own confusion (v. 21).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-36. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED AND CONCLUDED—THE ULTIMATE INBRINGING OF ALL ISRAEL, TO BE, WITH THE GENTILES, ONE KINGDOM OF GOD ON THE EARTH. 1. I say then, Hath ('Did') God cast away his people? God forbid—Our Lord did indeed announce that "the kingdom of God should be taken from Israel" (Matthew 21. 41); and when asked by the Eleven, after His resurrection, if he would at that time "restore the kingdom to Israel," His reply is a virtual admission that Israel was in some sense already out of covenant (Acts 1. 9). Yet here the apostle teaches that, in two respects, Israel was not "cast away;" First, Not totally; Second, Not finally. FIRST, Israel is not wholly cast away. for I also am an Israelite (see Philippians 3. 5)—and so a living witness to the contrary. of the seed of Abraham—of pure descent from the father of the faithful, of the tribe of Benjamin (Philippians 3. 5)—that tribe which, on the revolt of the ten tribes, constituted, with Judah, the one faithful kingdom of God (1 Kings 12. 21), and after the captivity was, along with Judah, the kernel of the Jewish nation (Ezra 4. 1; 10. 9). 2-2. God hath ('did') not cast away his people (i. e., wholly) which he foreknew—On the word "foreknew," see on ch. 8. 29. Wot (i. e., 'Know') ye not that the Scripture saith of (lit., 'in,' i. e., in the section which relates to) Elias: how he maketh intercession ('pleadeth') against Israel—(The word "saying," which follows, as also the particle "and" before "digged down," should be omitted, as without MSS. authority.) and I am left alone—'I only am left.' seven thousand, that have not bowed the knee to Baal—not "the image of Baal," according to the supplement of our version. 5. Even so at this present time—'in this present season;' this period of Israel's rejection. (See Acts 1. 7, Greek.) there is—'there obtains,' or 'hath remained,' a remnant according to the election of grace—q. d., 'As in Elijah's time the apostasy of Israel was not so universal as it seemed to be, and as he in his despondency concluded it to be, so now, the rejection of Christ by Israel is not so appalling in extent as one would be apt to think: There is now, as there was then, a faithful remnant; not however of persons naturally better than the unbelieving mass, but of persons graciously chosen to salvation.' (See 1 Corinthians 4. 7; 2 Thessalonians 2. 13.) This establishes our view of the argument on Election in ch. 9., as not being an election of Gentiles in the room of Jews, and merely to religious advantages, but a sovereign choice of some of Israel itself, from amongst others, to believe and be saved. (See on ch. 9. 6.) 6. And, &c.—better, 'Now if it (the election) be by grace, it is no more of works; for [then] grace becomes no more grace: but if it be of works,' &c. (The authority of ancient MSS. against this latter clause, as superfluous and not originally in the text, though strong, is not sufficient, we think, to justify its exclusion. Such seeming redundancies are not unusual with our apostle.) The general position here laid down is of vital importance: That there are but two possible sources of salvation—men's works, and God's grace; and that these are so essentially distinct and opposite, that salvation cannot be of any combination or mixture of both, but must be wholly either of the one or of the other. (See on ch. 4., note 3.) 7-10. What then?—How stands the fact? Israel hath not obtained that which he

seeketh for—better 'What Israel is in search of &c. Justification, or acceptance with God—see on ch. 9. 31; this he found not; but the election (the elect remnant of Israel) found it, and the rest were hardened,' or judicially given over to the 'hardness of their own hearts,' as it is written (Isaiah 29. 10, and Deuteronomy 29. 4), God hath given ('gave') them the spirit of slumber ('stupor') . . . unto this ('this present') day. And David saith—Psalm 69. 23—which in such a Messianic psalm must be meant of the rejecters of Christ. Let their table, &c.—i. e., let their very blessings prove a curse to them, and their enjoyments only sting and take vengeance on them. let their eyes be darkened . . . and bow down their back always—expressive either of the deceitfulness, or of the servile condition, to come on the nation through the just judgment of God. The apostle's object in making these quotations is to show that what he had been compelled to say of the then condition and prospects of his nation was more than borne out by their own Scriptures. But SECONDLY, God hath not cast away his people finally. The illustration of this point extends from v. 11 to v. 31. 11. I say then, Have they stumbled ('Did they stumble') that they should fall? God forbid; but (the supplement "rather" is better omitted) through their fall—lit., 'trespass,' but here best rendered 'false step' (Dr WETTE); not "fall," as in our version. salvation is come to the Gentiles, to provoke them to jealousy—Here, as also in ch. 10. 19 (quoted from Deuteronomy 32. 21), we see that emulation is a legitimate stimulus to what is good. 12. Now if the fall of them ('But if their trespass,' or 'false step') be the riches of the (Gentile) world—as being the occasion of their accession to Christ, and the diminishing of them (i. e., the reduction of the true Israel to so small a remnant) the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness!—i. e., their full recovery (see on v. 26); q. d., 'If an event so untoward as Israel's fall was the occasion of such unspeakable good to the Gentile world, of how much greater good may we expect an event so blessed as their full recovery to be productive?' 13. I speak ('am speaking') to you Gentiles—another proof that this Epistle was addressed to Gentile believers. (See on ch. 1. 13.) I magnify ('glorify') mine office—The clause beginning with "inasmuch" should be read as a parenthesis. if I may provoke, &c. (see on v. 11) . . . my flesh—Cf. Isaiah 58. 7. 15. For if the casting away of them—The apostle had denied that they were cast away (v. 1); here he affirms it. But both are true; they were cast away, though neither totally nor finally, and it is of this partial and temporary rejection that the apostle here speaks. be the reconciling of the (Gentile) world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead!—The reception of the whole family of Israel, scattered as they are among all nations under heaven, and the most inveterate enemies of the Lord Jesus, will be such a stupendous manifestation of the power of God upon the spirits of men, and of His glorious presence with the heralds of the Cross, as will not only kindle devout astonishment far and wide, but so change the dominant mode of thinking and feeling on all spiritual things as to seem like a resurrection from the dead. 16. For ('But') if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also [holy]; and is the root, so the branches—The Israelites were required to offer to God the first-fruits of the earth—both in their raw state, in a sheaf of newly-reaped grain (Leviticus 23. 10, 11), and in their prepared state, made into cakes of dough (Numbers 15. 19-21)—by which the whole produce of that season was regarded as hallowed. It is probable that the latter of these offerings is here intended, as to it the word "lump" best applies; and the argument of the apostle is, that as the separation unto God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, from the rest of mankind, as the parent stem of their race, was as real an offering of first-fruits as that which hallowed the produce of the earth, so, in the Divine estimation, it was as real a separation of the mass or "lump" of that nation in all time to God. The figure of the "root" and its "branches" is of like import—the consecration of the one of them extending to the other, 17, 18. And if—rather 'But if' q. d., 'If not withstanding this consecration of Abraham's race to God. some of the branches—The mass of the unbelieving and rejected Israelites are here called "some," not, as before, to meet Jewish prejudice (see on ch. 3, 3, and on "not all" in ch. 30, 16), but with the opposite view of checking Gentile pride. and thou, being a wild olive, wert ('wast') grafted in among them—Though it is more usual to graft the superior cutting upon the inferior stem, the opposite method, which is intended here, is not without example. and with them partakest ('wast made partaker'—along with the branches left, the believing remnant) of the root and fatness of the olive tree (the rich grace secured by covenant to the true seed of Abraham), boast not against the (rejected) branches. But if thou (do) boast, (remember that) thou bearest not ('it is not thou that bearest') the root, but the root thee—q. d., 'If the branches may not boast over the root that bears them, then may not the Gentile boast over the seed of Abraham; for what is thy standing, O Gentile, in relation to Israel, but that of a branch in relation to the root? From Israel hath come all that thou art and hast in the family of God; for "salvation is of the Jews" (John 4, 22). 19-21. Thou wilt say then (as a plea for boasting), The branches were broken off, that I might be grafted in. Well—(q. d., 'Be it so, but remember that')—because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest (not as a Gentile, but solely) by faith—But as faith cannot live in those "whose soul is lifted up" (Habakkuk 2, 4)—Be not high-minded, but fear (Proverbs 23, 14; Philippians 2, 12); for if God spared not the natural branches (sprung from the parent stem), take heed lest he also spare not thee (a mere wild graft)—The former might, beforehand, have been thought very improbable; but, after that, no one can wonder at the latter. 22, 23. Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them that fell, severity (in rejecting the chosen seed); but toward thee, goodness ('God's goodness' is the true reading)—i. e., His sovereign goodness in admitting thee to a covenant-standing who before wert a "stranger to the covenants of promise" (Ephesians 2, 12-20). if thou continue in his goodness—in believing dependence on that pure goodness which made thee what thou art. otherwise, &c. . . . And they also ('Yea, and they'), if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again—This appeal to the power of God to effect the recovery of His ancient people implies the vast difficulty of it—which all who have ever laboured for the conversion of the Jews are made depressingly to feel. That intelligent expositors should think that this was meant of individual Jews, reintroduced from time to time into the family of God on their believing on the Lord Jesus, is surprising; and yet those who deny the national recovery of Israel must and do so interpret the apostle. But this is to confound the two things which the apostle carefully distinguishes. Individual Jews have been at all times admissible, and have been admitted, to the Church through the gate of faith in the Lord Jesus. This is the "remnant, even at this present time, according to the election of grace," of which the apostle, in the first part of the chapter, had cited himself as one. But here he manifestly speaks of something not then existing, but to be looked forward to as a great future event in the economy of God, the reingrafting of the nation as such, when they "abide not in unbelief." And though this is here spoken of merely as a supposition (if their unbelief shall cease)—in order to set it over against the other supposition, of what will happen to the Gentiles if they shall not abide in the faith—the supposition is turned into an explicit prediction in the verses following. 24. For if thou wert cut ('wert cut off') from the olive tree, which is wild by nature, and wast grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree; how much more shall these, &c.—This is just the converse of v. 21: 'As the excision of the merely engrafted Gentiles through unbelief is a thing much more to be expected than was the excision of the natural Israel, before it happened; so the restoration of Israel, when they shall be brought to believe in Jesus, is a thing far more in the line of what we should expect, than the admission of the Gentiles to a standing which they never before enjoyed.'

25 For I would not . . . that ye should be ignorant of this mystery—The word "mystery," so often used by our apostle, does not mean (as with us) something incomprehensible, but 'something before kept secret, either wholly or for the most part, and now only fully disclosed' (cf. ch. 16, 25; 1 Corinthians 2, 7-10; Ephesians 1, 9, 10; 3, 3-6, 9, 10, &c.). lest ye should be wise in your own conceits—as if ye alone were in all time coming to be the family of God. that blindness ('hardness') in part is happened to ('hath come upon') Israel—i. e., hath come partially, or upon a portion of Israel. until the fulness of the Gentiles be ('have') come in—i. e., not the general conversion of the world to Christ, as many take it; for this would seem to contradict the latter part of this chapter, and throw the national recovery of Israel too far into the future: besides, in v. 15, the apostle seems to speak of the receiving of Israel, not as following, but as contributing largely to bring about the general conversion of the world—but, 'until the Gentiles have had their full time of the visible Church all to themselves while the Jews are out, which the Jews had till the Gentiles were brought in.' See Luke 21, 24. 26, 27. And so all Israel shall be saved—To understand this great statement, as some still do, merely of such a gradual inbringing of individual Jews, that there shall at length remain none in unbelief, is to do manifest violence both to it and to the whole context. It can only mean the ultimate ingathering of Israel as a nation, in contrast with the present "remnant." [So THOLUCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD HODGE.] Three confirmations of this now follow: two from the prophets, and a third from the Abrahamic covenant itself. First, as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall (or, according to what seems the true reading, without the "and"—'He shall') turn away ungodliness from Jacob—The apostle, having drawn his illustrations of man's sinfulness chiefly from Psalm 14, and Isaiah 59, now seems to combine the language of the same two places regarding Israel's salvation from it. [BENGEL.] In the one place the Psalmist longs to see the "salvation of Israel coming out of Zion" (Psalm 14, 7); in the other, the prophet announces that "the Redeemer (or, "Deliverer") shall come to (or for) Zion" (Isaiah 59, 20). But as all the glorious manifestations of Israel's God were regarded as issuing out of Zion, as the seat of His manifested glory (Psalm 20, 2; 110, 2; Isaiah 31, 9), the turn which the apostle gives to the words merely adds to them that familiar idea. And whereas the prophet announces, that He "shall come to (or, 'for') them that turn from transgression in Jacob," while the apostle makes Him say that He shall come "to turn away ungodliness from Jacob," this is taken from the LXX. version, and seems to indicate a different reading of the original text. The sense, however, is substantially the same in both. Second, for—rather, 'and' (again); introducing a new quotation. this is my covenant with them (lit., 'this is the covenant from me unto them') when I shall take away their sins—This, we believe, is rather a brief summary of Jeremiah 31, 31-34, than the express words of any prediction. Those who believe that there are no predictions regarding the literal Israel in the Old Testament, that stretch beyond the end of the Jewish economy, are obliged to view these quotations by the apostle as mere adaptations of Old Testament language to express his own predictions [ALEXANDER on Isaiah, &c.]. But how forced this is, we shall presently see. 28, 29. As concerning the Gospel they are enemies for your sakes—i. e., they are regarded and treated as enemies (in a state of exclusion through unbelief, from the family of God) for the benefit of you Gentiles; in the sense of v. 11, 15. but as touching the election (of Abraham and his seed), they are beloved—even in their state of exclusion—for the fathers' sakes. For the gifts and calling ('and the calling') of God are without repentance ('not to be,' or 'cannot be repented of')—By the "calling of God," in this case, is meant that sovereign act by which God, in the exercise of His free choice, "called"

Abraham to be the father of a peculiar people; while "the gifts of God" here denote the articles of the covenant which God made with Abraham, and which constituted the real distinction between his and all other families of the earth. Both these, says the apostle, are irrevocable; and as the point for which he refers to this at all is the final destiny of the Israelitish nation, it is clear that the perpetuity through all time of the Abrahamic covenant is the thing here affirmed. And lest any should say that though Israel, as a nation, has no destiny at all under the Gospel, but as a people disappeared from the stage when the middle wall of partition was broken down, yet the Abrahamic covenant still endures in the spiritual seed of Abraham, made up of Jews and Gentiles in one undistinguished mass of redeemed men under the Gospel—the apostle, as if to preclude that supposition, expressly states that the very Israel who, as concerning the Gospel, are regarded as "enemies for the Gentiles' sakes," are "beloved for the fathers' sakes;" and it is in proof of this that he adds, "For the gifts and the calling of God are without repentance." But in what sense are the now unbelieving and excluded children of Israel "beloved for the fathers' sakes?" Not merely from ancestral recollections, as one looks with fond interest on the child of a dear friend for that friend's sake [DR. ARNOLD]—a beautiful thought, and not foreign to Scripture, in this very matter (see 2 Chronicles 20. 7; Isaiah 41. 8)—but it is from ancestral connections and obligations, or their lineal descent from and oneness in covenant with the fathers with whom God originally established it. In other words, the natural Israel—not "the remnant of them according to the election of grace," but THE NATION, sprung from Abraham according to the flesh—are still an elect people, and as such, "beloved." The very same love which chose the fathers, and rested on the fathers as a parent stem of the nation, still rests on their descendants at large, and will yet recover them from unbelief, and reinstate them in the family of God. 30, 31. For as ye in times past have not believed (or, 'obeyed') God—that is, yielded not to God "the obedience of faith," while strangers to Christ. yet now have obtained mercy through (by occasion of) their unbelief—(See on v. 11, 15, 28.) even so have these (the Jews) now not believed (or, 'now been disobedient'), that through your mercy (the mercy shown to you) they also may obtain mercy—Here is an entirely new idea. The apostle has hitherto dwelt upon the unbelief of the Jews as making way for the faith of the Gentiles—the exclusion of the one occasioning the reception of the other; a truth yielding to generous, believing Gentiles but mingled satisfaction. Now, opening a more cheering prospect, he speaks of the mercy shown to the Gentiles as a means of Israel's recovery; which seems to mean that it will be by the instrumentality of believing Gentiles that Israel as a nation is at length to "look on Him whom they have pierced and mourn for Him," and so to "obtain mercy." (See 2 Corinthians 3. 15, 16.) 32. For God hath concluded them all in unbelief ('hath shut them all up to unbelief') that he might have mercy upon all—i. e., those "all" of whom he had been discoursing; the Gentiles first, and after them the Jews. [FRITZSCHE, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, PHILIPPI, STUART, HODGE.] Certainly it is not 'all mankind individually' [MEYER, ALFORD]; for the apostle is not here dealing with individuals, but with those great divisions of mankind, Jew and Gentile. And what he here says is, that God's purpose was to shut up each of these divisions of men to the experience first of an humbled, condemned state, without Christ, and then to the experience of His mercy in Christ. 33. Oh the depth, &c.—The apostle now yields himself up to the admiring contemplation of the grandeur of that Divine plan which he had sketched out. of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God—Many able expositors render this, 'of the riches and wisdom and knowledge,' &c. [ERASMUS, GROTIUS, BENGEL, MEYER, DE WETTE, THOLUCK, OLSHAUSEN, FRITZSCHE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, REVISED VERSION.] The words will certainly bear this sense, "the depth of God's riches." But "the riches of God" is a much rarer expression with our apostle than the riches of this or that perfection of God; and the words immediately following limit our attention to the unsearchableness of God's "judgments," which probably means His decrees or plans (Psalm 119. 75), and of "His ways," or the method by which He carries these into effect. [So LUTHER, CALVIN, BESA, HODGE, &c.] Besides, all that follows to the end of the chapter seems to show that while the Grace of God to guilty men in Christ Jesus is presupposed to be the whole theme of this chapter, that which called forth the special admiration of the apostle, after sketching at some length the Divine purposes and methods in the bestowment of this grace, was "the depth of the riches of God's wisdom and knowledge" in these purposes and methods. The "knowledge," then, points probably to the vast sweep of Divine comprehension herein displayed; the "wisdom" to that fitness to accomplish the ends intended, which is stamped on all this procedure. 34, 35. For who hath known the mind of the Lord?—see Job 15. 8; Jeremiah 23. 13 or who hath been his counsellor—see Isaiah 40. 13, 14 or who hath first given to him, and it shall be recompensed to him ('and shall have recompense made to him') again—see Job 35. 7, and 41. 11. These questions, it will thus be seen, are just quotations from the Old Testament, as if to show how familiar to God's ancient people was the great truth which the apostle himself had just uttered, that God's plans and methods in the dispensation of His Grace have a reach of comprehension and wisdom stamped upon them which finite mortals cannot fathom, much less could ever have imagined, before they were disclosed. 36. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom ('to Him') be glory for ever. Amen—Thus worthily—with a brevity only equalled by its sublimity—does the apostle here sum up this whole matter. "Of Him are all things," as their eternal Source: "THROUGH Him are all things," inasmuch as He brings all to pass which in His eternal counsel He proposed: "To Him are all things," as being His own last End; the manifestation of the glory of His own perfections being the ultimate, because the highest possible, design of all His procedure from first to last.—On this rich chapter, Note (1.) It is an unspeakable consolation to know that in times of deepest religious declension and most extensive defection from the truth, the lamp of God has never been permitted to go out, and that a faithful remnant has ever existed,—a remnant larger than their own drooping spirits could easily believe (v. 1-5). (2.) The preservation of this remnant, even as their separation at the first, is all of mere grace (v. 5, 6). (3.) When individuals and communities, after many fruitless warnings, are abandoned of God, they go from bad to worse (v. 7-10). (4.) God has so ordered His dealings with the great divisions of mankind, "that no flesh should glory in His presence." Gentile and Jew have each in turn been "shut up to unbelief," that each in turn may experience the "mercy" which saves the chief of sinners (v. 11-32). (5.) As we are "justified by faith," so are we "kept by the power of God through faith"—faith alone—unto salvation (v. 20-32). (6.) God's covenant with Abraham and his natural seed is a perpetual covenant, in equal force under the gospel as before it. Therefore it is, that the Jews as a nation still survive, in spite of all the laws which, in similar circumstances, have either extinguished or destroyed the identity of other nations. And therefore it is that the Jews as a nation will yet be restored to the family of God, through the subjection of their proud hearts to Him whom they have pierced. And as believing Gentiles will be honoured to be the instruments of this stupendous change, so shall the vast Gentile world reap such benefit from it, that it shall be like the communication of life to them from the dead. (7.) Thus has the Christian Church the highest motive to the establishment and vigorous prosecution of missions to the Jews; God having not only promised that there shall be a remnant of them gathered in every age, but pledged Himself to the final ingathering of the whole nation, assigned the honour of that ingathering to the Gentile Church, and assured them that the event, when it does arrive, shall have a life-giving effect upon the whole world (v. 12-16, 26-31). (8.) Those who think that in all the evangelical prophecies of the Old Testament the terms "Jacob," "Israel," &c., are to be understood solely of the Christian Church, would appear to read the Old Testament differently from the apostle, who, from the use of those very terms in Old Testament prophecy, draws arguments to prove that God has mercy in store for the natural Israel (v. 26, 27). (9.) Mere intellectual investigations into Divine truth in general, and the sense of the living oracles in particular, as they have a hardening effect, so they are a great contrast to the spirit of our apostle, whose lengthened sketch of God's majestic procedure towards men in Christ Jesus ends here in a burst of admiration, which loses itself in the still loftier frame of adoration (v. 33-36).

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-21. DUTIES OF BELIEVERS, GENERAL AND PARTICULAR. The doctrinal teaching of this Epistle is now followed up by a series of exhortations to practical duty. And first, the all-comprehensive duty. 1. I beseech you therefore—In view of all that has been advanced in the foregoing part of this Epistle. by the mercies of God—those mercies, whose free and unmerited nature, glorious Channel, and saving fruits have been opened up at such length. that ye present—See on ch. 6. 13, where we have the same exhortation and the same word there rendered "yield" (as also in v. 16, 19). your bodies—i. e., 'yourselves in the body,' considered as the organ of the inner life. As it is through the body that all the evil that is in the unrenewed heart comes forth into palpable manifestation and action, so it is through the body that all the gracious principles and affections of believers reveal themselves in the outward life. Sanctification extends to the whole man (1 Thessalonians 5. 23, 24). a living sacrifice—in glorious contrast to the legal sacrifices, which, save as they were slain, were no sacrifices at all. The death of the one "Lamb of God, taking away the sin of the world," has swept all dead victims from off the altar of God, to make room for the redeemed themselves as "living sacrifices" to Him who made "Him to be sin for us;" while every outgoing of their grateful hearts in praise, and every act prompted by the love of Christ, is itself a sacrifice to God of a sweet-smelling savour (Hebrews 13. 15, 16). holy—As the Levitical victims, when offered without blemish to God, were regarded as holy, so believers, "yielding themselves to God as those that are alive from the dead, and their members as instruments of righteousness unto God, are, in His estimation, not ritually but really "holy," and so—acceptable ('well-pleasing') unto God—not as the Levitical offerings, merely as appointed symbols of spiritual ideas, but objects, intrinsically, of Divine complacency, in their renewed character, and endeared relationship to Him through His Son Jesus Christ. which is your reasonable (rather, 'rational') service—in contrast, not to the senselessness of idol-worship, but to the offering of irrational victims under the law. In this view the presentation of ourselves, as living monuments of redeeming mercy, is here called "our rational service;" and surely it is the most rational and exalted occupation of God's reasonable creatures. So 2 Peter 1. 5, "to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ." and so ye not conformed to this world (cf. Ephesians 2. 2; Galatians 1. 4, Greek); but be ye transformed—or, 'transformed' (as in Matthew 17. 2; and 2 Corinthians 3. 18, Greek). by the renewing of your mind—not by a mere outward disconformity to the ungodly world, many of whose actions in themselves may be virtuous and praiseworthy; but by such an inward spiritual transformation as makes the whole life new—new in its motives and ends, even where the actions differ in nothing from those of the world—new, considered as a whole, and in such a sense as to be wholly unattainable save through the constraining power of the love of Christ. that ye may prove—i. e., experimentally. (See on the word "experience" in ch. 5. 4, and cf. 1 Thessalonians 5. 10, where the sentiment is the same.) what is that ('the') good and acceptable ('well-pleasing'), and perfect will of God—We prefer this rendering [with CALVIN, REVISED VERSION &c.] to that which many able critics [THOLUCK, MEYER, DE WETTE, FRITZSCHE, PHILIPPI, ALFORD, HODGE] adopt—'that ye may prove,' or 'discern the will of God, [even] what is good, and acceptable, and perfect.' God's will is "good," as it demands only what is essentially and unchangeably good (ch. 7. 10); it is "well-pleasing," in contrast with all that is arbitrary, as demanding only what God has eternal complacency in (cf. Micah 6. 8, with Jeremiah 9. 24); and it is "perfect," as it required nothing else than the perfection of God's reasonable creature, who, in proportion as he attains to it, reflects God's own perfection. Such then is the great general duty of the redeemed—SELF-CONSECRATION, in our whole spirit and soul and body to Him who hath called us into the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ. Next follow specific duties, chiefly social; beginning with Humility, the chiefest of all the graces—but here with special reference to spiritual gifts. 3. For I say (authoritatively), through the grace given unto me—as an apostle of Jesus Christ; thus exemplifying his own precept by modestly falling back on that office which both warranted and required such plainness towards all classes. to every man that is among you, not to think, &c.—It is impossible to convey in good English the emphatic play, so to speak, which each word here has upon another: 'not to be high-minded above what he ought to be minded, but so to be minded as to be sober-minded.' [CALVIN, ALFORD.] This is merely a strong way of characterizing all undue self-elevation. according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith—Faith is here viewed as the inlet to all the other graces, and so, as the receptive faculty of the renewed soul—q. d., 'As God hath given to each his particular capacity to take in the gifts and graces which He designs for the general good.' 4, 5. For as we have many members, &c.—The same diversity and yet unity obtains in the body of Christ, whereof all believers are the several members, as in the natural body. 6-8. Having then gifts differing according to the grace given to us—Here, let it be observed, all the gifts of believers alike are viewed as communications of mere grace. whether (we have the gift of) prophecy—i. e., of inspired teaching: as in Acts 15. 32. Any one speaking with Divine authority—whether with reference to the past, the present, or the future—was termed a prophet (Exodus 7. 1, &c.). [let us prophesy] according to the proportion of faith—rather, 'of our faith.' Many Romish expositors and some Protestant (as CALVIN and BENIGEL, and, though, hesitatingly, BEZA and HODGE), render this 'the analogy of faith,' understanding by it 'the general tenor' or 'rule of faith,' divinely delivered to men for their guidance. But this is against the context, whose object is to show that as all the gifts of believers are according to their respective capacity for them, they are not to be prized on account of them, but to use them purely for their proper ends. or ministry, [let us wait] on ('be occupied with') our ministering—The word here used imports any kind of service, from the dispensing of the word of life (Acts 6. 4) to the administering of the temporal affairs of the Church (Acts 6. 1-3). The latter seems intended here, being distinguished from "prophesying," "teaching," and "exhorting." or he that teacheth—Teachers are expressly distinguished from prophets, and put after them, as exercising a lower function (Acts 13. 1; 1 Corinthians 12. 28, 29). Probably it consisted mainly in opening up the evangelical bearings of Old Testament Scripture; and it was in this department apparently that Apollos showed his power and eloquence (Acts 18. 24). or he that exhorteth—Since all preaching, whether by apostles, prophets, or teachers, was followed up by exhortation (Acts 11. 23; 14. 22; 15. 32, &c.), many think that no specific class is here in view. But if liberty was given to others to exercise themselves occasionally in exhorting the brethren generally, or small parties of the less instructed, the reference may be to them. he that giveth—in the exercise of private benevolence probably, rather than in the discharge of diaconal duty. with simplicity—So the word probably means. But as simplicity seems enjoined in the next clause but one of this same verse, perhaps the meaning here is, 'with liberality,' as the same word is rendered in 2 Corinthians 8. 2; 9. 11. he that ruleth—whether in the Church or his own household. See 1 Timothy 3. 4, 5, where the same word is applied to both. with diligence—with earnest purpose. he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness—not only without grudging either trouble or pecuniary relief, but feeling it to be "more blessed to give than to receive," and to help than be helped. 9. Let love be without dissimulation—'Let your love be unfeigned,' as in 2 Corinthians 6. 6; 1 Peter 2. 22; and see 1 John 3. 18. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good—What a lofty tone of moral principle and feeling is here inculcated! It is not, Abstain from the one, and do the other; nor, Turn away from the one, and draw to the other; but, Abhor the one, and cling, with deepest sympathy, to the other. 10. Be, &c.—better, 'In brotherly love be affectionate one to another; in [giving, or showing] honour, outdoing each other.' The word rendered 'prefer' means rather 'to go before,' 'take the lead,' i. e., 'show an example.' How opposite is this to the reigning morality of the heathen world! and though Christianity has so changed the spirit of society, that a certain beautiful disinterestedness and self-sacrifice shines in the character of not a few who are but partially, if at all under the transforming power of the Gospel, it is only those whom "the love of Christ constrains to live not unto themselves," who are capable of thoroughly acting in the spirit of this precept. 11. not slothful in business—The word rendered "business" means 'zeal,' 'diligence,' 'purpose,' denoting the energy of action. serving the Lord—i. e., the Lord Jesus (see Ephesians 6. 5-8). Another reading—'serving the time,' or 'the occasion'—which differs in form but very slightly from the received reading, has been adopted by good critics [LUTHER, OLSHAUSEN, FRITZSCHE, MEYER]. But as MS. authority is decidedly against it, so is internal evidence; and comparatively few favour it. Nor is the sense which it yields a very Christian one. 12. rejoicing, &c.—Here it is more lively to retain the order and the verbs of the original: In hope rejoicing; in tribulation, enduring; in prayer, persevering.' Each of these exercises helps the other. If our "hope" of glory is so assured that it is a rejoicing hope, we shall find the spirit of "endurance in tribulation" natural and easy; but since it is "prayer" which strengthens the faith that begets hope, and lifts it up into an assured and joyful expectancy, and since our patience in tribulation is fed by this, it will be seen that all depends on our "perseverance in prayer." 13. given to hospitality—i. e., the entertainment of strangers. In times of persecution, and before the general institution of houses of entertainment, the importance of this precept would be at once felt. In the East, where such houses are still rare, this duty is regarded as of the most sacred character. [HODGE.] 14. Bless (i. e., Call down by prayer a blessing on) them which persecute you, &c.—This is taken from the Sermon on the Mount, which, from the allusions made to it, seems to have been the store-house of Christian morality among the churches. 15. Rejoice with them that rejoice; weep (the "and" should probably be omitted) with them that weep—What a beautiful spirit of sympathy with the joys and sorrows of others is here inculcated! But it is only one charming phase of the unselfish character which belongs to all living Christianity. What a world will ours be when this shall become its reigning spirit! Of the two, however, it is more easy to sympathize with another's sorrows than his joys, because in the one case he needs us; in the other not. But just for this reason the latter is the more disinterested, and so the nobler. 16. Be ('Being') of the same mind one toward another—The feeling of the common bond which binds all Christians to each other, whatever diversity of station, cultivation, temperament, or gifts may obtain among them, is the thing here enjoined. This is next taken up in detail. Mind not ('not minding') high things—i. e., cherish not ambitious or aspiring purposes and desires. As this springs from selfish severance of our own interests and objects from those of our brethren, so it is quite incompatible with the spirit inculcated in the preceding clause. but condescend ('condescending') to men of low estate—or (as some render the words), 'inclining unto the things that be lowly.' But we prefer the former. Be not wise in your own conceits—This is just the application of the caution against high-mindedness to the estimate we form of our own mental character. 17. Recompense ('Recompensing'), &c.—see on v. 14. Provide ('Providing') things honest ('honourable') in the sight of all men—The idea (which is from Proverbs 3. 4) is the care which Christians should take so to demean themselves as to command the respect of all men. 18. If it be possible (i. e., if others will let you), as much as lieth in you (or, 'dependeth on you') live peaceably (or, 'be at peace') with all men—The impossibility of this in some cases is hinted at, to keep up the hearts of those who, having done their best unsuccessfully to live in peace, might be tempted to think the failure was necessarily owing to themselves. But how emphatically expressed is the injunction to let nothing on our part prevent it! Would that Christians were guiltless in this respect! 19-21. avenge not, &c.—see on v. 14. but [rather] give place unto wrath—This is usually taken to mean, 'but give room or space for wrath to spend itself.' But as the context shows that the injunction is to leave vengeance to God, "wrath" here seems to mean, not the offence, which we are tempted to avenge, but the avenging wrath of God (see 2 Chronicles 24. 18), which we are enjoined to await, or give room for. (So the best interpreters.) if thine enemy hunger, &c.—This is taken from Proverbs 25. 21, 22, which without doubt supplied the basis of those lofty precepts on that subject which form the culminating point of the Sermon on the Mount. in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head—As the heaping of "coals of fire" is in the Old Testament the figurative expression of Divine vengeance (Psalm 140. 10; 11. 6, &c.), the true sense of these words seem to be, 'That will be the most effectual vengeance—a vengeance under which he will be fain to bend.' [So ALFORD, HODGE, &c.] The next verse confirms this. Be not overcome of evil—for then you are the conquered party. but overcome evil with good—and then the victory is yours; you have subdued your enemy in the noblest sense.—Note (1.) The redeeming mercy of God in Christ is, in the souls of believers, the living spring of all holy obedience (v. 1). (2.) As redemption under the gospel is not by irrational victims, as under the law, but "by the precious blood of Christ" (1 Peter 1. 18, 19), and, consequently, is not ritual but real, so the sacrifices which believers are now called to offer are all "living sacrifices;" and these—summed up in self-consecration to the service of God—are "holy and acceptable to God," making up together "our rational service" (v. 1). (3.) In this light, what are we to think of the so-called 'unbloody sacrifice of the mass, continually offered to God as a propitiation for the sins both of the living and the dead,' which the adherents of Rome's corrupt faith have been taught for ages to believe is the highest and holiest act of Christian worship—in direct opposition to the sublimely simple teaching which the Christians of Rome first received (v. 1)! (4.) Christians should not feel themselves at liberty to be conformed to the world, if only they avoid what is manifestly sinful; but rather, yielding themselves to the transforming power of the truth as it is in Jesus, they should strive to exhibit before the world an entire renovation of heart and life (v. 2). (5.) What God would have men to be, in all its beauty and grandeur, is for the first time really apprehended, when "written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tables of stone, but on the fleshy tables of the heart," 2 Corinthians 3. 3 (v. 2). (6.) Self-sufficiency and lust of power are peculiarly unlovely in the vessels of mercy, whose respective graces and gifts are all a Divine trust for behoof of the common body and of mankind at large (v. 3, 4). (7.) As forgetfulness of this has been the source of innumerable and unspeakable evils in the Church of Christ, so the faithful exercise by every Christian of his own peculiar office and gifts, and the loving recognition of those of his brethren, as all of equal importance in their own place, would put a new face upon the visible Church, to the vast benefit and comfort of Christians themselves and to the admiration of the world around them (v. 6-8). (8.) What would the world be, if it were filled with Christians having but one object in life, high above every other—to “serve the Lord”—and throwing into this service ‘alacrity’ in the discharge of all duties, and abiding “warmth of spirit” (v. 11)! (9.) Oh how far is even the living Church from exhibiting the whole character and spirit, so beautifully portrayed in the latter verses of this chapter (v. 12-21)! What need of a fresh baptism of the Spirit in order to this! And how “fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners,” will the Church become, when at length instinct with this Spirit! The Lord hasten it in its time!

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-14. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED—POLITICAL AND SOCIAL RELATIONS—MOTIVES. 1, 2. Let every soul—every man of you—be subject unto the higher powers—or, ‘submit himself to the authorities that are above him.’ For there is no power (‘no authority’) but of God; the powers that be are (‘have been’) ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power—‘So that he that setteth himself against the authority’—resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation—or, ‘condemnation,’ according to the old sense of that word; that is, not from the magistrate, but from God, whose authority in the magistrate’s is resisted. 3, 4. For rulers are not a terror to good works—‘to the good work,’ as the true reading appears to be—but to the evil . . . he beareth not the sword in vain—i. e., the symbol of the magistrate’s authority to punish. 5. Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath—for fear of the magistrate’s vengeance—but also for conscience’ sake—from reverence for God’s authority. It is of Magistracy in general, considered as a Divine ordinance, that this is spoken: and the statement applies equally to all forms of government, from an unchecked despotism—such as flourished when this was written, under the Emperor Nero—to a pure democracy. The inalienable right of all subjects to endeavour to alter or improve the form of government under which they live is left untouched here. But since Christians were constantly charged with turning the world upside down, and since there certainly were elements enough in Christianity of moral and social revolution to give plausibility to the charge, and tempt noble spirits, crushed under misgovernment, to take redress into their own hands, it was of special importance that the pacific, submissive, loyal spirit of those Christians who resided at the great seat of political power, should furnish a visible refutation of this charge. 6, 7. For, for this cause pay ye (rather, ‘ye pay’) tribute also—q. d., “This is the reason why ye pay the contributions requisite for maintaining the civil government,” for they are God’s ministers, attending continually upon (‘to’) this very thing. Render therefore to all their dues—From magistrates the apostle now comes to other officials, and from them to men related to us by whatever title. tribute—land tax, custom—mercantile tax, fear—reverence for superiors, honour—the respect due to persons of distinction. 8. Owe no man anything, but to love one another—q. d., ‘Acquit yourselves of all obligations except love, which is a debt that must remain ever due.’ [HODGE.] for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law—for the law itself is but love in manifold action, regarded as matter of duty. 9. For this, &c.—better thus: ‘For the [commandments], Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not covet, and whatever other commandment [there may be], it is summed up,’ &c. The clause, “Thou shalt not bear false witness,” is wanting in all the most ancient MSS.) The apostle refers here only to the second table of the law, as love to our neighbour is what he is treating of. 10. Love worketh no ill to his (or, one’s) neighbour; therefore, &c.—As love, from its very nature, studies and delights to please its object, its very existence is an effectual security against our wilfully injuring him. Next follow some general motives to the faithful discharge of all these duties. 11. And that—rather, ‘And this’ [do]—knowing the time, that now it is high time—id., ‘the hour has already come,’ for us to awake out of sleep—of stupid, fatal indifference to eternal things, for now is our salvation—rather, ‘the salvation,’ or simply ‘salvation’—nearer than when we (first) believed—This is in the line of all our Lord’s teaching, which represents the decisive day of Christ’s second appearing as at hand, to keep believers ever in the attitude of wakeful expectancy, but without reference to the chronological nearness or distance of that event. 12. The night (of evil) is far spent, the day (of consummated triumph over it) is at hand, let us therefore cast off (as a dress) the works of darkness—all works holding of the kingdom and period of darkness, with which, as followers of the risen Saviour, our connection has been dissolved, and let us put on the armour of light—described at large in Ephesians 6 11-18. 13. Let us walk honestly (‘becomingly,’ ‘seemingly’) as in the day—q. d., ‘Men choose the night for their revels, but our night is past, for we are all the children of the light and of the day (1 Thessalonians 5. 5): let us therefore only do what is fit to be exposed to the light of such a day.’ not in rioting and drunkenness—varied forms of intemperance; denoting revels in general, usually ending in intoxication, not in chambering and wantonness—varied forms of impurity; the one pointing to definite acts, the other more general. not in strife and envying—varied forms of that venomous feeling between man and man which reverses the law of love. 14. But—to sum up all in one word—put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ—in such wise that Christ only may be seen in you (see 2 Corinthians 3. 3; Galatians 3. 27; Ephesians 4. 24). and make no provision (‘take no forethought’) for the flesh, to [fulfil] the lusts [thereof]—q. d., ‘direct none of your attention to the cravings of your corrupt nature, how you may provide for their gratification.’—Note (1.) How gloriously adapted is Christianity for human society in all conditions! As it makes war directly against no specific forms of government, so it directly recommends none. While its holy and benign principles secure the ultimate abolition of all iniquitous government, the reverence which it teaches for magistracy, under whatever form, as a Divine institution, secures the loyalty and peaceableness of its disciples, amid all the turbulence and distractions of civil society, and makes it the highest interest of all states to welcome it within their pale, as in this as well as every other sense—“the salt of the earth, the light of the world” (v. 1-5). (2.) Christianity is the grand specific for the purification and elevation of all the social relations; inspiring a readiness to discharge all obligations, and most of all, implanting in its disciples that love which secures all men against injury from them, inasmuch as it is the fulfilling of the law (v. 6-10). (3.) The rapid march of the kingdom of God, the advanced stage of ‘t at which we have arrived, and the ever-nearing approach of the perfect day—nearer to every believer the longer he lives—should quicken all the children of light to redeem the time, and, seeing that they look for such things, to be diligent, that they may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless (2 Peter 3. 14). (4.) In virtue of ‘the expulsive power of a new and more powerful affection,’ the great secret of persevering holiness in all manner of conversation will be found to be “Christ in us, the hope of glory” (Colossians 1. 27), and Christ on us, as the character in which alone we shall be able to shine before men (2 Corinthians 3. 18) (v. 14).

CHAPTER XIV.

SEPARANCE. The subject here, and on to ch. 15. 13, is the consideration due from stronger Christians to their weaker brethren; which is but the great law of love (treated of in ch. 13.) in one particular form. 1. Him that is weak in the faith—rather, 'In faith;' i. e., not 'Him that is weak in the truth believed' [CALVIN, BEZA, ALFORD, &c.], but (as most interpreters agree), 'Him whose faith wants that firmness and breadth which would raise him above small scruples.' (See on v. 22, 23.) receive ye—to cordial Christian fellowship—but not to doubtful disputations—rather, perhaps, 'not to the deciding of doubts,' or 'scruples;' i. e., not for the purpose of arguing him out of them; which indeed usually does the reverse; whereas to receive him to full brotherly confidence and cordial interchange of Christian affection is the most effectual way of drawing them off. Two examples of such scruples are here specified, touching Jewish meats and days. "The strong," it will be observed, are those who knew these to be abolished under the gospel; "the weak" are those who had scruples on this point. 2. one believeth that he may eat all things—See Acts 10. 16. another, who is weak, eateth herbs—restricting himself probably to a vegetable diet, for fear of eating what might have been offered to idols, and so would be unclean. (See 1 Corinthians 8.) 3. Let not him that eateth despise (look down superciliously upon) him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not judge (sit in judgment censoriously upon) him that eateth: for God hath received him—as one of His dear children, who in this matter acts not from laxity, but religious principle. 4. Who art thou that judgest another man's (rather, 'another's') servant?—i. e., CHRIST'S, as the whole context shows, especially v. 8, 9. Yea, &c.—'But he shall be made to stand, for God is able to make him stand;' i. e., to make good his standing, not at the day of judgment, of which the apostle treats in v. 10, but in the true fellowship of the Church here, in spite of thy censures. 5. One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day—The supplement "alike" should be omitted, as injuring the sense. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind—be guided in such matters by conscientious conviction. 6. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it to the Lord—the Lord CHRIST, as before—and he . . . not, to the Lord he doth not—each doing what he believes to be the Lord's will. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks—The one gave thanks to God for the flesh which the other scrupled to use; the other did the same for the herbs to which, for conscience' sake, he restricted himself. From this passage about the observance of days, ALFORD unhappily infers that such language could not have been used if the sabbath-law had been in force under the Gospel in any form. Certainly it could not, if the sabbath were merely one of the Jewish festival days; but it will not do to take this for granted merely because it was observed under the Mosaic economy. And certainly, if the sabbath was more ancient than Judaism; if, even under Judaism, it was enshrined amongst the eternal sanctities of the Decalogue, uttered, as no other parts of Judaism were, amidst the terrors of Sinai; and if the Lawgiver Himself said of it when on earth, "The Son of man is LORD EVEN OF THE SABBATH DAY" (see Mark 2. 28)—it will be hard to show that the apostle must have meant it to be ranked by his readers amongst those vanished Jewish festival days, which only "weakness" could imagine to be still in force—a weakness which those who had more light ought, out of love, merely to bear with. 7, 8. For none of us (Christians) liveth to himself—(See 2 Corinthians 5. 14, 15), to dispose of himself or shape his conduct after his own ideas and inclinations, and no man ('and none'—of us Christians) dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord (the Lord CHRIST; see next verse); and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live therefore, or die, we are the Lord's—Nothing but the most vivid explanation of these remarkable words could make them endurable to any Christian ear, if Christ were a mere creature.

For Christ is here—in the most emphatic terms, and yet in the most unimpassioned tone—held up as the supreme Object of the Christian's life, and of his death too; and that by the man whose horror of creature-worship was such, that when the poor Lycaonians would have worshipped himself, he rushed forth to arrest the deed, directing them to "the living God," as the only legitimate Object of worship (Acts 14. 15). Nor does Paul teach this here, but rather appeals to it as a known and recognized fact, of which he had only to remind his readers. And since the apostle, when he wrote these words, had never been at Rome, he could only know that the Roman Christians would assent to this view of Christ, because it was the common teaching of all the accredited preachers of Christianity, and the common faith of all Christians. 9. For to this end Christ both, &c.—The true reading here is, To this end Christ died and lived ['again'] that he might be Lord both of the dead and ('and of the') living—The grand object of His death was to acquire this absolute Lordship over His redeemed, both in their living and in their dying, as His of right. 10. But why, &c.—The original is more lively:—'But thou (the weaker believer), why judgest thou thy brother? And thou again (the stronger), why despisest thou thy brother?' for we shall all (the strong and the weak together) stand before the judgment-seat of Christ—All the most ancient and best MSS. read here, 'the judgment-seat of God.' The present reading doubtless crept in from 2 Corinthians 5. 10, where "the judgment-seat of Christ" occurs. But here "the judgment-seat of God" seems to have been used, with reference to the quotation and the inference in the next two verses. 11, 12. For it is written (Isalah 45. 23), As I live, saith the Lord (Hebrew, JEHOVAH), every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God—consequently, shall bow to the award of God upon their character and actions. So then (infers the apostle) every one of us shall give account of himself to God—Now, if it be remembered that all this is adduced quite incidentally, to show that CHRIST is the absolute Master of all Christians, to rule their judgments and feelings towards each other while "living," and to dispose of them "dying," the testimony which it bears to the absolute Divinity of Christ will appear remarkable. On any other view, the quotation to show that we shall all stand before the judgment-seat of God would be a strange proof that Christians are all amenable to Christ. 13. Let us not therefore judge ('assume the office of judge over') one another; but judge this rather, &c.—a beautiful sort of play upon the word 'judge,' meaning, 'But let this be your judgment, not to put a stumbling-block,' &c. 14, 15. I know, and am persuaded by (or rather, 'in') the Lord Jesus—as "having the mind of Christ" (1 Corinthians 2. 16). that there is nothing unclean of itself—Hence it is that he calls those "the strong" who believed in the abolition of all ritual distinctions under the Gospel. (See Acts 10. 15.) but ('save that') to him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean—q. d., 'and therefore, though you can eat of it without sin, he cannot.' But if thy brother be grieved (has his weak conscience hurt) with [thy] meat—rather, 'because of meat.' The word "meat" is purposely selected as something contemptible in contrast with the tremendous risk run for its sake. Accordingly, in the next clause, that idea is brought out with great strength. Destroy not him with ('by') thy meat for whom Christ died—The worth of even the poorest and weakest brother cannot be more emphatically expressed than by the words, "for whom Christ died." [OLSHAUSEN.] The same sentiment is expressed with equal sharpness in 1 Corinthians 8. 11. Whatever tends to make any one violate his conscience tends to the destruction of his soul; and he who helps, whether willingly or no, to bring about the one is guilty of aiding to accomplish the other. 16, 17. Let not then your good—i. e., this liberty of yours as to Jewish meats and days, well-founded though it be—be evil spoken of—for the evil it does to others. For the kingdom of God—or, as we should say Religion; i. e., the proper business and blessedness for which Christians are formed into a community of re-renewed men in thorough subjection to God (cf. 1 Corinthians 1. 20). is not meat and drink ('eating and drinking'); but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost—a beautiful and comprehensive division of living Christianity. The first—"righteousness"—has respect to God, denoting here 'rectitude,' in its widest sense (as in Matthew 6. 33); the second—"peace"—has respect to our neighbours, denoting 'concord' among brethren (as is plain from v. 19; cf. Ephesians 4. 3; Colossians 3. 14, 15); the third—"joy in the Holy Ghost"—has respect to ourselves. This phrase, 'joy in the Holy Ghost,' represents Christians as so thinking and feeling under the workings of the Holy Ghost, that their joy may be viewed rather as that of the blessed Agent who inspires it than their own (cf. 1 Thessalonians 1. 6). 18. For he that in these things—'in this,' meaning this threefold life. serveth Christ—Here again observe how, though we do these three things as a "kingdom of God," yet it is "Christ" that we serve in so doing; the apostle passing here from God to Christ as naturally as before from Christ to God—in a way to us inconceivable, if Christ had been viewed as a mere creature (cf. 2 Corinthians 8. 21). is acceptable to God, and approved of men—these being the things which God delights in, and men are constrained to approve. (Cf. Proverbs 3. 4; Luke 2. 52; Acts 2. 47; 19. 20.) the things, &c.—more simply, 'the things of peace, and the things of mutual edification.' For ('For the sake of') meat destroy not the work of God—see on v. 15. The apostle sees in whatever tends to violate a brother's conscience the incipient destruction of God's work (for every converted man is such)—on the same principle as "he that hateth his brother is a murderer" (1 John 3. 15). All things indeed are pure—'clean;' the ritual distinctions being at an end. but it is evil to the man (there is criminality in the man) who eateth with offence—i. e., so as to stumble a weak brother. 21. It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor [any thing] ('nor to do any thing') whereby ('wherein') thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak—rather, 'is weak.' These three words, it has been remarked, are each intentionally weaker than the other:—q. d., 'Which may cause a brother to stumble, or even be obstructed in his Christian course, nay—though neither of these may follow—wherein he continues weak; unable wholly to disregard the example, and yet unprepared to follow it.' But this injunction to abstain from flesh, from wine, and from whatsoever may hurt the conscience of a brother, must be properly understood. Manifestly, the apostle is treating of the regulation of the Christian's conduct with reference simply to the prejudices of the weak in faith; and his directions are to be considered not as prescriptions for one's entire lifetime, even to promote the good of men on a large scale, but simply as cautions against the too free use of Christian liberty in matters where other Christians, through weakness, are not persuaded that such liberty is divinely allowed. How far the principle involved in this may be legitimately extended, we do not inquire here; but ere we consider that question, it is of great importance to fix how far it is here actually expressed, and what is the precise nature of the illustrations given of it. 22. Hast thou faith—on such matters? have it to thyself (within thine own breast) before God—a most important clause. It is not mere sincerity, or a private opinion, of which the apostle speaks; it is conviction as to what is the truth and will of God. If thou hast formed this conviction in the sight of God, keep thyself in this frame before Him. Of course this is not to be over-pressed, as if it were wrong to discuss such points at all with our weaker brethren. All that is here condemned is such a zeal for small points as endangers Christian love. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that which he alloweth—allows himself to do nothing, about the lawfulness of which he has scruples; does only what he neither knows nor fears to be sinful. 23. And (rather, 'But') he that doubteth is damned—(see on the word "damnation," ch. 13. 2). if he eat, because [he eateth] not of faith—see on the meaning of "faith" here, v. 22. for whatsoever is not of faith is sin—a maxim of unspeakable importance in the Christian life.—Note (1. Some points in Christianity are unessential to Christian fellowship; so that though one may be in error upon them, he is not on that account to be excluded either from the communion of the Church or from the full confidence of those who have more light. This distinction between essential and non-essential truths is denied by some who affect more than ordinary zeal for the honour and truth of God. But they must settle the question with our apostle. (2.) Acceptance with God is the only proper criterion of right to Christian fellowship. Whom God receives, men cannot lawfully reject (v. 3, 4). (3.) As there is much self-pleasing in setting up narrow standards of Christian fellowship, so one of the best preservatives against the temptation to do this will be found in the continual remembrance that CHRIST is the one Object for whom all Christians live, and to whom all Christians die; this will be such a living and exalted bond of union between the strong and the weak as will overshadow all their lesser differences and gradually absorb them (v. 7-9). (4.) The consideration of the common judgment-seat at which the strong and the weak shall stand together will be found another preservative against the unlovely disposition to sit in judgment on one another (v. 10-12). (5.) How brightly does the supreme Divinity of Christ shine out in this chapter! The exposition itself supersedes further illustration here. (6.) Though forbearance be a great Christian duty, indifference to the distinction between truth and error is not thereby encouraged. The former is, by the lax, made an excuse for the latter. But our apostle, while teaching "the strong" to bear with "the weak," repeatedly intimates in this chapter where the truth really lay on the points in question, and takes care to call those who took the wrong side "the weak" (v. 1, 2, 14). (7.) With what holy jealousy ought the purity of the conscience to be guarded, since every deliberate violation of it is incipient perdition (v. 15, 20)! Some, who seem to be more jealous for the honour of certain doctrines than for the souls of men, enervate this terrific truth by asking how it bears upon the 'Perseverance of the saints;' the advocates of that doctrine thinking it necessary to explain away what is meant by "destroying the work of God" (v. 20), and "destroying him for whom Christ died" (v. 15), for fear of the doctrinal consequences of taking it nakedly; while the opponents of that doctrine are ready to ask, How could the apostle have used such language if he had believed that such a catastrophe was impossible? The true answer to both lies in dismissing the question as impertinent. The apostle is enunciating a great and eternal principle in Christian Ethics—that the wilful violation of conscience contains within itself a seed of destruction; or, to express it otherwise, that the total destruction of the work of God in the renewed soul, and, consequently, the loss of that soul for eternity, needs only the carrying out to its full effect of such violation of the conscience. Whether such effects do take place, in point of fact, the apostle gives not the most distant hint here; and therefore that point must be settled elsewhere. But, beyond all doubt, as the position we have laid down is emphatically expressed by the apostle, so the interests of all who call themselves Christians require to be proclaimed and pressed on every suitable occasion. (8.) Zeal for comparatively small points of truth is a poor substitute for the substantial and catholic and abiding realities of the Christian life (v. 17, 18). (9.) "Peace" amongst the followers of Christ is a blessing too precious to themselves, and, as a testimony to them that are without, too important, to be ruptured for trifles, even though some lesser truths be involved in these (v. 19, 20). Nor are those truths themselves disparaged or endangered thereby, but the reverse. (10.) Many things which are lawful are not expedient. In the use of any liberty, therefore, our question should be, not simply, Is this lawful? but even if so, Can it be used with safety to a brother's conscience?—How will it affect my brother's soul (v. 21)? It is permitted to no Christian to say with Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (Genesis 4. 9.) (11.) Whenever we are in doubt as to a point of duty—where abstinence is manifestly sinful, but compliance not clearly lawful—the safe course is ever to be preferred, for to do otherwise is itself sinful. (12.) Now exalted and beautiful is the Ethics of Christianity—by a few great principles teaching us how to steer our course amidst practical difficulties, with equal regard to Christian liberty, love, and confidence!

CHAPTER XV.

VER. 1-13. SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED AND CONCLUDED. 1. We then that are strong—on such points as have been discussed, the abolition of the Jewish distinction of meats and days under the gospel. See on ch. 14, 14, 20. ought . . . not to please ourselves—ought to think less of what we may lawfully do than of how our conduct will affect others. 2, 3. Let every one of us (lay himself out to) please his neighbour, (not indeed for his mere gratification, but) for his good (with a view) to his edification. For even Christ pleased not (lived not to please) himself; but, as it is written (Psalm 69, 9), The reproaches, &c.—see Mark 10, 42-45. 4. For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning ('instruction'); that we through, &c.—'through the comfort and the patience of the Scriptures'—might have hope—g. d., 'Think not that because such portions of Scripture relate immediately to Christ, they are inapplicable to you; for though Christ's sufferings, as a Saviour, were exclusively His own, the motives that prompted them, the spirit in which they were endured, and the general principle involved in His whole work—self-sacrifice for the good of others—furnish our most perfect and beautiful model; and so all Scripture relating to these is for our instruction; and since the duty of forbearance, the strong with the weak, requires "patience," and this again needs "comfort," all those Scriptures which tell of patience and consolation, particularly of the patience of Christ, and of the consolation which sustained Him under it, are our appointed and appropriate nutriment, ministering to us "hope" of that blessed day when these shall no more be needed.' See on ch. 4., note 7. (For the same connection between "patience and hope" see on ch. 12, 12, and 1 Thessalonians 1, 3.) 5, 6. Now the God of patience and consolation—Such beautiful names of God are taken from the graces which He inspires: as "the God of hope" (v. 13), "the God of peace" (v. 33), &c. grant you to be like minded ('of the same mind') according to Christ Jesus—It is not mere unanimity which the apostle seeks for them; for unanimity in evil is to be deprecated. But it is "according to Christ Jesus"—after the sublimest model of Him whose all-absorbing desire was to do, "not His own will, but the will of Him that sent Him" (John 6, 38). that, &c.—rather, 'that with one accord ye may with one mouth glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; the mind and the mouth of all giving harmonious glory to His name. What a prayer! And shall this never be realized on earth? 7. Wherefore—Returning to the point—receive ye one another to the glory of God—If Christ received us, and bears with all our weaknesses, well may we receive and compassionate one with another, and by so doing God will be glorified. 8-12. Now—'For' is the true reading: the apostle is merely assigning an additional motive to Christian forbearance. I say that Jesus Christ was ('hath become') a minister of the circumcision—a remarkable expression, meaning 'the Father's Servant for the salvation of the circumcision (or, of Israel),' for the truth of God—to make good the veracity of God towards His ancient people. to confirm the (Messianic) promises made unto the fathers—To cheer the Jewish believers, whom he might seem to have been disparaging, and to keep down Gentile pride, the apostle holds up Israel's salvation as the primary end of Christ's mission. But next after this, Christ was sent—that the Gentiles might glorify God for His mercy—A number of quotations from the Old Testament here follow, to show that God's plan of mercy embraced, from the first, the Gentiles along with the Jews. as it is written (Psalm 18, 49), I will confess to (i. e., glorify) thee among the Gentiles, &c. And again (Deuteronomy, 32, 43, though there is some difficulty in the Heb.), Rejoice, ye Gentiles, (along) with his people (Israel). And again (Psalm 117, 1). Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people ('peoples'—the various nations outside the pale of Judaism). And again, Kaais saith (Isaiah 11, 10), There shall be a ('the') root of Jesse—meaning, not 'He from whom Jesse sprang,' but 'He that is sprung from Jesse' (i. e., Jesse's son David,—see Revelation 22, 16. and he that shall rise, &c.—So the LXX. in substantial, though not verbal, agreement with the original. 13. Now, &c.—This seems a concluding prayer, suggested by the whole preceding subject-matter of the Epistle. the God of hope (see on v. 5) fill you with all joy and peace in believing—the native truth of that faith which is the great theme of this Epistle (cf. Galatians 5, 22). that ye may abound in hope—"of the glory of God." See on ch. 5, 1. through the power of the Holy Ghost—to whom, in the economy of redemption, it belongs to inspire believers with all gracious affections.—On the foregoing portion, Note (1.) No Christian is at liberty to regard himself as an isolated disciple of the Lord Jesus, having to decide questions of duty and liberty solely with reference to himself. As Christians are one body in Christ, so the great law of love binds them to act in all things with tenderness and consideration for their brethren in "the common salvation" (v. 1, 2). (2.) Of this unselfishness CHRIST is the perfect model of all Christians (v. 3). (3.) Holy Scripture is the Divine storehouse of all furniture for the Christian life, even in its most trying and delicate features (v. 4). (4.) The harmonious glorification of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ by the whole body of the redeemed, as it is the most exalted fruit of the scheme of redemption, so it is the last end of God in it (v. 5-7).

14-23. CONCLUSION: IN WHICH THE APOSTLE APOLOGIZES FOR THUS WRITING TO THE ROMAN CHRISTIANS, EXPLAINS WHY HE HAD NOT YET VISITED THEM, ANNOUNCES HIS FUTURE PLANS, AND ASKS THEIR PRAYERS FOR THE COMPLETION OF THEM. 14, 15. And, &c.—rather, 'Now I am persuaded, my brethren, even I myself, concerning you'—that ye also yourselves are full of goodness—of inclination to all I have been enjoining on you—filled with all knowledge (of the truth expounded), and able (without my intervention) to admonish one another. Nevertheless, I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort ('measure'), as putting you in mind, because of the grace that is given to me of God—as an apostle of Jesus Christ. 16. that I should be the (rather, 'a') minister—The word here used is commonly employed to express the office of the priesthood, from which accordingly the figurative language of the rest of the verse is taken. of Jesus Christ ('Christ Jesus,' according to the true reading) to the Gentiles—a further proof that the Epistle was addressed to a Gentile Church. See on ch. 1, 13. ministering the gospel of God—As the word here is a still more priestly one, it should be rendered [as in REVISED VERSION], 'ministering as a priest in the Gospel of God,' that the offering up of the Gentiles (as an oblation to God, in their converted character) might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost—the end to which the ancient offerings typically looked. 17. I have therefore whereof I may glory—or (adding the article, as the reading seems to be), 'I have my glorying,' through ('in') Christ Jesus in those things which pertain to God—the things of the ministry committed to me of God. 18-23. For I will not dare to speak of any ('to speak ought') of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me—a modest, though somewhat obscure form of expression, meaning, 'I will not dare to go beyond what Christ hath wrought by me'—in which form accordingly the rest of the passage is expressed. Observe here how Paul ascribes all the success of his labours to the activity of the living Redeemer, working in and by him. by word and deed—by preaching and working; which latter he explains in the next clause. through mighty (lit., 'in the power of') signs and wonders—i. e., glorious miracles. by the power of the Spirit of God—'the Holy Ghost,' as the true reading seems to be. This seems intended to explain

the efficacy of the word preached, as well as the working of the miracles which attested it, so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto ('as far as') Illyricum—to the extreme north-western boundary of Greece. It corresponds to the modern Croatia and Dalmatia (2 Timothy 4. 10). See Acts 20. 1, 2. I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ. Yea, &c.—rather, 'Yet making it my study (cf. 2 Corinthians 5. 9; 1 Thessalonians 4. 11, Greek), so to preach the Gospel, not where Christ was [already] named, that I might not build upon another man's foundation: but (might act) as it is written, To whom no tidings of Him came, they shall see,' &c. For which cause—'Being so long occupied with this missionary work, I have been much (or, 'for the most part') hindered,' &c. See on ch. 1. 9-11. 23, 24. But now having no more place ('no longer having place')—i. e., unbroken ground, where Christ has not been preached—and having a great desire ('a longing') these many years to come unto you (see, as before, on ch. 1. 9-11); whenever I take my journey into Spain—Whether this purpose was ever accomplished has been much disputed, as no record of it nor allusion to it anywhere occurs. Those who think our apostle was never at large after his first imprisonment at Rome will of course hold that it never was; while those who are persuaded, as we are, that he underwent a second imprisonment, prior to which he was at large for a considerable time after his first, incline naturally to the other opinion. I will come to you—If these words were not originally in the text, and there is weighty evidence against them, they must at least be inserted as a necessary supplement. in my journey, &c.—'as I pass through by you, to be set forward on my journey thither, if first I be somewhat filled with your company:' q. d., 'I should indeed like to stay longer with you than I can hope to do, but I must, to some extent at least, have my fill of your company.' 25-27. But now I go to Jerusalem to minister ('ministering') to the saints—in the sense immediately to be explained. For, &c.—better, 'For Macedonia and Achaia have thought good to make a certain contribution for the poor of the saints which are at Jerusalem. (See Acts 24. 17.) They have thought it good; and their debtors verily they are:'—q. d., 'And well they may, considering what the Gentile believers owe to their Jewish brethren.' For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also ('they owe it also') to minister unto them in carnal things—Cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 11; Galatians 6. 6; and see Luke 7. 4; Acts 10. 2, 28, 29. When therefore I have . . . sealed (i. e., delivered over safely) to them this fruit (of the faith and love of the Gentile converts), I will come ('come back,' or 'return') by you into Spain—See on v. 24. And I am sure ('I know') that . . . I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of Christ—Such, beyond all doubts, is the true reading, the words "of the gospel" being in hardly any MSS. of antiquity and authority. Nor was the apostle mistaken in this confidence, though his visit to Rome was in very different circumstances from what he expected. See Acts 28. 16—end. 30. Now I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit—or, 'by the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the love of the Spirit'—not the love which the Spirit bears to us, but that love which He kindles in the hearts of believers towards each other:—q. d., 'By that Saviour whose name is alike dear to all of us and whose unsearchable riches I live only to proclaim, and by that love one to another which the blessed Spirit diffuses through all the brotherhood, making the labours of Christ's servants a matter of common interest to all—I beseech you' that ye strive together with me in your prayers to God for me—implying that he had his grounds for anxious fear in this matter. 31. that I may be delivered from them that do not believe ('that do not obey,' i. e., the truth, by believing it; as in ch. 2. 8) in Judea—He saw the storm that was gathering over him in Judea, which, if at all, would certainly burst upon his head when he reached the capital; and the event too clearly showed the correctness of these apprehensions, and that my service which I have for Jerusalem—see on v. 25-28. may be accepted by ('prove acceptable to') the saints—Nor was he without apprehension lest the opposition he had made to the narrow jealousy of the Jewish converts against the free reception of their Gentile brethren, should make this gift of theirs to the poor saints at Jerusalem less welcome than it ought to be. He would have the Romans therefore to join him in wrestling with God that this gift might be gratefully received, and prove a cement between the two parties. But further. 32. that I may come unto you with ('in') joy by the will of God (Acts 18. 21; 1 Corinthians 4. 19; 16. 7; Hebrews 6. 3; James 4. 15), and may with you be refreshed—rather, 'with you refresh myself,' after all his labours and anxieties, and so be refitted for future service. 33. Now the God of peace be with you all. Amen—The peace here sought is to be taken in its widest sense: the peace of reconciliation to God, first, "through the blood of the everlasting covenant" (Hebrews 13. 20; 1 Thessalonians 5. 23; 2 Thessalonians 3. 16; Philipians 4. 9); then the peace which that reconciliation diffuses among all the partakers of it (1 Corinthians 14. 33; 2 Corinthians 13. 11; and see on ch. 16. 20); more widely still, that peace which the children of God, in beautiful imitation of their Father in heaven, are called and privileged to diffuse far and wide through this sin-distracted and divided world (ch. 22. 18; Matthew 5. 9; Hebrews 12. 14; James 3. 18).—Note (1.) Did "the chiefest of the apostles" apologize for writing to a Christian Church which he had never seen, and a Church that he was persuaded was above the need of it, save to "stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance" (2 Peter 1. 13; 3. 1); and did he put even this upon the sole plea of apostolic responsibility (v. 14-16)? What a contrast is thus presented to hierarchical pride, and in particular to the affected humility of the bishop of this very Rome! How close the bond which the one spirit draws between ministers and people—how wide the separation produced by the other! (2.) There is in the Christian Church no real priesthood, and none but figurative sacrifices. Had it been otherwise, it is inconceivable that the 16th verse of this chapter should have been expressed as it is. Paul's only priesthood and sacrificial offerings lay, first, in ministering to them as "the apostle of the Gentiles," not the sacrament with the 'real presence' of Christ in it, or the sacrifice of the mass, but "the Gospel of God," and then, when gathered under the wing of Christ, presenting them to God as a grateful offering, "being sanctified (not by sacrificial gifts, but) by the Holy Ghost." (See Hebrews 13. 9-16.) (3.) Though the debt we owe to those by whom we have been brought to Christ can never be discharged, we should feel it a privilege when we render them any lower benefit in return (v. 26, 27). (4.) Formidable designs against the truth and the servants of Christ should, above all other ways of counteracting them, be met by combined prayer to Him who rules all hearts and controls all events; and the darker the cloud, the more resolutely should all to whom Christ's cause is dear "strive together in their prayers to God" for the removal of it (v. 30, 31). (5.) Christian fellowship is so precious that the most eminent servants of Christ, amidst the toils and trials of their work, find it refreshing and invigorating; and it is no good sign of any ecclesiastic, that he deems it beneath him to seek and enjoy it even amongst the humblest saints in the Church of Christ (v. 24, 32).

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-27. CONCLUSION, EMBRACING SUNDRY SALUTATIONS AND DIRECTIONS, AND A CLOSING PRAYER. 1. I commend unto you Phoebe our sister, which is a servant (or 'deaconess') of the Church which is at Cenchrea—The word is Cenchreae, the eastern part of Corinth, Acts 18. 18. That in the earliest churches there were deaconesses, to attend to the wants of the female members, there is no good reason to doubt. So early at least as the reign of Trajan, we learn from PLINY's celebrated letter to that emperor—A. D. 110, or 111—that they existed in the Eastern churches. Indeed, from the relation in which

eyes then stood to each other, something of this sort would seem to have been a necessity. Modern attempts, however, to revive this office have seldom found favour; either from the altered state of society, or the abuse of the office, or both. 3. Receive her in the Lord—i. e., as a genuine disciple of the Lord Jesus. as ('so as') becometh saints—so as saints should receive saints. assist her in whatsoever business she hath ('may have') need of you—some private business of her own. for she hath been a succourer of many, and of myself also—See Psalm 41. 1-3; 2 Timothy 1. 16-18. 3-5. Salute Priscilla—The true reading here is 'Prisca' (as in 2 Timothy 4. 19), a contracted form of Priscilla, as "Silas" of "Silvanns." and Aquila my helpers—The wife is here named before the husband (as in Acts 18. 18, and v. 26, according to the true reading; also in 2 Timothy 4. 19), probably as being the more prominent and helpful to the Church. who have for my life laid down ('who did for my life lay down') their own necks—i. e., risked their lives; either at Corinth (Acts 18. 6, 9, 10), or more probably at Ephesus (Acts 19. 30, 31; and cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 32). They must have returned from Ephesus, where we last find them in the history of the Acts, to Rome, whence the edict of Claudius had banished them (Acts 18. 2); and doubtless, if not the principal members of that Christian community, they were at least the most endeared to our apostle. unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles—whose special apostle this dear couple had rescued from imminent danger. 5. Likewise the Church that is in their house—The Christian assembly that stately met there for worship. 'From his occupation as tent-maker, he had probably better accommodations for the meetings of the Church than most other Christians.' [HODGE.] Probably this devoted couple had written to the apostle such an account of the stated meetings at their house, as made him feel at home with them, and include them in this salutation, which doubtless would be read at their meetings with peculiar interest. Salute my [well] beloved Epænetus, who is the first-fruits (i. e., the first convert) of Achaia unto Christ—The true reading here, as appears by the MSS., is, 'the first-fruits of Asia unto Christ'—i. e., Proconsular Asia (see Acts 16. 6). In 1 Corinthians 16. 15 it is said that "the household of Stephanas was the first-fruits of Achaia;" and though if Epænetus was one of that family, the two statements might be reconciled according to the received text, there is no need to resort to this supposition, as that text is in this instance without authority. Epænetus, as the first believer in that region called Proconsular Asia, was dear to the apostle. See Hosea 9. 10; and Micah 7. 1. None of the names mentioned from v. 5-15 are otherwise known. One wonders at the number of them, considering that the writer had never been at Rome. But as Rome was then the centre of the civilized world, to and from which journeys were continually taken to the remotest parts, there is no great difficulty in supposing that so active a travelling missionary as Paul would, in course of time, make the acquaintance of a considerable number of the Christians then residing at Rome. 6. Greet (or 'salute') Mary, who bestowed much labour on us—labour, no doubt, of a womanly kind. 7. Andronicus and Junia—or, as it might be, 'Junias,' a contracted form of 'Junianus;' in this case, it is a man's name. But if, as is more probable, the word be, as in our version, "Junia," the person meant was no doubt either the wife or the sister of Andronicus. my kinsmen—or, 'relatives.' and my fellow-prisoners—on what occasion, it is impossible to say, as the apostle elsewhere tells us that he was "in prisons more frequent" (2 Corinthians 11. 23). which are of note among the apostles—Those who think the word "apostle" is used in a lax sense, in the Acts and Epistles, take this to mean 'noted apostles' [CHEYBOSTOM, LUTHER, CALVIN, BENGEL, OLSHAUSEN, THOLUCK, ALFORD, JOWETT]; others, who are not clear that the word "apostle" is applied to any without the circle of the Twelve, save where the connection or some qualifying words show that the literal meaning of 'one sent' is the thing intended, understand by the expression used here, 'persons esteemed by the apostles.' [BEZA, GROTIUS, DE WETTE, MEYER, FRITSCHKE, STUART, PHILIPPI, HODGE.] And of course, if "Junia" is to be taken for a woman, this latter must be the meaning, who also were in Christ before me—The apostle writes as if he envied them this priority in the faith. And, indeed, if to be "in Christ" be the most enviable human condition, the earlier the date of this blessed translation, the greater the grace of it. This latter statement about Andronicus and Junia seems to throw some light on the preceding one. Very possibly they may have been among the first-fruits of Peter's labours, gained to Christ either on the day of Pentecost or on some of the succeeding days. In that case they may have attracted the special esteem of those apostles who for some time resided chiefly at Jerusalem and its neighborhood; and our apostle, though he came late in contact with the other apostles, if he was aware of this fact, would have pleasure in alluding to it. 8. Amplias—a contracted form of 'Amplatus'—my beloved in the Lord—an expression of dear Christian affection. 9, 10. Urbane—rather, 'Urbanus;' It is a man's name. our helper ('fellow-labourer') in Christ. Salute Apelles approved ('the approved') in Christ—or, as we should say, 'that tried Christian;' a noble commendation. Salute them which are of Aristobulus [household]—It would seem, from what is said of Narcissus in the following verse, that this Aristobulus himself had not been a Christian; but that the Christians of his household simply were meant; very possibly some of his slaves. 11. Salute Herodion, my kinsman—(See on v. 7.) Greet them that be of [the household] of Narcissus, which are in the Lord—which implies that others in his house, including probably himself, were not Christians. 12. Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord—two active females. Salute the beloved Persis (another female), which laboured much in the Lord—referring probably, not to official services, such as would fall to the deaconesses, but to such higher Christian labours—yet within the sphere competent to woman—as Priscilla bestowed on Apollos and others (Acts 18. 18). 13. Salute Rufus, chosen ('the chosen') in the Lord—meaning, not 'who is one of the elect,' as every believer is, but 'the choice' or 'precious one' in the Lord. (See 1 Peter 2. 4; 1 John 13.) We read in Mark 15. 21 that Simon of Cyrene, whom they compelled to bear our Lord's cross, was "the father of Alexander and Rufus." From this we naturally conclude, that when Mark wrote his Gospel, Alexander and Rufus must have been well known as Christians among those by whom he expected his Gospel to be first read; and, in all likelihood, this was that very "Rufus;" in which case our interest is deepened by what immediately follows about his mother. and (salute) his mother and mine—The apostle calls her "his own mother," not so much as our Lord calls every elderly female believer His mother (Matthew 12. 49, 50), but in grateful acknowledgment of her motherly attentions to himself, bestowed no doubt for his Master's sake, and the love she bore to his honoured servants. To us it seems altogether likely that the conversion of Simon the Cyrenian dated from that memorable day when "passing (casually) by, as he came from the country" (Mark 15. 21), "they compelled him to bear the" Saviour's cross. Sweet compulsion, if what he thus beheld issued in his voluntarily taking up his own cross! Through him it is natural to suppose that his wife would be brought in, and that this believing couple, now "heirs together of the grace of life" (1 Peter 3. 7), as they told their two sons, Alexander and Rufus, what honour had unwittingly been put upon their father at that hour of deepest and dearest moment to all Christians, might be blessed to the inbringing of both of them to Christ. In this case, supposing the elder of the two to have departed to be with Christ ere this letter was written, or to have been residing in some other place, and Rufus left alone with his mother, how instructive and beautiful is the testimony here borne to her! 14, 15. Salute Asyncritus, &c.—These have been thought to be the names of ten less notable Christians than those already named. But this will hardly be supposed if it be observed that they are divided into two pairs of five each, and that after the first of these pairs it is added, "and the brethren which are with them," while after the second pair we have the words, "and all the saints which are with them." This perhaps hardly means that each of the five in both pairs had "a Church at his house," else probably this would have been more expressly said. But at least it would seem to indicate that they were each a centre of some few Christians who met at his house—it may be for further instruction, for prayer, for missionary purposes, or for some other Christian objects. These little peeps into the rudimentary forms which Christian fellowship first took in the great cities, though too indistinct for more than conjecture, are singularly interesting. Our apostle would seem to have been kept minutely informed as to the state of the Roman Church, both as to its membership and its varied activities, probably by Priscilla and Aquila.

16. Salute one another with an holy kiss—So 1 Corinthians 16. 20; 1 Thessalonians 5. 26; 1 Peter 5. 14. The custom prevailed among the Jews, and doubtless came from the East, where it still obtains. Its adoption into the Christian churches, as the symbol of a higher fellowship than it had ever expressed before, was probably as immediate as it was natural. In this case the apostle's desire seems to be that on receipt of his Epistle, with its salutations, they should in this manner expressly testify their Christian affection. It afterwards came to have a fixed place in the church service, immediately after the celebration of the Supper, and continued long in use. In such matters, however, the state of society and the peculiarities of different places require to be studied. The churches of Christ salute you—The true reading is, 'All the churches;' the word "all" gradually falling out, as seeming probably to express more than the apostle would venture to affirm. But no more seems meant than to assure the Romans in what affectionate esteem they were held by the churches generally; all that knew he was writing to Rome having expressly asked their own salutations to be sent to them. (See v. 19.) 17. Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned ('which ye learned'), and avoid them—The fomentors of "divisions" here referred to are probably those who were unfriendly to the truths taught in this Epistle, while those who caused "offences" were probably those referred to in ch. 14. 15 as haughtily disregarding the prejudices of the weak. The direction as to both is, first, to "mark" such, lest the evil should be done ere it was fully discovered; and next, to "avoid" them (cf. 2 Thessalonians 3. 6, 14), so as neither to bear any responsibility for their procedure, nor seem to give them the least countenance. 18. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ—'our Lord Christ' appears to be the true reading, but their own belly—not in the grosser sense, but as 'living for low ends of their own' (cf. Philipians 3. 19). and by good words and fair speeches deceive the simple—the unwary, the unsuspecting. See Proverbs 14. 15. 19. For your obedience (i. e., tractableness) is come abroad unto all. I am glad therefore on your behalf—I rejoice therefore over you, seems the true reading. but yet I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple—'harmless,' as in Matthew 10. 16, from which the warning is taken—concerning ('unto') evil—q. d., 'Your reputation among the churches for subjection to the teaching ye have received is to me sufficient ground of confidence in you; but ye need the serpent's wisdom to discriminate between transparent truth and plausible error, with that guileless simplicity which instinctively cleaves to the one and rejects the other.' 20. And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly—The apostle encourages the Romans to persevere in resisting the wiles of the devil with the assurance that, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, they are "shortly" to receive their discharge, and have the satisfaction of "putting their feet upon the neck" of that formidable Enemy—a symbol familiar, probably, in all languages to express not only the completeness of the defeat, but the abject humiliation of the conquered foe. See Joshua 10. 24; 2 Samuel 22. 41; Ezekiel 21. 29; Psalm 91. 13. Though the apostle here styles Him who is thus to bruise Satan, "the God of peace," with special reference to the "divisions" (v. 17) by which the Roman Church was in danger of being disturbed, this sublime appellation of God has here a wider sense, pointing to the whole "purpose for which the Son of God was manifested, to destroy the works of the devil" (1 John 3. 8); and indeed this assurance is but a reproduction of the first great promise, that the Seed of the woman should bruise the Serpent's head (Genesis 3. 15). The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen—The "Amen" here has no MS. authority. What comes after this, where one would have expected the Epistle to close, has its parallel in Philipians 4. 20, &c., and being in fact common in epistolary writings, is simply a mark of genuineness. 21. Timothy, my work-fellow—'my fellow-labourer;' see Acts 16. 1-5. The apostle mentions him here rather than in the opening address to this Church, as he had not been at Rome. [BENGEL.] and Lucius—not Luke, for the fuller form of 'Lucas' is not 'Lucius' but 'Lucanus.' The person meant seems to be "Lucius of Cyrene," who was among the "prophets and teachers" at Antioch with our apostle, before he was summoned into the missionary field. (Acts 13. 1.) and Jason—See Acts 17. 5. He had probably accompanied or followed the apostle from Thessalonica to Corinth. Sostater—See Acts 20. 4. 22. I, Tertius, who wrote this ('the') epistle—as the apostle's amanuensis, or penman—salute you in the Lord—So usually did the apostle dictate his Epistles, that he calls the attention of the Galatians to the fact that to them he wrote with his own hand. (Galatians 6. 11.) But this Tertius would have the Romans to know that, far from being a mere scribe, his heart went out to them in Christian affection; and the apostle, by giving his salutation a place here, would show what sort of assistants he employed. 23. Gaius mine host, and (the host) of the whole Church—See Acts 20. 4. It would appear that he was one of only two persons whom Paul baptized with his own hand; cf. 3 John 1. His Christian hospitality appears to have been something uncommon. Erastus the chamberlain ('treasurer') of the city—doubtless of Corinth. See Acts 19. 22; 2 Timothy 4. 20. and Quartus a brother—rather, 'the' or 'our brother;' as Sosthenes and Timothy are called, 1 Corinthians 1. 1, and 2 Corinthians 1. 1. (Greek.) Nothing more is known of this Quartus. 24. The grace, &c.—a repetition of the benediction precisely as in v. 20. save that it is here invoked on them "all." 25. Now to him that is of power—more simply, as in Jude 24, 'to Him that is able'—to stablish (confirm, or uphold) you, according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ—i. e., in conformity with the truths of that Gospel which I preach, and not I only, but all to whom has been committed "the preaching of Jesus Christ"—according to the revelation of the mystery (see on ch. 11. 25), which was kept secret since the world began—lit., 'which hath been kept in silence during eternal ages'—but is now made manifest—The reference here is to that peculiar feature of the Gospel economy which Paul himself was specially employed to carry into practical effect and to unfold by his teaching—the introduction of the Gentile believers to an equality with their Jewish brethren, and the new, and, to the Jews, quite unexpected form which this gave to the whole Kingdom of God; cf. Ephesians 3. 1-10, &c. This the apostle calls here a mystery hitherto undisclosed, in what sense the next verse will show, but now fully unfolded; and his prayer for the Roman Christians, in the form of a doxology to Him who was able to do what he asked, is that they might be established in the truth of the Gospel, not only in its essential character, but specially in that feature of it which gave themselves, as Gentile believers, their whole standing among the people of God, and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for (in order to) the obedience of faith—Lest they should think, from what he had just said, that God had brought in upon his people so vast a change on their condition without giving them any previous notice, the apostle here adds that, on the contrary, “the Scriptures of the prophets” contain all that he and other preachers of the Gospel had to declare on these topics, and indeed that the same “everlasting God,” who “from eternal ages” had kept these things hid, had given “commandment” that they should now, according to the tenor of those prophetic Scriptures, be imparted to every nation for their believing acceptance. 27. to God, &c.—‘To the only wise God through Jesus Christ, be’—lit., ‘to whom be;’ q. d., ‘to Him, I say, be the glory for ever Amen.’ At its outset, this is an ascription of glory to the power that could do all this; at its close it ascribes glory to the wisdom that planned and that presides over the gathering of a redeemed people out of all nations. The apostle adds his devout “Amen,” which the reader—if he has followed him with the astonishment and delight of him who pens these words—will fervently echo.—On this concluding section of the Epistle, note (1.) In the minute and delicate manifestations of Christian feeling, and lively interest in the smallest movements of Christian life, love, and zeal, which are here exemplified, combined with the grasp of thought and elevation of soul which this whole Epistle displays, as indeed all the writings of our apostle, we have the secret of much of that grandeur of character which has made the name of Paul stand on an elevation of its own in the estimation of enlightened Christendom in every age, and of that influence which under God, beyond all the other apostles, he has already exercised, and is yet destined to exert, over the religious thinking and feeling of men. Nor can any approach him in these peculiarities without exercising corresponding influence on all with whom they come in contact (v. 1-16). (2.) “The wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove”—in enjoining which our apostle here only echoes the teaching of his Lord (Matthew 10. 16)—is a combination of properties the rarity of which among Christians is only equalled by its vast importance. In every age of the Church there have been real Christians whose excessive study of the serpent’s wisdom has so sadly trenchanted upon their guileless simplicity, as at times to excite the distressing apprehension that they were no better than wolves in sheep’s clothing. Nor is it to be denied, on the other hand, that, either from inaptitude or indisposition to judge with many discrimination of character and of measures, many eminently simple, spiritual, devoted Christians, have throughout life exercised little or no influence on any section of society around them. Let the apostle’s counsel on this head (v. 19) be taken as a study, especially by young Christians, whose character has yet to be formed, and whose permanent sphere in life is but partially fixed; and let them prayerfully set themselves to the combined exercise of both those qualities. So will their Christian character acquire solidity and elevation, and their influence for good be proportionably extended. (3.) Christians should cheer their own and each other’s hearts, amidst the toils and trials of their protracted warfare, with the assurance that it will have a speedy and glorious end; they should accustom themselves to regard all opposition to the progress and prosperity of Christ’s cause—whether in their own souls, in the churches with which they are connected, or in the world at large—as just “Satan” in conflict, as ever, with Christ their Lord; and they should never allow themselves to doubt that “the God of peace” will “shortly” give them the neck of their Enemy, and make them to bruise the Serpent’s head (v. 20). (4.) As Christians are held up and carried through solely by Divine power, working through the glorious Gospel, so to that power, and to the wisdom that brought that Gospel nigh to them, they should ascribe all the glory of their stability now, as they certainly will of their victory at last (v. 25-27). (5.) “Has the everlasting God” “commanded” that the Gospel “mystery,” so long kept hid but now fully disclosed, shall be “made known to all nations for the obedience of faith” (v. 26)? Then, what “necessity is laid upon” all the churches and every Christian, to send the Gospel “to every creature!” And we may rest well assured that the prosperity or decline of churches, and of individual Christians, will have not a little to do with their faithfulness or indifference to this imperative duty.

The ancient subscription at the end of this Epistle—though of course of no authority—appears to be in this case quite correct.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE AUTHENTICITY of this Epistle is attested by Clement of Rome (Ep. to Corinth. c. 47), Polycarp (Ep. to Philipp. c. 11), and Irenæus (Adversus Hæres. 4. 27. 3). The city to which it was sent was famed for its wealth and commerce which were chiefly due to its situation between the Ionian and Ægean Seas on the isthmus connecting the Peloponnesus with Greece. In St. Paul’s time it was capital of the province Achaia and the seat of the Roman proconsul (Acts 18. 12). The state of morals in it was notorious for debauchery, even in the profligate heathen world; so much so that “to Corinthianize” was a proverbial phrase for “to play the wanton;” hence arose dangers to the purity of the Christian Church at Corinth. That Church was founded by St. Paul on his first visit (Acts 18. 1-17).

He had been the instrument of converting many Gentiles (ch. 12. 2), and some Jews (Acts 18. 8), notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the countrymen of the latter (Acts 18. 5), during the year and a half in which he sojourned there. The converts were chiefly of the humbler classes (ch. 1. 26, &c.). Crispus (ch. 1. 14; Acts 18. 8), Erastus and Gaius (Calus) were, however, men of rank (Romans 16. 23). A variety of classes is also implied in ch. 11. 22. The risk of contamination by contact with the surrounding corruptions, and the temptation to a craving for Greek philosophy and rhetoric (which Apollos’ eloquent style rather tended to foster, Acts 18. 24, &c.) in contrast to Paul’s simple preaching of Christ crucified (ch. 2. 1, &c.), as well as the opposition of certain teachers to him, naturally caused him anxiety. emissaries from the Judaizers of Palestine boasted of “letters of commendation” from Jerusalem, the metropolis of the faith. They did not, it is true, insist on circumcision in refined Corinth, where the attempt would have been hopeless, as they did among the simpler people of Galatia; but they attacked the apostolic authority of Paul (ch. 9. 1, 2; 2 Corinthians 10. 1, 7, 8), some of them declaring themselves followers of Cephas, the chief apostle, others boasting that they belonged to Christ Himself (ch. 1. 12; 2 Corinthians 10. 7), whilst they haughtily repudiated all subordinate teaching. Those persons gave out themselves for apostles (2 Corinthians 11. 5. 13). The ground taken by them was, that Pau-was not one of the Twelve, and not an eye-witness of the Gospel facts, and durst not prove his apostleship by claiming sustenance from the Christian Church. Another section avowed themselves followers of Paul himself, but did so in a party spirit, exalting the minister rather than Christ. The followers of Apollos, again, unduly prized his Alexandrian learning and eloquence, to the disparagement of the apostle, who studiously avoided any deviation from Christian simplicity (ch. 2. 1-5). In some of this last philosophizing party there may have arisen the Antinomian tendency which tried to defend theoretically their own practical immorality: hence their denial of the future resurrection, and their adoption of the Epicurean motto, prevalent in heathen Corinth, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die" (ch. 15). Hence, perhaps, arose their connivance at the incestuous intercourse kept up by one of the so-called Christian body with his stepmother during his father's life. The household of Chloe informed St. Paul of many other evils: such as contentions, divisions, and lawsuits brought against brethren in heathen law courts by professing Christians; the abuse of their spiritual gifts into occasions of display and fanaticism; the interruption of public worship by simultaneous and disorderly ministrations, and decorum violated by women speaking unveiled (contrary to Oriental usage), and so usurping the office of men, and even the holy communion desecrated by greediness and revelling on the part of the communicants. Other messengers also, came from Corinth, consulting him on the subject of (1.) the controversy about meats offered to idols; (2.) the disputes about celibacy and marriage; (3.) the due exercise of spiritual gifts in public worship; (4.) the best mode of making the collection which he had requested for the saints at Jerusalem (ch. 16. 1, &c.). Such were the circumstances which called forth the First Epistle to the Corinthians, the most varied in its topics of all the Epistles.

In ch. 5. 9, "I wrote unto you in an Epistle not to company with fornicators," it is implied that St. Paul had written a previous letter to the Corinthians (now lost). Probably in it he had also enjoined them to make a contribution for the poor saints at Jerusalem, whereupon they seem to have asked directions as to the mode of doing so, to which he now replies (ch. 16. 2). It also probably announced his intention of visiting them on his way to Macedonia, and again on his return from Macedonia (2 Corinthians 1. 15, 16), which purpose he changed on hearing the unfavourable report from Chloe's household (ch. 16. 5-7), for which he was charged with fickleness (2 Corinthians 1. 17). In the first Epistle which we have, the subject of fornication is alluded to only in a summary way, as if he were rather replying to an excuse set up after rebuke in the matter, than introducing it for the first time. [ALFORD.] Preceding this former letter, he seems to have paid a second visit to Corinth. For in 2 Corinthians 12. 4; 13. 1, he speaks of his intention of paying them a third visit, implying he had already twice visited them. See also Notes on 2 Corinthians 2. 1; 13. 2; also 1. 15, 16. It is hardly likely that during his three years' sojourn at Ephesus he would have failed to revisit his Corinthian converts, which he could so readily do by sea, there being constant maritime intercourse between the two cities. This second visit was probably a short one (cf. ch. 16. 7); and attended with pain and humiliation (2 Corinthians 2. 1; 12. 21), occasioned by the scandalous conduct of so many of his own converts. His milder censures having then failed to produce reformation, he wrote briefly directing them "not to company with fornicators." On their misapprehending this injunction, he explained it more fully in the Epistle, the first of the two extant (ch. 5. 9, 13). That the second visit is not mentioned in Acts is no objection to its having really taken place, as that book is fragmentary and omits other leading incidents in St. Paul's life; e. g., his visit to Arabia, Syria, and Cilicia (Galatians 1. 17-21).

The PLACE OF WRITING is fixed to be Ephesus (ch. 16. 8). The subscription in English Version, "From Philippi," has no authority whatever, and probably arose from a mistaken translation of ch. 16. 5, "For I am passing through Macedonia." At the time of writing St. Paul implies (ch. 16. 8) that he intended to leave Ephesus after Pentecost of that year. He really did leave it about Pentecost (57. A. D.). Cf. Acts 19. 20. The allusion to Passover imagery in connection with our Christian Passover, Easter (ch. 5. 7), makes it likely that the season was about Easter. Thus the date of the Epistle is fixed with tolerable accuracy, about Easter, certainly before Pentecost, in the third year of his residence at Ephesus, 57 A. D. For other arguments, see CONYBEARE and HOWSON'S Life and Ep. of St. Paul.

The Epistle is written in the name of Sosthenes "our brother." BIRKS supposes he is the same as the Sosthenes, Acts 18. 17, who, he thinks, was converted subsequently to that occurrence. He bears no part in the Epistle itself, the apostle in the very next verses (v. 4, &c.) using the first person: so Timothy is introduced, 2 Corinthians 1. 1. The bearers of the Epistle were probably Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (see the subscription), whom he mentions (ch. 16. 17, 18) as with him then, but who he implies are about to return back to Corinth; and therefore he commends them to the regard of the Corinthians.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-31. THE INSCRIPTION; THANKSGIVING FOR THE SPIRITUAL STATE OF THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH; REPROOF OF PARTY DIVISIONS; HIS OWN METHOD OF PREACHING ONLY CHRIST. 1. called to be—Found in some, not in others, of the oldest MSS. Possibly inserted from Romans 1. 1; but as likely to be genuine. Translate, lit., "a called apostle." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] through . . . will of God—not because of my own merit. Thus St. Paul's call as "an apostle by the will of God," whilst constituting the ground of the authority he claims in the Corinthian Church (cf. Galatians 1. 1), is a reason for humility on his own part (ch. 15. 8, 10). [BENGEL.] In assuming the ministerial office a man should see he does so not of his own impulse, but by the will of God (Jeremiah 21); Paul if left to his own will would never have been an apostle (Romans 9. 16). Sosthenes—See my Introduction. Associated by St. Paul with himself in the inscription, either in modesty, Sosthenes being his inferior (CHRYSOSTOM), or in order that the name of a "brother" of note in Corinth (Acts 18. 17) might give weight to his Epistle and might show, in opposition to his detractors that he was supported by leading brethren. Gallo had driven the Jews who accused Paul from the judgment-seat. The Greek mob, who disliked the Jews, took the opportunity then of beating Sosthenes the ruler of the Jewish synagogue, whilst Gallo looked on and refused to interfere, being secretly pleased that the mob should second his own contempt for the Jews. Paul probably at this time had showed sympathy for an adversary in distress, which issued in the conversion of the latter. Sc Crispus also, the previous chief ruler of the synagogue, had been converted. Saul the persecutor turned into Paul the apostle, and Sosthenes the leader in persecution against that apostle, were two trophies of Divine grace that, side by side, would appeal with double power to the Church at Corinth. [BIRKS.] 2. the Church of God—He calls it so notwithstanding its many blots. Fanatics and sectaries vainly think to anticipate the final sifting of the wheat and tares (Matthew 13. 27-30). 'It is a dangerous temptation to think there is no Church where there is not apparent perfect purity. He who thinks so, must at last separate from all others and think himself the only holy man in the world, or establish a peculiar sect with a few hypocrites. It was enough for Paul in recognizing the Corinthians as a Church, that he saw among them evangelical doctrine, baptism, and the Lord's Supper." [CALVIN.] It was the Church of God not of this or of that favourite leader. [CHRYSOSTOM.] at Corinth—a Church at dissolute Corinth—what a paradox of grace! sanctified—consecrated, or set apart as holy to God in (by union with) Christ Jesus. In the Greek there are no words "to them that are;" translate simply, "men sanctified," &c. called to be saints—rather, "called saints;" saints by calling: applied by Paul to all professing members of the Church. As "sanctified in Christ" implies the fountain sources of holiness, the believer's original sanctification in Christ (ch. 6. 11; Hebrews 10. 10, 14; 1 Peter 1. 2) in the purposes of God's grace; so "called saints" refer to their actual call (Romans 8. 30), and the end of that call that they should be holy (1 Peter 1. 15). with all that in every place call upon . . . Christ—The Epistle is intended for these also, as well as for the Corinthians. The true CATHOLIC CHURCH (a term first used by IGNATIUS, ad Smyrnæos, c. 8); not consisting of those who call themselves from Paul, Cephas, or any other eminent leader (v. 12), but of all, wherever they be, who call on Jesus as their Saviour in sincerity (cf. 2 Timothy 2. 22). Still a general unity of discipline and doctrine in the several churches is implied in ch. 4. 17; 7. 17; 11. 16; 14. 33, 36. The worship due to God is here attributed to Jesus (cf. Joel 2. 32; Matthew 4. 10; Acts 9. 14). both theirs and ours—"in every place which is their home . . . and our home also;" this is added to include the Christians throughout Achaia, not residing in Corinth the capital (2 Corinthians 1. 1). St. Paul feels the home of his converts to be also his own. Cf. a similar phrase, Romans 16. 13. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] "Ours" refers to Paul and Sosthenes, and the Corinthians' home. [ALFORD.] BEZA better explains, "Both their Lord and our Lord." All believers have one and the same Lord (ch. 8. 6; Ephesians 4. 5); a virtual reproof of the divisions of the Corinthians, as if Christ were divided (v. 13). 3. peace—peculiarly needed in the Corinthian Church, on account of its dissensions. On this verse see Romans 1. 7. 4. He puts the causes for praise and hope among them in the foreground, not to discourage them by the succeeding reproof, and in order to appeal to their better selves. my God—(Romans 1. 8; Philippians 1. 3.) always—(Cf. Philippians 1. 4.) the grace . . . given you—(Cf. v. 7.) by . . . Christ—lit., IN JESUS CHRIST—given you as members in Christ. 5. utterance—ALFORD from MENOCHIUS translates, "doctrine." Ye are rich in preachers or the preaching of the word, and rich in knowledge or apprehension of it: lit. (the word preached). English Version, as in 2 Corinthians 8. 7, is better: for St. Paul, purposing presently to dwell on the abuse of the two gifts on which the Corinthians most prided themselves, utterance (speech) and knowledge (ch. 1. 20; 3. 18; 4. 19; ch. 13. and 14.), previously gains their goodwill by congratulating them on having those gifts. 6. According as the testimony of (of, and concerning) Christ (who is both the object and author of this testimony [BENGEL]; ch. 2. 1; 1 Timothy 2. 6; 2 Timothy 1. 8) was confirmed among [ALFORD] you, i. e., by God, through my preaching, and through the miracles accompanying it (ch. 12. 8; Mark 16. 20; 2 Corinthians 1. 21, 22; Galatians 3. 2, 5; Ephesians 4. 7, 8; Hebrews 2. 4). God confirmed (cf. Philippians 1. 7; Hebrews 2. 3), or gave effect to the Gospel among (or better as English Version, "in") the Corinthians by their accepting it and setting their seal to its truth, through the inward power of His Spirit, and the outward gifts and miracles accompanying it. [CALVIN.] 7. ye come behind—are inferior to other Christians elsewhere. [GROTIVS.] in no gift—Not that all had all gifts, but different persons among them had different gifts (ch. 12. 4, &c.). waiting for . . . coming of . . . Christ—The crowning proof of their "coming behind in no gift," faith, hope, and love, are all exercised herein (cf. 1 Timothy 4. 8; Titus 2. 13). "Leaving to others their MEMENTO MORI (remember death), do thou earnestly cherish this joyous expectation of the Lord's coming." [BENGEL.] The Greek verb implies, "to expect constantly, not only for a certain time, but even to the end till the expected event happens" (Romans 8. 19). [TITM., Synonyms,] 8. Who—God, v. 4 (not Jesus Christ, v. 7, in which case it would be "in His day"). unto the end—viz., "the coming of Christ." blameless in the day of . . . Christ—(1 Thessalonians 5. 23.) After that day there is no danger (Ephesians 4. 30; Philippians 1. 6). Now is our day to work, and the day of our enemies to try us: then will be the day of Christ, and of His glory in the saints. [BENGEL.] 9. faithful—to His promises (Philippians 1. 6; 1 Thessalonians 5. 24). called—according to His purpose (Romans 8. 28). unto . . . fellowship of . . . Jesus—to be fellow-heirs with Christ (Romans 8. 17-23), like Him sons of God and heirs of glory (Romans 8. 30; 2 Thessalonians 2. 14; 1 Peter 5. 10; 1 John 1. 3). CHRYSOSTOM remarks that the name of Christ is oftener mentioned in this than in any other Epistle, the apostle designing thereby to draw them away from their party admiration of particular teachers to Christ alone. 10. Now—Ye already have knowledge, utterance, and hope, maintain also love. brethren—The very title is an argument for love. by . . . Christ—whom St. Paul wishes to be all in all to the Corinthians, and therefore names Him so often in this chapter. speak . . . same thing—not speaking different things as ye do (v. 12), in a spirit of variance. divisions—lit., splits breaches, but—but rather, perfectly joined together—the opposite word to "divisions." It is applied to healing a wound, or making whole a rent. mind . . . judgment—the view taken by the understanding, and the practical decision arrived at [CONYBEARE and HOWSON], as to what is to be done. The mind, within, refers to things to be believed: the judgment is displayed outwardly in things to be done. [BENGEL.] Disposition—opinion. [ALFORD.] 11. (Ch. 11. 18.) by them . . . of . . . house of Chloe—They seem to have been alike in the confidence of St. Paul and of the Corinthians. The Corinthians "wrote" to the apostle (ch. 7. 1) consulting him concerning certain points: marriage, the eating of things offered to idols, the decorum to be observed by women in religious assemblies. But they said not a syllable about the enormities and disorders that had crept in among them. That information reached Paul by other quarters. Hence his language about those evils is, "It hath been declared unto me," &c.; "It is reported commonly" (ch. 5. 1, 2). All this he says before he notices their letter, which shows that the latter did not give him any intimation of those evils. An undesigned proof of genuineness. [PALMY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] Observe his prudence: He names the family, to let it be seen that he made his allegation not without authority: he does not name the individuals, not to excite odium against them. He tacitly implies that the information ought rather to have come to him directly from their presbyters, as they had consulted him about matters of less moment. contentions—not so severe a word as "divisions," lit., schisms (Margin, v. 10). 12. this I say—this is what I mean in saying "contentions" (v. 11). every one of you saith—Ye say severally, glorying in men" (v. 31; ch. 3. 21, 22), one, I am of Paul; another, I am of Apollos; &c. Not that they formed definite parties, but they individually betrayed the spirit of party in contentions under the name of different favourite teachers. St. Paul will not allow himself to be flattered even by those who made his name their party cry, so as to connive at the dishonour thereby done to Christ. These probably were converted under his ministry. Those alleging the name of Apollos, Paul's successor at Corinth (Acts 18. 24, &c.), were persons attracted by his rhetorical style (probably acquired in Alexandria, ch. 2. 6), as contrasted with the "weak bodily presence" and "contemptible speech" of the apostle. Apollos, doubtless, did not willingly foster this spirit of undue preference (ch. 4. 6, 8); nay, to discourage it, he would not repeat his visit just then (ch. 16. 12). I of Cephas—Probably Judaizers, who sheltered themselves under the name of St. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision (Cephas is the Hebrew, Peter the Greek name; John 1. 42; Galatians 2. 11, &c.): the subjects handled in chs. 7.-9. were probably suggested as matters of doubt by them. The Church there began from the Jewish synagogue, Crispus the chief ruler, and Sosthenes his successor (probably), being converts. Hence some Jewish leaven, though not so much as elsewhere, is traceable (2 Corinthians 11. 22). Petrism afterwards sprang up much more rankly at Rome. If it be wrong to boast "I am of Peter," how much more so to boast "I am of the Pope!" [BENGEL.] I of Christ—A fair pretext used to slight the ministry of Paul and his other teachers (ch. 4. 8; 2 Corinthians 10. 7-11). 13. Is Christ divided?—into various parts (one under one leader, another under another). [ALFORD.] The unity of His body is not to be cut in pieces, as if all did not belong to Him, the One Head. was Paul crucified for you?—In the Greek the interrogation implies that a strong negative answer is expected: "Was it Paul (surely you will not say so) that was crucified for you?" In the former question the majesty of "CHRIST" (the Anointed One of God) implies the impossibility of His being "divided." in the latter, "Paul's" insignificance implies the impossibility of his being the head of redemption, "crucified for" them, and giving his name to the redeemed. This, which is true of Paul the founder of the Church of Corinth, holds equally good of Cephas and Apollos, who had not such a claim as Paul in the Corinthian Church. crucified . . . baptized—The cross claims us for Christ, as redeemed by Him; baptism, as dedicated to Him. in the name—rather, "into the name" (Galatians 3. 27), implying the incorporation involved in the idea of baptism. 14. I thank God's providence now, whose ordered it that I baptized none of you but Crispus (the former ruler of the synagogue, Acts 18. 8) and Gaius (written by the Romans CAIUS; the host of Paul at Corinth, and of the Church, Romans 16. 23; a person therefore in good circumstances). Baptizing was the office of the deacons (Acts 10. 48) rather than of the apostles, whose office was that of establishing and superintending generally the churches. The deacons had a better opportunity of giving the necessary course of instruction preparatory to baptism. Crispus and Gaius, &c., were probably among the first converts, and hence were baptized by Paul himself, who founded the Church. 15. Lest—Not that Paul had this reason at the time, but God so arranged it that some might say. [ALFORD.] 16. household of Stephanas—"The first-fruits of Achaia," i. e., among the first converted there (ch. 16. 15, 17). It is likely that such "households" included infants (Acts 16. 33). The history of the Church favours this view, as infant baptism was the usage from the earliest ages. 17. St. Paul says this not to depreciate baptism; for he exalts it most highly (Romans 6. 3). He baptized some first converts; and would have baptized more, but that his and the apostles' peculiar work was to preach the Gospel, to found by their autoptic testimony particular churches, and then to superintend the churches in general. sent me—lit., as an apostle. not to baptize—even in Christ's name, much less in my own. not with wisdom of words—or speech; philosophical reasoning set off with oratorical language and secular learning, which the Corinthians set so undue a value upon (v. 5; ch. 2. 1, 4) in Apollos, and the want of which in St. Paul they were dissatisfied with (2 Corinthians 10. 10). cross of Christ—the sum and substance of the Gospel (v. 23; ch. 2. 2), Christ crucified. be made of none effect—lit., be made void (Romans 4. 14); viz., by men thinking more of the human reasonings and eloquence in which the Gospel was set forth, than of the Gospel itself of Christ crucified, the sinner's only remedy, and God's highest exhibition of love. 18. preaching, &c.—lit., the word, or speech as to the cross; in contrast to the "wisdom of words" (so called), v. 17. them that perish—rather, them that are perishing, viz., by preferring human "wisdom of words" to the doctrine of the "cross of Christ." It is not the final state that is referred to; but, "them that are in the way of perishing." So also in 2 Corinthians 2. 15, 16. us which are saved—In the Greek the collocation is more modest, "to them that are being saved (that are in the way of salvation) as," i. e., to which class we belong. power of God—which includes in it that it is "the wisdom of God" (v. 24). God's powerful instrument of salvation; the highest exhibition of God's power (Romans 1.

16). What seems to the world "weakness" in God's plan of salvation (v. 25), and in its mode of delivery by His apostle (ch. 2. 3) is really His mighty "power." What seems "foolishness" because wanting man's "wisdom of words" (v. 17), is really the highest "wisdom of God" (v. 24). 19. I will destroy—Slightly altered from the LXX., Isaiah 29. 14. The Hebrew is, "The wisdom of the wise shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." St. Paul by inspiration gives the sense of the Spirit, by making God the cause of their wisdom perishing, &c., "I will destroy," &c. understanding of the prudent—lit., of the understanding ones. 20. Where? &c.—Nowhere; for God "brings them to naught" (v. 19). the wise—generally, the scribe—Jewish. [ALFORD.] the disputer—Greek. [ALFORD.] Cf. the Jew and Greek of this world contrasted with the godly wise, v. 22, 23. VITRINGA thinks the reference is to the Jewish discourses in the synagogue, Daraschoth, from a Hebrew root "to dispute." Cf. "questions," Acts 23. 3; Titus 3. 9. If so, "wise" refers to Greek wisdom (cf. v. 22). St. Paul applies Isaiah 33. 18 here in a higher sense; there the primary reference was to temporal deliverance, here to external; v. 22, which is in threefold opposition to v. 18 there, sanctions this higher application; the Lord in the threefold character being the sole ground of glorying to his people. of this world . . . of this world—rather, "dispensation (or age) . . . world;" the Greek words are distinct. The former is here this age or worldly order of things in a moral point of view, as opposed to the Christian dispensation or order of things. The latter is the world viewed externally and cosmically. made foolish—shown the world's philosophy to be folly, because it lacks faith in Christ crucified. [CHRYSOSTOM.] Has treated it as folly, and not used its help in converting and saving men (v. 26, 27). [ESTIUS.] 21. after that—rather, whereas. in the wisdom of God—in the wise arrangement of God. world by wisdom—rather, "by its wisdom," or its philosophy (John 1. 10; Romans 1. 28). knew not God—whatever other knowledge it attained (Acts 17. 23, 27). The deistic theory that man can by the light of nature discover his duty to God, is disproved by the fact that man has never discovered it without revelation. All the stars and moon cannot make it day; that is the prerogative of the sun. Nor can nature's highest gifts make the moral day arise; that is the office of Christ. Even the Jew missed this knowledge, in so far as he followed after mere carnal world-wisdom. it pleased God—St. Paul refers to Jesus' words (Luke 10. 21). by the foolishness of preaching—by that preaching which the world (unbelieving Jews and Gentiles alike) deem foolishness. save them that believe—(Romans 1. 16.) 22. For—lit., Since; seeing that. This verse illustrates how the "preaching" of Christ crucified came to be deemed "foolishness" (v. 21). a sign—The oldest MSS. read "signs." The singulos was a later correction from Matthew 12. 38; 16. 1; John 2. 18. The signs the Jews craved for were not mere miracles, but direct tokens from heaven that Jesus was Messiah (Luke 11. 16). Greeks seek . . . wisdom—viz., a philosophic demonstration of Christianity. Whereas Christ, instead of demonstrative proof, demands faith on the ground of His word, and of a reasonable amount of evidence that the alleged revelation is His word. Christianity begins not with solving intellectual difficulties, but with satisfying the heart that longs for forgiveness. Hence not the refined Greeks, but the theocratic Jews were the chosen organ for propagating revelation. Again, intellectual Athens (Acts 17. 18-21, &c.) received the gospel less readily than commercial Corinth. 23. we—Paul and Apollos. Christ crucified—The Greek expresses not the mere fact of His crucifixion, but the permanent character acquired by the transaction, whereby He is now a Saviour (Galatians 3. 1). [GREEN.] A Messiah (Christ) crucified was the stone on which the Jews stumbled (Matthew 21. 44). The opposition of Jew and Gentile alike shows that a religion so seemingly contemptible in its origin could not have succeeded if it had not been divine. unto the Greeks—the oldest MSS. read "unto the Gentiles." 24. called—(cf. v. 26.) The same class as the "us which are (being) saved" (v. 18); the elect, who have obeyed the call; called effect-

ally (Romans 8. 28, 30). Christ—"Crucified" is not here added, because when the offence of the cross is overcome, "Christ" is received in all His relations, not only in His cross, but in His life and His future kingdom. power—so meeting all the reasonable requirements of the Jews who sought "a sign." The cross (the death of a slave), which to the Jews (looking for a temporal Messiah) was a "stumbling-block," is really "the power of God" to the salvation of all who believe. wisdom of God—so really exhibiting, and in the highest degree (if they would but see it), that which the Greeks sought after—wisdom (Colossians 2. 3). 25. foolishness of God—i. e., God's plan of salvation which men deem "foolishness," weakness of God—Christ "crucified through weakness" (2 Corinthians 13. 4, the great stumbling-block of the Jews), yet "living by the power of God." So He perfects strength out of the weakness of His servants (ch. 2. 3; 2 Corinthians 12. 9). 26. ye see—rather, from the prominence of the verb in the Greek, "see" or "consider" (imperative). [ALFORD from VULGATE and IRENÆUS.] your calling . . . are called—instead of the words in italics, supplied by English Version, supply, "were your callers." What St. Paul is dwelling on (cf. v. 27, 28), is the weakness of the instrumentality which the Lord employed to convert the world. [HINDS and WHATELY; so ANSELM.] However, English Version accords well with v. 24. "The whole history of the expansion of the Church is a progressive victory of the ignorant over the learned, the lowly over the lofty, until the emperor himself laid down his crown before the cross of Christ." [OLSHAUSEN.] wise . . . after the flesh—the wisdom of this world acquired by human study without the Spirit. Contrast Matthew 16. 17. 27. the foolish things—a general phrase for all persons and things foolish. Even things (and those, too, foolish things) are chosen by God to confound persons, (and those too persons who are wise). This seems to me the force of the change from neuter to masculine. to confound—The Greek is stronger, "that He might confound (or put to shame)," &c. God confounds the wise by effecting through His instruments, without human wisdom, what the worldly wise, with it, cannot effect, viz., to bring men to salvation. chosen . . . chosen—The repetition indicates the gracious deliberateness of God's purpose (James 2. 5). 28. yea, and things which are not—Yea is not in the Greek. Also some of the oldest MSS. omit "and." Thus the clause, "things which are not" (are regarded as naught), is in apposition with "foolish . . . weak . . . base (i. e., low born) and despised things." God has chosen all four, though regarded as things that are not, to bring to naught things that are. 29. no flesh . . . glory—For they who try to glory (boast) because of human greatness and wisdom, are "confounded" or put to shame (v. 27). Flesh, like "the flower of the field," is beautiful, but frail (Isaiah 40. 6). in his presence—We are to glory not before Him, but in Him. [BENGE.] 30. But . . . ye—in contrast to them that "glory" in worldly wisdom and greatness. of him are—not of yourselves (Ephesians 2. 8), but of Him (Romans 11. 30). From Him ye are (i. e., have spiritual life, who once were spiritually among the "things which are not," v. 28). in Christ—by living union with Him. Not "in the flesh" (v. 28, 29). of God—from God; emanating from Him and sent by Him. is made unto us—has been made to us, to our eternal gain. wisdom—unattainable by the worldly mode of seeking it (v. 19, 20; contrast Colossians 2, 3; Proverbs 8.; Isaiah 9. 6). By it we become "wise unto salvation," owing to His wisdom in originating and executing the plan, whereas once we were "fools." righteousness—the ground of our justification (Jeremiah 23. 5, 6; Romans 4. 25; 2 Corinthians 5. 21); whereas once we were "weak" (Romans 5. 6). Isaiah 42. 21; 45. 24. sanctification—by His Spirit; whereas formerly we were "base." Hereafter our righteousness and sanctification alike shall be both perfect and inherent. Now the righteousness wherewith we are justified is perfect, but not inherent; that wherewith we are sanctified is inherent, but not perfect. [HOOKER.] Now sanctification is perfect in principle, but not in attainment. These two are joined in the Greek as forming essentially but one thing, as distinguished from the "wisdom" in devising and executing the plan for us ("abounded toward us in all wisdom," Ephesians 1. 8), and "redemption," the final completion of the scheme in the deliverance of the body (the position of "redemption" last shows that this limited sense is the one intended here). Luke 21. 28; Romans 8. 23; Ephesians 1. 14; 4. 30. redemption—whereas once we were "despised." 31. glory in . . . Lord—(Jeremiah 9. 23, 24)—in opposition to "flesh glorying in His presence" (v. 29). In contrast to morbid slavish self-abasement, St. Paul joins with humility the elevating consciousness of our true dignity in Christ. He who glories is to glory in the Lord, not in the flesh, nor in the world.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-16. ST. PAUL'S SUBJECT OF PREACHING, CHRIST CRUCIFIED, NOT IN WORLDLY, BUT IN HEAVENLY, WISDOM AMONG THE PERFECT. 1. And I—so I, [CONYBEARE] as one of the "foolish, weak, and despised" instruments employed by God (ch. 1. 27, 28); "glorying in the Lord," not in man's wisdom (ch. 1. 31). Cf. ch. 1. 23, "We," when I came—(Acts 18. 1, &c.). Paul might, had he pleased, have used an ornate style, having studied secular learning at Tarsus of Cilicia, which Strabo preferred as a school of learning to Athens or Alexandria; here, doubtless, he read the Cilician Aratus' poems (which he quotes, Acts 17. 28), and Epimenides (Titus 1. 12), and Menander (1 Corinthians 15. 33). Grecian intellectual development was an important element in preparing the way for the Gospel, but it failed to regenerate the world, showing that for this a superhuman power is needed. Hellenistic (Grecizing) Judaism at Tarsus and Alexandria was the connecting link between the schools of Athens and those of the Rabbis. No more fitting birth-place could there have been for the apostle of the Gentiles than Tarsus, free as it was from the warping influences of Rome, Alexandria, and Athens. He had at the same time Roman citizenship, which protected him from sudden violence. Again, he was reared in the Hebrew Divine law at Jerusalem. Thus, as the three elements, Greek cultivation, Roman polity (Luke 2. 1), and the Divine law given to the Jews, combined just at Christ's time, to prepare the world for the Gospel; so the same three, by God's marvellous providence, met together in the apostle to the Gentiles. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] testimony of God—"the testimony of Christ" (ch. 1. 6), therefore Christ is God. 2. The Greek implies, "The only definite thing that I made it my business to know among you, was, to know Jesus Christ (His person) and Him crucified (His office) [ALFORD], not exalted on the earthly throne of David, but executed as the vilest malefactor. The historical fact of Christ's crucifixion had probably been put less prominently forward by the seekers after human wisdom in the Corinthian Church, to avoid offending learned heathens and Jews. Christ's person and Christ's office constitute the sum of the Gospel. 3. I—the preacher: as v. 2 describes the subject, "Christ crucified," and v. 4 the mode of preaching: "my speech . . . not with enticing words," &c., "but demonstration of the Spirit." weakness—personal and bodily (2 Corinthians 10. 10; 12. 7, 9; Galatians 4. 13). trembling—(cf. Philippians 2. 12). Not personal fear, but a trembling anxiety to perform a duty; anxious conscientiousness, as proved by the contrast to "eye-service" (Ephesians 6. 5). [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 4. my speech—in private. preaching—in public. [BENGE.] ALFORD explains it, My discourses on doctrines, and my preaching, or announcement of facts. enticing—rather, persuasive. man's wisdom—"man's" is omitted in the oldest authorities. Still "wisdom" does refer to man's wisdom. demonstration of . . . Spirit, &c.—persuasion is man's means of moving his fellow-man. God's means is demonstration, leaving no doubt, and inspiring implicit faith, by the powerful working of the Spirit (then exhibited both outwardly by miracles, and inwardly by working on the heart, now in the latter and the more important way, only, (Matthew 7. 29; Acts 6. 10; Hebrews 4. 12; cf. also Romans 15. 19). The same simple power accompanies Divine truth now, producing certain persuasion and conversion, when the Spirit demonstrates by it

I CORINTHIANS II.

5. stand in . . . wisdom of men—rest on it, owe its origin and continuance to it. 6, 7. Yet the Gospel preaching, so far from being at variance with true "wisdom," is a wisdom infinitely higher than that of the wise of the world. we speak—resuming "we" (preachers, I, Apollos, &c.) from "we preach" (ch. 1. 28), only that here, "we speak" refers to something less public (cf. v. 7, 13, "mystery," "hidden") than "we preach," which is public. For "wisdom" here denotes not the whole of Christian doctrine, but its sublimer and deeper principles. perfect—those matured in Christian experience and knowledge alone can understand the true superiority of the Christian wisdom which St. Paul preached. Distinguished not only from worldly and natural men, but also from babes, who though "in Christ" retain much that is "carnal" (ch. 3. 1, 2), and cannot therefore understand the deeper truths of Christianity (ch. 14. 20; Philippians 3. 15; Hebrews 5. 14). St. Paul does not mean by the "mystery" or "hidden wisdom" (v. 7), some hidden tradition distinct from the Gospel (like the Church of Rome's "disciplina arcani," and doctrine of reserve), but the unfolding of the treasures of knowledge, once hidden in God's counsels, but now announced to all, which would be intelligently comprehended in proportion as the hearer's inner life became perfectly transformed into the image of Christ. Cf. instances of such "mysteries," i. e., deeper Christian truths, not preached at St. Paul's first coming to Corinth, when he confined himself to the fundamental elements (v. 2), but now spoken to the "perfect" (ch. 15. 51; Romans 11. 25; Ephesians 3. 5, 6). "Perfect" is used not of absolute perfection, but relatively to "babes," or those less ripe in Christian growth (cf. Philippians 3. 12, 15, with 1 John 2. 12-14). "God" (v. 7) is opposed to the world, the apostles to "the princes (great and learned men) of this world" (v. 8; cf. ch. 1. 20). [BENGE.] come to naught—nothingness (ch. 1. 28). They are transient, not immortal. Therefore, their wisdom is not real. [BENGE.] Rather, translate with ALFORD, "Which are being brought to naught," viz., by God's choosing the "things which are not (the weak and despised things of the Gospel), to bring to naught (the same verb as here) things that are" (ch. 1. 28). 7. wisdom of God—emphatically contrasted with the wisdom of men and of this world (v. 5, 6). in a mystery—connected in construction with "we speak:" We speak as dealing with a mystery, i. e., not something to be kept hidden, but what heretofore was so, but is now revealed. Whereas the Pagan mysteries were revealed only to a chosen few, the Gospel mysteries were made known to all who would obey the truth. "If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost" (2 Corinthians 4. 3), "whom the God of this world hath blinded." Ordinarily we use "mystery" in reference to those from whom the knowledge is withheld; the apostles, in reference to those to whom it is revealed. [WHATELY.] It is hidden before it is brought forward, and when it is brought forward it still remains hidden to those that are imperfect. [BENGE.] ordained—lit., foreordained (cf. v. 9), "prepared for them that love Him," before the world—rather, "before the ages" (of time), i. e., from eternity. This infinitely antedates worldly wisdom in antiquity. It was before not only the wisdom of the world, but eternally before the world itself and its ages. to our glory—ours both now and hereafter, from "the Lord of glory" (v. 8), who brings to naught "the princes of this world." 8. Which—wisdom. The strongest proof of the natural man's destitution of heavenly wisdom. crucified . . . Lord of glory—implying the inseparable connection of Christ's humanity and His divinity. The Lord of glory (which He had in His own right before the world was, John 17. 4, 24) was crucified. 9. But—(it has happened) as it is written. Eye hath not seen, &c.—ALFORD translates, "The things which eye saw not, &c., the things which God prepared, &c., to us God revealed through His Spirit." Thus, however, the "but" of v. 10 is ignored. Rather construe, as ESTIUS, "(We speak, supplied from v. 9), things which eye saw not (heretofore), &c., things which God prepared, &c. But God revealed them to us, &c." The quotation is not a verbatim one, but an inspired exposition of the "wisdom" (v. 6, from

Isaiah 64. 4). The exceptive words, "O God, besides (except) thee," are not quoted directly, but are virtually expressed in the exposition of them (v. 10), "None know thee, O God, seest these mysteries, and God hath revealed them to us by His Spirit." entered—lit., come up into the heart. A Hebraism (cf. Margin, Jeremiah 3. 16). In Isaiah 64. it is "Prepared (lit., "will do") for him that waiteth for him," here, "for them that love Him." For Isaiah spoke to them who waited for Messiah's appearance as future; St. Paul, to them who love Him as having actually appeared (1 John 4. 19), cf. v. 12, "the things that are freely given to us of God." [BENGE.] 10. reveals . . . by . . . Spirit—the inspiration of thoughts (so far as truth essential to salvation is concerned) makes the Christian (ch. 3. 16; 12. 3; Matthew 16. 17; John 16. 13; 1 John 2. 20, 27); that of words, the PROPHET (2 Samuel 23. 1, 2; 1 Kings 13. 1, 5), "by the word of the Lord" (v. 13; John 20. 30, 31; 2 Peter 1. 21). The secrets of revelation are secret to some, not because those who know them will not reveal them (for indeed, the very notion of revelation implies an unveiling of what had been veiled), but because those to whom they are announced have not the will or power to comprehend them. Hence the Spirit-taught alone know these secrets (Psalm 26. 14; Proverbs 3. 32; John 7. 17; 15. 16). unto us—the "perfect" or fully matured in Christian experience (v. 6). Intelligent men may understand the outline of doctrines; but without the Holy Spirit's revelation to the heart, these will be to them a mere outline—a skeleton correct perhaps, but wanting life [Quotations for the Times xiv.] (Luke 10. 21). the Spirit searcheth—working in us and with our Spirits (cf. Romans 8. 16, 26, 27). The Old Testament shows us God (the Father) for us. The Gospels, God (the Son) with us. The Acts and Epistles, God (the Holy Ghost) in us [MONOD] (Galatians 3. 14). deep things of God—(Psalm 92. 5.) His Divine nature, attributes, and counsels. The Spirit delights to explore the infinite depths of His own Divine mind, and then reveal them to us, according as we are capable of understanding them (Deuteronomy 29. 29). This proves the personality and Godhead of the Holy Ghost. Godhead cannot be separated from the Spirit of God, as manhood cannot be separated from the spirit of man. [BENGE.] 11. what man, &c.—lit., who of MEN knoweth the things of a MAN, save the spirit of that man? things of God knoweth no man—rather, "none knoweth," not angel or man. This proves the impossibility of any knowing the things of God, save by the Spirit of God (who alone knows them, since even in the case of man, so infinitely inferior in mind to God, none of his fellow-men, but his own spirit alone knows the things hidden within him). 12. we . . . received, not . . . spirit of . . . world—the personal evil "spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Ephesians 2. 2). This spirit is natural in the unregenerate, and needs not to be received. Spirit which is of God—i. e., which comes FROM God. We have received it only by the gift of God, whose Spirit it is, whereas our own spirit is the spirit that is IN us men (v. 11). that we might know . . . things . . . freely given . . . of God present experimental knowledge, to our unspeakable comfort, of His deep mysteries of wisdom, and of our future possession of the good "things which God hath prepared for them that love Him" (v. 9). 13. also—we not only know by the Holy Ghost, but we also speak the "things freely given to us of God" (v. 12). which the Holy Ghost teacheth—the old MSS. read "the Spirit" simply, without "Holy." comparing spiritual things with spiritual—expounding the Spirit-inspired Old Testament Scripture, by comparison with the Gospel which Jesus by the same Spirit revealed [GROTIUS]; and conversely illustrating the Gospel mysteries by comparing them with the Old Testament types. [CHRYSOSTOM.] So the Greek word is translated, "comparing" (2 Corinthians 10. 12). WAHL (Clavis) translates, "explaining (as the Greek is translated, Genesis 40. 8, LXX.) to spiritual (i. e., Spirit-taught men) men, spiritual things (the things which we ourselves are taught by the Spirit)." Spirit-taught men alone can comprehend spiritual truths. (his secrets with v. 8, 9, 10, 14, 15; ch. 3. 1. ALFORD translates, "Putting together (combining) spirituals with spirituals;" i. e., attaching spiritual words to spiritual things, which we should not do, if we were to use words of worldly wisdom to expound spiritual things (so v. 1, 4; 1 Peter 4. 11). Perhaps the generality of the neuters is designed to comprehend these several notions by implication. Comparing, or combining, spirituals with spirituals; implying both that spiritual things are only suited to spiritual persons (so "things" comprehended persons, ch. 1. 27), and also that spiritual truths can only be combined with spiritual (not worldly-wise) words, and lastly, spirituals of the Old and New Testaments can only be understood by mutual comparison, or combination, not by combination with worldly "wisdom," or natural perceptions (ch. 1. 21, 22; 2. 1, 4-9; cf. Psalm 119. 18). 14. natural man—lit., a man of animal soul. As contrasted with the spiritual man, he is governed by the animal soul, which overbears his spirit, which latter is without the Spirit of God (Jude 19). So the animal (English Version, "natural") body, or body led by the lower animal nature (including both the mere human fallen reason and heart), is contrasted with the Spirit-quickened body (ch. 15. 44-46). The carnal man (the man led by bodily appetites, and also by a self-exalting spirit, estranged from the Divine life) is closely akin; so too the "earthly," "Devilish," or "demon-like;" "led by an evil spirit," is the awful character of such a one, in its worst type (James 3. 15). receiveth not—though they are offered to him, and are "worthy of being received by all men" (1 Timothy 1. 15). they are foolishness unto him—whereas he seeks "wisdom" (ch. 1. 22). neither can he—not only does he not, but he cannot know them, and therefore has no wish to "receive" them (Romans 8. 7). 15. He that is spiritual—lit., "the spiritual (man)." In v. 14, it is "A (not "the," as English Version) natural man." The spiritual is the man distinguished above his fellow-men, as he in whom the Spirit rules. In the unregenerate, the spirit which ought to be the organ of the Holy Spirit (and which is so in the regenerate), is overridden by the animal soul, and is in abeyance, so that such a one is never called "spiritual." judgeth all things—and persons, by their true standard (cf. ch. 6. 2-4; 1 John 4. 1), in so far as he is spiritual. "Discerneth . . . is discerned," would better accord with the translation of the same Greek (v. 14). Otherwise for "discerned," in v. 14, translate, "judged of," to accord with the translation, "judgeth . . . is judged," in this 15th verse. He has a practical insight into the verities of the Gospel, though he is not infallible on all theoretical points. If an individual may have the Spirit without being infallible, why may not the Church have the Spirit, and yet not be infallible (a refutation of the plea of Rome for the Church's infallibility, from Matthew 28. 20; John 16. 13)? As the believer and the Church have the Spirit, and are yet not therefore Impeccable, so he and the Church have the Spirit, and yet are not infallible or Impeccable. He and the Church are both infallible and Impeccable, only in proportion to the degree in which they are led by the Spirit. The Spirit leads into all truth and holiness; but His influence on believers and on the Church is as yet partial. Jesus alone, who had the Spirit without measure (John 3. 34), is both infallible and Impeccable. Scripture, because it was written by men, who whilst writing were infallibly inspired, is unmixed truth (Proverbs 28. 5; 1 John 2. 27). 16. For—proof of v. 13, that the spiritual man "is judged of no man." In order to judge the spiritual man, the ordinary man must "know the mind of the Lord." But "who of ordinary men knows" that? that he may instruct him—i. e., so as to be able to set Him right as His counsellor (quoted from Isaiah 40. 13, 14). So the LXX. translate the Greek verb, which means to prove, in Acts 9. 22. Natural men who judge spiritual men, living according to the mind of God ("We have the mind of Christ"), are virtually wishing to instruct God, and bring Him to another mind, as counsellors setting to right their king. we have the mind of Christ—in our degree of capability to apprehend it. Isaiah 40. refers to JEHOVAH; therefore, as it is applied here to Christ, He is Jehovah.

Ver. 1-23. ST. PAUL COULD NOT SPEAK TO THEM OF DEEP SPIRITUAL TRUTHS, AS THEY WERE CARNAL, CONTENTING FOR THEIR SEVERAL TEACHERS; THESE ARE NOTHING BUT WORKERS FOR GOD, TO WHOM THEY MUST GIVE ACCOUNT IN THE DAY OF FIERY JUDGMENT. THE HEARERS ARE GOD'S TEMPLE, WHICH THEY MUST NOT DEFILE BY CONTENTIONS FOR TEACHERS, WHO, AS WELL AS ALL THINGS, ARE THEIRS, BEING CHRIST'S. 1. And 1—i. e., as the natural (animal) man cannot receive, so I also could not speak unto you the deep things of God, as I would to the spiritual; but I was compelled to speak to you as I would to MEN OF FLESH. The oldest MSS. read this for "carnal." The former (lit., fleshy) implies men wholly of flesh, or natural. Carnal, or fleshy, implies not they were wholly natural or unregenerate (ch. 2. 14), but that they had much of a carnal tendency; e. g., their divisions. St. Paul had to speak to them as he would to men wholly natural, inasmuch as they are still carnal (v. 3) in many respects, notwithstanding their conversion (ch. 1. 4-9). babes—contrasted with the perfect (fully matured) in Christ (Colossians 1. 28; cf. Hebrews 5. 13, 14). This implies they were not men wholly of flesh, though carnal in tendencies. They had life in Christ, but it was weak. He blames them for being still in a degree (not altogether, cf. ch. 1. 5, 7; therefore he says "as") babes in Christ, when by this time they ought to have "come unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Ephesians 4. 13). In Romans 7. 14, also the oldest MSS. read "I am a man of flesh." 2. (Hebrews 5. 12.) milk—the elementary "principles of the doctrine of Christ" (ch. 6. 1). 3. envying—jealousy, rivalry. As this refers to their feelings, "strife" refers to their words, and "divisions" to their actions. [BENGL.] There is a gradation, or ascending climax: envying had produced strife, and strife divisions (factious parties). [GROTIUS.] His language becomes severer now as He proceeds; in ch. 1. 11 he had only said "contentions," he now multiplies the words (cf. the stronger term, ch. 4. 6, than in ch. 3. 21). carnal—for "strife" is a "work of the flesh" (Galatians 5. 20). The "flesh" includes all feelings that aim not at the glory of God, and the good of our neighbour, but at gratifying self. walk as men—as unregenerate men (cf. Matthew 16. 23). "After the flesh, not after the Spirit" of God, as becomes you as regenerate by the Spirit (Romans 8. 4; Galatians 5. 25, 26). 4. (Ch. 1. 12.) are ye not carnal—the oldest MSS. read "Are ye not men?" i. e., "walking as men" unregenerate (v. 3). 5. Paul . . . Apollos—the oldest MSS. read in the reverse order, Apollos . . . Paul. He puts Apollos before himself in humility. who then—seeing then that ye severally strive so for your favourite teachers, "Who is (of what intrinsic power and dignity) Paul?" If so great an apostle reasons so of himself, how much more does humility, rather than self-seeking, become ordinary ministers! but ministers, &c.—the oldest MSS. have no "but." "Who is Apollos . . . Paul? (mere) ministers (a lowly word appropriate here, servants), by whom (not "in whom;" by whose ministrations) ye believed," as . . . Lord gave to every man—i. e., to the several hearers, for it was God that "gave the increase" (v. 6). 6. I . . . planted, Apollos watered—(Acts 18. 1; 19. 1.) Apollos at his own desire (Acts 18. 27) was sent by the brethren to Corinth, and there followed up the work which St. Paul had begun. God gave the increase—i. e., the growth (v. 19; Acts 18. 27). "Believed through grace." Though ministers are nothing, and God all in all, yet God works by instruments, and promises the Holy Spirit in the faithful use of means. This is the dispensation of the Spirit, and ours is the ministry of the Spirit. 7. neither is he that . . . anything . . . but God—viz., is all in all. "God" is emphatically last in the Greek, "He that giveth the increase (namely, God)." Here follows a parenthesis from v. 8 to v. 21, where "Let no man glory in MEN" stands in antithetic contrast to God here. 8. one—essentially in their aim they are one, engaged in one and the same ministry; therefore they ought not to be made by you the occasion of forming separate parties. and every man—rather

"And every man." Though in their service or ministry, they are essentially "one," yet every minister is separately responsible in "his own" work, and "shall receive his own" (emphatically repeated) reward, according to his own labour." The reward is something over and above personal salvation (v. 14, 15; 2 John 8). He shall be rewarded according to, not his success or the amount of work done, but "according to his own labour." It shall be said to him, "Well done, thou good and (not successful, but) faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord" (Matthew 25, 23). 9. Translate, as the Greek collocation of words, and the emphasis on "God" thrice repeated, requires, "For (in proof that "each shall receive reward according to his own labour," viz., from God) it is of God that we are the fellow-workers (labouring with, but under, and belonging to Him as His servants, 2 Corinthians 5, 20; 6, 1; cf. Acts 15, 4; Note, 1 Thessalonians 3, 2) of God that ye are the field (or tillage), of God that ye are the building." [ALFORD.] "Building" is a new image introduced here, as suited better than that of husbandry, to set forth the different kinds of teaching and their results, which he is now about to discuss. "To edify" or "build up" the Church of Christ is similarly used (Ephesians 2, 21, 22; 4, 29). 10. grace . . . given unto me—St. Paul puts this first, to guard against seeming to want humility, in pronouncing himself "a wise master-builder," in the clause following. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The "grace" is that "given" to him in common with all Christians (v. 5), only proportioned to the work which God had for him to do. [ALFORD.] wise—i. e., skillful. His skill is shown in his laying a foundation. The unskillful builder lays none (Luke 6, 49). Christ is the foundation (v. 11). another—who ever comes after me. He does not name Apollos; for he speaks generally of all successors, whoever they be. His warning, "Let every man (every teacher) take heed how," &c., refers to other successors rather than Apollos, who doubtless did not, as they, build wood, hay, &c., on the foundation (cf. ch. 4, 15). "I have done my part, let them who follow me see (so the Greek for "take heed") to theirs." [BENGEL.] how—with what material. [ALFORD.] How far wisely, and in builder-like style (1 Peter 4, 11). buildeth thereupon—here the building or superstructure raised on Christ the "foundation," laid by Paul (ch. 2, 2) is not, as in Ephesians 2, 20, 21, the Christian Church made up of believers, the "lively stones" (1 Peter 2, 5), but the doctrinal and practical teaching which the teachers who succeeded Paul, superadded to his first teaching; not that they taught what was false, but their teaching was subtle and speculative reasoning, rather than solid and simple truth. 11. (Isaiah 28, 16; Acts 4, 12; Ephesians 2, 20.) For—my warning ("take heed," &c., v. 10) is as to the superstructure ("buildeth thereupon"), not as to the foundation: "For other foundation can no man lay, than that which has (already) been laid (by God) Jesus Christ," the person, not the mere abstract doctrine about Him, though the latter also is included; Jesus, GOD-SAVIOUR; Christ, MESSIAH or ANOINTED. can—a man can not lay any other, since the only one recognized by God has been already laid. 12. Now—rather, "But." The image is that of a building on a solid foundation, and partly composed of durable and precious, partly of perishable materials. The "gold, silver, precious stones," which all can bear fire (Revelation 21, 18, 19), are teachings that will stand the fiery test of judgment; "wood, hay, stubble," are those which cannot stand it; not positive heresy, for that would destroy the foundation, but teaching mixed up with human philosophy and Judaism, curious rather than useful. Besides the teachings, the superstructure represents also the persons cemented to the Church by them, the reality of whose conversion, through the teachers' instrumentality, will be tested at the last day. Where there is the least grain of real gold of faith, it shall never be lost (1 Peter 1, 7; cf. ch. 4, 12). On the other hand, the lightest straw feeds the fire. [BENGEL.] (Matthew 5, 19.) 13. Every man's work—Each teacher's superstructure on the foundation. the day—of the Lord (ch. 1, 8; Hebrews 3, 25; 1 Thessalonians 5, 4). The article is emphatic, The day. i. e., the great day of days, the long expected

day. declare it—old English for "make it clear" (ca. 4, 4). It shall be revealed by fire—i. e., "every man's work." Rather, "He," the Lord, whose day it is (2 Thessalonians 1, 7, 8). Translate lit., "Is being revealed (the present in the Greek implies the certainty and nearness of the event, Revelation 22, 10, 20) in fire" (Malachi 3, 2, 3, 4, 1). The fire (probably figurative here, as the gold, hay &c.) is not purgatory (as Rome teaches, i. e., purificatory and punitive), but probatory, not restricted to those dying in "venial sin": the supposed intermediate class between those entering heaven at once, and those dying in mortal sin who go to hell, but universal, testing the godly and ungodly alike (2 Corinthians 5, 10; cf. Mark 9, 49). This fire is not till the last day, the supposed fire of purgatory begins at death. The fire of St. Paul is to try the works, the fire of purgatory the persons, of men. St. Paul's fire causes "loss" to the sufferers; Rome's purgatory, great gain, viz., heaven at last to those purged by it, if only it were true. Thus this passage, quoted by Rome for, is altogether against purgatory. "It was not this doctrine that gave rise to prayers for the dead; but the practice of praying for the dead [which crept in from the affectionate but mistaken solicitude of survivors] gave rise to the doctrine." [WHATELY.] 14. abide—abide the testing fire (Matthew 3, 11, 12). which he hath built thereupon—which he built on the foundation. reward—wages, as a builder, i. e., teacher. His converts built on Christ the foundation, through his faithful teaching, shall be his "crown of rejoicing" (2 Corinthians 1, 14; Philippians 2, 16; 1 Thessalonians 2, 19). 15. If . . . be burnt—If any teacher's work consist of such materials as the fire will destroy. [ALFORD.] suffer loss—i. e., forfeit the special "reward," not that he shall lose salvation (which is altogether a free gift, not a "reward" or wages), for he remains still on the foundation (v. 12; 2 John 6). saved; yet so as by fire—rather, "so as through fire" (Zechariah 3, 2; Amos 4, 11; Jude 23). "Saved, yet not without fire" (Romans 2, 27). [BENGEL.] As a builder whose building, not the foundation, is consumed by fire, escapes, but with the loss of his work [ALFORD], as the shipwrecked merchant, though he has lost his merchandise, is saved, though having to pass through the waves. [BENGEL.] Malachi 3, 1, 2; and 4, 1, give the key to explain the imagery. The "Lord suddenly coming to His temple" in flaming "fire," all the parts of the building which will not stand that fire will be consumed; the builders will escape with personal salvation, but with the loss of their work, through the midst of the conflagration. [ALFORD.] Again, a distinction is recognized between minor and fundamental doctrines (if we regard the superstructure as representing the doctrines superadded to the elementary essentials); a man may err as to the former, and yet be saved, but not so as to the latter (cf. Philippians 3, 15). 16. Know ye not—It is no new thing I tell you, in calling you "God's building;" ye know and ought to remember, ye are the noblest kind of building, "the temple of God." ye—all Christians form together one vast temple. The expression is not, "ye are temples," but "ye are the temple" collectively, and "lively stones" (1 Peter 2, 5) individually. God . . . Spirit—God's indwelling, and that of the Holy Spirit, are one; therefore the Holy Spirit is God. No literal "temple" is recognized by the New Testament in the Christian Church. The only one is the spiritual temple, the whole body of believing worshippers which the Holy Spirit dwells in (ch. 6, 19; John 4, 23, 24). The synagogue, not the temple, was the model of the Christian house of worship. The temple was the house of sacrifice, rather than of prayer. Prayers in the temple were silent and individual (Luke 1, 10; 18, 10-13), not joint and public, nor with reading of Scripture, as in the synagogue. The temple, as the name means (from a Greek root "to dwell"), was the earthly dwelling-place of God, where alone He put His name. The synagogue (as the name means an assembly) was the place for assembling men. God now too has His earthly temple, not one of wood and stone, but the congregation of believers, the "living stones" on the "spiritual house." Believers are all spiritual priests in it. Jesus Christ, our High Priest, has the only litera-priesthood (Malachi 1. 11; Matthew 18. 20; 1 Peter 2. 5). [STRONG.] 17. If any . . . defile . . . destroy—rather, the Greek verb is the same in both cases, “destroy . . . destroy.” God repays in kind by a righteous retaliation. The destroyer shall himself be destroyed. As temporal death was the penalty of marring the material temple (Leviticus 16, 2; Daniel 5. 2, 3, 30), so eternal death is the penalty of marring the spiritual temple—the Church. The destroyers here (v. 16, 17), are distinct from the unwise or unskillful builders (v. 12, 15); the latter held fast the “foundation” (v. 11), and, therefore, though they lose their work of superstructure and the special reward, yet they are themselves saved; the destroyers, on the contrary, assailed with false teaching the foundation, and so subvert the temple itself, and shall therefore be destroyed. (See Note, a. 10.) [ESTIUS and NEANDER.] I think St. Paul passes here from the teachers to all the members of the Church, who, by profession, are “priests unto God” (Exodus 19. 6; 1 Peter 2. 9; Revelation 1. 6). As the Aaronic priests were doomed to die if they violated the old temple (Exodus 23. 13), so any Christian who violates the sanctity of the spiritual temple, shall perish eternally (Hebrews 12. 14; 10. 31). Holy—inviolable (Habakkuk 2. 20). which temple ye are—rather, “the which (i. e., holy) are ye” [ALFORD], and, therefore, want of holiness on the part of any of you (or, as ESTIUS, “to tamper with the foundation in teaching you”) is a violation of the temple, which cannot be let to pass with impunity. GROTIUS supports English Version. 18. seemeth—i. e., is, and is regarded by himself and others. wise in this world—wise in mere worldly wisdom (ch. 1. 20). let him become a fool—by receiving the Gospel in its unworldly simplicity, and so becoming a fool in the world’s sight. [ALFORD.] Let him no longer think himself wise, but seek the true wisdom from God, bringing his understanding into captivity to the obedience of faith. [ESTIUS.] 19. with God—in the judgment of God. it is written—in Job 5. 13. The formula of quoting SCRIPTURE used here, establishes the canonicity of Job. He taketh . . . wise in . . . own craftiness—proving the “foolishness” of the world’s wisdom, since it is made by God the very care to catch those who think themselves so wise. Lit., He who taketh, &c., the whole of the sentence not being quoted, but only the part which suited St. Paul’s purpose. 20. Quotation from Psalm 94. 11. There it is of men; here it is “of the wise.” St. Paul by inspiration states the class of men whose “thoughts” (or rather, “reasonings,” as suits the Greek and the sense of the context) the Spirit designated in the Psalm, “vanity,” viz., the “proud” (v. 2) and worldly-wise, whom God in v. 8 calls “fools,” though they “boast themselves” of their wisdom in pushing their interests (v. 4). 21. let no man glory in men—renouncing the subject from v. 4; cf. ch. 1. 12 and 31, where the true object of glorying is stated: “he that glorieth let him glory in THE LORD.” Also ch. 4. 6, “That no one of you be puffed up for one against another.” For all things—not only all men. For you to glory thus in men, is lowering yourselves from your high position as heirs of all things. All men (including your teachers) belong to Christ, and therefore to you, by your union with Him; He makes them and all things work together for your good (Romans 8. 28). Ye are not for the sake of them, but they for the sake of you (2 Corinthians 4. 5, 15). They belong to you, not you to them. 22. Enumeration of some of the “all things.” The teachers, in whom they gloried, he puts first (ch. 1. 12). He omits after “Cephas” or Christ (to whom exclusively some at Corinth (ch. 1. 12) professed to belong); but, instead, substitutes “ye are Christ’s” (v. 23). world . . . life . . . death . . . things present . . . things to come—not only shall they not “separate you from the love of God in Christ” (Romans 8. 38, 39), but they “all are yours,” i. e., are for you (Romans 8. 28), and belong to you, as they belong to Christ your Head (Hebrews 1. 2). things present—“things actually present.” [ALFORD.] 23. ye are Christ’s—not Paul’s, or Apollos’, or Cephas’ (ch. 11. 3; Matthew 23. 8-10). “Neither be ye called masters; for one is your Master, even Christ” (Romans 14. 8). Not merely a particular action of you, but ye all are Christ’s (ch. 1. 12). Christ is God’s—(ch. 11. 3). God is the ultimate end of all, even of Christ, His co-equal Son (ch. 15. 28; Philippians 2. 6-11).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-21. TRUE VIEW OF MINISTERS: THE JUDGMENT IS NOT TO BE FORESTALLED; MEANWHILE THE APOSTLES’ LOW STATE CONTRASTS WITH THE CORINTHIANS’ PARTY PRIDE, NOT THAT ST. PAUL WOULD SHAME THEM, BUT AS A FATHER WARN THEM; FOR WHICH END HE SENT TIMOTHY, AND WILL SOON COME HIMSELF. 1. account . . . us—Paul and Apollos. ministers of Christ—not heads of the Church in whom ye are severally to glory (ch. 1. 12); the headship belongs to Christ alone; we are but His servants ministering to you (ch. 1. 13; 3. 5, 22). stewards—(Luke 12. 42; 1 Peter 4. 10). Not the depositories of grace, but dispensers of it (“rightly dividing” or dispensing it), so far as God gives us it, to others. The Chazan, or overseer, in the synagogue answered to the bishop or “angel” of the Church, who called seven of the synagogue to read the law every sabbath, and oversaw them. The Parnasin of the synagogue, like the ancient “deacon” of the Church, took care of the poor (Acts 6), and subsequently preached in subordination to the presbyters or bishops, as Stephen and Phillip did. The Church is not the appendage to the priesthood; but the minister is the steward of God to the Church. Man shrinks from too close contact with God, hence he willingly puts a priesthood between, and would serve God by deputy. The Pagan (like the modern Romish) priest was rather to conceal than to explain “the mysteries of God.” The minister’s office is to “preach” (lit., proclaim as a herald, Matthew 10. 27) the deep truths of God (“mysteries,” heavenly truths, only known by revelation), so far as they have been revealed, and so far as his hearers are disposed to receive them. JOSEPHUS says, the Jewish religion made known to all the people the mysteries of their religion, whilst the Pagans concealed from all but the “initiated” few, the mysteries of theirs. 2. Moreover—The oldest MSS. read, “Moreover HERE” (i. e., on earth). The contrast thus is between man’s usage as to stewards (v. 2), and God’s way (v. 3). Though here below, in the case of stewards, inquiry is made, that one may be found (i. e., proved to be) faithful; yet God’s steward awaits no such judgment of man, in man’s day, but the Lord’s judgment in His great day. Another argument against the Corinthians for their partial preferences of certain teachers for their gifts: whereas what God requires in His stewards is faithfulness (1 Samuel 3. 20; Hebrews 3. 5; Margin); as indeed is required in earthly stewards, but with this difference (v. 3), that God’s stewards await not man’s judgment to test them, but the testing which shall be in the day of the Lord. 3. it is a very small thing—lit., “it amounts to a very small matter;” not that I despise your judgment, but as compared with God’s, it almost comes to nothing. judged . . . of man’s judgment—lit., “man’s day,” contrasted with the day (ch. 3. 13) of the Lord (v. 5; 1 Thessalonians 5. 4). “The day of man” is here put before us as a person. [WAHL.] All days previous to the day of the Lord are man’s days. EMERY translates the thrice recurring Greek for judged . . . judge . . . judgeth (v. 4), thus: To me for my part (though capable of being found faithful) it is a very small matter that I should be approved of by man’s judgment; yea, I do not even assume the right of judgment and approving myself—but He that has the right, and is able to judge on my case (the Dijudicator), is the Lord. 4. by myself—translate, “I am conscious to myself of no (ministerial) unfaithfulness.” BENDEL explains the Greek compound, “to decide in judgments on one in relation to others,” not simply to judge. am I not hereby justified—Therefore conscience is not an infallible guide. St. Paul did not consider his so. This verse is directly against the judicial power claimed by the priests of Rome. 5. Disproving the judicial power claimed by the Romish priesthood in the confessional. Therefore—as the Lord is the sole Decider or Dijudicator. judge—not the same Greek word as in v. 3, 4, whose the meaning is to approve of, or decide on, the merits of one’s

case. Here all judgments in general are forbidden, which would, on our part, presumptuously forestall God's prerogative of final judgment. Lord—Jesus Christ, whose "ministers" we are (v. 1), and who is to be the Judge (John 5. 22, 27; Acts 10. 42; 17. 31). manifest . . . hearts—our judgments now (as those of the Corinthians respecting their teachers) are necessarily defective, as we only see the outward act, we cannot see the motives of "hearts." "Faithfulness" (v. 2) will hereby be estimated, and the "Lord" will "justify" or the reverse (v. 4), according to the state of the heart. then shall every man have praise—(Ch. 3. 8; 1 Samuel 26. 23; Matthew 25. 21, 23, 28.) Rather, "his due praise," not exaggerated praise, such as the Corinthians heaped on favorite teachers; "THE praise" (so the Greek) due for acts estimated by the motives. "Then;" not before: therefore wait till then (James 5. 7). 6. And—"Now," marking transition. In a figure transferred to myself—i. e., I have represented under the persons of Apollos and myself what really holds good of all teachers, making us two a figure or type of all the others. I have mentioned us two, whose names have been used as a party cry; but under our names I mean others to be understood, whom I do not name, in order not to shame you. [ESTRUS.] not to think, &c.—the best MSS. omit "think." Translate, "That in us (as your example) ye might learn (this), not (to go) beyond what is written." Reverse the sentence of Holy Writ, as much as its declarations: so you will less dogmatize on what is not expressly revealed (Deuteronomy 29. 29). puffed up for one—viz., "for one (favorite minister) against another." The Greek indicative implies, "That ye be not puffed up AS YE ARE." 7. Translate, "Who distinguisheth thee (above another)?" not thyself, but God. glory, as if thou hadst not received it—as if it was to thyself, not to God, thou owest the receiving of it. 8. Irony. Translate, "Already ye are filled full (with spiritual food), already ye are rich, ye have seated yourselves upon your throne as kings, without us." The emphasis is on "already" and "without us;" ye act as if ye needed no more to "hunger and thirst after righteousness," and as if already ye had reached the "kingdom" for which Christians have to strive and suffer. Ye are so puffed up with your favorite teachers, and your own fancied spiritual attainments in knowledge through them, that ye feel like those "filled full" at a feast, or as a "rich" man priding himself in his riches: so ye feel ye can now do "without us," your first spiritual fathers (v. 15). They forgot that before the "kingdom" and the "fulness of joy," at the marriage feast of the Lamb, must come the cross, and suffering, to every true believer (2 Timothy 2. 5, 11, 12). They were like the self-complacent Laodiceans (Revelation 3. 17; cf. Hosea 12. 8). Temporal fulness and riches doubtless tended in some cases at Corinth, to generate this spiritual self-sufficiency; the contrast to the apostle's literal "hunger and thirst" (v. 11) proves this. I would . . . ye did reign—translate, "I would indeed," &c., I would truly it were so, and that your kingdom had really begun. that we also might reign with you—(2 Corinthians 12. 14.) "I seek not yours, but you." Your spiritual prosperity would redound to that of us, your fathers in Christ (ch. 9. 23). When you reach the kingdom, you shall be our "crown of rejoicing, in the presence of our Lord Jesus" (1 Thessalonians 2. 19). 9. For—assigning the reason for desiring that the "reign" of himself and his fellow-apostles with the Corinthians were come, viz., the present afflictions of the former. I think—the Corinthians (ch. 3. 18) "seemed" to (lit., as here, "thought") themselves "wise in this world." St. Paul, in contrast, "thinks" that God has sent forth him and his fellow-ministers "last," i. e., the lowest in this world. The apostles fared worse than even the prophets, who, though sometimes afflicted, were often honoured (2 Kings 1. 10; 5. 9; 8. 9, 12). set forth—as a spectacle or gazing-stock, as the apostles—St. Paul includes Apollos with the apostles, in the broader sense of the word, so Romans 16. 7; 2 Corinthians 13. 23 (Greek for "messengers," apostles). as it were appointed to death—as criminals condemned to die. made a spectacle—lit., a theatrical spectacle. So the Greek in Hebrews 10. 33 "made a gazing-stock by reproaches and afflictions." Criminals "condemned to die," in St. Paul's time, were exhibited as a gazing-stock to amuse the populace in the amphitheatre. They were "set forth last" in the show, to fight with wild beasts. This explains the imagery of St. Paul here. (Cf. TERTULLIAN, de Pudicitia, ch. 14.) the world—to the whole world, including "both angels and men;" "the whole family in heaven and earth" (Ephesians 3. 15). As Jesus was "seen of angels" (1 Timothy 3. 16), so His followers are a spectacle to the holy angels who take a deep interest in all the progressive steps of redemption (Ephesians 3. 10; 1 Peter 1. 12). St. Paul tacitly implies that though "last" and lowest in the world's judgment, Christ's servants are deemed by angels a spectacle worthy of their most intense regard. [CHRYSOSTOM.] However, since "the world" is a comprehensive expression, and is applied in this Epistle to the evil especially (ch. 1. 27, 28), and since the spectators (in the image drawn from the amphitheatre) gaze at the show with savage delight, rather than sympathy for the sufferers, I think bad angels are included, besides good angels. ESTRUS makes the bad alone to be meant. But the generality of the term "angels," and its frequent use in a good sense, as well as Ephesians 3. 10; 1 Peter 1. 12, incline me to include good as well as bad angels, though, for the reasons stated above, the bad may be principally meant. 10. Irony. How much your lot (supposing it real) is to be envied, and ours to be pitied. fools—(Ch. 1. 21; 3. 18; cf. Acts 17. 18; 26. 24.) for Christ's sake . . . in Christ—our connection with Christ only entails on us the lowest ignominy, "ON ACCOUNT OF," or, "FOR THE SAKE OF" Him, as "fools;" yours gives you full fellowship in Him as "wise" (i. e., supposing you really are all you seem, ch. 3. 18). we . . . weak . . . ye . . . strong—(Ch. 2. 3; 2 Corinthians 13. 9.) we . . . despised—(2 Corinthians 10. 10) because of our "weakness," and our not using worldly philosophy and rhetoric, on account of which ye Corinthians and your teachers are (seemingly) so "honourable." Contrast with "despised" the "ye (Galatians) despised not my temptation . . . in my flesh." 11. (2 Corinthians 11. 23-27.) naked—i. e., insufficiently clad (Romans 8. 35). buffeted—as a slave (1 Peter 2. 20), the reverse of the state of the Corinthians, "reigning as kings" (Acts 23. 2). So Paul's master before him was "buffeted" as a slave, when about to die a slave's death (Matthew 26. 67). 12. working with our own hands—viz., "even unto this present hour" (v. 11). This is not stated in the narrative of St. Paul's proceedings at Ephesus, from which city he wrote this Epistle (though it is expressly stated of him at Corinth, cf. Acts 18. 3, &c., and 19). But in his address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20. 34), he says, "Ye yourselves know that these hands have ministered unto my necessities," &c. The undesignedness of the coincidence thus indirectly brought out is incompatible with forgery. 13. defamed, we entreat—viz., God for our defamers, as Christ enjoined (Matthew 5. 10, 44). [GROTIUS.] We reply gently. [ESTRUS.] filth—"The refuse" [CONYBEARE and HOWSON], the sweepings or rubbish thrown out after a cleaning. of all things—not of the "world" only. 14. warn—rather, "admonish" as a father uses "admonition" to "beloved sons," not provoking them to wrath (Ephesians 6. 4). The Corinthians might well be "ashamed" at the disparity of state between the father, St. Paul, and his spiritual children themselves. 15. ten thousand—implying that the Corinthians had more of the one than was desirable. instructors—tutors who had the care of rearing, but had not the rights, or peculiar affection, of the father, who alone had begotten them spiritually. in Christ—St. Paul admits that these "instructors" were not mere legalists, but evangelical teachers. He uses, however, a stronger phrase of himself in begetting them spiritually, "In Christ Jesus," implying both the Saviour's office and person. As Paul was the means of spiritually regenerating them, and yet "baptized none of them save Crispus, Gaius, and the household of Stephanas," regeneration cannot be inseparably ~~to~~ and by baptism (ch. 1. 14-17). 16. be ye followers of me—lit., imitators, viz., in my ways, which be in Christ (v. 17; ch. 11. 1), not in my crosses (v. 8-13; Acts 26. 29; Galatians 4. 10, 17. For this cause—that ye may the better "be followers of me" (v. 16), through his admonitions. sent . . . Timothy—(Ch. 16. 10; Acts 19. 21, 22.) "Paul purposed . . . when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem. So he sent into Macedonia Timothy and Erastus." Here it is not expressly said, he sent Timothy into Achaia (of which Corinth was capital), but it is implied, for he sent him with Erastus before him. As he therefore purposed to go into Achaia himself, there is every probability they were to go thither also. They are said only to have been sent into Macedonia, because it was the country to which they went immediately from Ephesus. The undesignedness of the coincidence establishes the genuineness of both the Epistle and the history. In both, Timothy's journey is closely connected with St. Paul's own (cf. v. 19). Erastus is not specified in the Epistle, probably because it was Timothy who was charged with St. Paul's orders, and possibly Erastus was a Corinthian, who, in accompanying Timothy, was only returning home. The seeming discrepancy at least shows that the passages were not taken from one another. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] son—i. e., converted by me (cf. v. 14, 15; Acts 14. 6, 7; with 16. 1, 2; 1 Timothy 1. 2, 18; 2 Timothy 1. 2). Translate, "My son, beloved and faithful to the Lord." bring you into remembrance—Timothy, from his spiritual connection with St. Paul, as converted by him, was best suited to remind them of the apostle's walk and teaching (2 Timothy 3. 10), which they in some respects, though not altogether (ch. 11. 2), had forgotten. as I teach . . . in every church—an argument implying that what the Spirit directed St. Paul to teach "everywhere" else, must be necessary at Corinth also (ch. 7. 17). 18. Some . . . as though I would not come—he guards against some misconstruing (as by the Spirit he foresees they will, when his letter shall have arrived) his sending Timothy, "as though" he "would not come" (or, "were not coming") himself. A puffed-up spirit was the besetting sin of the Corinthians (cf. ch. 1. 11; 5. 2). 19. ALFORD translates, "But come I will;" an emphatical negation of their supposition (v. 18). shortly—after Pentecost (ch. 16. 9). if the Lord will—a wise proviso (James 4. 15). He does not seem to have been able to go as soon as he intended, and will know—take cognizance of, but the power—I care not for their high-sounding "speech," "but what I desire to know is "their power," whether they be really powerful in the Spirit, or not. The predominant feature of Grecian character, a love for power of course, rather than that of godliness, showed itself at Corinth. 20. kingdom of God is not in word—translate, as in v. 19, to which the reference is "speech." Not empty "speeches," but the manifest "power" of the Spirit attests the presence of "the kingdom of God" (the reign of the gospel spiritually), in a Church or in an individual (cf. a. 2. 1, 4; 1 Thessalonians 1. 5). 21. with a rod, or in love—the Greek preposition is used in both clauses; must come in displeasure to exercise the rod, or in love, and be Spirit of meekness (Isaiah 11. 4; 2 Corinthians 13. 3)?

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-13. THE INCESTUOUS PERSON AT CORINTH: THE CORINTHIANS REPROVED FOR CONNIVANCE, AND WARNED TO PURGE OUT THE BAD LEAVEN. QUALIFICATION OF HIS FORMER COMMAND AS TO ASSOCIATION WITH SINNERS OF THE WORLD. 1. commonly—rather, "actually." [ALFORD.] Absolutely. [BENGEL.] "It is reported," implies, that the Corinthians, though they "wrote" (ch. 7. 1) to St. Paul on other points, gave him no information on those things which bore against themselves. These latter matters reached the apostle indirectly (ch. 1. 11). so much as named—The oldest MSS. and authorities omit "named:" "Fornication of such a gross kind as (exists) not even among the heathen, so that one (of you) hath (in concubinage) his father's wife," i. e., his stepmother, whilst his father is still alive (2 Corinthians 7. 12; cf. Leviticus 18. 8). She was perhaps a heathen, for which reason he does not direct his rebuke against her (cf. v. 12, 13). ALFORD thinks "have" means have in marriage: but the

connection is called "fornication," and neither Christian nor Gentile law would have sanctioned such a marriage however Corinth's notorious profligacy might wink at the concubinage. 2. puffed up—with your own wisdom and knowledge, and the eloquence of your favourite teachers: at a time when ye ought to be "mourning" at the scandal caused to religion by the incest. Paul mourned because they did not mourn (2 Corinthians 2. 4). We ought to mourn over the transgressions of others, and repent of our own (2 Corinthians 12. 21). [BENGEL.] that—ye have not felt such mourning as would lead to the result that, &c. taken away from among you—by excommunication. The incestuous person was hereby brought to bitter repentance, in the interval between the sending of the first and second Epistles (2 Corinthians 2. 5-10). Excommunication in the Christian Church corresponded to that in the Jewish synagogue, in there being a lighter and heavier form: the latter an utter separation from church-fellowship and the Lord's house, the former exclusion from the Lord's Supper only, but not from Church. 3. as absent—The best MSS. read, "being absent." present in spirit—(2 Kings 5. 26; Colossians 2. 5.) so done—rather, "perpetrated," as the Greek word here is stronger than that for "done" in v. 2. "So," i. e., so scandalously whilst called a brother. 4. In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ—By His authority and as representing His person and will (2 Corinthians 2. 10). Join this with "to deliver such a one unto Satan" (v. 5). The clause, "When ye have been gathered together and my Spirit (wherein I am "present," though "absent in body," v. 3), with the power of our Lord Jesus," stands in a parenthesis between. Paul speaking of himself uses the word "spirit;" of Christ, "power." Christ's power was promised to be present with His Church "gathered together in His name" (Matthew 18. 18-20); and here St. Paul by inspiration gives a special promise of his apostolic spirit, which in such cases was guided by the Holy Spirit, ratifying their decree passed according to his judgment ("I have judged," v. 3), as though he were present in person (John 20. 21-23; 2 Corinthians 13. 3-10). This power of infallible judgment was limited to the apostles; for they alone had the power of working miracles as their credentials to attest their infallibility. Their successors, to establish their claim to the latter, must produce the former (2 Corinthians 12. 12). Even the apostles in ordinary cases, and where not specially and consciously inspired, were fallible (Acts 8. 13, 23; Galatians 2. 11-14). 5. Besides excommunication (which the Corinthians themselves had the power of), St. Paul delegates here to the Corinthian Church his own special power as an apostle, of inflicting corporeal disease or death in punishment for sin ("to deliver to Satan such a one," i. e., so heinous a sinner). For instances of this power, see Acts 5. 1-11; 13. 11; 1 Timothy 1. 20. As Satan receives power at times to try the godly, as Job (Job 2. 4-7) and Paul (2 Corinthians 12. 7; cf. also as to Peter, Luke 22. 31), much more the ungodly. Satan, the "accuser of the brethren" (Revelation 12. 10) and the "adversary" (1 Peter 5. 8), demands the sinner for punishment on account of sin (Zechariah 3. 1). When God lets Satan have his way, He is said to "deliver the sinner unto Satan" (cf. Psalm 109. 6). Here it is not finally; but for the affliction of the body with disease, and even death (ch. 11. 30, 32), so as to destroy fleshly lust. He does not say, "for the destruction of the body," for it shall share in redemption (Romans 8. 23); but of the corrupt "flesh" which cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and the lusts of which had prompted this offender to incest (Romans 7. 5; 8. 9, 10). The "destruction of the flesh" answers to "mortify the deeds of the body" (Romans 8. 13), only that the latter is done by one's self, the former is effected by chastisement from God (cf. 1 Peter 4. 6). the spirit . . . saved—the spiritual part of man, in the believer the organ of the Holy Spirit. Temporary affliction often leads to permanent salvation (Psalm 33. 16). 6. Your glorying in your own attainments and those of your favourite teachers (ch. 3. 21; 4. 19; 5. 2), whilst all the while ye connive at such a scandal, is quite unseemly. a little leaven leaveneth . . . whole lump—(Galatians 5. 9), viz., with present complicity in the guilt, and the dan-of future contagion (ch. 15. 33; 2 Timothy 2. 17). 7. old leaven—The remnant of the "old" (Ephesians 4. 22-24) heathenish and natural corruption. The image is taken from the extreme care of the Jews in searching every corner of their houses, and "purging out" every particle of leaven from the time of killing the lamb before the Passover (Deuteronomy 16. 3, 4). So Christians are continually to search and purify their hearts (Psalm 139. 23, 24), as ye are unleavened—normally, and as far as your Christian calling is concerned: free from the leaven of sin and death (ch. 6. 11). St. Paul often grounds exhortations on the assumption of Christian professors' normal state as realized (Romans 6. 3, 4). [ALFORD.] Regarding the Corinthian Church as the Passover "unleavened lump" or mass, he entreats them to correspond in fact with this their normal state. "For Christ our Passover (Exodus 12. 5-11, 21-23; John 1. 29) has been (English Version, "is") sacrificed for us;" i. e., as the Jews began the days of unleavened bread with the slaying of the Passover lamb, so, Christ our Passover having been already slain, let there be no leaven of evil in you who are the "unleavened lump." Doubtless he alludes to the Passover which had been two or three weeks before kept by the Jewish Christians (ch. 16. 8): the Gentile Christians probably also refraining from leavened bread at the love-feasts. Thus the Jewish Passover naturally gave place to our Christian Easter. The time, however, of keeping feast (metaphorical; i. e., leading the Christian life of joy in Christ's finished work, cf. Proverbs 15. 15) among us Christians, corresponding to the Jewish Passover, is not limited, as the latter, to one season, but is ALL our time; for the transcendent benefits of the once-for-all completed sacrifice of our Passover Lamb extends to all the time of our lives and of this Christian dispensation; in no part of our time is the leaven of evil to be admitted. "For even:" an additional reason, besides that in v. 6, and a more cogent one for purging out every leaven of evil, viz., that Christ has been already sacrificed, whereas the old leaven is yet unre-moved, which ought to have been long ago purged out. 8. not . . . old leaven—of our unconverted state as Jews or heathen. malice—the opposite of "sincerity," which allows no leaven of evil to be mixed up with good (Matthew 18. 6). wickedness—the opposite of "truth," which allows not evil to be mistaken for good. The Greek for "malice" means the evil habit of mind; "wickedness," the outcoming of the same in word and deed. The Greek for "sincerity" expresses lit., a thing which, when examined by the sun's light, is found pure and unadulterated. 9. I wrote . . . in an epistle—rather, "in THE Epistle:" a former one not now extant. That St. Paul does not refer to the present letter is proved by the fact that no direction "not to company with fornicators" occurs in the previous part of it; also the words, "In an (or the) epistle," could not have been added if he meant, "I have just written" (2 Corinthians 10. 10). "His letters" (plural; not applying to merely one) confirm this. 2 Corinthians 7. 8 also refers to our first Epistle, just as here a former letter is referred to by the same phrase. St. Paul probably wrote a former brief reply to inquiries of the Corinthians: our first Epistle, as it enters more fully into the same subject, has superseded the former, which the Holy Spirit did not design for the guidance of the Church in general, and which therefore has not been preserved. See my Introduction. 10. Limitation of the prohibition alluded to in v. 9. As in dissolute Corinth to "company with no fornicators," &c., would be almost to company with none in the (unbelieving) world; ye need not utterly ("altogether") forego intercourse with fornicators, &c., of the unbelieving world (cf. ch. 10. 27; John 17. 15; 1 John 5. 18, 19). As "fornicators" sin against themselves; so "extortioners" against their neighbours, and "idolaters" against God. The attempt to get "out of the world," in violation of God's will that believers should remain in it but keep themselves from its evil, led to monasticism and its consequent evils. 11. But now I have written—"Now" does not express time, but "the case being so," viz., that to avoid fornicators, &c., of the world, you would have to leave the world altogether, which would be absurd. So

"now" is used, Hebrews 11. 16. Thus we avoid making the apostle now retract a command which he had before given. I have written—i. e., my meaning in the letter I wrote, was, &c. a brother—contrasted with a "fornicator, &c., of the world" (v. 10). There is less danger in associating with open worldlings than with carnal professors. Here, as in Ephesians 5. 3, 5, "covetousness" is joined with "fornication:" the common font of both being "the fierce and ever fiercer longing of the creature, which has turned from God, to fill itself with the inferior objects of sense." [TRENCH, Syn. New Testament.] Hence "idolatry" is associated with them: and the covetous man is termed an "idolater" (Numbers 25. 1, 2). The Corinthians did not fall into open idolatry, but ate things offered to idols, so making a compromise with the heathen; just as they connived at fornication. Thus this verse prepares for the precepts, ch. 8. 4, &c. Cf. the similar case of fornication, combined with a similar idolatrous compromise, after the pattern of Israel with the Midianites (Revelation 2. 14). no not to eat—not to sit at the same table with such; whether at the love-feasts (Agapæ) or in private intercourse, much more at the Lord's table: at the last, too often now the guests "are not as children in one family, but like a heterogeneous crowd of strangers in an inn" [BENGEL] (cf. Galatians 2. 12; 2 John 10. 11). 12. what have I to do—You might have easily understood that my concern is not with unbelievers outside the Church, but that I referred to those within it. also—Implying, Those within give me enough to do without those outside. do not ye, &c.—Ye judge your fellow-citizens, not strangers: much more should I. [BENGEL.] Rather, Is it not your duty to judge them that are within? God shall judge them that are without: do you look at home. [GROTIUS.] God is the Judge of the salvation of the heathen, not we (Romans 2. 12-16). St. Paul here gives an anticipatory censure of their going to law with saints before heathen tribunals, instead of judging such causes among themselves within. 13. put away from among yourselves that wicked—Sentence of excommunication in language taken from Deuteronomy 24. 7.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-11. LITIGATION OF CHRISTIANS IN HEATHEN COURTS CENSURED: ITS VERY EXISTENCE BETRAYS A WRONG SPIRIT: BETTER TO BEAR WRONG NOW, AND HEREAFTER THE DOERS OF WRONG SHALL BE SHUT OUT OF HEAVEN. 1. Dare—This word implies treason against Christian brotherhood. [BENGEL.] before the unjust—The Gentile judges are here so termed by an epithet appropriate to the subject in question, viz., one concerning justice. Though all Gentiles were not altogether unjust, yet in the highest view of justice which has regard to God as the Supreme Judge, they are so: Christians, on the other hand, as regarding God as the only Fountain of justice, should not expect justice from them. before . . . saints—The Jews abroad were permitted to refer their disputes to Jewish arbitrators (JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 14. 10, 17). So the Christians were allowed to have Christian arbitrators. 2. Do ye not know—as a truth universally recognized by Christians. Notwithstanding all your glorying in your "knowledge," ye are acting contrary to it (ch. 1. 4, 5; 8. 1). The oldest MSS. have "Or" before "Know ye not;" i. e., "What! (expressing surprise) know ye not," &c. saints . . . judge—i. e., rule, including judgment: as assessors of Christ. Matthew 19. 28, "judging," i. e., ruling over. Cf. Psalm 49. 14; Daniel 7. 22, 27; Revelation 2. 26; 3. 21; 20. 4. There is a distinction drawn by able expositors between the saints who judge or rule, and the world which is ruled by them: as there is between the elected (Matthew 20. 23) twelve apostles who sit on thrones judging, and the twelve tribes of Israel that are judged by them. To reign, and to be saved, are not necessarily synonymous. As Jehovah employed angels to carry the law into effect when He descended on Sinai to establish His throne in Israel, so at His coming the saints shall administer the kingdom for, and under, Him. The nations of the earth, and Israel the foremost, is the

flesh, shall, in this view, be the subjects of the rule of the Lord and His saints in glorified bodies. The mistake of the Chliasts was, they took the merely carnal view, restricting the kingdom to the terrestrial part. This part shall have place with the accession of spiritual and temporal blessings such as Christ's presence must produce. Besides this earthly glory, there shall be the heavenly glory of the saints reigning in transfigured bodies, and holding such blessed intercourse with mortal men, as angels had with men of old, and as Christ, Moses, and Elias, in glory had with Peter, James, and John, in the flesh at the transfiguration (2 Timothy 2. 12; 2 Peter 1. 16-18). But here the "world" seems to be the unbelieving world that is to be "condemned" (ch. 11. 22), rather than the whole world, including the subject nations which are to be brought under Christ's sway; however, it may include both those to be condemned, with the bad angels, and those about to be brought into obedience to the sway of Christ with His saints. Cf. Matthew 25. 32, 40, "all nations," "these my brethren" on the thrones with Him. The event will decide the truth of this view. Judged by you—or before you (cf. ch. 8. 22). smallest matters—The weightiest of earthly questions at issue are infinitely small compared with those to be decided on the judgment day. 3. Judge angels—viz., bad angels. We who are now "a spectacle to angels" shall then "judge angels." The saints shall join in approving the final sentence of the Judge on them (Jude 6). Believers shall, as administrators of the kingdom under Jesus, put down all rule that is hostile to God. Perhaps, too, good angels shall then receive from the Judge, with the approval of the saints, higher honours. 4. judgments—i. e., cases for judgment, least esteemed—lit., those of no esteem. Any, however low in the Church, rather than the heathen (ch. 1. 23). Questions of earthly property are of secondary consequence in the eyes of true Christians, and are therefore delegated to those in a secondary position in the Church. 5. your shame—Thus he checks their puffed-up spirit (ch. 5. 2; cf. ch. 15. 34). To shame you out of your present unworthy course of litigation before the heathen, I have said (v. 4), "Set the least esteemed in the Church to judge." Better even this, than your present course. Is it so?—Are you in such a helpless state that, &c. not a wise man—though ye admire "wisdom" so much on other occasions (ch. 1. 5, 22). St. Paul alludes probably to the title "Caham," or wise man, applied to each Rabbi in Jewish councils. no, not one—not even one, amidst so many reputed among you for wisdom (ch. 3. 18; 4. 6). shall be able—when applied to. brethren—lit., brother; i. e., judge between brother and brother. As each case should arise, the arbitrator was to be chosen from the body of the Church, such a wise person as had the charism, or gift, of Church government. 6. But—emphatically answering the question in the end of v. 5 in the negative. Translate, "Nay," &c. 7. utterly a fault—lit., a shortcoming (not so strong as sin). Your going to law at all is a falling short of your high privileges, not to say your doing so before unbelievers, which aggravates it. rather take wrong—(Proverbs 20. 22; Matthew 5. 39, 40); i. e., suffer yourselves to be wronged. 8. ye—emphatic. Ye, whom your Lord commanded to return good for evil, on the contrary, "do wrong (by taking away) and defraud" (by retaining what is entrusted to you; or "defraud" marks the effect of the "wrong" done, viz., the loss inflicted). Not only do ye not bear, but ye inflict wrongs. 9. unrighteous—translate, "Doers of wrong;" referring to v. 8 (cf. Galatians 5. 21). kingdom of God—which is a kingdom of righteousness (Romans 14. 17). fornicators—alluding to ch. 5; also below, v. 12-13. effeminate—self-polluters, who submit to unnatural lusts. 11. ye are washed—The Greek middle voice expresses, "Ye have had yourselves washed." This washing implies the admission to the benefits of Christ's salvation generally; of which the parts are, (1.) Sanctification, or the setting apart from the world, and adoption into the Church: so "sanctified" is used ch. 7. 14; John 17. 19. Cf. 1 Peter 1. 2, where it rather seems to mean the setting apart of one as consecrated by the Spirit in the eternal purpose of God. (2.) Justification from condemnation through the righteousness of God in Christ by faith (Romans 1. 17). So PAROUS. The order of sanctification before justification shows that it must be so taken, and not in the sense of progressive sanctification. "Washed" precedes both, and so must refer to the Christian's outward new birth of water, the sign of the inward setting apart to the Lord by the inspiration of the Spirit as the seed of new life (John 3. 5; Ephesians 5. 26; Titus 3. 5; Hebrews 10. 22). St. Paul (cf. the Church of England Baptismal Service), in charity, and faith in the ideal of the Church, presumes that baptism realizes its original design, and that those outwardly baptized inwardly enter into vital communion with Christ (Galatians 3. 27). He presents the grand ideal which those alone realized in whom the inward and the outward baptism coalesced. At the same time he recognizes the fact that this in many cases does not hold good (v. 8-10), leaving it to God to decide who are the really "washed," whilst he only decides on broad general principles. In the name of . . . Jesus, and by the Spirit—rather, "in the Spirit," i. e., by His in-dwelling. Both clauses belong to the three—"washed, sanctified, justified." our God—The "our" reminds them that amidst all his reproofs God is still the common God of himself and them.

12-20. REFUTATION OF THE ANTINOMIAN DEFENCE OF FORNICATION, AS IF IT WAS LAWFUL BECAUSE MEATS ARE SO. 12. All things are lawful unto me—These, which were St. Paul's own words on a former occasion (to the Corinthians, cf. ch. 10. 23, and Galatians 5. 23), were made a pretext for excusing the eating of meats offered to idols, and so of what was generally connected with idolatry (Acts 15. 29), "fornication" (perhaps in the letter of the Corinthians to St. Paul, ch. 7. 1). St. Paul's remark had referred only to things indifferent: but they wished to treat fornication as such, on the ground that the existence of bodily appetites proved the lawfulness of their gratification. me—St. Paul giving himself as a sample of Christians in general. but I—whatever others do, I will not, &c. lawful . . . brought under the power—The Greek words are from the same root, whence there is a play on the words: All things are in my power, but I will not be brought under the power of any of them (the "all things"). He who commits "fornication," steps aside from his own legitimate power or liberty, and is "brought under the power" of an harlot (v. 15; cf. ch. 7. 4). The "power" ought to be in the hands of the believer, not in the things which he uses [BENGEL]; else his liberty is forfeited, he ceases to be his own master (John 8. 34-35; Galatians 5. 13; 1 Peter 2. 16; 2 Peter 2. 19). Unlawful things ruin thousands; "lawful" things (unlawfully used), ten thousands. 13. The argument drawn from the indifference of meats (ch. 8. 8; Romans 14. 14, 17; cf. Mark 7. 18; Colossians 2. 20-22) to that of fornication does not hold good. Meats doubtless are indifferent, since both they and the "belly" for which they are created are to be "destroyed" in the future state. But "the body is not (created) for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body" (as its Redeemer, who hath Himself assumed the body): "And God hath raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us" (i. e., our bodies): therefore the "body" is not, like the "belly," after having served a temporary use, to be destroyed: Now "he that committeth fornication, sinneth against his own body" (v. 18). Therefore fornication is not indifferent, since it is a sin against one's own body, which, like the Lord for whom it is created, is not to be destroyed, but to be raised to eternal existence. Thus St. Paul gives here the germ of the three subjects handled in subsequent sections: (1.) The relation between the sexes. (2.) The question of meats offered to idols. (3.) The resurrection of the body. shall destroy—at the Lord's coming to change the natural bodies of believers into spiritual bodies (ch. 15. 44, 52). There is a real essence underlying the superficial phenomena of the present temporary organization of the body, and this essential germ, when all the particles are scattered, involves the future resurrection of the body incorruptible. 14. (Romans 8. 11.) raised up—rather "raised," to distinguish it from

"will raise up us;" the Greek of the latter being a compound, the former a simple verb. Believers shall be raised up out of the rest of the dead (Note, Philippians 3. 11); the first resurrection (Revelation 20. 5). us—Here he speaks of the possibility of his being found in the grave when Christ comes; elsewhere, of his being possibly found alive (1 Thessalonians 4. 17). In either event, the Lord's coming rather than death is the great object of the Christian's expectation (Romans 8. 19). 15. Resuming the thought in v. 13, "the body is for the Lord" (ch. 12. 27; Ephesians 4. 12, 15, 16; 5. 30). shall I then—such being the case. take—spontaneously alienating them from Christ. For they cannot be at the same time "the members of an harlot," and "of Christ." [BENGL.] It is a fact no less certain than mysterious, that moral and spiritual ruin is caused by such sins; which human wisdom (when untaught by revelation) held to be actions as blameless as eating and drinking. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 16. Justification of his having called fornicators "members of an harlot" (v. 15). joined—by carnal intercourse; lit., cemented to: cleaving to. one body—with her. with he—God speaking by Adam (Genesis 2. 24; Matthew 19. 5). "He which made them at the beginning said," &c. (Ephesians 5. 31). 17. one spirit—with Him. In the case of union with a harlot, the fornicator becomes one "body" with her (not one "spirit," for the spirit which is normally the organ of the Holy Spirit in man, is in the carnal so overlaid with what is sensual that it is ignored altogether). But the believer not only has his body sanctified by union with Christ's body, but also becomes "one Spirit" with Him (John 15. 1-7; 17. 21; 2 Peter 1. 4; cf. Ephesians 5. 23-32, and John 3. 6). 18. Flee—The only safety in such temptations is flight (Genesis 39. 12; Job 31. 1). Every sin—The Greek is forcible. "Every sin whatsoever that a man doeth." Every other sin; even gluttony, drunkenness, and self-murder are "without," i. e., comparatively external to the body (Mark 7. 18; cf. Proverbs 6. 30-32). He certainly injures, but he does not alienate the body itself; the sin is not terminated in the body; he rather sins against the perishing accidents of the body (as the "belly," and the body's present temporary organization), and against the soul than against the body in its permanent essence, designed "for the Lord." "But" the fornicator alienates that body which is the Lord's, and makes it one with a harlot's body, and so "sinneth against his own body," i. e., against the verity and nature of his body; not a mere effect on the body from without, but a contradiction of the truth of the body, wrought within itself. [ALFORD.] 19. Proof that "he that fornicates sinneth against his own body" (v. 18). your body—not "bodies." As in ch. 3. 17, he represented the whole company of believers (souls and bodies), i. e., the Church, as "the temple of God" the Spirit; so here, the body of each individual of the Church is viewed as the ideal "temple of the Holy Ghost." So John 17. 23, which proves that not only the Church, but also each member of it, is "the temple of the Holy Ghost." Still though many the several members form one temple, the whole collectively being that which each is in miniature individually. Just as the Jews had one temple only, so in the fullest sense all Christian churches and individual believers form one temple only. Thus "YOUR (plural) body" is distinguished here from "HIS OWN (particular or individual) body" (v. 18). In sinning against the latter, the fornicator sins against "your (ideal) body," that of "Christ," whose "members your bodies" are (v. 15). In this consists the sin of fornication, that it is a sacrilegious consecration of God's temple to profane uses. The unseen, but much more efficient, Spirit of God in the spiritual temple now takes the place of the visible Shekinah in the old material temple. The whole man is the temple; the soul is the inmost shrine; the understanding and heart the holy place; and the body, the porch and exterior of the edifice. Chastity is the guardian of the temple to prevent any thing unclean entering which might provoke the indwelling God to abandon it as defiled. [TERTULLIAN de cultu feminarum.] None but God can claim a temple; here the Holy Ghost is assigned one; therefore the Holy Ghost God not your own—The fornicator treats his body as if it were "his own," to give to a harlot if he pleases (v. 15 of v. 20). But we have no right to alienate our body which is the Lord's. In ancient servitude the person of the servant was wholly the property of the master, not his own. Purchase was one of the ways of acquiring a slave. Man has sold himself to sin (1 Kings 21. 20; Romans 7. 14). Christ buys him to Himself, to serve Him (Romans 6. 16-22). So bought with a price—Therefore Christ's blood is strictly a ransom paid to God's justice by the love of God in Christ for our redemption (Matthew 20. 28; Acts 20. 28; Galatians 3. 13; Hebrews 9. 12; 1 Peter 1. 18, 19; 2 Peter 2. 1; Revelation 5. 9). Whilst He thus took off our obligation to punishment, He laid upon us a new obligation to obedience (ch. 7. 22, 23). If we accept Him as our Prophet to reveal God to us, and our Priest to atone for us, we must also accept Him as our King to rule over us as wholly His, presenting every token of our fealty (Isalah 26. 13). in your body—as "in" a temple (cf. John 13. 32; Romans 12. 1; Philippians 1. 20). and in your spirit, which are God's—Not in the oldest MSS. and versions, and not needed for the sense, as the context refers mainly to the "body" (v. 16, 18, 19). The "spirit" is incidentally mentioned v. 17, which perhaps gave rise to the interpolation, at first written in the margin, afterwards inserted in the text.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-40. REPLY TO THEIR INQUIRIES AS TO MARRIAGE; THE GENERAL PRINCIPLE IN OTHER THINGS IS, ABIDE IN YOUR STATION, FOR THE TIME IS SHORT. 1. The Corinthians in their letter had probably asked questions which tended to disparage marriage, and had implied that it was better to break it off when contracted with an unbeliever. good—i. e., expedient, because of "the present distress;" i. e., the unsettled state of the world, and the likelihood of persecutions tearing rudely asunder those bound by marriage-ties. Hebrews 13. 4, in opposition to ascetic and Romish notions of superior sanctity in celibacy, declares, "Marriage is HONOURABLE IN ALL." Another reason why in some cases celibacy may be a matter of Christian expediency is stated v. 34, 35, "that ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction." But these are exceptional cases, and in exceptional times, such as those of St. Paul. 2. Here the general rule is given to avoid fornication—More lit., "on account of fornications," to which as being very prevalent at Corinth, and not even counted sins among the heathen, unmarried persons might be tempted. The plural, "fornications," marks irregular lusts, as contrasted with the unity of the marriage relation. [BENGL.] let every man have—a positive command to all who have not the gift of continency, in fact to the great majority of the world (v. 5). The dignity of marriage is set forth by St. Paul, Ephesians 5. 25-32, in the fact that it signifies the mystical union between Christ and the Church. 3, 4. The duty of cohabitation on the part of the married. due benevolence—The oldest MSS. read simply, "her due;" i. e., the conjugal cohabitation due by the marriage contract (cf. v. 4). 4. A paradox. She hath not power over her body, and yet it is her own. The oneness of body in which marriage places husband and wife explains this. The one complements the other. Neither without the other realizes the perfect ideal of man. 5. Defraud . . . not—viz., of the conjugal duty "due" (v. 3; cf. LXX., Exodus 21. 10). except it be—unless perchance. [ALFORD.] give yourselves to—lit., be at leisure for; be free from interruptions for; viz., on some special "season," as the Greek for "time" means (cf. Exodus 19. 15; Joel 2. 16; Zechariah 7. 3). fasting and prayer—The oldest MSS. omit "fasting and;" an interpolation, evidently, of ascetics. come together—The oldest MSS. read, "be together," viz., in the regular state of the married. Satan—who often thrusts in his temptations to unholy thoughts amidst the holiest exercises for your incontinency—because of your inability to "contain" (v. 8) your natural propensities, which Satan would take advantage of. 6. by permission . . . not of commandment—not by God's permission to me to say it. but, "by way of permission to you, not as a commandment." "This" refers to the directions v. 2-5. 7. even as

—having the gift of continence (Matthew 19. 11, 12). This wish does not hold good absolutely, else the extension of mankind and of the Church would cease; but relatively to "the present distress" (v. 26). 8. to the unmarried—in general, of both sexes (v. 10, 11). and widows—in particular, even as I—unmarried (ch. 9. 5). 9. if they cannot contain—i. e., have not continency. burn—with the secret flame of lust, which lays waste the whole inner man. [Cf. AUGUSTINE, de Sancta Virginitate.] The dew of God's grace is needed to stifle the flame, which otherwise would thrust men at last into hell-fire. 10. not I, but the Lord—(Cf. v. 12, 25, 40.) In ordinary cases he writes on inspired apostolic authority (ch. 14. 37); but here on the direct authority of the Lord himself (Mark 10. 11, 12). In both cases alike the things written are inspired by the Spirit of God, "but not all for all time, nor all on the primary truths of the faith." [ALFORD.] Let not the wife depart—lit., "be separated from." Probably the separation on either side, whether owing to the husband or to the wife, is forbidden. 11. But and if she depart—or "be separated." If the sin of separation has been committed, that of a new marriage is not to be added (Matthew 5. 32). be reconciled—by appeasing her husband's displeasure, and recovering his good will. let not . . . husband put away . . . wife—In Matthew 5. 32 the only exception allowed is, "saving for the cause of fornication." 12. to the rest—the other classes (besides "the married," v. 10, where both husband and wife are believers) about whom the Corinthians had inquired, viz., those involved in mixed marriages with unbelievers. not the Lord—by any direct command spoken by Him. she be pleased—Greek, "consents;" implying his wish in the first instance, with which hers concurs. 13. the woman—a believer. let her not leave him—"her husband," instead of "him," is the reading of the oldest MSS. The Greek for "leave" is the same as in v. 12, "put away;" translate, "Let her not put away (i. e., part with) her husband." The wife had the power of effecting a divorce by Greek and Roman law. 14. sanctified—Those inseparably connected with the people of God are hallowed thereby, so that the latter may retain the connection without impairing their own sanctity (cf. 1 Timothy 4. 5); nay, rather imparting to the former externally some degree of their own hallowed character, and so preparing the way for the unbeliever becoming at last sanctified inwardly by faith. by . . . by—rather, "in . . . in;" i. e., in virtue of the marriage-tie between them. by the husband—The oldest MSS. read, "by the brother." It is the fact of the husband being a "brother," i. e., a Christian, though the wife is not so, that sanctifies or hallows the union. else . . . children unclean—i. e., beyond the hallowed pale of God's people: in contrast to "holy," i. e., all that is within the consecrated limits. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] The phraseology accords with that of the Jews, who regarded heathens as "unclean," and all of the elect nation as "holy," i. e., partakers of the holy covenant. Children were included in the covenant, as God made it not only with Abraham, but with his "seed after" him (Genesis 17. 7). So the faith of one Christian parent gives to the children a near relationship to the Church, just as if both parents were Christians (cf. Romans 11. 16). Timothy, the bearer of this Epistle, is an instance in point (Acts 16. 1). St. Paul appeals to the Corinthians as recognizing the principle, that the infants of heathen parents would not be admissible to Christian baptism, because there is no faith on the part of the parents; but where one parent is a believer, the children are regarded as not aliens from, but admissible even in infancy as sharers in, the Christian covenant; for the Church presumes that the believing parent will rear the child in the Christian faith. Infant baptism tacitly superseded infant circumcision, just as the Christian Lord's day gradually superseded the Jewish sabbath, without our having any express command for, or record of, transference. The setting aside of circumcision and of sabbaths in the case of the Gentiles was indeed expressly commanded by the apostles and St. Paul, but the substitution of infant baptism and of the Lord's day were tacitly adopted, not expressly enacted. No explicit mention of it occurs till Irenæus in the third century; but no society of Christians that we read of disputed its propriety till 1500 years after Christ. Anabaptists would have us defer baptism till maturity as the child cannot understand the nature of it. But a child may be made heir of an estate: it is his, though incapable at the time of using or comprehending its advantage; he is not hereafter to acquire the title and claim to it: he will hereafter understand his claim, and be capable of employing his wealth: he will then, moreover, become responsible for the use he makes of it. [ARCHBISHOP WHATELY.] 15. if . . . depart—i. e., wishes for separation; translate, "separateth himself:" offended with her Christianity, and refusing to live with her unless she renounce it. brother . . . is not under bondage—is not bound to renounce the faith for the sake of retaining her unbelieving husband. [HAMMOND.] So Deuteronomy 12. 6; Matthew 10. 35-37; Luke 14. 26. The believer does not lie under the same obligation in the case of a union with an unbeliever, as in the case of one with a believer. In the former case he is not bound not to separate, if the unbeliever separate or "depart," in the latter nothing but "fornication" justifies separation. [PHOTIUS in Ecumenicus.] but God hath called us to peace—Our Christian calling is one that tends to "peace" (Romans 12. 18), not quarrelling; therefore the believer should not ordinarily depart from the unbelieving consort (v. 12-14), on the one hand; and on the other, in the exceptional case of the unbeliever desiring to depart, the believer is not bound to force the other party to stay in a state of continual discord (Matthew 5. 32). Better still it would be not to enter into such unequal alliances at all (v. 40; 2 Corinthians 6. 14). 16. What knowest thou but that by staying with thy unbelieving partner thou mayest save him or her? Enforcing the precept to stay with the unbelieving consort (v. 12-14). So Ruth the Moabitess became a convert to her husband's faith; and Joseph and Moses probably gained over their wives. So conversely the unbelieving husband may be won by the believing wife (1 Peter 3. 1). [CALVIN.] Or else (v. 15), if thy unbelieving consort wishes to depart, let him go, so that thou mayest live "in peace;" for thou canst not be sure of converting him, so as to make it obligatory on thee at all costs to stay with him against his will. [MENOCHIUS and ALFORD.] save—be the instrument of salvation to (James 5. 20). 16. But—Greek, "If not." "Only." Caution that believers should not make this direction (v. 16; as ALFORD explains it) a ground for separating of themselves (v. 12-14). Or, But if there be no hope of gaining over the unbeliever, still let the general principle be maintained, "As the Lord hath allotted to each, as God hath called each, so let him walk" (so the Greek in the oldest reading); let him walk in the path allotted to him and wherein he was called. The heavenly calling does not set aside our earthly callings, so ordain I in all churches—ye also therefore should obey. 18. not become uncircumcised—by surgical operation (1 Maccabees 1. 15; JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 12. 5. 1). Some Christians in excess of anti-Jewish feeling might be tempted to this. let him not be circumcised—as the Judaizing Christians would have him (Acts 15.; Galatians 5. 2). 19. circumcision . . . nothing, but . . . keeping of . . . commandments of God—viz., is all in all. In Galatians 5. 6 this "keeping of the commandments of God" is defined to be "faith which worketh by love;" and in Galatians 6. 15, "a new creature." Circumcision was a commandment of God: but not for ever, as "love." 20. the same calling—i. e., the condition from which he is called a Jew, a Greek, a slave, or a freeman. 21. care not for it—Let it not be a trouble to thee that thou art a servant or slave. use it rather—continue rather in thy state as a servant (v. 20; Galatians 3. 28; 1 Timothy 6. 2). The Greek, "But if even thou mayest be made free, use it," and the context (v. 20, 22) favours this view. [CHRYSOSTOM, BENGEL, and ALFORD.] This advice (if this translation be right) is not absolute, as the spirit of the Gospel is against slavery. What is advised here is, contentment under one's existing condition (v. 24), though an undesirable one, since in our union with Christ all outward disparities of condition are compensated (v. 22). He not sp taly impatient to cast off "even" thy condition as a servant by unlawful means (1 Peter 2. 13-18); as, e. g., Onesimus did by fleeing (Philemon 10-18). The precept (v. 23), "Become not (so the Greek) the servants of men," implies plainly that slavery is abnormal (cf. Leviticus 25. 42). "Men-stealers," or slave-dealers, are classed in 1 Timothy I. 10, with "murderers" and "perjurers." NEANDER, ZACIUS, &c., explain, "If called, being a slave, to Christianity, be content—but yet, if also thou canst be free (as a still additional good, which if thou canst not attain, be satisfied without it; but which, if offered to thee, is not to be despised), make use of the opportunity of becoming free, rather than by neglecting it to remain a slave." I prefer this latter view, as more according to the tenor of the Gospel, and fully justified by the Greek. 22. the Lord's freeman—(Philemon 16)—rather, "freedman." Though a slave externally, spiritually made free by the Lord: from sin, John 8. 36; from the law, Rom. 8. 2; from "circumcision," v. 19; Galatians 5. 1. Christ's servant—(Ch. 9. 21.) Love makes Christ's service perfect freedom (Matthew 11. 20, 30; Galatians 5. 13; 1 Peter 2. 16). 23. be not ye—Greek, "become not ye." St. Paul here changes from "thou" (v. 21) to "ye." YE ALL are "bought" with the blood of Christ, whatever be your earthly state (ch. 6. 20); "Become not servants to men," either externally, or spiritually (the former sense applying to the free alone: the latter to Christian freemen and slaves alike, that they should not be servile adherents to their party leaders at Corinth, ch. 3. 21, 22; Matthew 23. 8-10; 2 Corinthians II. 20; nor indeed slaves to men generally, so far as their condition admits). The external and internal conditions, so far as is attainable, should correspond, and the former be subservient to the latter (cf. v. 21, 32-35). 24. abide with God—being chiefly careful of the footing on which he stands towards God rather than that towards men. This clause, "with God," limits the similar precept, v. 20. A man may cease to "abide in the calling wherein he was called," and yet not violate the precept here. If a man's calling be not favourable to his "abiding with God" (retaining holy fellowship with Him), he may use lawful means to change from it (cf. Note, v. 21). 25. no commandment of the Lord: yet . . . my judgment—I have no express revelation from the Lord commanding it, but I give my judgment (opinion): viz., under the ordinary inspiration which accompanied the apostles in all their canonical writings (cf. v. 40; ch. I. 37; 1 Thessalonians 4. 15). The Lord inspires me in this case to give you only a recommendation, which you are free to adopt or reject, not a positive command. In the second case (v. 10, 11) it was a positive command; for the Lord had already made known His will (Malachi 2. 14, 15; Matthew 5. 31, 32). In the third case (v. 12), the Old Testament commandment of God to put away strange wives (Ezra 10. 3), St. Paul by the Spirit revokes. mercy of the Lord—(1 Timothy 1. 13.) He attributes his apostleship and the gifts accompanying it (including inspiration) to God's grace alone. faithful—in dispensing to you the inspired directions received by me from the Lord. 26. I suppose—"I consider." this—viz., "for a man so to be," i. e., in the same state in which he is (v. 27). For—by reason of. the present distress—the distresses to which believers were then beginning to be subjected, making the married state less desirable than the single; and which should prevail throughout the world before the destruction of Jerusalem, according to Christ's prophecy (Matthew 24. 8-21; cf. Acts 11. 23). 27. Illustrating the meaning of "so to be," v. 23. Neither the married (those "bound to a wife") nor the unmarried (those "loosed from a wife") are to "seek" a change of state (cf. v. 20, 24). 28. trouble in the flesh—Those who marry, he says, shall incur "trouble in the flesh" (i. e., in their outward state, by reason of the present distress), not sin, which is the trouble of the spirit. but I spare you—The emphasis in the Greek is on "I." My motive in advising you so is, to "spare you" such trouble in the flesh. So ALFORD after CALVIN, BENJEL, &c. ESTIUS from AUGUSTINE explains it, "I spare you further details of the inconveniences of matrimony, lest even the incontinent may at the peril of not be deterred from matrimony: thus I have regard for your infirmity." The antithesis in the Greek of "I . . . you" and "such" favours the former. 29. This I say—a summing up of the whole, wherein he draws the practical inference from what precedes (ch. 15. 50). the time—the season (so the Greek) of this present dispensation up to the coming of the Lord (Romans 13. 11). He uses the Greek expression which the Lord used in Luke 21. 8; Mark 13. 33. short—lit., contracted. it remaineth—The oldest MSS. read, "The time (season) is shortened as is what remains, in order that both they," &c.; i. e., the effect which the shortening of the time ought to have is, "that for the remaining time (henceforth), both they," &c. The clause, "as to what remains," though in construction belonging to the previous clause, in sense belongs to the following. However, CYPRIAN and Vulgate support English Version, as though they had none—We ought to consider nothing as our own in real or permanent possession. 30. They that weep . . . wept not—(Cf. 2 Corinthians 6. 10.) they that buy . . . possessed not—(Cf. Isaiah 24. 1, 2.) Christ specifies as the condemning sin of the men of Sodom not merely their open profligacy, but that "they bought, they sold," &c., as men whose all was in this world (Luke 17. 28). Possessed in the Greek implies a holding fast of a possession; this the Christian will not do, for his "enduring substance" is elsewhere (Hebrews 10. 34). 31. not abusing it—not abusing it by an overmuch using of it. The meaning of "abusing" here is, not so much perverting, as using it to the full. [BENJEL.] We are to use it, not to take our fill of its pursuits as our chief aim (cf. Luke 10. 40-42). As the planets whilst turning on their own axis, yet revolve round the sun; so whilst we do our part in our own worldly sphere, God is to be the centre of all our desires. fashion—the present fleeting form. Cf. Psalm 39. 6, "vain show;" Psalm 73. 20, "a dream;" James 4. 14, "a vapour." passeth away—not merely shall pass away, but is now actually passing away. The image is drawn from a shifting scene in a play represented on the stage (1 John 2. 17). St. Paul inculcates not so much the outward denial of earthly things, as the inward spirit whereby the married and the rich, as well as the unmarried and the poor, would be ready to sacrifice all for Christ's sake. 32. without carefulness—I would have you to be not merely "without trouble," but "without distracting cares" (so the Greek). careth—if he uses aright the advantages of his condition. 34. difference also—not merely the unmarried and the married man differ in their respective duties, but also the wife and the virgin. Indeed a woman undergoes a greater change of condition than a man in contracting marriage. 35. for your own profit—not to display my apostolic authority. not . . . cast a snare upon you—Image from throwing a noose over an animal in hunting. Not that by hard injunctions I may entangle you with the fear of committing sin where there is no sin. comely—befitting under present circumstances. attend upon—lit., "assiduously wait on;" sitting down to the duty. Cf. Luke 10. 39, Mary; Luke 2. 37, "Anna . . . a widow, who departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day" (1 Timothy 5. 5). distraction—the same Greek as "cumbered" (Luke 10. 40, Martha). 36. behave . . . uncomely—Is not treating his daughter well in leaving her unmarried beyond the flower of her age, and thus debarring her from the lawful gratification of her natural feeling as a marriageable woman. need so require—if the exigencies of the case require it; viz., regard to the feelings and welfare of his daughter. Opposed to "having no necessity" (v. 37). let them marry—the daughter and her suitor. 37. steadfast—not to be turned from his purpose by the obloquy of the world. having no necessity—arising from the natural inclinations of the daughter. power over his . . . will—when, owing to his daughter's will not opposing his will, he has power to carry into effect his will or wish. decreed—determined. 38. her—The oldest MSS. have, "his own virgin daughter." but—The oldest MSS. have "and." 39. bound by the law—The oldest MSS. omit "by the law." only in the Lord—i. e., her marry only a Christian (2 Corinthians 6. 14). 40. happier . . . I think also—"I also think;" just as you Corinthians and your teachers think much of your opinions, so I also give my opinion by inspiration; so in v. 25, "my judgment" or opinion. Think does not imply doubt, but often a matter of well-grounded assurance (John 5. 89).

CHAPTER VIII.

V. 1-18. ON PARTAKING OF MEATS OFFERED TO IDOLS. Though to those knowing that an idol has no existence, the question of eating meats offered to idols (referred to in the letter of the Corinthians, cf. ch. 7. 1) might seem unimportant, it is not so with some, and the infirmities of such should be respected. The portions of the victims not offered on the altars belonged partly to the priests, partly to the offerers; and were eaten at feasts in the temples and in private houses, and were often sold in the markets; so that Christians were constantly exposed to the temptation of receiving them, which was forbidden (Numbers 25. 2; Psalm 106. 28). The apostles forbade it in their decree issued from Jerusalem (Acts 15., and 21., 25.); but St. Paul does not allude here to that decree, as he rests his precepts rather on his own independent apostolic authority. we know that we all have knowledge—The Corinthians doubtless had referred to their "knowledge" (viz., of the indifference of meats, as in themselves having no sanctity or pollution). St. Paul replies, "We are aware that we all have (speaking generally, and so far as Christian theory goes; for in v. 7 he speaks of some who practically have not) this knowledge." Knowledge puffeth up—when without "love." Here a parenthesis begins; and the main subject is resumed in the same words, v. 4. "As concerning (touching) therefore the eating," &c. "Puffing up" is to please self. "Edifying" is to please one's neighbour. Knowledge only says, All things are lawful for me; Love adds, But all things do not edify [BENGEL] (ch. 10. 23; Romans 14. 15). edifieth—tends to build up the spiritual temple (ch. 3. 9; 6. 19). 2. And—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The absence of the connecting particle gives an emphatical sententiousness to the style, suitable to the subject. The first step to knowledge is to know our own ignorance. Without love there is only the appearance (note, "think," &c.) of knowledge. knoweth—The oldest MSS. read a Greek word implying personal experimental acquaintance, not merely knowledge of a fact, which the Greek of "we know" or are aware (v. 1) means. as he ought to know—experimentally and in the way of "love." 3. love God—the source of love to our neighbour (1 John 4. 11, 12, 20; 5. 2). the same—viz., this man; he who loves, not he who "thinks that he knows," not having "charity" or love (v. 1, 2). is known of him—is known with the knowledge of approval, and is acknowledged by God as His (Psalm 1. 6; Galatians 4. 9; 2 Timothy 2. 19). Contrast, "I never knew you," Matthew 7. 23. To love God is to know God; and he who thus knows God has been first known by God (cf. ch. 13. 12; 1 Peter 1. 2). 4. As concerning, &c.—Resuming the subject begun in v. 1, "As touching," &c. idol is nothing—has no true being at all; the god it represents is not a living reality. This does not contradict ch. 10. 20, which states that they who worship idols, worship devils; for here it is the gods believed by the worshippers to be represented by the idols which are denied to have any existence, not the devils which really under the idols delude the worshippers. none other God—The oldest MSS. omit the word "other;" which gives a clearer sense. 5. "For even supposing there are (exist) gods so called (2 Thessalonians 2. 4), whether in heaven (as the sun, moon, and stars) or in earth (as deified kings, beasts, &c.), as there be (a recognized fact, Deuteronomy 10. 17; Psalm 135. 5; 136. 2) gods many and lords many." Angels and men in authority are termed gods in Scripture, as exercising a divinely-delegated power under God (cf. Exodus 22. 9, with v. 23; Psalm 82. 1, 6; John 10. 34, 35). 6. to us—believers. of whom—from whom as Creator all things derive their existence. we in him—rather, "we for Him," or "unto Him." God the FATHER is the end for whom and for whose glory believers live. In Colossians 1. 16 all things are said to be created (not only "by" Christ, but also) "for Him" (CHRIST) So entirely are the Father and Son one (cf. Romans 11. 36; Hebrews 2. 10). one Lord—contrasted with the "many lords" of heathendom (v. 5). by whom—(John 1. 3; Hebrews 1. 2). we by him—as all things are "of" the Father by creation, so they (we believers especially) are restored to Him by the new creation (Colossians 1. 20; Revelation 21. 5). Also, as all things are by Christ by creation, so they (we especially) are restored by Him by the new creation. 7. Howbeit—Though to us who "have knowledge" (v. 1, 4-6) all meats are indifferent, yet "this knowledge is not in all" in the same degree as we have it. St. Paul had admitted to the Corinthians that "we all have knowledge" (v. 1), i. e., so far as Christian theory goes; but practically some have it not in the same degree. with conscience—An ancient reading; but other very old MSS. read "association" or "habit." In either reading the meaning is: Some Gentile Christians, whether from old association of ideas or misdirected conscience, when they ate such meats, ate them with some feeling as if the idol were something real (v. 4), and had changed the meats by the fact of the consecration into something either holy or else polluted. unto this hour—after they have embraced Christianity; an implied censure, that they are not further advanced by this time in Christian "knowledge." their conscience . . . is defiled—by their eating it "as a thing offered to idols." If they ate it unconscious at the time that it had been offered to idols, there would be no defilement of conscience. But conscions of what it was, and not having such knowledge as other Corinthians boasted of, viz., that an idol is nothing and can therefore neither pollute nor sanctify meats, they by eating them sin against conscience (cf. Romans 14. 15-23). It was on the ground of Christian expediency, not to cause a stumbling-block to "weak" brethren, that the Jerusalem decree against partaking of such meats (though indifferent in themselves) was passed (Acts 15). Hence he here vindicates it against the Corinthian asserters of an inexpedient liberty. 8. Other old MSS. read, "Neither if we do not eat, are we the better: neither if we eat are we the worse:" the language of the eaters who justified their eating thus. [LACHMANN.] In English Version St. Paul admits that "meat neither resents (so the Greek for "commendeth") us as commended nor as disapproved before God:" it does not affect our standing before God (Romans 14. 6). 9. this liberty of yours—the watchword for lax Corinthians. The very indifference of meats, which I concede, is the reason why ye should "take heed" not to tempt weak brethren to act against their conscience (which constitutes sin, Romans 14. 22, 23). 10. If any man—being weak. which hast knowledge—The very knowledge which thou prides thyself on (v. 1), will lead the weak after thy example to do that against his conscience, which thou doest without any scruple of conscience, viz., to eat meats offered to idols. conscience of him which is weak—rather, "His conscience, seeing he is weak." [ALFORD, &c.] emboldened—viz., built up. You ought to have built up your brother in good; but by your example your building him up is the emboldening him to violate his conscience. 11. shall . . . perish—The oldest MSS. read "perisheth." A single act seemingly unimportant may produce everlasting consequences. The weak brother loses his faith, and if he do not recover it, his salvation [BENGEL.] (Romans 14. 23). for whom Christ died—and for whose sake we too ought to be willing to die (1 John 3. 16). And yet professing Christians at Corinth virtually tempted their brethren to their damnation, so far were they from sacrificing aught for their salvation. Note here, that it is no argument against the dogma that Christ died for all, even for those who perish, to say that thus He would have died in vain for many. Scripture is our rule, not our suppositions as to consequences. More is involved in redemption than the salvation of man: the character of God as at once just and loving is vindicated even in the case of the lost; for they might have been saved, and so even in their case Christ has not died in vain. So the mercies of God's providence are not in vain, though many abuse them. Even the condemned shall manifest God's love in the great day in that they too had the offer of God's mercy. It shall be the most awful ingredient in their cup that they might have been saved but would not: Christ died to redeem even them. 12. wound their weak conscience—lit., "smile their conscience, being (as yet) in a weak state." It aggravates the cruelty of the act that it is committed on the weak, just as if one were to strike an invalid, against Christ—on account of the sympathy between Christ and His members (Matthew 25. 40; Acts 9. 4, 5). 13. meat—Old English for "food" in general. make . . . to offend—Greek, "is a stumbling-block to." no flesh—In order to ensure my avoiding flesh offered to idols, I would abstain from all kinds of flesh, in order not to be a stumbling-block to my brother.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-27. HE CONFIRMS HIS TEACHING AS TO NOT PUTTING A STUMBLING-BLOCK IN A BROTHER'S WAY (ch. 8. 13) BY HIS OWN EXAMPLE IN NOT USING HIS UNDOUBTED RIGHTS AS AN APOSTLE, SO AS TO WIN MEN TO CHRIST. 1. Am I not an apostle? am I not free?—The oldest MSS. read the order thus, "Am I not free? am I not an apostle?" He alludes to ch. 8. 9, "this liberty of yours:" If you claim it, I appeal to yourselves as the witnesses, have not I also it? "Am I not free?" If you be so, much more I. For "am I not an apostle?" so that I can claim not only Christian, but also apostolic liberty. have I not seen Jesus—corporeally, not in a mere vision: cf. ch. 15. 8, where the fact of the resurrection, which he wishes to prove, could only be established by an actual bodily appearance, such as was vouchsafed to Peter and the other apostles. In Acts 9. 7, 17 the contrast between "the men with him seeing no man," and "Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way," shows that Jesus actually appeared to him in going to Damascus. His vision of Christ in the temple (Acts 22. 17) was "in a trance." To be a witness of Christ's resurrection was a leading function of an apostle (Acts 1. 22). The best MSS. omit "Christ," ye my work in the Lord—your conversion is His workmanship (Ephesians 2. 10) through my instrumentality: the "seal of mine apostleship" (v. 2). 2. yet doubtless—yet at least I am such to you. seal of mine apostleship—your conversion by my preaching, accompanied with miracles ("the signs of an apostle," Romans 15. 18, 19; 2 Corinthians 12. 12), and your gifts conferred by me (ch. 1. 7), vouch for the reality of my apostleship, just as a seal set to a document attests its genuineness (John 8. 33; Romans 4. 11). 3. to them that . . . examine me—i. e., who call in question mine apostleship. is this—viz., that you are the seal of mine apostleship. 4. Have we not power—Greek, "right," or lawful power, equivalent to "liberty" claimed by the Corinthians (ch. 8. 9). The "we" includes with himself his colleagues in the apostleship. The Greek interrogative expresses, "You surely won't say (will you?) that we have not the power or right," &c. eat and drink—without labouring with our hands (v. 11, 13, 14). St. Paul's not exercising this right was made a plea by his opponents for insinuating that he was himself conscious he was no true apostle (2 Corinthians 12. 13-16). 5. lead about a sister, a wife—i. e., "a sister as a wife," "a sister" by faith, which makes all believers brethren and sisters in the one family of God: "a wife" by marriage covenant. St. Paul implies he did not exercise his undoubted right to marry and "lead about" a believer, for the sake of Christian expediency, as well to save the Church the expense of maintaining her in his wide circuits, as also that he might give himself more undistractedly to building up the Church of Christ (ch. 7. 26, 32, 35). Contrast the Corinthians' want of self-sacrifice in the exercise of their "liberty" at the cost of destroying, instead of edifying, the Church (ch. 8. 9, 10; Margin, 11-13). as other apostles—Implying that some of them had availed themselves of the power which they all had, of marrying. We know from Matthew 8. 14, that Cephas or Peter was a married man. A confutation of St. Peter's self-styled followers, the Romanists, who exclude the clergy from marriage. CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, Stromata or Miscellanies, 7. sec. 63, records a tradition, that he encouraged his wife when being led to death by saying

"Remember, my dear one, the Lord." Cf. EUSEBIUS, E. H. 3. 30. brethren of the Lord—held in especial esteem on account of their relationship to Jesus (Acts 1. 14; Galatians 1. 9). James, Joses, Simon, and Judas. Probably cousins of Jesus: as cousins were termed by the Jews "brethren." ALFORD makes them literally brothers of Jesus by Joseph and Mary. Cephas—Probably singled out as being a name carrying weight with one partisan section at Corinth. "If your favourite leader does so, surely so may I" (ch. 1. 12, & 22). 6. Barnabas—long the associate of Paul, and, like him, in the habit of self-denyingly forbearing to claim the maintenance which is a minister's right. So Paul supported himself by tent-making (Acts 18. 3; 20. 34; 1 Thessalonians 2. 9; 2 Thessalonians 3. 8). 7. The minister is spiritually a soldier (2 Timothy 2. 3), a vine-dresser (ch. 3. 6-8; Song of Solomon 1. 6), and a shepherd (1 Peter 5. 2, 4). of the fruit—The oldest MSS. omit "of." 8. as a man—I speak thus not merely according to human judgment, but with the sanction of the Divine law also. 9. ox . . . treadeth . . . corn—(Deuteronomy 25. 4.) In the East to the present day they do not after reaping carry the sheaves home to barns as we do, but take them to an area under the open air to be threshed by the oxen treading them with their feet, or else drawing a threshing instrument over them (cf. Micah 4. 13). Doth God . . . care for oxen?—rather, "Is it for the oxen that God careth?" Is the animal the ultimate object for whose sake this law was given? No. God does care for the lower animal (Psalm 36. 6; Matthew 10. 29), but it is with the ultimate aim of the welfare of man, the head of animal creation. In the humane consideration shown for the lower animal, we are to learn that still more ought it to be exercised in the case of man, the ultimate object of the law; and that the human (spiritual as well as temporal) labourer is worthy of his hire. 10. altogether—join this with "saith." "Does he (the Divine lawgiver) by all means say it for our sakes?" It would be untrue, that God saith it altogether (in the sense of solely) for our sakes. But it is true, that He by all means saith it for our sakes as the ultimate object in the lower world. GROTIUS, however, translates, "mainly" or "especially," instead of altogether. that—"meaning that" [ALFORD]; lit., because. should plough—ought to plough in hope. The obligation rests with the people not to let their minister labour without remuneration. he that thresheth in hope should be partaker of his hope—The oldest MS. versions and fathers read, "He that thresheth (should or ought to thresh) in the hope of partaking" (viz., of the fruit of his threshing). "He that plougheth," spiritually, is the first planter of a Church in a place (cf. ch. 3. 6, 9); "he that thresheth," the minister who tends a Church already planted. 11. we . . . we—emphatical in the Greek. We, the same persons who have sown to you the infinitely more precious treasures of the Spirit, may at the least claim in return what is the only thing you have to give, viz., the goods that nourish the flesh ("your carnal things"). 12. others—whether true apostles (v. 5) or false ones (2 Corinthians 11. 20). we rather—considering our greater labours for you (2 Corinthians 11. 23). suffer all things—without complaining of it. We desire to conceal (lit., hold as a water-tight vessel) any distress we suffer from straitened circumstances. The same Greek is in ch. 13. 7. lest we . . . hinder . . . Gospel—not to cause a hindrance to its progress by giving a handle for the imputation of self-seeking, if we received support from our flock. The less of incumbrance and expense caused to the Church, and the more of work done, the better for the cause of the Gospel (2 Timothy 2. 4). 13. minister about holy things—the Jewish priests and Levites. The Greek especially applies to the former, the priests offering sacrifices. partakers with the altar—a part of the victims going to the service of the altar, and the rest being shared by the priests (Leviticus 7. 6; Numbers 18. 6, &c.; Deuteronomy 18. 1, &c.). 14. Even so—The only inference to be drawn from this passage is, not that the Christian ministry is of a sacrificial character as the Jewish priesthood, but simply, that as the latter was supported by the contributions of the people, so should the former. The stipends of the clergy were at first from voluntary offerings at the Lord's Supper. At the love-feast preceding it every believer, according to his ability, offered a gift; and when the expense of the table had been defrayed, the bishop laid aside a portion for himself, the presbyters, and deacons; and with the rest relieved widows, orphans, confessors, and the poor generally. [TERTULLIAN, Apology, ch. 39.] The stipend was in proportion to the dignity and merits of the several bishops, presbyters, and deacons. [CYPRIAN, c. 4, ep. 6.] preach . . . Gospel—plainly marked as the duty of the Christian minister, in contrast to the ministering about sacrifices (Greek) and waiting at the altar of the Jewish priesthood and Levites (v. 13). If the Lord's Supper were a sacrifice (as the Mass is supposed to be), this 14th verse would certainly have been worded so, to answer to v. 13. Note the same Lord Christ "ordains" the ordinances in the Old and in the New Testaments (Matthew 10. 10; Luke 10. 7). 15. Paul's special gift of continency, which enabled him to abstain from marriage, and his ability to maintain himself without interrupting seriously his ministry, made that expedient to him which is ordinarily inexpedient, viz., that the ministry should not be supported by the people. What to him was a duty, would be the opposite to one, for instance, to whom God had committed a family, without other means of support. I have used none of these things—none of these "powers" or rights which I might have used (v. 4-6, 12). neither—rather, "Yet I have not written." so done unto me—lit., in my case: as is done in the case of a soldier, a planter, a shepherd, a ploughman, and a sacrificing priest (v. 7, 10, 18). make my glorying void—deprive me of my privilege of preaching the Gospel without remuneration (2 Corinthians 11. 7-10). Rather than hinder the progress of the Gospel by giving any pretext for a charge of interested motives (2 Corinthians 12. 17, 18), St. Paul would "die" of hunger. Cf. Abraham's similar disinterestedness (Genesis 14. 22, 23). 16. though I preach . . . I have nothing to glory of—i. e., If I preach the Gospel, and do so not gratuitously, I have no matter for "glorying." For the "necessity" that is laid on me to preach (cf. Jeremiah 20. 9, and the case of Jonah) does away with ground for "glorying." The sole ground for the latter that I have, is my preaching without charge (v. 18): since there is no necessity laid on me as to the latter, it is my voluntary act for the Gospel's sake. 17. Translate, "If I be doing this (i. e., preaching) of my own accord (which I am not, for the "necessity" is laid on me which binds a servant to obey his master), I have a reward; but if (as is the case) involuntarily (Acts 9. 15; 22. 15; 26. 16; not of my own natural will, but by the constraining grace of God; Romans 9. 16; 1 Timothy 1. 13-16), I have had a dispensation (of the Gospel) entrusted to me" (and so can claim no "reward," seeing that I only "have done that which was my duty to do," Luke 17. 10, but incur the "woe," v. 16, if I fall in it). 18. What is my reward?—The answer is in v. 19, viz., that by making the Gospel without charge, where I might have rightfully claimed maintenance, I might "win the more." of Christ—The oldest MSS. and versions omit these words. abuse—rather, "that I use not to the full my power." This is his matter for "glorying," the "reward" ultimately aimed at is the gaining of the more (v. 19). The former, as involving the latter, is verbally made the answer to the question, "What is my reward?" But really the "reward" is that which is the ultimate aim of his preaching without charge, viz., that he may gain the more; it was for this end, not to have matter of glorying, that he did so. 19. free from all men—i. e., from the power of all men. gain the more—i. e., as many of them ("all men") as possible. "Gain" is an appropriate expression in relation to a "reward" (1 Thessalonians 2. 19, 20); he therefore repeats it frequently (v. 20-22). 20. I became as a Jew—In things not defined by the law, but by Jewish usage. Not Judaizing in essentials, but in matters where there was no compromise of principle (cf. Acts 16. 3; 21. 20-26) an undesigned coincidence between the history and the Epistle, and so a sure proof of genuineness. to them that are under the law, as under the law—in things defined by the law; such as ceremonies not then repugnant to Christianity. Perhaps the reason for distinguishing this class from the former is that St. Paul himself belonged nationally to "the Jews," but did not in creed belong to the class of "them that are under the law." This view is confirmed by the reading inserted here by the oldest MSS., versions, and fathers, "not being (i. e., parenthetically, "not that I am") myself under the law." 21. To them . . . without law—i. e., without revealed law: the heathen (cf. Romans 2. 12 with v. 15). as without law—not urging on them the ceremonies and "works of the law," but "the hearing of faith" (Galatians 3. 2). Also discoursing in their own manner, as at Athens, with arguments from their own poets (Acts 17. 28). being not without law to God—"Whilst thus conforming to others in matters indifferent, taking care not to be without law in relation to God, but responsible to law (lit., IN LAW) in relation to Christ." This is the Christian's true position in relation to the world, to himself, and to God. Everything develops itself according to its proper law. So the Christian, though no longer subject to the literal law as constraining him from without, is subject to an inward principle or law, the spirit of faith in Christ acting from within as the germ of a new life. He does not in the Greek (as in English Version) say "under the law" (as he does in v. 20) to Christ; but uses the milder term, "in . . . law," responsible to law. Christ was responsible to the law for us, so that we are no longer responsible to it (Galatians 3. 13, 24), but to Him, as the members to the Head (ch. 7. 22; Romans 8. 1-4; 1 Peter 2. 16). Christians serve Christ in newness of spirit, no longer in oldness of the letter (i. e., the old external law as such), Romans 7. 4-6. To Christ, as man's Head, the Father has properly delegated His authority (John 5. 22, 27); whence here he substitutes "Christ" for "God" in the second clause, "not without law to God, but under the law to Christ." The law of Christ is the law of love (Galatians 6. 2; cf. 5. 13). 22. gain the weak—i. e., establish, instead of being a stumbling-block to inexperienced Christians (ch. 8. 7). Romans 14. 1, "Weak in the faith." ALFORD thinks the "weak" are not Christians at all, for these have been already "won;" but those outside the Church, who are yet "without strength" to believe (Romans 5. 6). But when "weak" Christians are by the condescending love of stronger brethren kept from falling from faith, they are well said to be "gained" or won. by all means . . . some—The gain of even "some" is worth the expenditure of "all means." He conformed himself to the feelings of each in the several classes, that out of them all he might gain some. 23. partaker thereof—Greek, "fellow-partaker." of the Gospel blessings promised at Christ's coming: "with" (not as English Version, "you;" but) them, viz., with those thus "gained" by me to the Gospel. 24. Know ye not—The Isthmian games, in which the foot-race was a leading one, were of course well known, and a subject of patriotic pride to the Corinthians, who lived in the immediate neighbourhood. These periodical games were to the Greeks rather a passion than a mere amusement: hence their suitability as an image of Christian earnestness. in a race—Greek, "in a race-course." all . . . one—Although we knew that one alone could be saved, still it would be well worth our while to run. [BENGEL.] Even in the Christian race not "all" who enter on the race win (ch. 10. 1-5). So run, that ye may obtain—said parenthetically. These are the words in which the instructors of the young in the exercise schools (gymnasia) and the spectators on the race-course exhorted their pupils to stimulate them to put forth all exertions. The gymnasium was a prominent feature in every Greek city. Every candidate had to take an oath that he had been ten months in training, and that he would violate none of the regulations (2 Timothy 2. 5; cf. 1 Timothy 4. 7, 8). He lived on a strict self-denying diet, refraining from wine and pleasant foods, and enduring cold and heat and most laborious discipline. The "prize" awarded by the judge or umpire was a chaplet of green leaves; at the Isthmus, those of the indigenous pine, for which parsley leaves were temporarily substituted (v. 25). The Greek sv.

'obtain' is fully obtain. It is in vain to begin, unless we persevere to the end (Matthew 10. 22; 24. 13; Revelation 2. 10). The "so" expresses, Run with such perseverance in the heavenly course, as "all" the runners exhibit in the earthly "race" just spoken of: to the end that ye may attain the prize. 25. striveth—In wrestling: a still more severe contest than the foot-race. is temperate—So Paul exercised self-denial, abstaining from claiming sustenance for the sake of the "reward," viz., to "gain the more" (v. 23, 19). corruptible—soon wilhering, as being only of fir leaves taken from the fir groves which surrounded the Isthmian race-course or stadium. incorruptible—(1 Peter 1. 4; 5. 4; Revelation 2. 10). "Crown" here is not that of a king (which is expressed by a different Greek word, viz., "diadem"), but a wreath or garland. 26. I—Return to his main subject, his own self-denial, and his motive in it. run, not as uncertainly—not as a runner uncertain of the goal. Ye Corinthians gain no end in your entering idol temples or eating idol meats. But I, for my part, in all my acts, whether in my becoming "all things to all men," or in receiving no sustenance from my converts, have a definite end in view, viz., to "gain the more." I know what I aim at, and how to aim at it. He who runs with a clear aim, looks straight forward to the goal, makes it his sole aim, casts away every encumbrance (Hebrews 12. 1, 2), is indifferent to what the bystanders say, and sometimes even a fall only serves to rouse him the more. [BEN-SEL.] not as one that beateth the air—instead of beating the adversary. Alluding to the Sciamachia or sparring in the school in sham-fight (cf. ch. 14. 9), wherein they struck out into the air as if at an imaginary adversary. The real adversary is Satan acting on us through the flesh. 27. keep under—lit., bruise the face under the eyes, so as to render it black and blue; so, to chastise in the most sensitive part. Cf. "mortify the deeds of the body," Romans 8. 13; also 1 Peter 2. 1. It is not ascetic fasts or macerations of the body which are here recommended, but the keeping under of our natural self-seeking, so as, like Paul, to lay ourselves out entirely for the great work. my body—the old man and the remainders of lust in my flesh. "My body," so far as by the flesh it opposes the spirit [ESTIUS] (Galatians 5. 17). Men may be severe to their bodies and yet indulge their lust. Ascetic "neglect of the body" may be all the while a more subtle "satisfying of the flesh" (Colossians 2. 23). Unless the soul keep under the body, the body will get above the soul. The body may be made a good servant, but is a bad master. bring it into subjection—or bondage, as a slave or servant led away captive; so the Greek. preached—lit., heralded. He keeps up the image from the races. The heralds summoned the candidates for the foot-race into the race-course [PLATO, Legg. 3. 833], and placed the crowns on the brows of the conquerors, announcing their names. [BEN-SEL.] They probably proclaimed also the laws of the combat; answering to the preaching of the apostles. [ALFORD.] The Christian herald is also a combatant; in which respect he is distinguished from the herald at the games. a cast-away—falling shamefully of the prize myself, after I have called others to the contest. Rejected by God, the Judge of the Christian race, notwithstanding my having, by my preaching, led others to be accepted. Cf. the equivalent term, "reprobate," Jeremiah 6. 30; 2 Corinthians 13. 6. St. Paul implies, if such earnest, self-denying watchfulness over himself be needed still, with all his labours for others, to make his own calling sure, much more is the same needed by the Corinthians, instead of their going, as they do, to the extreme limit of Christian liberty.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-33. DANGER OF FELLOWSHIP WITH IDOLATRY ILLUSTRATED IN THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL: SUCH FELLOWSHIP INCOMPATIBLE WITH FELLOWSHIP IN THE LORD'S SUPPER. EVEN LAWFUL THINGS ARE TO BE FORBIDDEN, SO AS NOT TO HURT WEAK BROTHERN. 1. Moreover—The oldest MSS. read "FOR." Thus the connection with the foregoing chapter is expressed. Ye need to exercise self-denying watchfulness notwithstanding all

your privileges, lest ye be cast-aways. For the Israelites with all their privileges were most of them cast-aways through want of it. ignorant—with all your boasted "knowledge." our fathers—The Jewish Church stands in the relation of parent to the Christian Church. all—Arrange as the Greek, "Our fathers were all under the cloud;" giving the "all" its proper emphasis. Not so much as one of so great a multitude was detained by force or disease (Psalm 105. 37). [BEN-SEL.] Five times the "all" is repeated, in the enumeration of the five favours which God bestowed on Israel (v. 1-4). Five times, correspondingly, they sinned (v. 6-10). In contrast to the "all" stands "many (rather, 'the most') of them" (v. 5). All of them had great privileges, yet most of them were cast-aways through lust. Beware you, having greater privileges, of sharing the same doom through a similar sin. Continuing the reasoning, ch. 9. 24, "They which run in a race, run all, but one receiveth the prize." under the cloud—were continually under the defence of the pillar of cloud, the symbol of the Divine presence (Exodus 13. 21, 22; Psalm 105. 39; cf. Isaiah 4. 5). passed through the sea—by God's miraculous interposition for them (Exodus 14. 29). 2. And—And so. [BEN-SEL.] baptized unto Moses—the servant of God and representative of the Old Testament covenant of the law: as Jesus, the Son of God, is of the Gospel covenant (John 1. 17; Hebrews 3. 5, 6). The people were led to believe in Moses as God's servant by the miracle of the cloud protecting them, and by their being conducted under him safely through the Red Sea; therefore they are said to be "baptized unto" him (Exodus 14. 31). "Baptized" is here equivalent to "initiated." It is used in accommodation to St. Paul's argument to the Corinthians; they, it is true, have been "baptized," but so also virtually were the Israelites of old; if the virtual baptism of the latter availed not to save them from the doom of lust, neither will the actual baptism of the former save them. There is a resemblance between the symbols also: for the cloud and sea consist of water, and as these took the Israelites out of sight, and then restored them again to view, so the water does to the baptized. [BEN-SEL.] OLSHAUSEN understands "the cloud" and "the sea" as symbolizing the Spirit and water respectively (John 3. 5; Acts 10. 44-47). Christ is the pillar-cloud that screens us from the heat of God's wrath. Christ as "the light of the world" is our "pillar of fire" to guide us in the darkness of the world. As the rock when smitten sent forth the waters, so Christ, having been once for all smitten, sends forth the waters of the Spirit. As the manna bruised in mills fed Israel, so Christ, when "it pleased the Lord to bruise Him," has become our spiritual food. A strong proof of inspiration is given in this fact, that the historical parts of Scripture, without the consciousness even of the authors, are covert prophecies of the future. 3. same spiritual meat—As the Israelites had the water from the rock, which answered to baptism, so they had the manna which corresponded to the other of the two Christian sacraments, the Lord's Supper. St. Paul plainly implies the importance which was attached to these two sacraments by all Christians in those days: "an inspired protest against those who lower their dignity, or deny their necessity." [ALFORD.] Still he guards against the other extreme of thinking the mere external possession of such privileges will ensure salvation. Moreover, had there been seven sacraments, as Rome teaches, St. Paul would have alluded to them, whereas he refers to only the two. He does not mean by "the same" that the Israelites and we Christians have the "same" sacrament; but that believing and unbelieving Israelites alike had "the same" spiritual privilege of the manna (cf. v. 17). It was "spiritual meat" or food; because given by the power of God's spirit, not by human labour. [GROTIUS and ALFORD.] Galatians 4. 29, "born after the Spirit," i. e., supernaturally. Psalm 78. 24, "corn of heaven" (Psalm 105. 40). Rather, "spiritual" in its typical signification, Christ, the true Bread of heaven, being signified (John 6. 22). Not that the Israelites clearly understood the signification, but believers among them would feel that in the typ-

something more was meant; and their implicit and reverent, though indistinct, faith was counted to them for justification, of which the manna was a kind of sacramental seal. "They are not to be heard which feign that the old fathers did look only for transitory promises" (Article vii Church of England), as appears from this passage of Hebrews 4. 2). 4. drink—(Exodus 17. 6.) In Number 20. 8, "the beasts" also are mentioned as having drunk. The literal water typified "spiritual drink," and is therefore so called. spiritual Rock that followed them—rather, "accompanied them." Not the literal rock (or its water) "followed" them, as ALFORD explains, as if St. Paul sanctioned the Jews' tradition (Rabbi Solomon on Numbers 20. 2) that the rock itself, or at least the stream from it, followed the Israelites from place to place (cf. Deuteronomy 9. 21). But Christ, the "Spiritual Rock" (Psalm 78. 20, 35; Deuteronomy 32. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37; Isaiah 23. 16; 1 Peter 2. 6), accompanied them (Exodus 33. 15). "Followed" implies His attending on them to minister to them; thus, though mostly going before them, He, when occasion required it, followed "behind" (Exodus 14. 19). He satisfied all alike as to their bodily thirst whenever they needed it; as on three occasions is expressly recorded (Exodus 15. 24, 25; 17. 6; Numbers 20. 8); and this drink for the body symbolized the spiritual drink from the Spiritual Rock (cf. John 4. 13, 14; see Note, v. 3). 5. But—Though they had so many tokens of God's presence. many of them—rather, "the majority of them;" "the whole part." All except Joshua and Caleb of the first generation. not—in the Greek emphatically standing in the beginning of the sentence: "Not," as one might have naturally expected, "with the more part of them was," &c. God—whose judgment alone is valid. for—the events showed, they had not pleased God. overthrown—lit., strewn in heaps. in the wilderness—far from the land of promise. 6. were—Greek, "came to pass as." our examples—samples to us of what will befall us, if we also with all our privileges walk carelessly. lust—the fountain of all the four other offenses enumerated, and therefore put first (James 1. 14, 15; cf. Psalm 106. 14). A particular case of lust was that after flesh, when they pined for the fish, leeks, &c., of Egypt, which they had left (Numbers 11. 4, 33, 34). These are included in the "evil things," not that they are so in themselves, but they became so to the Israelites when they lusted after what God withheld, and were discontented with what God provided. 7. idolaters—A case in point. As the Israelites sat down (a deliberate act), ate and drank at the idol feast to the calves in Horeb, so the Corinthians were in danger of idolatry by a like act, though not professedly worshipping an idol as the Israelites (ch. 8. 10, 11; 10. 14, 20, 21; Exodus 32. 6). He passes here from the first to the second person, as they alone (not he also) were in danger of idolatry, &c. He resumes the first person appropriately at the 16th verse. some—The multitude follow the lead of some bad men. play—with lascivious dancing, singing, and drumming round the calf (cf. "rejoiced," Acts 7. 41). 8. fornication—lit., Fornication was generally, as in this case (Numbers 25.), associated at the idol feasts with spiritual fornication, i. e., idolatry. This all applied to the Corinthians (ch. 5. 1, 9; 6. 9, 15, 18; ch. 8. 10). Balaam tempted Israel to both sins with Midian (Revelation 2. 14). Cf. ch. 8. 7, 9, "stumbling-block," "eat . . . thing offered unto . . . idol." three and twenty thousand—in Numbers 25. 9 "twenty and four thousand." If this were a real discrepancy, it would militate rather against inspiration of the subject matter and thought, than against verbal inspiration. The solution is: Moses in Numbers includes all who died "in the plague;" St. Paul, all who died "in one day;" 1000 more may have fell next day. [KITTO, Biblical Cyclopaedia.] Or, the real number may have been between 23,000 and 24,000 say 23,500, or 23,600; when writing generally were the exact figures were not needed, one writer might quite neraciously give one of the two round numbers near the exact one, and the other writer the other. [BENGEL.] Whichever be the true way of reconciling the seeming discrepant statements, at least the ways given above prove they are not really irreconcilable. 9. tempt Christ

—So the oldest versions, Irenæus (264), and good MSS. read "So the oldest MSS. read "Lord;" and our MS. only "God." If "Lord" be read, it will mean Christ. As "Christ" was referred to in one of the five privileges of Israel (v. 4), so it is natural that He should be mentioned here in one of the five corresponding sins of that people. In Numbers 21. 5 it is "spake against God" (whence probably arose the alteration in the one MS., 1. Corinthians 10. 9, "God," to harmonize it with Numbers 21. 5). As either "Christ" or "Lord" is the genuine reading "Christ" must be "God." Cf. "Why do ye tempt the Lord?" Exodus 17. 2, 7. Cf. Romans 14. 11, with Isaiah 45. 22, 23, Israel's discontented complainings were temptings of Christ especially, the "Angel" of the covenant (Exodus 23. 20, 21; 32. 34; Isaiah 63. 9). Though they drank of "that Rock . . . Christ" (v. 4), they yet complained for want of water (Exodus 17. 2, 7). Though also eating the same spiritual meat (Christ, "the true manna," "the bread of life"), they yet murmured, "Our soul loatheth this light bread." In this case, being punished by the fiery serpents, they were saved by the brazen serpent, the emblem of Christ (cf. John 8. 56; Hebrews 11. 26). The Greek for "tempt" means, tempt or try, so as to wear out the long-suffering of Christ (cf. Psalm 95. 8, 9; Numbers 14. 22). The Corinthians were in danger of provoking God's long-suffering by walking on the verge of idolatry, through overweening confidence in their knowledge. 10. some of them . . . murmured—upon the death of Korah and his company, who themselves were murmurers (Numbers 16. 41, 49). Their murmurs against Moses and Aaron were virtually murmurs against God (cf. Exodus 16. 8, 10). St. Paul herein glances at the Corinthian murmurs against himself, the apostle of Christ, destroyed—14,700 perished, the destroyer—the same destroying angel sent by God as in Exodus 12. 23, and 2 Samuel 24. 16. 11. Now . . . these things . . . ensamples—resuming the thread of v. 6. The oldest MSS. read, "by way of example the ends of the world"—lit., "of the ages;" the New Testament dispensation in its successive phases (plural, "ends") being the winding up of all former "ages." No new dispensation shall appear till Christ comes as Avenger and Judge; till then the "ends" being many include various successive periods (cf. Hebrews 9. 26). As we live in the last dispensation, which is the consummation of all that went before, our responsibilities are the greater; and the greater is the guilt, St. Paul implies, to the Corinthians, which they incur if they fall short of their privileges. 12. thinketh he standeth—stands and thinks that he stands [BENGEL]; i. e., stands "by faith" "well pleasing" to God; in contrast to v. 5, "with many of them God was not well pleased" (Romans 11. 20). fall—from his place in the Church of God (cf. v. 8, "fell"). Both temporally and spiritually (Romans 14. 4). Our security, so far as relates to God, consists in faith; so far as relates to ourselves, it consists in fear. 13. Consolation to them, under their temptation; it is none but such as is "common to man," or "such as man can bear," "adapted to man's powers of endurance." [WAHL.] faithful—(Psalm 125. 3; Isaiah 27. 3, & Revelation 3. 10.) "God is faithful" to the covenant which He made with you in calling you (1 Thessalonians 5. 24). To be led into temptation is distinct from running into it, which would be "tempting God" (v. 9; Matthew 4. 7). way to escape—(Jeremiah 29. 11; 2 Peter 2. 9.) The Greek is, "the way of escape;" the appropriate way of escape in each particular temptation; not an immediate escape, but one in due time, after patience has had her perfect work (James 1, 2-4, 12). He "makes" the way of escape simultaneously with the temptation which His providence permissively arranges for His people, to bear it—Greek, to bear up under it, or against it. Not, He will take it away (2 Corinthians 12. 7-9). 14. Resuming the argument, v. 7; ch. 8. 9, 10. flee—do not tamper with it by doubtful acts, such as eating idol meats on the plea of Christian liberty. The only safety is in wholly shunning whatever borders on idolatry (2 Corinthians 6. 16, 17). The Holy Spirit herein also presciently warned the Church against the idolatry, subsequently transferred from the idol feast to the Lord's Supper itself, in the figment of transubstantiation. 15. Appeal to their own powers of judgment to weigh the force of the argument that follows: viz., that as the partaking of the Lord's Supper involves a partaking of the Lord himself, and the partaking of the Jewish sacrificial meats involved a partaking of the altar of God, and, as the heathens sacrifice to devils, to partake of an idol feast is to have fellowship with devils. We cannot divest ourselves of the responsibility of "judging" for ourselves. The weakness of private judgment is not an argument against its use, but its abuse. We should the more take pains in searching the infallible word, with every aid within our reach, and above all with humble prayer for the Spirit's teaching (Acts 17. 11). If St. Paul, an inspired apostle, not only permits, but urges, men to judge his sayings by Scripture, much more should the fallible ministers of the present visible Church do so. "To wise men," refers with a mixture of irony to the Corinthian boast of "wisdom" (ch. 4. 40; 2 Corinthians 11. 19). Here you have an opportunity of exercising your "wisdom" in judging "what I say." 16. The cup of blessing—Answering to the Jewish "cup of blessing," over which thanks were offered in the Passover. It was in doing so that Christ instituted this part of the Lord's Supper (Matthew 26. 27; Luke 22. 17, 20). we bless—"we," not merely ministers, but also the congregation. The minister "blesses" (i. e., consecrates with blessing) the cup, not by any priestly transmitted authority of his own, but as representative of the congregation, who virtually through him bless the cup. The consecration is the corporate act of the whole Church. The act of joint blessing by him and them (not "the cup" itself, which, as also "the bread," in the Greek is in the accusative), and the consequent drinking of it together, constitute the communion, i. e., the joint participation "of the blood of Christ." Cf. v. 18, "They who eat . . . are partakers" (joint communicants), &c. "Is" in both cases in this verse is literal, not represents. He who with faith partakes of the cup and the bread, partakes really but spiritually of the blood and body of Christ (Ephesians 5. 30, 32), and of the benefits of His sacrifice on the cross (cf. v. 18). In contrast to this is to have "fellowship with devils" (v. 20). ALFORD explains, "The cup . . . is the [joint] participation (i. e., that whereby the act of participation takes place) of the blood," &c. It is the seal of our living union with, and a means of our partaking of, Christ as our Saviour (John 6. 53-57). It is not said, "The cup . . . is the blood," or "the bread . . . is the body," but "is the communion (joint-participation) of the blood . . . body." If the bread be changed into the literal body of Christ, where is the sign of the sacrament? Romanists eat Christ "in remembrance of Himself." To drink literal blood would have been an abomination to Jews, which the first Christians were (Leviticus 17. 11, 12). Breaking the bread was part of the act of consecrating it, for thus was represented the crucifixion of Christ's body (1 Corinthians 11. 24). The distinct specification of the bread and the wine disproves the Romish doctrine of concomitancy, and exclusion of the laity from the cup. 17. one bread—rather, "loaf." One loaf alone seems to have been used in each celebration. and one body—Omit "and;" "one loaf (that is), one body." "We, the many (viz., believers assembled; so the Greek), are one bread (by our partaking of the same loaf, which becomes assimilated to the substance of all our bodies; and so we become), one body" (with Christ, and so with one another). we . . . all—Greek, "the whole of us." 18. Israel after the flesh—the literal, as distinguished from the spiritual, Israel (Romans 2. 29; 4. 1; 9. 3; Galatians 3. 29). partakers of the altar—and so of God, whose is the altar; they have fellowship in God and His worship, of which the altar is the symbol. 19, 20. What say I then?—The inference might be drawn from the analogies of the Lord's Supper and Jewish sacrifices, that an idol is really what the heathen thought it to be, a god, and that in eating idol meats they had fellowship with the god. This verse guards against such an inference: "What would I say then? that a thing sacrificed to an idol is any real thing (in the sense that the heathen regard it), or that an idol is any real thing?" (The oldest MSS. read the words in this order. Supply "Nay;") "But (I say) that the things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils" (demons). St. Paul here introduces a new fact. It is true that, as I said, an idol has no reality in the sense that the heathen regard it, but it has a reality in another sense; heathendom being under Satan's dominion as "prince of this world," he and his demons are in fact the powers worshipped by the heathen, whether they are or are not conscious of it (Deuteronomy 32. 17; Leviticus 17. 7; 2 Chronicles 11. 15; Psalm 106. 37; Revelation 9. 20). "Devil" is in the Greek restricted to Satan, "demons" is the term applied to his subordinate evil spirits. Fear, rather than love, is the motive of heathen worship (cf. the English word "panic," from PAN, whose human form with horns and cloven hoofs gave rise to the vulgar representations of Satan which prevail now); just as fear is the spirit of Satan and his demons (James 2. 19). I would not that ye . . . have fellowship with devils—by partaking of idol feasts (ch. 8. 10). 21. Ye cannot, &c.—really and spiritually; though ye may outwardly (1 Kings 18. 21). cup of devils—in contrast to the cup of the Lord. At idol feasts libations were usually made from the cup to the idol first, and then the guests drank; so that in drinking they had fellowship with the idol. the Lord's table—The Lord's Supper is a feast on a table, not a sacrifice on an altar. Our only altar is the cross, our only sacrifice that of Christ once for all. The Lord's Supper stands, however, in the same relation analogically, to Christ's sacrifice, as the Jews' sacrificial feasts did to their sacrifices (cf. Malachi 1. 7, "altar . . . table of the Lord"), and the heathen idol feasts to their idolatrous sacrifices (Isaiah 65. 11). The heathen sacrifices were offered to idol nonentities, behind which Satan lurked. The Jew's sacrifice was but a shadow of the substance which was to come. Our one sacrifice of Christ is the only substantial reality; therefore, whilst the partaker of the Jew's sacrificial feast partook rather "of the altar" (v. 18) than of God manifested fully, and the heathen idol-feaster had fellowship really with demons, the communicant in the Lord's Supper has in it a real communion of, or fellowship in, the body of Christ once sacrificed, and now exalted as the Head of redeemed humanity. 22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy?—by dividing our fellowship between Him and idols (Ezekiel 20. 39). Is it our wish to provoke Him to assert His power? Deuteronomy 32. 21, is before the apostle's mind [ALFORD] (Exodus 20. 5). are we stronger?—that we can risk a contest with Him. 23. All things are lawful for me, &c.—Recurring to the Corinthian plea (ch. 6. 12), he repeats his qualification of it. The oldest MSS. omit both times "for me." edify not—tend not to build up the spiritual temple, the Church, in faith and love. St. Paul does not appeal to the apostolic decision (Acts 15.), which seems to have been not so much regarded outside of Palestine, but rather to the broad principle of true Christian freedom, which does not allow us to be governed by external things, as though, because we can use them, we must use them (ch. 6. 12). Their use or non-use to be regulated by regard to edification. 24. (Vor 33; ch. 13. 5; Romans 15. 1, 2.) 25. shambles—butchers stalls; the flesh-market. asking no question—whether it has been offered to an idol or not. for conscience' sake—If on asking you should hear it had been offered to idols, a scruple would arise in your conscience which was needless, and never would have arisen had you asked no questions. 26. The ground on which such eating without questioning is justified is, the earth and all its contents ("the fulness thereof," Psalm 20. 1; 50. 12), including all meats, belong to the Lord, and are appointed for our use, and where conscience suggests no scruple, all are to be eaten (Romans 14. 14, 20; 1 Timothy 4. 4, 5; cf. Acts 10. 15). 27. ye be disposed to go—tacitly implying, they would be as well not to go, but yet not forbidding them to go (v. 9). [GROTIUS.] The feast is not an idol feast, but a general entertainment, at which, however, there might be meat that had been offered to an idol. for conscience' sake—See Note, v. 25. 28. if any man—a weak Christian at table, wishing to warn his brother. offered is sacrifice unto idols—The oldest MSS. omit "unto idols." At a heathen's table the expression, offensive to him would naturally be avoided. for conscience's sake—not to cause a stumbling-block to the conscience of thy weak brother (ch. 8. 10-12). for the earth is the Lord's, &c.—Not in the oldest MSS. 29. Conscience . . . of the other—the weak brother introduced in v. 28. for why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?—St. Paul passes to the first person, to teach his converts by putting himself as it were in their position. The Greek terms for "the other" and "another" are distinct. "The other" is the one with whom St. Paul's and his Corinthian converts' concern is; "another" is any other with whom he and they have no concern. If a guest know the meat to be idol meat whilst I know it not, I have "liberty" to eat without being condemned by his "conscience." [GROTIVS.] Thus the "for," &c., is an argument for v. 27, "Eat, asking no questions." Or, "Why should I give occasion by the rash use of my liberty that another should condemn it [ESTIVS], or that my liberty should cause the destruction of my weak brother?" [MENOCHIVS.] Or, the words are those of the Corinthian objector (perhaps used in their letter, and so quoted by St. Paul), "Why is my liberty judged by another's conscience?" why should not I be judged only by my own, and have liberty to do whatever it sanctions? St. Paul replies in v. 31, Your doing so ought always to be limited by regard to what most tends "to the glory of God." [VATABLUS, CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] The first explanation is simplest; the "for," &c., in it refers to "not thine own" (i. e., "not my own," in St. Paul's change to the first person); I am to abstain only in the case of liability to offend another's conscience; in cases where my own has no scruple, I am not bound, in God's judgment, by any other conscience than my own. 30. For—The oldest MSS. omit "for." by grace—rather, thankfully." [ALFORD.] I . . . be partaker—I partake of the food set before me. evil spoken of—by him who does not use his liberty, but will eat nothing without scrupulosity and questioning whence the meat comes. give thanks—which consecrates all the Christian's acts (Romans 14. 6; 1 Timothy 4. 3, 4). 31. Contrast Zechariah 7. 6; the picture of worldly men. The godly may "eat and drink," and it shall be well with him (Jeremiah 22. 15, 16). to the glory of God—(Colossians 3. 17; 1 Peter 4. 11)—which involves our having regard to the edification of our neighbour. 32. Give none offence—in things indifferent (ch. 8. 13; Romans 14. 13; 2 Corinthians 6. 3); for in all essential things affecting Christian doctrine and practice, even in the smallest detail, we must not swerve from principle, whatever offence may be the result (ch. 1. 23). Giving offence is unnecessary, if our own spirit cause it; necessary, if it be caused by the truth. 33. I please—I try to please (ch. 9. 19, 22; Romans 15. 2). not seeking mine own—(v. 24). many—rather as Greek, "THE many."

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-34. CENSURE ON DISORDERS IN THEIR ASSEMBLIES: THEIR WOMEN NOT BEING VEILED, AND ABUSES AT THE LOVE-FEASTS. 1. Rather belonging to the end of ch. 10, than to this chapter. followers—Greek, "imitators." of Christ—who did not please Himself (Romans 15. 3); but gave Himself, at the cost of laying aside His Divine glory, and dying as man, for us (Ephesians 5. 2; Philippians 2. 4, 5). We are to follow Christ first, and earthly teachers only so far as they follow Christ. 2. Here the chapter ought to begin. ye remember me in all things—in your general practice, though in the particular instances which follow ye fail. ordinances—Greek, "traditions," i. e., apostolic directions given by word of mouth or in writing (v. 23; ch. 15. 3; 2 Thessalonians 2. 15). The reference here is mainly to ceremonies: for in v. 23, as to the LORD'S SUPPER, which is not a mere ceremony, he says, not merely "I delivered unto you," but also, "I received of the Lord:" here he says only "I delivered to you." Romanists argue hence for oral traditions. But the difficulty is to know what is a genuine apostolic tradition intended for all ages. Any that can be proved to be such ought to be observed; any that cannot, ought to be rejected (Revelation 22. 18) Those preserved in the written word alone can be proved to be such. 3. The Corinthian women, on the ground of the abolition of distinction of sexes in Christ, claimed equality with the male sex, and, overstepping the bounds of propriety, came forward to pray and prophesy without the customary head-covering of females. The Gospel, doubtless, did raise women from the degradation in which they had been sunk, especially in the East. Yet, whilst on a level with males as to the offer of, and standing in grace (Galatians 3. 28), their subjection in point of order, modesty, and seemliness, is to be maintained. St. Paul reproves here their unseemliness as to dress: in ch. 14. 34, as to the retiring modesty in public which becomes them. He grounds his reproof here on the subjection of woman to man in the order of creation. the head—an appropriate expression when he is about to treat of woman's appropriate head-dress in public. of every man . . . Christ—(Ephesians 5. 23.) of . . . woman . . . man—(V. 8; Genesis 3. 16; 1 Timothy 2. 11, 12; 1 Peter 3. 1, 5, 6.) head of Christ is God—(Ch. 3. 23; 15. 27, 28; Luke 3. 22, 38; John 14. 28; 20. 17; Ephesians 3. 9.) "Jesus, therefore, must be of the same essence as God: for, since the man is the head of the woman, and since the head is of the same essence as the body, and God is the head of the Son, it follows the Son is of the same essence as the Father." [S. CHRYSOSTOM.] "The woman is of the essence of the man, and not made by the man; so, too, the Son is not made by the Father, but of the essence of the Father." [THEODORET, t. 3, p. 171.] 4. praying—in public (v. 17). prophesying—preaching in the Spirit (ch. 12. 10). having—i. e., if he were to have: a supposed case to illustrate the impropriety in the woman's case. It was the Greek custom (and so that at Corinth) for men in worship to be uncovered; whereas the Jews wore the Tallith, or veil, to show reverence before God, and their unworthiness to look on him (Isaiah 6. 2); however, Maimonides (Mishna) excepts cases where [as in Greece] the custom of the place was different. dishonoureth his head—not as ALFORD, "Christ" (v. 3); but literally, as "his head" is used in the beginning of the verse. He dishonoureth his head (the principal part of the body) by wearing a covering or veil, which is a mark of subjection, and which makes him look downwards instead of upwards to his Spiritual Head, Christ, to whom alone he owes subjection. Why, then, ought not man to wear the covering in token of his subjection to Christ, as the woman wears it in token of her subjection to man? "Because Christ is not seen: the man is seen; so the covering of him who is under Christ is not seen; of her who is under the man, is seen." [BENJEL.] (Cf. v. 7) 5. woman . . . prayeth . . . prophesieth—This instance of women speaking in public worship is an extraordinary case, and justified only by the miraculous gifts which such women possessed as their credentials; for instance, Anna the prophetess and Priscilla (so Acts 2. 18). The ordinary rule to them is, silence in public (ch. 14. 34, 35; 1 Timothy 2. 11, 12). Mental receptivity and activity in family life are recognized in Christianity, as most accordant with the destiny of woman. This passage does not necessarily sanction women speaking in public, even though possessing miraculous gifts; but simply records what took place at Corinth, without expressing an opinion on it, reserving the censure of it till ch. 14. 34, 35. Even those women endowed with prophecy were designed to exercise their gift, rather in other times and places, than the public congregation. dishonoureth . . . head—in that she acts against the Divine ordinance and the modest propriety that becomes her: in putting away the veil, she puts away the badge of her subjection to man, which is her true "honour;" for through him it connects her with Christ, the head of the man. Moreover, as the head-covering was the emblem of maiden modesty before man (Genesis 24. 65), and conjugal chastity (Genesis 20. 16); so, to uncover the head indicated withdrawal from the power of the husband, whence a suspected wife had her head uncovered by the priest (Numbers 5. 18). ALFORD takes "her head" to be man, her symbolical, not her literal head; but as it is literal in the former clause, it must be so in the latter one. all one as if . . . shaven—As woman's hair is given her by nature, as her covering (v. 15), to cut it off like a man, all admit, would be indecorous: therefore, to put away the head-covering, too, like a man, would be similarly indecorous. It is natural to her to have long hair for her covering: she ought, therefore, to add the other (the wearing of a head-covering) to show, that she does of her own will that which nature itself teaches she ought to do, as token of her subjection to man. 6. A woman would not like to be "shorn" or (what is worse) "shaven:" but if she chooses to be uncovered (unveiled) in front, let her be so also behind, i. e., "shorn." a shame—an unbecoming thing (cf. v. 13-15). Thus the shaving of nuns is "a shame." 7-9. Argument, also, from man's more immediate relation to God, and the woman's to man. man . . . image . . . glory of God—being created in God's "image," first and directly: the woman, subsequently, and indirectly, through the mediation of man. Man is the representative of God's "glory" (this ideal of man being realized most fully in the Son of man (Psalm 8, 4, 5; cf. 2 Corinthians 8, 23). Man is declared in Scripture to be both the "image," and in the "likeness," of God (cf. James 3, 9). But "image" alone is applied to the Son of God (Colossians 1, 15; cf. Hebrews 1, 3). "Express image," Greek, the impress. The Divine Son is not merely "like" God, He is God of God, "being of one substance (essence) with the Father." [NICENE CREED.] woman . . . glory of . . . man—He does not say, also, "the image of the man." For the sexes differ: moreover, the woman is created in the image of God, as well as the man (Genesis 1, 26, 27). But as the moon in relation to the sun (Genesis 37, 9), so woman shines not so much with light direct from God, as with light derived from man, i. e., in her order in creation; not that she does not in grace come individually into direct communion with God; but even here much of her knowledge is mediately given her through man, on whom she is naturally dependent. 8. is of . . . of—takes his being from ("out of") . . . from: referring to woman's original creation, "taken out of man" (cf. Genesis 2, 23). The woman was made by God mediately through the man, who was, as it were, a veil or medium placed between her and God, and therefore, should wear the veil or head-covering in public worship, in acknowledgment of this subordination to man in the order of creation. The man being made immediately by God as his glory, has no veil between himself and God. [FABER STAPULENSIS in Bengel.] 9. Neither—rather "For also;" Another argument: The immediate object of woman's creation. "The man was not created for the sake of the woman; but the woman for the sake of the man" (Genesis 2, 18, 21, 22). Just as the Church, the bride, is made for Christ; and yet in both the natural and the spiritual creations, the bride, whilst made for the bridegroom, in fulfilling that end, attains her own true "glory," and brings "shame" and "dishonour" on herself by any departure from it (v. 4, 6). 10. power on her head—the kerchief: French "couvre-chef," head-covering, the emblem of "power on her head:" the sign of her being under man's power, and exercising delegated authority under him. St. Paul had before his mind the root-connection between the Hebrew terms for "veil" (Radid), and subjection (Radad). because of the angels—who are present at our Christian assemblies (cf. Psalm 138, 1, "gods," i. e., angels), and delight in the orderly subordination of the several ranks of God's worshippers in their respective places, the outward demeanour and dress of the latter being indicative of that inward humility which angels know to be most pleasing to their common Lord (ch. 4, 9; Ephesians 3, 10; Ecclesiastes 5, 6). HAMMOND quotes Chrysostom, "Thou standest with angels; thou singest with them; thou hymnest with them; and yet dost thou stand laughing?" BENGEL explains, "As the angels are in relation to God, so the woman is in relation to man. God's face is uncovered; angels in his presence are veiled (Isaiah 6, 2). Man's face is uncovered; woman in his presence is to be veiled. For her not to be so, would, by its indecorousness, offend the angels (Matthew 18, 10, 31). She, by her weakness, especially needs their ministry; she ought, therefore, to be the more careful not to offend them." 11. Yet neither sex is insulated and independent of the other in the Christian life. [ALFORD.] The one needs the other in the sexual relation; and in respect to Christ ("in the Lord"), the man and the woman together (for neither can be dispensed with) realize the ideal of redeemed humanity represented by the bride, the Church. 12. As the woman was formed out of (from) the man, even so is man born by means of woman; but all things (including both man and woman) are from God as their source (Romans 11, 36; 2 Corinthians 5, 18). They depend mutually each on the other and both on him. 13. Appeal to their own sense of decorum. a woman . . . unto God—By rejecting the emblem of subjection (the head-covering), she passes at one leap in praying publicly beyond both the man and angels [BENGEL.] 14. The fact that nature has provided woman, and not man, with long hair, proves that man was designed to be uncovered, and woman covered. The Nazarene, however, wore long hair lawfully, as being part of a vow sanctioned by God (Numbers 6, 5). Cf. as to Absalom 2 Samuel 14, 26, and Acts 18, 18. 15. her hair . . . for a covering—Not that she does not need additional covering. Nay, her long hair shows she ought to cover her head as much as possible. The will ought to accord with nature. [BENGEL.] 16. A summary close to the argument by appeal to the universal custom of the churches. if any . . . seem—the Greek also means "thinks" (fit) (cf. Matthew 3, 9). If any man chooses (still after all my arguments) to be contentious. If any be contentious and thinks himself right in being so. A reproof of the Corinthians' self-sufficiency and disputatiousness (ch. 1, 20). we—apostles; or we of the Jewish nation, from whom ye have received the Gospel, and whose usages in all that is good ye ought to follow: Jewish women veiled themselves when in public, according to Tertullian. [ESTIUS.] The former explanation is best, as the Jews are not referred to in the context: but he often refers to himself and his fellow-apostles, by the expression, "we—us" (ch. 4, 9, 10; 5, 6). no such custom—as that of women praying uncovered. Not as CHRYSOSTOM, &c., "that of being contentious." The Greek term implies a usage, rather than a mental habit (John 18, 89). The usage of true "churches (plural: not, as Rome sees it, 'the Church,' as an abstract entity; but 'the churches, as a number of independent witnesses) of God" (the churches which God Himself recognizes), is a valid argument in the case of external rites, especially, negatively, e.g., Such rites were not received among them, therefore, ought not to be admitted among us: but in questions of doctrine, or the essentials of worship, the argument is not valid [SCLATER] (ch. 7, 17; 14, 33). neither—nor yet. Catholic usage is not an infallible test of truth, but a general test of decency. 17. in this—which follows. I declare—rather, "I enjoin:" as the Greek is always so used. The oldest MSS. read tu, "This I enjoin (you) not praising (you)". that—inasmuch as: in that you, &c. Here he qualifies his praise (v. 2). "I said that I praised you for keeping the ordinances delivered to you; but I must now give injunction in the name of the Lord, on a matter in which I praise you not, viz., as to the Lord's Supper (v. 23; ch. 14, 37). not for the better—not so as to progress to what is better. for the worse—so as to retrograde to what is worse. The result of such "coming together" must be "condemnation" (v. 34). 18. first of all—In the first place. The "divisions" (Greek, schisms) meant, are not merely those of opinion (ch. 1, 10), but in outward acts at the love-feasts (Agapæ) (v. 21). He does not follow up the expression, "in the first place," by "in the second place." But, though not expressed, a second abuse was in his mind, when he said, "In the first place," viz., THE ABUSE OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS, which also created disorder in their assemblies [ALFORD] (ch. 12, 1, &c.; 14, 23, 26, 33, 40). in the Church—not the place of worship; for Isidore of Pelusinus denies that there were such places specially set apart for worship in the apostles' times (Epistle 246, 2. But, "in the assembly" or "congregation:" in convocation for worship, where especially love, order, and harmony should prevail. The very ordinance instituted for uniting together believers in one body, was made as occasion of "divisions" (schisms). partly—He hereby excepts the innocent. "I am unwilling to believe all I hear, but some I cannot help believing" [ALFORD]: whilst my love is unaffected by it. [BENGEL.] 19. heresies—Not merely "schisms" or "divisions" (v. 18), which are "recent dissensions of the congregation through differences of opinion" [AUGUSTINE, Con. Crescon. Don. 2. 7 quoted by French Synonyms, New Testament], but also "heresies," i. e., "schisms which have now become inveterate:" "Sects" [CAMPBELL, vol. 2, p. 126, 127]: so Acts 5. 17; 15. 5, translate the same Greek. At present there were dissensions at the love-feasts; but St. Paul, remembering Jesus' words (Matthew 18. 7; 24. 10, 12; Luke 17. 1), foresees "there must be (come) also" matured separations, and established parties in secession, as separatists. The "must be" arises from sin in professors necessarily bearing its natural fruits: these are overruled by God to the probation of character of both the godly and the ungodly, and to the discipline of the former for glory. "Heresies" had not yet its technical sense ecclesiastically, referring to doctrinal errors: it means confirmed schisms. St. Augustine's rule is a golden rule as regards questions of heresy and catholicity: "In doubtful questions, liberty; in essentials, unity; in all things, charity." that . . . approved may be made manifest—through the disapproved (reprobates) becoming manifested (Luke 2. 35; 1 John 2. 19). 20. When . . . therefore—Resuming the thread of discourse from v. 18. this is not to—rather, "there is no such thing as eating the Lord's Supper;" it is not possible where each is greedily intent only on devouring "HIS OWN supper," and some are excluded altogether, not having been waited for (v. 33), where some are "drunken," whilst others are "hungry" (v. 21). The love-feast usually preceded the Lord's Supper (as eating the Passover came before the Lord's Supper at the first institution of the latter). It was a club-feast, where each brought his portion, and the rich, extra portions for the poor; from it the bread and wine were taken for the Eucharist; and it was at it that the excesses took place, which made a true celebration of the Lord's Supper during or after it, with true discernment of its solemnity, out of the question. 21. one taketh before other—The rich "before" the poor, who had no supper of their own. Instead of "tarrying for one another" (v. 33); hence the precept (ch. 12. 21, 25). his own supper—"His own" belly is his God (Philippians 3. 19); "the Lord's Supper," the spiritual feast never enters his thoughts. drunken—The one has more than is good for him, the other less. [BENGEL.] 22. What I—Greek, For. houses—(cf. v. 34)—"at home." That is the place to satiate the appetite, not the assembly of the brethren. [ALFORD.] despise ye the Church of God—the congregation mostly composed of the poor, whom "God hath chosen," however ye show contempt for them (James 2. 5); cf. "of God" here, marking the true honour of the Church. shame them that have not—viz., houses to eat and drink in, and who, therefore, ought to have received their portion at the love-feasts from their wealthier brethren. I praise you not—resuming the words (v. 17). 23. His object is to show the unworthiness of such conduct from the dignity of the holy supper. I—Emphatic in the Greek. It is not my own invention, but the Lord's institution. received of the Lord—by immediate revelation (Galatians 1. 12; cf. Acts 22. 17, 18; 2 Corinthians 12. 1-4). The renewal of the institution of the Lord's Supper by special revelation to St. Paul enhances its solemnity. The similarity between St. Luke's and St. Paul's account of the institution, favours the supposition that the former drew his information from the apostle, whose companion in travel he was. Thus, the undesigned coincidence is a proof of genuineness. night—the time fixed for the Passover (Exodus 12. 6): though the time for the Lord's Supper is not fixed. betrayed—With the traitor at the table, and death present before His eyes, He left this ordinance as His last gift to us, to commemorate His death. Though about to receive such an injury from man, He gave this pledge of His amazing love to man. 24. break—the breaking of the bread involves its distribution, and reproves the Corinthian mode at the love-feast, of "every one taking before other his own supper." my body . . . broken for you—"Given" (Luke 22. 19) for you (Greek, in your behalf), and "broken," so as to be distributed among you. The oldest MSS. omit "broken," leaving it to be supplied from "break." The two old versions, Memphitic and Thebaic, read from Luke, "given." The literal "body" could not have been meant; for Christ was still sensibly present among his disciples when he said, "This is my body." They could only have understood Him symbolically and analogically: As this bread is to your bodily health, so my body is to the spiritual health of the believing communicant. The words, "Take, eat," are not in the oldest MSS. 25. when he had supped—Greek, "after the eating of supper," viz., the Passover supper which preceded the Lord's Supper, as the love-feast did subsequently. Therefore, you Corinthians ought to separate common meals from the Lord's Supper. [BENGEL.] the new testament—or "covenant." The cup is the parchment-deed, as it were, on which my new covenant, or last will is written and sealed, making over to you all blessings here and hereafter. in my blood—ratified by MY blood: "not by the blood of goats and calves" (Hebrews 9. 12).—as oft as—Greek, as many times soever: implying that it is an ordinance often to be partaken of. in remembrance of me—St. Luke expresses this, which is understood by St. Matthew and St. Mark. St. Paul twice records it as suiting his purpose. The old sacrifices brought sins continually to remembrance (Hebrews 10. 1, 3). The Lord's Supper brings to remembrance Christ and His sacrifice once for all for the full and final remission of sins. 26. For—In proof that the Lord's Supper is "in remembrance" of Him. show—announce publicly. The Greek does not mean to dramatically represent, but "ye publicly profess each of you, the Lord has died FOR ME." [WAHL.] This word, as "is" in Christ's institution (v. 24, 25), implies not literal presence, but a vivid realization, by faith, of Christ in the Lord's Supper, as a living person, not a mere abstract dogma, "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh" (Ephesians 5. 30; cf. Genesis 2. 23); and ourselves "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones," "our sinful bodies made clean by His body (once for all offered), and our souls washed through His most precious blood." [Church of England Prayer Book.] "Show," or "announce," is an expression applicable to new things; cf. "show" as to the Passover, Exodus 13. 8. So the Lord's death ought always to be fresh in our memory; cf. in heaven, Revelation 5. 6. That the Lord's Supper is in remembrance of Him, implies that he is bodily absent, though spiritually present, for we cannot be said to commemorate one absent. The fact that we not only show the Lord's death in the supper, but eat and drink the pledges of it, could only be understood by the Jews, accustomed to such feasts after propitiatory sacrifices, as implying our personal appropriation therein of the benefits of that death. till he come—when there shall be no longer need of symbols of His body, the body itself being manifested. The Greek expresses the certainly of His coming. Rome teaches that we eat Christ present corporally, "till He come" corporally; a contradiction in terms. The shewbread, lit., bread of the presence, was in the sanctuary, but not in the holiest place (Hebrews 9. 1-8); so the Lord's Supper in heaven, the antitype to the holiest place, shall be superseded by Christ's own bodily presence; then the wine shall be drunk "anew" in the Father's kingdom, by Christ and His people together, of which heavenly banquet, the Lord's Supper is a spiritual foretaste and specimen (Matthew 26. 29). Meantime, as the shewbread was placed anew, every sabbath, on the table before the Lord (Leviticus 24. 5-8); so the Lord's death was shown, or announced afresh at the Lord's table the first day of every week in the primitive Church. We are now "priests unto God" in the dispensation of Christ's spiritual presence, antitypical to the HOLY PLACE: the perfect and eternal dispensation, which shall not begin till Christ's coming, is antitypical to the HOLIEST PLACE, which Christ our High Priest alone in the flesh as yet has entered (Hebrews 9. 6, 7); but which, at his coming, we, too who are believers, shall enter (Revelation 7. 15; 21. 2)

CHAPTER XII.

The supper joins the two closing periods of the Old and the New dispensations. The first and second comings are considered as one coming, whence the expression is not "return," but "come" (cf., however, John 14. 3). 27. eat and drink—So one of the oldest MSS. reads. But three or four equally old MSS., the Vulgate and Cyprian, read "or." Romanists quote this reading in favour of communion in one kind. This consequence does not follow. St. Paul says, Whosoever is guilty of unworthy conduct, either in eating the bread, or in drinking the cup, is guilty of the body and blood of Christ. Impropriety in only one of the two elements, vitlates true communion in both. Therefore, in the end of the verse, he says, not "body or blood," &c., but "body and blood." Any who takes the bread without the wine, or the wine without the bread, "unworthily" communicates, and so "is guilty of Christ's body and blood:" for he disobeys Christ's express command to partake of both. If we do not partake of the sacramental symbol of the Lord's death worthily, we share in the guilt of that death. (Cf. "crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh," Hebrews 6, 6.) Unworthiness in the person, is not what ought to exclude any, but unworthily communicating: However unworthy we be, if we examine ourselves so as to find that we penitently believe in Christ's Gospel, we may worthily communicate. 28. examine—Greek, prove, or test, his own state of mind in respect to Christ's death, and his capability of "discerning the Lord's body" (v. 29, 31). Not auricular confession to a priest, but self-examination is necessary. so—after due self-examination. of . . . of—In v. 27, where the receiving was unworthily, the expression was, "eat this bread, drink . . . cup" without "of." Here the "of" implies due circumspection in communicating. [BENGEI.] let him eat—His self-examination is not in order that he may stay away, but that he may eat, i. e., communicate. 29. damnation—A mistranslation which has put a stumbling-block in the way of many in respect to communicating. The right translation is "judgment." The judgment is described (v. 30-32) as temporal. not discerning—not duly judging: not distinguishing in judgment (so the Greek: the sin and its punishment thus being marked as corresponding) from common food, the sacramental pledges of the Lord's body. Most of the oldest MSS. omit "Lord's," see v. 27. Omitting also "unworthily," with most of the oldest MSS. we must translate, "He that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, if he discern not the body" (Hebrews 10. 29). The Church is "the body of Christ" (ch. 12. 27): The Lord's body is His literal body appreciated and discerned by the soul in the faithful receiving, and not present in the elements themselves. 30. weak . . . sickly—He is "weak" who has naturally no strength: "sickly," who has lost his strength by disease. [TITM. Synonyms.] sleep—are being lulled in death: not a violent death; but one the result of sickness, sent as the Lord's chastening for the individual's salvation, the mind being brought to a right state on the sick bed (v. 31). 31. if we would judge ourselves—Most of the oldest MSS. read "But," not "For." Translate also lit., "If we duly judged ourselves, we should not be (or not have been) judged," i. e., we should escape (or have escaped) our present judgments. In order to duly judge or "discern (appreciate) the Lord's body," we need to "duly judge ourselves." A present warning against the dogma of priestly absolution after full confession, as the necessary preliminary to receiving the Lord's Supper. 32. chastened—(Revelation 3. 19.) with the world—who, being bastards, are without chastening (Hebrews 12. 8). 33. Tarry one for another—In contrast to v. 21. The expression is not "Give a share to one another," for all the vands brought to the feast were common property, and, therefore, they should "tarry" till all were met to partake together of the common feast of fellowship. [THEOPHYL.] 34. if any . . . hunger—so as not to be able to "tarry for others," let him take off the edge of his auger at home [ALFORD] (v. 22). the rest—"the other questions you asked me as to the due celebration of the Lord's supper." Not other questions in general; for he does subsequently set in order other general questions in this Epistle.

Ver. 1-31. THE USE AND THE ABUSE OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS, ESPECIALLY PROPHECYING AND TONGUES. This is the second subject for correction in the Corinthian assemblies: the "first" was discussed (ch. 11. 18-34). 1. spiritual gifts—the signs of the Spirit's continued efficacious presence in the Church, which is Christ's body, the complement of His incarnation, as the body is the complement of the head. By the love which pervades the whole, the gifts of the several members, forming reciprocal complements to each other, tend to the one object of perfecting the body of Christ. The ordinary and permanent gifts are comprehended together with the extraordinary, without distinction specified, as both alike flow from the Divine indwelling Spirit of life. The extraordinary gifts, so far from making professors more peculiarly saints than in our day, did not always even prove that such persons were in a safe state at all (Matthew 7. 22). They were needed at first in the Church (1.) as a pledge to Christians themselves who had just passed over from Judaism or heathendom, that God was in the Church; (2.) for the propagation of Christianity in the world; (3.) for the edification of the Church. Now that we have the whole written New Testament, which they had not, and Christianly established as the result of the miracles, we need no further miracle to attest the truth. So the pillar of cloud which guided the Israelites was withdrawn when they were sufficiently assured of the Divine presence, the manifestation of God's glory being thenceforward enclosed in the Most Holy place. [ARCHBISHOP WHATELY.] St. Paul sets forth in order, I. The unity of the body (v. 1-27). II. The variety of its members and functions (v. 27-30). III. The grand principle for the right exercise of the gifts, viz., love (v. 31, and ch. 13). IV. The comparison of the gifts with one another (ch. 14). I would not have you ignorant—with all your boasts of "knowledge" at Corinth. If ignorant now, it will be your own fault, not mine (ch. 14. 38). 2. (Ephesians 2. 11.) that ye were—The best MSS. read, "That WHEN ye were;" thus "ye were" must be supplied before "carried away"—Ye were blindly transported hither and thither at the will of your false guides. these dumb idols—Greek, "the idols which are dumb:" contrasted with the living God who "speaks" in the believer by his Spirit (v. 3, &c.). This gives the reason why the Corinthians needed instruction as to spiritual gifts, viz., their past heathen state, wherein they had no experience of intelligent spiritual powers. When blind, ye went to the dumb. as ye were led—The Greek is, rather, "as ye might (happen to) be led," viz., on different occasions. The heathen oracles led their votaries at random, without any definite principle. 3. The negative and positive criteria of inspiration by the Spirit—the rejection or confession of Jesus as Lord [ALFORD] (1 John 4. 2; 5. 1). St. Paul gives a test of truth against the Gentiles; St. John against the false prophets. by the Spirit—rather, as Greek, "IN the Spirit;" that being the power pervading him, and the element in which he speaks [ALFORD] (Matthew 16. 17; John 15. 26). of God . . . Holy—The same Spirit is called at one time "the Spirit of God;" at another, "the Holy Ghost," or "Holy Spirit." Infinite Holiness is almost synonymous with Godhead. speaking . . . say—"speak" implies the act of utterance; "say" refers to that which is uttered. Here, "say" means a spiritual and believing confession of Him. Jesus—Not an abstract doctrine, but the historical, living God-man (Romans 10. 9). accursed—as the Jews and Gentiles treated Him (Galatians 3. 13). Cf. "to curse Christ" in the heathen PLINY's letter (Ep. 10. 97). The spiritual man feels Him to be the Source of all blessings (Ephesians 1. 3) and to be severed from Him is to be accursed (Romans 9. 3). Lord—acknowledging himself as His servant (Isaiah 26. 13). "Lord" is the LXX. translation for the incommunicable Hebrew name JEHOVAH. 4. diversities of gifts—i. e., varieties of spiritual endowments peculiar to the several members of the Church: cf. "dividing to every man severally" (v. 11). same Spirit—The Holy Trinity appears here: the Holy Spirit in this verse; Christ in v. 5; and the Father in v. 6. The terms "gifts," "administrations," and "operations," respectively correspond to the Divine Three. The Spirit is treated of in v. 7, &c.; the Lord, in v. 12, &c.; God, in v. 28. Cf. Ephesians 4. 4-6. 5, 6. "Gifts" (v. 4), "administrations" (the various functions and services performed by those having the gifts, cf. v. 28), and "operations" (the actual effects resulting from both the former, through the universally operative power of the one Father who is "above all, through all, and in us all"), form an ascending climax. [HENDERSON, Inspiration.] same Lord—whom the Spirit glorifies by these ministrations. [BENGEL.] 6. operations—(Cf. v. 10.) same God . . . worketh—by His Spirit working (v. 11). all in all—all of them (the "gifts") in all the persons (who possess them). 7. But—Though all the gifts flow from the one God, Lord, and Spirit, the "manifestation" by which the Spirit acts (as He is hidden in Himself), varies in each individual. to every man—to each of the members of the Church severally. to profit withal—with a view to the profit of the whole body. 8-10. Three classes of gifts are distinguished by a distinct Greek word for "another" (a distinct class), marking the three several genera: allo marks the species, hetero the genera (cf. Greek, ch. 15. 39-41). I. Gifts of intellect, viz., (1.) wisdom, (2.) knowledge. II. Gifts dependent on a special faith, viz., that of miracles (Matthew 17. 20): (1.) Healings, (2.) workings of miracles, (3.) prophecy of future events, (4.) discerning of spirits, or the divinely-given faculty of distinguishing between those really inspired, and those who pretended to inspiration. III. Gifts referring to the tongues. (1.) Divers kinds of tongues, (2.) Interpretation of tongues. The catalogue in v. 28 is not meant strictly to harmonize with the one here, though there are some particulars in which they correspond. The three genera are summarily referred to by single instances of each in ch. 13. 8. The first genus refers more to believers; the second, to unbelievers. by . . . by . . . by—The first in Greek is, "By means of," or "through the operation of;" the second is, "according to" the disposing of (cf. v. 11); the third is, "In," i. e., under the influence of (so the Greek, Matthew 22. 28; Luke 2. 27). word of wisdom—the ready utterance of (for imparting to others, Ephesians 6. 19) wisdom, viz., new revelations of the Divine wisdom in redemption, as contrasted with human philosophy (ch. 1. 24; 2. 6, 7; Ephesians 1. 8; 3. 10; Colossians 2. 3). word of knowledge—ready utterance supernaturally imparted of truths ALREADY REVEALED (in this it is distinguished from "the word of wisdom," which related to new revelations). Cf. ch. 14. 6, where "revelation" (answering to "wisdom" here) is distinguished from "knowledge." [HENDERSON.] Wisdom or revelation belonged to the "prophets;" knowledge, to the "teachers." Wisdom penetrates deeper than knowledge. Knowledge relates to things that are to be done. Wisdom, to things eternal: hence, wisdom is not, like knowledge, said to "pass away" (ch. 13. 8). [BENGEL.] 9. faith—not of doctrines, but of miracles: confidence in God, by the impulse of His Spirit, that He would enable them to perform any required miracle (cf. ch. 13. 2; Mark 11. 23; James 5. 15). Its nature, or principle, is the same as that of saving faith, viz., reliance on God; the producing cause, also, in the same, viz., a power altogether supernatural (Ephesians 1. 19, 20). But the objects of faith differ respectively. Hence, we see, saving faith does not save by its intrinsic merit, but by the merits of Him who is the object of it. healing—Greek plural, "healings;" referring to different kinds of disease which need different kinds of healing (Matthew 10. 1). 10. working of miracles—As "healings" are miracles, those here meant must refer to miracles of special and extraordinary power (so the Greek for "miracles" means); e. g., healings might be effected by human skill in course of time; but the raising of the dead, the infliction of death by a word, the innocuous use of poisons, &c., are miracles of special power. Cf. Mark 6. 5; Acts 19. 11. prophecy—Here, probably, not in the wider sense of public teaching by the Spirit (ch. 11. 4, 5; 14. 1-5, 22-39); but, as its position between "miracles" and a "discerning of spirits" implies, the inspired disclosure of the future (Acts 11. 27, 28; 21. 11; 1 Timothy 1. 18). [HEN-DERSON.] It depends on "faith" (v. 9; Romans 12. 6). The prophets ranked next to the apostles (v. 28; Ephesians 3. 5; 4. 11). As prophecy is part of the whole scheme of redemption, an inspired insight into the obscurer parts of the existing Scriptures, was the necessary preparation for the miraculous foresight of the future. discerning of spirits—discerning between the operation of God's Spirit, and the evil spirit, or unaided human spirit (ch. 14. 29; cf. 1 Timothy 4. 1; 1 John 4. 1). kinds of tongues—the power of speaking various languages: also a spiritual language unknown to man, uttered in ecstasy (ch. 14. 2-12). This is marked as a distinct genus in the Greek, "To another and a different class." Interpretation of tongues—(Ch. 14. 13, 26, 27.) 11. as he will—(v. 18; Hebrews 2. 4). 12, 13. Unity, not unvarying uniformity, is the law of God in the world of grace, as in that of nature. As the many members of the body compose an organic whole and none can be dispensed with as needless, so those variously gifted by the Spirit, compose a spiritual organic whole, the body of Christ, into which all are baptized by the one Spirit. of that one body—Most of the oldest MSS. omit "one." so also is Christ—i. e., the whole Christ, the head and body. So Psalm 18. 50, "His anointed (Messiah or Christ), David (the antitypical David) and His seed." by . . . Spirit . . . baptized—lit., "in;" in virtue of; through. The designed effect of baptism, which is realized when not frustrated by the unfaithfulness of man. Gentiles—lit., Greeks. all made to drink into one Spirit—The oldest MSS. read, "Made to drink of one Spirit," omitting "into" (John 7. 37). There is an indirect allusion to the Lord's Supper, as there is a direct allusion to baptism in the beginning of the verse. So the "Spirit, the water, and the blood" (1 John 5. 8), similarly combine the two outward signs with the inward things signified, the Spirit's grace, are . . . have been—rather as Greek, "were . . . were." (The past tense.) 14. Translate, "For the body also." The analogy of the body, not consisting exclusively of one, but of many members, illustrates the mutual dependence of the various members in the one body, the Church. The well-known fable of the belly and the other members, spoken by Menenius Agrippa, to the seceding commons [LIVY, 2. 32], was probably before St. Paul's mind, stored as it was with classical literature. 15. The humbler members ought not to disparage themselves, or to be disparaged by others more noble (v. 21, 22). foot . . . hand—The humble speaks of the more honourable member which most nearly resembles itself: so the "ear" of the "eye" (the nobler and more commanding member, Numbers 10. 31) (v. 16). As in life each compares himself with those whom he approaches nearest in gifts, not those far superior. The foot and hand represent men of active life; the ear and eye, those of contemplative life. 17. Superior as the eye is, it would not do if it were the sole member to the exclusion of the rest. 18. now—as the case really is, every one—each severally. 19. where were the body—which, by its very idea, "hath many members" (v. 12, 14). [ALFORD.] 20. now—as the case really is: in contrast to the supposition (v. 19; cf. v. 18). many members—mutually dependent. 21. The higher cannot dispense with the lower members. 22. more feeble—more susceptible of injury: e. g., the brain, the belly, the eye. Their very feebleness, so far from doing away with the need for them, calls forth our greater care for their preservation, as being felt "necessary." 23. less honourable—"We think" the feet and the belly "less honourable," though not really so in the nature of things. bestow . . . honour—putting shoes on (Margt.) the feet, and clothes to cover the belly. uncomely parts—the secret parts: the poorest, though unclad in the rest of the body, cover these. 24. tempered . . . together—on the principle of mutual compensation. to that part which lacked—to the deficient part [ALFORD] (v. 23). 25. no schism (cf. v. 21)—no disunion; referring to the "divisions" noticed, ch. 11. 18. care one for another—i. e., in behalf of one another. 26. And—Accordingly. all . . . suffer with it—"When a thorn enters the heel, the whole body feels it, and is concerned: the back bends, the belly and thighs contract themselves, the hands come forward and draw out the thorn, the head stoops, and the eyes regard the affected member with intense gaze." [CHRYSOSTOM.] rejoice with it—"When the head is crowned, the whole man feels honoured, the mouth expresses, and the eyes look, gladness." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 27. members in particular—i. e., severally members of it. Each Church is in miniature what the whole aggregate of churches is collectively, "the body of Christ" (cf. ch. 3. 16); and its individual components are members, every one in his assigned place. 28. set . . . in the Church—as he has "set the members . . . in the body" (v. 18). first apostles—above even the prophets. Not merely the Twelve, but others are so called, e. g., Barnabas, &c. (Romans 16. 7). teachers—who taught, for the most part, truths already revealed; whereas, the prophets made new revelations, and spoke all their prophesings under the Spirit's influence. As the teachers had the "word of knowledge," so the prophets "the word of wisdom" (v. 8). Under "teachers" are included "evangelists and pastors." miracles—lit., "powers" (v. 10): ranked below "teachers," as the function of teaching is more edifying, though less dazzling than working miracles. helps, governments—lower and higher departments of "ministrations" (v. 5); as instances of the former, deacons whose office it was to help in the relief of the poor, and in baptizing and preaching, subordinate to higher ministers (Acts 6. 1-10; 8. 5-17): also, others who helped with their time and means, in the Lord's cause (cf. ch. 13. 3; Numbers 11. 17). The Americans similarly use "helps" for "helpers." And, as instances of the latter, presbyters, or bishops, whose office it was to govern the Church (1 Timothy 5. 17; Hebrews 13. 17, 24). These officers, though now ordinary and permanent, were originally specially endowed with the Spirit for their office, whence they are here classed with other functions of an inspired character. Government (lit., guiding the helm of affairs), as being occupied with external things, notwithstanding the outward status it gives, is ranked by the Spirit with the lower functions. Cf. "He that giveth (answering to 'helps')—he that ruleth" (answering to "governments") (Romans 12. 8). Translate, lit., 'Helpings, governings.' [ALFORD, &c.] diversities of tongues—(v. 10.) "Divers kinds of tongues." 29. Are all?—Surely not. 31. covet earnestly—Greek, "emulously desire." Not in the spirit of discontented "coveting." The Spirit "divides to every man severally as He will" (v. 1); but this does not prevent men earnestly seeking, by prayer and watchfulness, and cultivation of their faculties, the greatest gifts. BEZA explains, "Hold in the highest estimation;" which accords with the distinction in his view (ch. 14. 1) between "follow after charity—zealously esteem spiritual gifts:" also with (v. 11, 18) the sovereign will with which the Spirit distributes the gifts, precluding individuals from desiring gifts not vouchsafed to them. But see the note, ch. 14. 1. the best gifts—Most of the oldest MSS. read, "the greatest gifts." and yet—Greek, "and moreover." Besides recommending your zealous desire for the greatest gifts, I am about to show you a something still more excellent (lit., "a way most waylike") to desire, "the way of love" (cf. ch. 14. 1). This love or "charity," includes both "faith" and "hope" (ch. 13. 7), and bears the same fruits (ch. 13.) as the ordinary and permanent fruits of the Spirit (Galatians 5. 22-24). Thus "long-suffering," cf. v. 4; "faith," v. 7; "joy," v. 8; "meekness," v. 5; "goodness," v. 5; "gentleness," v. 4 (the Greek is the same 'or "is kind"). It is the work of the Holy Spirit, and consists in love to God, on account of God's love in Christ to us, and as a consequence, love to man, especially to the brethren in Christ (Romans 5. 5; 13. 30). This is more to be desired than gifts (Luke 10. 20).

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-13. CHARITY OR LOVE SUPERIOR TO ALL GIFTS. The New Testament psalm of love, as the 45th Psalm (see its title) and Canticles in the Old Testament. 1. tongues—from these he ascends to "prophecy" (v. 2); then, to "faith:" then to benevolent and self-sacrificing deeds: a climax. He does not except even himself, and so passes from addressing them ("unto you," ch. 12. 31, to putting the case in his own person, "Though I," &c. speak with the tongues—with the eloquence which was so much admired at Corinth (e. g., Apollos, Acts 18. 24; cf. ch. 1. 12; 3. 21, 22), and with the command of various languages, which some at Corinth abused to purposes of mere ostentation (ch. 14. 2, &c.). of angels—higher than men, and therefore, it is to be supposed, speaking a more exalted language. charity—the principle of the ordinary and more important gifts of the Spirit, as contrasted with the extraordinary gifts (ch. 12). sounding . . . tinkling—sound without soul or feeling: such are "tongues" without charity. cymbal—Two kinds are noticed (Psalm 150. 5), the loud or clear, and the high-sounding one: hand cymbals and finger cymbals, or castagnets. The sound is sharp and piercing. 2. mysteries—(Romans 11. 25; 16. 25.) Mysteries refer to the deep counsels of God hitherto secret, but now revealed to His saints. Knowledge, to truths long known. faith . . . remove mountains—(Matthew 17. 20; 21. 21.) The practical power of the will elevated by faith [NEANDER] confidence in God that the miraculous result will surely follow the exercise of the will at the secret impulse of His Spirit. Without "love" prophecy, knowledge, and faith, are not what they seem (cf. ch. 8. 1, 2; Matthew 7. 22; James 2. 41, cf. v. 8), and so fall of the heavenly reward (Matthew 6. 2). Thus St. Paul, who teaches justification by faith only (Romans 3. 4, 5; Galatians 2. 16; 3. 7-14), is shown to agree with St. James, who teaches (James 2. 24) "by works" (i. e., by LOVE, which is the "spirit" of faith, James 2. 26) a man is justified, "and not by faith only." 3. bestow . . . goods . . . poor—lit., dole out in food all my goods; one of the highest functions of the "helps" (ch. 12. 28). give . . . body to be burned—lit., to such a degree as that I should be burned. As the three youths did (Daniel 3. 28), "yielded their bodies" (cf. 2 Corinthians 12. 15). These are most noble exemplifications of love in giving and in suffering. Yet they may be without love; in which case the "goods" and "body" are given, but not the soul, which is the sphere of love. Without the soul God rejects all else, and so rejects the man, who is therefore "profited" nothing (Matthew 16. 26; Luke 9. 23-25). Men will fight for Christianity, and die for Christianity, but not live in its spirit, which is love. 4. suffereth long—under provocations of evil from others. The negative side of love. is kind—The positive side. Extending good to others. Cf. with love's features here those of the "wisdom from above" (James 3. 17). envieth—The Greek includes also jealousy. vaunteth not—in words, even of gifts which it really possesses; an indirect rebuke of those at Corinth who used the gift of tongues for mere display. not puffed up—with party zeal, as some at Corinth were (ch. 4. 6). 5. not . . . unseemly—is not un-courteous, or inattentive to civility and propriety. thinketh no evil—imputeth not evil [ALFORD]; lit., "the evil" which actually is there (Proverbs 10. 12; 1 Peter 4. 8). Love makes allowances for the falls of others, and is ready to put on them a charitable construction. Love, so far from devising evil against another, excuses "the evil" which another inflicts on her [ESTIUS]; doth not meditate upon evil inflicted by another [BENGEL]; and in doubtful cases, takes the more charitable view. [GROTIVS.] 6. rejoiceth in the truth—rather, "rejoiceth with the truth." Exults not at the perpetration of iniquity (unrighteousness) by others (cf. Genesis 9. 22, 23), but rejoices when the truth rejoices; sympathizes with it in its triumphs (2 John 4). See the opposite (2 Timothy 3. 8), "Resist the truth." So "the truth" and "unrighteousness" are contrasted (Romans 2. 8). "The truth" is the Gospel truth, the inseparable ally of love (Ephesians 4. 15; 3 John 12). The false charity which compromises "the truth" by glossing over "iniquity" or unrighteousness is thus tacitly condemned (Proverbs 17. 15). 7. Beareth all things—without speaking of what it has to bear. The same Greek verb as in ch. 9. 12. It endures without divulging to the world personal distress. Lit., said of holding fast like a watertight vessel, so the charitable man contains himself in silence from giving vent to what selfishness would prompt under persehardship. believeth all things—unsuspiciously believes all that is not palpably false, all that it can with a good conscience believe to the credit of another. Cf. James 3. 17, "easy to be entreated;" Greek, easily persuaded. hopeth—what is good of another, even when others have ceased to hope. endureth—persecutions in a patient and loving spirit. 8. never faileth—never is to be out of use; it always holds its place. shall fail . . . vanish away—The same Greek verb is used for both; and that different from the Greek verb for "faileth." Translate, "Shall be done away with," i. e., shall be dispensed with at the Lord's coming, being superseded by their more perfect heavenly analogues; for instance, knowledge by intuition. Of "tongues," which are still more temporary, the verb is "shall cease." A primary fulfilment of St. Paul's statement took place when the Church attained its maturity; then "tongues" entirely "ceased," and "prophecyings" and "knowledge," so far as they were supernatural gifts of the Spirit, were superseded as no longer required when the ordinary preaching of the word, and the Scriptures of the New Testament collected together, had become established institutions. 9, 10. in part—partially and imperfectly. Cf. a similar contrast to the "perfect man," "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Ephesians 4. 11-13). that which is in part—fragmentary and isolated. 11. When . . . a child—(Ch. 3. 1; 14. 20.) I spake—alluding to "tongues." understood—or, "had the sentiments of." Alluding to "prophecy." I thought—Greek, "reasoned" or "judged," alluding to "knowledge." when I became . . . I put away—rather, "now that I am become a man, I have done away with the things of the child." 12. now—in our present state. see—an appropriate expression, in connection with the "prophets" or seers (1 Samuel 9. 9). through a glass—i. e., in a mirror; the reflection seeming to the eye to be behind the mirror, so that we see it through the mirror. Ancient mirrors were made of polished brass or other metals. The contrast is between the inadequate knowledge of an object gained by seeing it reflected in a dim mirror (such as ancient mirrors were), compared with the perfect idea we have of it by seeing itself directly. darkly—lit., in enigma. As a "mirror" conveys an image to the eye, so an "enigma" to the ear. But neither "eye nor ear" can fully represent (though the believer's soul gets a small revelation now of) "the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him" (ch. 2. 9). St. Paul alludes to Numbers 12. 8, "not in dark speeches;" LXX., "not in enigmas." Compared with the visions and dreams vouchsafed to other prophets, God's communications with Moses were "not in enigmas." But compared with the intuitive and direct vision of God hereafter, even the revealed word now is "a dark discourse," or a shadowing forth by enigma of God's reflected likeness. Cf. 2 Peter 1. 19, where the "light" or candle in a dark place stands in contrast with the "day" dawning. God's word is called a glass or mirror also in 2 Corinthians 3. 18. then—"when that which is perfect is come" (v. 10). face to face—not merely "mouth to mouth" (Numbers 12. 8). Genesis 32. 30 was a type (John 1. 50, 51.) know . . . known—rather as Greek, "fully know . . . fully known." Now we are known by, rather than know, God (ch. 8. 8; Galatians 4. 9). 13. And now—translate, "But now." "In this present state." HENDERSON.] Or, "now" does not express time, but opposition, as in ch. 5. 11, "the case being so" [GROTIUS]; whereas it is the case that the three gifts, "prophecy," "tongues," and "knowledge" (cited as specimens of the whole class of gifts) "fail" (v. 8), there abide permanently only these three—faith, hope, charity. In one sense faith and hope shall be done away, faith being superseded by sight, and hope by actual fruition (Romans 8. 24; 2 Corinthians 5. 7); and charity, or love, alone never faileth (v. 8). But in another sense, "faith and hope," as well as "charity," ABIDE; viz., after the extraordinary gifts have ceased; for those three are necessary and sufficient for salvation at all times, whereas the extraordinary gifts are not at all so; cf. the use of "abide," ch. 3. 14. Charity, or love, is connected specially with the Holy Spirit, who is the bond of the loving union between the brethren (Romans

15. 30; Colossians 1. 8). Faith is towards God. Hope is in behalf of ourselves. Charity is love to God creating in us love towards our neighbour. In an unbeliever there is more or less of the three opposites—unbelief, despair, hatred. Even hereafter faith in the sense of trust in God "abideth;" also "hope," in relation to ever-new joys in prospect, and at the anticipation of ever-increasing blessedness, sure never to be disappointed. But love alone in every sense "abideth;" it is therefore "the greatest" of the three, as also because it presupposes "faith," which without "love" and its consequent "works" is dead (Galatians 5. 6; James 2. 17, 20). but—rather, "and;" as there is not so strong opposition between charity and the other two, faith and hope, which like it also "abide."

CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 1-25. SUPERIORITY OF PROPHECY OVER TONGUES. 1. Follow after charity—as your first and chief aim, seeing that it is "the greatest" (ch. 13. 13). and desire—translate, "Yet (as a secondary aim) desire zealously (Note, ch. 12. 31) spiritual gifts." but rather—"but chiefly that ye may prophesy" (speak and exhort under inspiration) (Proverbs 29. 18; Acts 13. 1; 1 Thessalonians 5. 20), whether as to future events, i. e., strict prophecy, or explaining obscure parts of Scripture, especially the prophetic Scriptures, or illustrating and setting forth questions of Christian doctrine and practice. Our modern preaching is the successor of prophecy, but without the inspiration. Desire zealously this (prophecy) more than any other spiritual gift; or in preference to "tongues" (v. 2, &c.). [BEN-GEL.] 2. speaketh . . . unto God—who alone understands all languages. no man understandeth—generally speaking; the few who have the gift of interpreting tongues are the exception. in the spirit—as opposed to "the understanding" (v. 14). mysteries—unintelligible to the hearers, exciting their wonder, rather than instructing them. Corinth, being a mart resorted to by merchants from Asia, Africa, and Europe, would give scope amidst its mixed population for the exercise of the gift of tongues; but its legitimate use was in an audience understanding the tongue of the speaker, not, as the Corinthians abused it, in mere display. 3. But—on the other hand. edification—of which the two principal species given are "exhortation" to remove sluggishness, "comfort" or consolation to remove sadness. [BEN-GEL.] Omit "to." 4. edifieth himself—as he understands the meaning of what the particular "tongue" expresses; but "the Church," i. e., the congregation, does not. 5. Translate, "Now I wish you all to speak with tongues (so far am I from thus speaking through having any objection to tongues), but rather IN ORDER THAT (as my ulterior and higher wish for you) ye should prophesy." Tongues must therefore mean languages, not ecstatic, unintelligible rhapsodies (as NEANDER fancied): for Paul could never "wish" for the latter in their behalf. greater—because more useful. except he interpret—the unknown tongue which he speaks, "that the Church may receive edifying" (building up). 6. Translate, "But now:" seeing there is no edification without interpretation. revelation . . . prophesying—corresponding one to the other; "revelation" being the supernatural unveiling of Divine truths to man, "prophesying" the enunciation to men of such revelations. So "knowledge" corresponds to "doctrine," which is the gift of teaching to others our knowledge. As the former pair refers to specially revealed mysteries, so the latter pair refers to the general obvious truths of salvation, brought from the common storehouse of believers. 7. Translate, "And things without life-giving sound, whether pipe or harp, YET (notwithstanding their giving sound) if they give not a distinction in the tones (i. e., notes) how," &c. ? what is piped or harped—i. e., what tune is played on the pipe or harp. 8. Translate, "For if also:" an additional step in the argument. uncertain sound—having no definite meaning; whereas it ought to be so marked that one succession of notes on the trumpet should summon the soldiers to attack; another, to retreat; another, to some other evolution. 9. So . . . ye—who have life; as opposed to “things without life” (v. 7). by the tongue—the language which ye speak in. ye shall speak—ye will be speaking into the air, i. e., in vain (ch. 9. 26). 10. it may be—i. e., perhaps, speaking by conjecture. “It may chance” (ch. 15. 37). so many—as may be enumerated by investigators of such matters. Cf. “so much,” used generally for a definite number left undefined, Acts 5. 8; also 2 Samuel 12. 8. kinds of voices—kinds of articulate speech. without signification—without articulate voice (i. e., distinct meaning). None is without its own voice, or mode of speech, distinct from the rest. 11. Therefore—seeing that none is without meaning. a barbarian—a foreigner (Acts 28. 2). Not in the depreciatory sense as the term is now used, but one speaking a foreign language. 12. zealous—emulously desirous. spiritual gifts—lit., “spirits;” i. e., emanations from the one Spirit. seek that ye may excel to translate, “Seek them, that ye may abound in them to the edifying,” &c. 13. Explain, “Let him who speaketh with a tongue [unknown] in his prayer (or, when praying) strive that he may interpret.” [ALFORD.] This explanation of “pray” is needed by its logical connection with “prayer in an unknown tongue” (v. 14). Though his words be unintelligible to his hearers, let him in them pray that he may obtain the gift of interpreting, which will make them “edifying” to “the Church” (v. 12). 14. spirit—my higher being, the passive object of the Holy Spirit’s operations, and the instrument of prayer in the unknown tongue, distinguished from the “understanding,” the active instrument of thought and reasoning; which in this case must be “unfruitful” in edifying others, since the vehicle of expression is unintelligible to them. On the distinction of soul or mind and spirit, see Ephesians 4. 23; Hebrews 4. 12. 15. What is it then?—What is my determination thereupon? and—rather as Greek, “but:” I will not only pray with my spirit, which (v. 14) might leave the understanding unedified, BUT with the understanding also. [ALFORD and ELLICOTT.] pray with the understanding also—and, by inference, I will keep silence altogether if I cannot pray with the understanding (so as to make myself understood by others). A prescient warning, mutatis mutandis, against the Roman and Greek practice of keeping liturgies in dead languages, which long since have become unintelligible to the masses; though their forefathers spoke them at a time when those liturgies were framed for general use. 16. Else . . . thou—He changes from the first person, as he had just expressed his own resolution, “I will pray with the understanding,” whatever “thou” doest. blest—the highest kind of prayer. occupieth the room of the unlearned—one who, whatever other gifts he may possess, yet, as wanting the gift of interpretation, is reduced by the speaking in an unknown tongue to the position of one unlearned, or “a private person.” say Amen—Prayer is not a vicarious duty done by others for us; as in Rome’s liturgies and masses. We must join with the leader of the prayers and praises of the congregation, and say aloud our responsive “Amen” in assent, as was the usage of the Jewish (Deuteronomy 27. 15–26; Nehemiah 8. 6) and Christian primitive churches. [JUSTIN MART., Apol. 2. 97.] 17. givest thanks—The prayers of the synagogue were called “eulogies,” because to each prayer was joined a thanksgiving. Hence the prayers of the Christian Church also were called blessings and giving of thanks. This illustrates Colossians 4. 2; 1 Thessalonians 5. 17, 18. So the Kaddisch and Keduscha, the synagogue formulæ of “hallowing” the Divine “name” and of prayer for the “coming of God’s kingdom,” answer to the Church’s Lord’s Prayer, repeated often and made the foundation on which the other prayers are built. [TERTULLIAN, de Oratone.] 18. tongues—The oldest MSS. have the singular, “in a tongue [foreign].” 19. I had rather—The Greek verb more literally expresses this meaning, “I wish to speak five words with my understanding (rather) than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue:” even the two thousandth part of ten thousand. The Greek for “I would rather,” would be a different verb. St. Paul would NOT wish at all to speak “ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.” 20. Brethren—an appellation calculated to conciliate their favorable reception of his exhortation. children in understanding—as preference of gifts abused to non-edification would make you (cf. ch. 3. 1; Matthew 10. 16; Romans 16. 19; Ephesians 4. 14). The Greek for “understanding” expresses the will of one’s spirit, Romans 8. 6 (it is not found elsewhere); as the “heart” is the will of the “soul.” The same Greek is used for “minded” in Romans 8. 6. men—full-grown. Be childlike, not childish. 21. In the law—as the whole Old Testament is called, being all of it the law of God. Cf. the citation of the Psalms as the “law,” John 10. 34. Here the quotation is from Isaiah 28. 11, 12, where God virtually saith of Israel, This people hear me not, though I speak to them in the language which they are familiar with; I will therefore speak to them in other tongues; namely, those of the foes whom I will send against them; but even then they will not hearken to me; which St. Paul thus applies, Yesee that it is a penalty to be associated with men of a strange tongue, yet ye impose this on the Church [GROTIUS]; they who speak in foreign tongues are like “children” just “weaned from the milk” (Isaiah 28. 9), “with stammering lips” speaking unintelligibly to the hearers, appearing ridiculous (Isaiah 28. 14), or as babbling drunkards (Acts 2. 13), or madmen (v. 23). 22. Thus from Isaiah it appears, reasons St. Paul, that “tongues” (unknown and uninterpreted) are not a sign mainly intended for believers (though at the conversion of Cornelius and the Gentiles with him, tongues were vouchsafed to him and them to confirm their faith), but mainly to be a condemnation to those, the majority, who, like Israel in Isaiah’s day, reject the sign and the accompanying message. Cf. “yet . . . will they not hear me,” v. 21. “Sign” is often used for a condemnatory sign (Ezekiel 4. 3, 4; Matthew 12. 39–42). Since they will not understand, they shall not understand. prophesying . . . not for them that believe not, but . . . believe—i. e., prophesying has no effect on them that are radically and obstinately like Israel (Isaiah 28. 11, 12), unbelievers, but on them that are either in receptivity or in fact believers; it makes believers of those not wilfully unbelievers (v. 24, 25; Romans 10. 17), and spiritually nourishes those that already believe. 23. whole . . . all . . . tongues—The more there are assembled, and the more that speak in unknown tongues, the more will the impression be conveyed to strangers “coming in” from curiosity (“unbelievers”), or even from a better motive (“unlearned”), that the whole body of worshippers is a mob of fanatical “madmen;” and that “the Church is like the company of builders of Babel after the confusion of tongues, or like the cause tried between two deaf men before a deaf judge, celebrated in the Greek epigram.” [GROTIUS.] unlearned—having some degree of faith, but not gifts. [BENGEL.] 24. all—one by one (v. 31). prophecy—speak the truth by the Spirit intelligibly, and not in unintelligible tongues. one—“any one.” Here singular; implying that this effect, viz., conviction by all, would be produced on any one whatsoever, who might happen to enter. In v. 23 the plural is used; “unlearned or unbelievers;” implying that however many there might be, not one would profit by the tongues; yea, their being many would confirm them in rejecting the sign, as many unbelieving men together strengthen one another in unbelief; individuals are more easily won. [BENGEL.] convinced—convicted in conscience; said of the “one that believeth not” (John 16. 8, 9). judged—his secret character is opened out. “Is searched into.” [ALFORD.] Said of the “one unlearned” (cf. ch. 2. 15). 25. And thus—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions. secrets of his heart made manifest—He sees his own inner character opened out by the sword of the Spirit (Hebrews 4. 12; James 1. 23), the word of God, in the hand of him who prophesieth. Cf. the same effect produced on Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel 2. 30, end of the verse, 46, 47. No argument is stronger for the truth of religion than its manifestation of men to themselves in their true character. Hence hearers even now often think the preacher must have aimed his sermon particularly at them. and so—convicted at last, judged, and manifested to himself. Cf. the effect on the woman of Samaria produced by Jesus' unfolding of her character to herself, John 4. 19, 29. and report—to his friends at home, as the woman of Samaria did. Rather, as the Greek is, "He will worship God, announcing," i. e., openly avowing them and there, "that God is in you of a truth," and by implication that the God who is in you is of a truth the God.

26-40. RULES FOR THE EXERCISE OF GIFTS IN THE CONGREGATION. 26. How is it then?—rather, "What then is the true rule to be observed as to the use of gifts?" Cf. v. 15, where the same Greek occurs. a doctrine—to impart and set forth to the congregation. a psalm—extemporary, inspired by the Spirit, as that of Mary, Zechariah, Simeon, and Anna (Luke 1. and 2). a tongue . . . a revelation—the oldest MSS. transpose the order: "revelation . . . tongue;" "interpretation" properly following "tongue" (v. 13). Let all things be done unto edifying—The general rule under which this particular case falls; an answer to the question at the beginning of this verse. Each is bound to obey the ordinances of his Church not adverse to Scripture. See Article XXXIV, Church of England Prayer Book. 27. let it be by two—at each time, in one assembly; not more than two or three might speak with tongues at each meeting. by course—in turns. let one interpret—one who has the gift of interpreting tongues; and not more than one. 28. let him—the speaker in unknown tongues. speak to himself, and to God—(cf. v. 2, 1)—privately and not in the hearing of others. 29. Two or three—at one meeting (he does not add "at the most," as in v. 27, lest he should seem to "quench prophesyings," the most edifying of gifts), and these "one by one," in turns (v. 27, "by course," and v. 31). St. Paul gives here similar rules to the prophets, as previously to those speaking in unknown tongues. judge—by their power of "discerning spirits" (ch. 12. 10), whether the person prophesying was really speaking under the influence of the Spirit (cf. ch. 12. 3; 1 John 4. 1-3). 30. If any thing—translate, "But if any thing." one that sitteth by—a hearer. let the first hold his peace—let him who heretofore spoke, and who came to the assembly furnished with a previous ordinary (in those times) revelation from God (v. 26), give place to him who at the assembly is moved to prophesy by a sudden revelation from the Spirit. 31. For ye may—rather, "For ye can [if ye will] all prophesy one by one," giving way to one another. The "for" justifies the precept (v. 30), "let the first hold his peace." 32. And—Following up the assertion in v. 31, "Ye can (if ye will) prophesy one by one," i. e., restrain yourselves from speaking all together; "and the spirits of the prophets," i. e., their own spirits, acted on by the Holy Spirit, are not so hurried away by His influence, as to cease to be under their own control; they can if they will hear others, and not demand that they alone should be heard uttering communications from God. 33. In all the churches of the saints God is a God of peace; let Him not among you be supposed to be a God of confusion. [ALFORD.] Cf. the same argument, ch. 11. 16. LACHMANN, &c., put a full stop at "peace," and connect the following words thus: "As in all churches of the saints, let your women keep silence in your churches." 34. (1 Timothy 2. 11, 12.) For women to speak in public would be an act of independence, as if they were not subject to their husbands (cf. ch. 11. 3; Ephesians 5. 22; Titus 2. 5; 1 Peter 3. 1). For "under obedience," translate, "in subjection" or "submission," as the Greek is translated (Ephesians 5. 21, 22, 24). the law—a term applied to the whole Old Testament; here, Genesis 3. 16. 35. Anticipation of an objection. Women may say, "But if we do not understand some thing, may we not 'ask' a question publicly so as to 'learn'?" Nay, replies St. Paul, if you want information, 'ask' not in public, but 'at home;' ask not other men, but 'your own particular (so the Greek) husbands.'" shame—indecorous. 36. What!—Greek, "Or." Are you about to obey me? Or, if you set up your judgment above that of other churches. I wish to know, do you pretend that your Church is the first Church FROM which the gospel word came, that you should give the law to all others? Or are you the only persons UNTO whom it has come? 37. prophet—the species. spiritual—the genus: spiritually endowed. The followers of Apollos prided themselves as "spiritual" (ch. 3. 1-3; cf. Galatians 6. 1). Here one capable of discerning spirits is specially meant. things that I write . . . commandments of the Lord—a direct assertion of inspiration. St. Paul's words as an apostle are Christ's words. St. Paul appeals not merely to one or two, but to a body of men, for the reality of three facts about which no body of men could possibly be mistaken. (1.) That his having converted them was not due to mere eloquence, but to the "demonstration of the Spirit and of power;" (2.) that part of this demonstration consisted in the communication of miraculous power, which they were then exercising so generally as to require to be corrected in the irregular employment of it; (3.) that among these miraculous gifts was one which enabled the "prophet" or "spiritual person" to decide whether St. Paul's Epistle was Scripture or not. He could not have written so, unless the facts were notoriously true: for he takes them for granted, as consciously known by the whole body of men whom he addresses. [HINDS on Inspiration.] 38. if any man be ignorant—wilfully; not wishing to recognize these ordinances and my apostolic authority in enjoining them. let him be ignorant—I leave him to his ignorance: it will be at his own peril; I feel it waste of words to speak anything further to convince him. An argument likely to have weight with the Corinthians, who admired "knowledge" so much. 39. covet—earnestly desire. Stronger than "forbid not;" marking how much higher he esteemed "prophecy" than "tongues." 40. Let, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "But let," &c. This verse is connected with v. 39, "But (whilst desiring prophecy, and not forbidding tongues) let all things be done decently," &c. "Church government is the best security for Christian liberty." [J. NEWTON.] (Cf. v. 23, 26-33.)

CHAPTER XV.

Ver. 1-58. THE RESURRECTION PROVED AGAINST THE DENIERS OF IT AT CORINTH. Christ's resurrection rests on the evidence of many eye-witnesses, including St. Paul himself, and is the great fact preached as the groundwork of the Gospel: they who deny the resurrection in general, must deny that of Christ, and the consequence of the latter will be, that Christian preaching and faith are vain. 1. Moreover—"Now." [ALFORD and ELLICOTT.] I declare—lit., "I make known:" it implies some degree of reproach that it should be now necessary to make it known to them afresh, owing to some of them "not having the knowledge of God" (v. 34). Cf. Galatians 1. 11. wherein ye stand—wherein ye now take your stand. This is your present actual privilege, if ye suffer not yourselves to fall from your high standing. 2. ye are saved—rather, "ye are being saved." if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you—Able critics, BENGEL, &c., prefer connecting the words thus, "I declare unto you the Gospel (v. 1) in what words I preached it unto you." St. Paul reminds them, or rather makes known to them, as if anew, not only the fact of the Gospel, but also with what words, and by what arguments, he preached it to them. Translate in that case, "if ye hold it fast." I prefer arranging as English Version, "By which ye are saved, if ye hold fast (in memory and personal appropriation) with what speech I preached it unto you." unless—which is impossible, your faith is vain, in resting on Christ's resurrection as an objective reality. 3. I delivered unto you—A short creed, or summary of articles of faith, was probably even then existing; and a profession in accordance with it was required of candidates for baptism (Acts 8. 37). first of all—lit., "among the foremost points" (Hebrews 6. 2). The atonement is, in St. Paul's view, of primary importance. which I . . . received—from Christ Himself by special revelation (cf. ch. 11. 23). died for our sins—i. e., to atone for them: for taking away our sins (1 John 3. 5; cf. Galatians 1. 4): "gave Himself for our sins" (Isaiah 53. 5; 2 Corinthians 5. 15; Titus 2. 14). The "for" here does not, as in some passages, imply vicarious substitution, but "in behalf of" (Hebrews 5. 3; 1 Peter 1.

4). It does not, however, mean merely "on account of," which is expressed by a different Greek word (Romans 4. 25), (though in English Version translated similarly "for"), according to the Scriptures—which "cannot be broken." St. Paul puts the testimony of Scripture above that of those who saw the Lord after His resurrection. [BENJEL.] So our Lord quotes Isaiah 53. 12, in Luke 22. 37; cf. Psalm 22. 15, &c.; Daniel 9. 26. 4. buried . . . rose again—His burial is more closely connected with His resurrection than His death. At the moment of His death, the power of His inextinguishable life exerted itself (Matthew 27. 52). The grave was to Him not the destined receptacle of corruption, but an apartment fitted for entering into life (Acts 2. 26-28). [BENJEL.] rose again—Greek, "hath risen:" the state thus begun, and its consequences, still continue. 5. seen of Cephas—Peter (Luke 24. 34). the Twelve—The round number for "the Eleven" (Luke 24. 33, 36): "The Twelve" was their ordinary appellation, even when their number was not full. However, very possibly Matthias was present (Acts 1. 22, 23). Some of the oldest MSS. and versions read, "the Eleven:" but the best on the whole, "the Twelve." 6. five hundred—This appearance was probably on the mountain (Tabor, according to tradition), in Galilee, when his most solemn and public appearance, according to His special promise, was vouchsafed (Matthew 26. 32; 28. 7, 10, 16). He "appointed" this place, as one remote from Jerusalem, so that believers might assemble there more freely and secretly. ALFORD'S theory of Jerusalem being the scene, is improbable; as such a multitude of believers could not, with any safety, have met in one place in the metropolis, after his crucifixion there. The number of disciples (Acts 1. 15) at Jerusalem shortly after, was one hundred and twenty, those in Galilee and elsewhere not being reckoned. Andronicus and Junius were, perhaps, of the number (Romans 16. 7): they are said to be "among the apostles" (who all were witnesses of the resurrection, Acts 1. 22). remain under this present—and, therefore, may be sifted thoroughly to ascertain the trustworthiness of their testimony. fallen asleep—in the sure hope of awaking at the resurrection (Acts 7. 60). 7. seen of James—the Less, the brother of our Lord (Galatians 1. 19). The Gospel according to the Hebrews, quoted by JEROME (Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, p. 170 D.), records that "James swore he would not eat bread from the hour that he drank the cup of the Lord, till he should see Him rising again from the dead." all the apostles—the term here includes many others besides "the Twelve" already enumerated (v. 5): perhaps the seventy disciples (Luke 10). [CHRYSOSTOM.] 8. one born out of due time—Greek, "the one abortively born:" the abortion in the family of the apostles. As a child born before the due time is puny, and though born alive, yet not of the proper size, and scarcely worthy of the name of man, so "I am the least of the apostles," scarcely "meet to be called an apostle;" a supernumerary taken into the college of apostles out of regular course, not led to Christ by long instruction, like a natural birth, but by a sudden power, as those prematurely born. [GROTIUS.] Cf. the similar image from child-birth, and by the same spiritual power, the resurrection of Christ (1 Peter 1. 3). "Begotten again by the resurrection of Jesus." Jesus' appearance to Paul, on the way to Damascus, is the one here referred to. 9. least—The name, "Paulus," in Latin, means least. I persecuted the Church—Though God has forgiven him, Paul can hardly forgive himself at the remembrance of his past sin. 10. by . . . grace . . . and His grace—The repetition implies the prominence which God's grace had in his mind, as the sole cause of his marvellous conversion and subsequent labours. Though "not meet to be called an apostle," grace has given him, in Christ, the meetness needed for the office. Translate as the Greek, "His grace which was (showed) towards me." what I am—occupying the honourable office of an apostle. Contrast with this the self-sufficient prayer of another Pharisee (Luke 18. 11). but I laboured—by God's grace (Philippians 2. 16). than they all—than any of the apostles (v. 7). grace of God . . . with me—cf. 'the Lord working with them' (Mark 16. 20).

The oldest MSS. omit "which was." The "not I, but grace," implies, that though the human will concurred with God when brought by His Spirit into conformity with His will, yet "grace" so preponderated in the work, that His own co-operation is regarded as nothing, and grace as virtually the sole agent. (Cf. ch. 8. 9; Matthew 10. 20; 2 Corinthians 6. 1; Philippians 2. 12, 13.) 11. whether it were I or they—(the apostles) who "laboured more abundantly" (v. 10) in preaching, such was the substance of our preaching, viz., the truths stated in v. 3, 4, 12. 11—Seeing that it is an admitted fact that Christ is announced by us eye-witnesses as having risen from the dead, how is it that some of you deny that which is a necessary consequence of Christ's resurrection, viz., the general resurrection? some—Gentile reasoners (Acts 17. 32; 28. 8) who would not believe it, because they did not see "how" it could be (v. 35, 36). 12. If there be no general resurrection, which is the consequent, then there can have been no resurrection of Christ, which is the antecedent. The head and the members of the body stand on the same footing: what does not hold good of them, does not hold good either of Him: His resurrection and theirs are inseparably joined (cf. v. 20-22; John 14. 19). 13. your faith . . . vain—(v. 11.) The Greek for "vain" here is, empty, unreal: in v. 17, on the other hand, it is, without use, frustrated. The principal argument of the first preachers in support of Christianity, was that God had raised Christ from the dead (Acts 1. 22; 2. 32; 4. 10, 33; 13. 37; Romans 1. 4). If this fact were false, the faith built on it must be false too. 14. testified of God—i. e., concerning God. The rendering of others is, "against God" [Vulgate, ESTIUS, GROTIUS]: the Greek preposition with the genitive implies, not direct antagonism (as the accusative would mean), but indirect to the dishonour of God. English Version is probably better. if so be—as they assert. It is not right to tell untrue stories, though they are told, and seem for the glory of God (Job 13. 7). 15. The repetition implies the unanswerable force of the argument. 16. vain—Ye are, by the very fact (supposing the case to be as the skeptics maintained), frustrated of all which "your faith" appropriates: Ye are still under the everlasting condemnation of your sins (even in the disembodied state which is here referred to), from which Christ's resurrection is our justification (Romans 4. 25): "saved by his life" (Romans 5. 10). 17. fallen asleep in Christ—in communion with Christ as His members. "In Christ's case the term used is death, to assure us of the reality of His suffering; in our case, sleep, to give us consolation: In His case, His resurrection having actually taken place, St. Paul shrinks not from the term death; in ours, the resurrection being still only a matter of hope, he uses the term falling asleep" [PHOTIUS, Questiones Amphilochoia, 197]. perished—their souls are lost; they are in misery in the unseen world. 18. If our hopes in Christ were limited to this life only, we should be, of all men, most to be pitied, viz., because, whilst others live unmolested, we are exposed to every trial and persecution, and, after all, are doomed to bitter disappointment in our most cherished hope; for all our hope of salvation, even of the soul (not merely of the body), hangs on the resurrection of Christ, without which His death would be of no avail to us (Ephesians 1. 19, 20; 1 Peter 1. 3). The heathen are "without hope" (Ephesians 2. 12; 1 Thessalonians 4. 13). We should be even worse, for we should be also without present enjoyment (ch. 4. 9). 19. now—as the case really is. and become—Omitted in the oldest MSS. the first-fruits—the earnest or pledge, that the whole resurrection harvest will follow, so that our faith is not vain, nor our hope limited to this life. The time of writing this Epistle was probably about the Passover (ch. 5. 7); the day after the Passover sabbath was that for offering the first-fruits (Leviticus 23. 10, 11), and the same was the day of Christ's resurrection: whence appears the appropriateness of the image. 20. by man . . . by man—The first-fruits are of the same nature as the rest of the harvest; so Christ, the bringer of life, is of the same nature as the race of men to whom he brings it; just as Adam, the bringer of death, was of the same nature as the men on whom he brought it. 22. in Adam all—In union of nature with Adam, as representative head of mankind in their fall. in Christ . . . all—In union of nature with Christ, the representative head of mankind in their recovery. The life brought in by Christ is co-extensive with the death brought in by Adam. 23. But each in his own order—rather, rank: the Greek is not in the abstract, but concrete image from troops, "each in his own regiment." Though all shall rise again, let not any think all shall be saved; nay, each shall have his proper place, Christ first (Colossians 1. 18), and after Him the godly who die in Christ (1 Thessalonians 4. 16), in a separate band from the ungodly, and then "the end," i. e., the resurrection of the rest of the dead. Christian churches, ministers, and individuals, seem about to be judged first "at His coming" (Matthew 25. 1-30); then "all the nations" (Matthew 25. 31-46). Christ's own flock shall share His glory "at His coming," which is not to be confounded with "the end," or general judgment (Revelation 20. 4-6, 11-15). The latter is not in this chapter specially discussed, but only the first resurrection, viz., that of the saints; not even the judgment of Christian hollow professors (Matthew 25. 1-30) at His coming, is handled, but only the glory of them "that are Christ's," who alone in the highest sense "obtain the resurrection from the dead" (Luke 14. 14; 20. 35, 36; Philippians 3. 11, see note). The second coming of Christ is not a mere point of time, but a period beginning with the resurrection of the just at His appearing, and ending with the general judgment. The ground of the universal resurrection is the union of all mankind in nature with Christ, their representative Head, who has done away with death, by His own death in their stead: the ground of the resurrection of believers is not merely this, but their personal union with Him as their "Life" (Colossians 3. 4), effected causatively by the Holy Spirit, and instrumentally by faith as the subjective, and by ordinances as the objective means. 24. Then—after that: next in the succession of "orders" or "ranks." the end—the general resurrection, and final judgment and consummation (Matthew 25. 46). delivered up . . . kingdom to . . . Father—(Cf. John 13. 3.) Seeming at variance with Daniel 7. 14, "His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away." Really, His giving up of the mediatorial kingdom to the Father, when the end for which the mediatorial economy was established has been accomplished, is altogether in harmony with its continuing everlastingly. The change which shall then take place, shall be in the manner of administration, not in the kingdom itself; God shall then come into direct connection with the earth, instead of mediatorially, when Christ shall have fully and finally removed everything that severs asunder the holy God and a sinful earth (Colossians 1. 20). The glory of God is the final end of Christ's mediatorial office (Philippians 2. 10, 11). His co-equality with the Father is independent of the latter, and prior to it, and shall, therefore, continue when its function shall have ceased. His manhood, too, shall everlastingly continue, though, as now, subordinate to the Father. The throne of the Lamb (but no longer mediatorial) as well as of God, shall be in the heavenly city (Revelation 22. 3; cf. 3. 21). The unity of the Godhead, and the unity of the Church, shall be simultaneously manifested at Christ's second coming. Cf. Zephaniah 3. 9; Zechariah 14. 9; John 17. 21-24. The oldest MSS. for "shall have delivered up," read, "delivereth up," which suits the sense better. It is "when He shall have put down all rule," that "He delivereth up the kingdom to the Father." shall have put down all rule—The effect produced during the millenary reign of Himself and His saints (Psalm 110. 1; 8. 6; 2. 6-9), to which passages St. Paul refers, resting his argument on the two words, "all" and "until," of the Psalmist: a proof of verbal inspiration of Scripture (cf. Revelation 2. 23, 27). Meanwhile, He "rules in the midst of His enemies" (Psalm 110. 2). He is styled "the King" when He takes His great power (Matthew 25. 34; Revelation 11. 15, 17). The Greek for "put down" is, "done away with," or "brought to naught." "All" must be subject to Him, whether openly-opposed powers, as Satan and His angels, or kings and angelic principalities (Ephesians 1. 4); 25. must—because Scripture foretells it. till—there will be no further need of His mediatorial kingdom, its object having been realized. enemies under his feet—(Luke 13. 27; Ephesians 1. 22.) 26. shall be—Greek, "is done away with" (Revelation 20. 14; cf. 1. 18). It is to believers especially this applies (v. 55-57); even in the case of unbelievers, death is done away with by the general resurrection. Satan brought in sin, and sin brought in death! So they shall be destroyed (rendered utterly powerless) in the same order (v. 56; Hebrews 2. 14; Revelation 19. 20; 20. 10, 14). 27. all things—including death (cf. Ephesians 1. 22; Philippians 3. 21; Hebrews 2. 8; 1 Peter 3. 22). It is said, "hath put," for what God has said is the same as if it were already done, so sure is it. St. Paul here quotes the 8th Psalm in proof of his previous declaration, "For (it is written), 'He hath put all things under his feet.'" under his feet—as His footstool (Psalm 110. 1). In perfect and lasting subjection. when he—viz., God, who by His Spirit inspired the Psalmist. 28. Son . . . himself . . . subject—not as the creatures are, but as a Son voluntarily subordinate to, though co-equal with, the Father. In the mediatorial kingdom, the Son had been, in a manner, distinct from the Father. Now, His kingdom shall merge in the Father's, with whom He is one; not that there is thus any derogation from His honour; for the Father Himself wills "that all should honour the Son, as they honour the Father" (John 5. 22, 23; Hebrews 1. 6). God . . . all in all—as Christ is all in all (Colossians 3. 11; cf. Zechariah 14. 9). Then, and not till then, "all things," without the least infringement of the Divine prerogative, shall be subject to the Son, and the Son subordinate to the Father, whilst co-equally sharing his glory. Contrast Psalm 10. 4; 14. 1. Even the saints do not fully realize God as their "all" (Psalm 78. 25) now, through desiring it; then each shall feel, God is all to me. 29. Else—if there be no resurrection. what shall they do?—How wretched is their lot! they . . . which are baptized for the dead—third person; a class distinct from that in which the apostle places himself, "we" (v. 30); first person. ALFORD thinks there is an allusion to a practice at Corinth of baptizing a living person in behalf of a friend who died unbaptized; thus St. Paul, without giving the least sanction to the practice, uses an ad hominem argument from it against its practitioners, some of whom, though using it, denied the resurrection: "What account can they give of their practice; why are they at the trouble of it, if the dead rise not?" [So Jesus used an ad hominem argument, Matthew 12. 27.] But if so, it is strange there is no direct censure of it. Some Marcionites adopted the practice at a later period, probably from taking this passage, as ALFORD does; but, generally, it was unknown in the Church. BENGEI translates, "over (immediately upon) the dead," i. e., who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. Cf. Job 17. 1, "the graves are ready for me." The price they get for their trouble is, that they should be gathered to the dead for ever (v. 13, 16). Many in the ancient Church put off baptism till near death. This seems the better view; though there may have been some rites of symbolical baptism at Corinth, now unknown, perhaps grounded on Jesus' words (Matthew 20. 22, 23), which St. Paul here alludes to. The best punctuation is, "If the dead rise not at all, why are they then baptized for them" (so the oldest MSS. read the last words, instead of "for the dead")? 30. we—apostles (v. 9; ch. 4. 9). A gradation from those who could only for a little time enjoy this life (i. e., those baptized at the point of death), to us, who could enjoy it longer, if we had not renounced the world for Christ. [BENGEI.] 31. by your rejoicing—by the glorying which I have concerning you, as the fruit of my labours in the Lord. Some of the earliest MSS. and fathers read "our," with the same sense. BENGEI understands "your rejoicing," to be the enjoyable state of the Corinthians, as contrasted with his dying daily to give his converts rejoicing or glorying (ch. 4. 8; 2 Corinthians 4. 12, 13; Ephesians 3. 13; Philippians 1. 26). But the words, "which . . . have," favour the explanation—'the rejoicing which I have over you.' Many of the oldest MSS. and Vulgate insert

"brethren" here. I die daily—This ought to stand first in the sentence, as it is so put prominently forward in the Greek. I am day by day in sight of death, exposed to it, and expecting it (2 Corinthians 4. 11, 12; 1. 8, 9; 11. 23). 32. Punctuate thus: "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me? If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink," &c. [BENJEL.] If "merely as a man" (with the mere human hope of the present life; not with the Christian's hope of the resurrection; answering to "If the dead rise not," the parallel clause in the next sentence), I have fought with men resembling savage beasts. Heraclitus, of Ephesus, had termed his countrymen "w. d beasts" 400 years before. So Epimenides called the Cretians (Titus 1. 12). St Paul was still at Ephesus (ch. 16. 8), and there his life was daily in danger (ch. 4. 9; cf. 2 Corinthians 1. 8). Though the tumult (Acts 19. 29, 30) had not yet taken place (for after it he set out immediately for Macedonia), this Epistle was written evidently just before it, when the storm was gathering, "many adversaries" (ch. 16. 9) were already menacing him. what advantageth it me?—seeing I have renounced all that, "as a mere man," might compensate me for such sufferings, gain, fame, &c. let us eat, &c.—Quoted from LXX. (Isaiah 22. 13), where the prophet describes the reckless self-indulgence of the despisers of God's call to mourning, Let us enjoy the good things of life now, for it soon will end. St. Paul imitates the language of such skeptics, to reprove both their theory and practice. "If men but persuade themselves that they shall die like the beasts, they soon will live like beasts too." [SOUTH.] 33. evil communications corrupt good manners—a current saying, forming a verse in Menander, the comic poet, who probably took it from Euripides (SOCRATES, Historia Ecclesiastica, 3. 16). "Evil communications" refer to intercourse with those who deny the resurrection. Their notion seems to have been, that the resurrection is merely spiritual, that sin has its seat solely in the body, and will be left behind when the soul leaves it, if, indeed, the soul survive death at all. good—not only good-natured, but pliant. Intimacy with the profligate society around was apt to corrupt the principles of the Corinthians. 34. Awake—lit., "out of the sleep" of carnal intoxication into which ye are thrown by the influence of these skeptics (v. 32; Joel 1. 5). to righteousness—in contrast with "sin" in this verse, and corrupt manners, v. 33. sin not—do not give yourselves up to sinful pleasures. The Greek expresses a continued state of abstinence from sin. Thus, St. Paul implies that they who live in sinful pleasures readily persuade themselves of what they wish, viz., that there is to be no resurrection. some—the same as in v. 12. have not the knowledge of God—and so know not His power in the resurrection (Matthew 22. 29). Stronger than "are ignorant of God." An habitual ignorance: wilful, in that they prefer to keep their sins, rather than part with them, in order to know God (cf. John 7. 17; 1 Peter 2. 15). to your shame—that you Corinthian Christians, who boast of your knowledge, should have among you, and maintain intercourse with, those so practically ignorant of God, as to deny the resurrection. 35. How—It is folly to deny a fact of REVELATION, because we do not know the "how." Some measure God's power by their petty intelligence, and won't admit, even on His assurance, anything which they cannot explain. Ezekiel's answer of faith to the question is the truly wise one (Ezekiel 37. 3). So Jesus argues not on principles of philosophy, but wholly from "the power of God," as declared by the Word of God (Matthew 19. 26; Mark 10. 27; 12. 23; Luke 18. 27). come—The dead are said to depart, or to be deceased: those rising again to come. The objector could not understand how the dead are to rise, and with what kind of a body they are to come. Is it to be the same body? If so, how is this, since the resurrection bodies will not eat or drink, or beget children, as the natural bodies do? Besides, the latter have mouldered into dust. How then can they rise again? If it be a different body, how can the personal identity be preserved? St. Paul answers, In one ~~name~~ it will be the same body, in another, a distinct body. It will be a body, but a spiritual, not a natural body. 36. fool—with all thy boasted philosophy (Psalm 14. 1). that which thou—"Thou," emphatical: appeal to the objector's own experience: "The seed which thou thyself sowest." St. Paul, in this verse and v. 42, answers the question v. 35, "How;" and in v. 37-41 and 43, the question, "With what kind of body?" He converts the very objection (the death of the natural body) into an argument. Death, so far from preventing *quicken*ing, is the necessary prelude and prognostication of it, just as the seed "is not quickened" into a new sprout with increased produce, "except it die" (except a dissolution of its previous organization takes place). Christ by His death for us has not given us a reprieve from death as to the life which we have from Adam; nay, He permits the law to take its course on our fleshly nature; but He brings from Himself new spiritual and heavenly life out of death (v. 37). 37. not that body that shall be—A body beautiful and no longer a "bare grain." [BENJEL.] No longer without stalk or ear, but clothed with blade and ears, and yielding many grains instead of only one. [GROTIUS.] There is not an identity of all the particles of the old and the new body. For the perpetual transmutation of matter is inconsistent with this. But there is a hidden germ which constitutes the identity of body amidst all outward changes: the outward accretions fall off in its development, whilst the germ remains the same. Every such germ ("seed," v. 38) "shall have its own body," and be instantly recognized, just as each plant now is known from the seed that was sown (see Note, ch. 6. 13). So Christ by the same image illustrated the truth that His death was the necessary prelude of His putting on His glorified body, which is the ground of the regeneration of the many who believe (John 12. 24). Progress is the law of the spiritual, as of the natural world. Death is the avenue not to mere revivification or reanimation, but to resurrection and regeneration (Matthew 19. 23; Philippians 3. 21). Cf. "planted," &c., Romans 6. 5. 38. as it hath pleased him—at creation, when He gave to each of the (kinds of) seeds (so the Greek is for "to every seed") a body of its own (Genesis 1. 11, "after its kind," suited to its species). So God can and will give to the blessed at the resurrection their own appropriate body, such as it pleases Him, and such as is suitable to their glorified state: a body peculiar to the individual, substantially the same as the body sown. 39-41. Illustrations of the suitability of bodies, however various, to their species: the flesh of the several species of animals; bodies celestial and terrestrial; the various kinds of light in the sun, moon, and stars, respectively. flesh—animal organism. [DE WETTE.] He implies by the word that our resurrection bodies shall be in some sense really flesh, not mere phantoms of air [ESTIUS.] So some of the oldest creeds expressed it, "I believe in the resurrection of the flesh." Cf. as to Jesus' own resurrection body, Luke 24. 39; John 20. 27; to which ours shall be made like, and therefore shall be flesh, but not of animal organism (Philippians 3. 21) and liable to corruption. But v. 50 below implies, it is not "flesh and blood" in the animal sense we now understand them; for these "shall not inherit the kingdom of God." not the same—not flesh of the same nature and excellency. As the kinds of flesh, however widely differing from one another, do not cease to be flesh, so the kinds of bodies, however differing from one another, are still bodies. All this is to illustrate the difference of the new celestial body from its terrestrial seed, whilst retaining a substantial identity. beasts—quadrupeds. another of fishes . . . another of birds—Most of the oldest MSS. read thus, "another FLESH of birds . . . another of fishes:" the order of nature. 40. celestial bodies—Not the sun, moon, and stars, which are first introduced v. 41, but the bodies of angels, as distinguished from the bodies of earthly creatures. the glory of the celestial—(Luke 9. 26). glory of . . . terrestrial—(Matthew 6. 28, 29; 1 Peter 1. 24). 41. one glory of . . . sun . . . another . . . of . . . moon—The analogy is not to prove different degrees of glory among the blessed (whether this may be, or not, indirectly hinted at), but this: As the various fountains of ~~water~~

which is so similar in its aspect and properties, differ (the sun from the moon, and the moon from the stars and even one star from another star, though all seem so much alike); so there is nothing unreasonable in the doctrine that our present bodies differ from our resurrection bodies, though still continuing bodies. Cf. the same simile, appropriate especially in the clear Eastern skies (Daniel 12. 4; Matthew 13. 43). Also that of seed in the same parable (Matthew 13. 24; Galatians 6. 7, 8). 42. sown—Following up the image of seed. A delightful word instead of burial. In corruption—liable to corruption; corruptible: not merely a prey when dead to corruption; as the contrast shows, "raised in incorruption," i. e., not liable to corruption, incorruptible. 43. in dishonour—answering to "our vile body" (Philippians 3. 21); lit., "our body of humiliation:" liable to various humiliations of disease, injury, and decay at last. in glory—the garment of incorruption (v. 42, 43) like His glorious body (Philippians 4. 21), which we shall put on (v. 49, 53; 2 Corinthians 5. 2-4). in weakness—liable to infirmities (2 Corinthians 13. 4). in power—answering to a "spiritual body" (v. 44; cf. Luke 1. 17, "Spirit and power"). Not liable to the weaknesses of our present frail bodies (Isaiah 33. 24; Revelation 11. 4). 44. a natural body—lit., "an animal body," a body moulded in its organism of "flesh and blood" (v. 50) to suit the animal soul which predominates in it. The Holy Spirit in the spirit of believers, indeed, is an earnest of a superior state (Romans 8. 11), but meanwhile in the body the animal soul preponderates; hereafter the Spirit shall predominate, and the animal soul be duly subordinate. spiritual body—a body wholly moulded by the Spirit, and its organism not conformed to the lower and animal (Luke 20. 35, 36), but to the higher and spiritual, life (cf. ch. 2. 14; 1 Thessalonians 5. 23). there is, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "If there is a natural (or animal-souled) body, there is also a spiritual body." It is no more wonderful a thing, that there should be a body fitted to the capacities and want of man's highest part, his spirit, than (which we see to be the case) that there should be one fitted to the capacities and wants of his subordinate part, the animal soul. [ALFORD.] 45. so—in accordance with the distinction just mentioned between the natural or animal-souled body and the spiritual body. it is written—(Genesis 2. 7)—"Man became (was made to become) a living soul," i. e., endowed with an animal soul, the living principle of his body. the last Adam—the LAST Head of humanity, who is to be fully manifested in the last day, which is His day (John 6. 39). He is so called in Job 19. 25; see my Note there (cf. Romans 5. 14). In contrast to "the last," St. Paul calls "man" (Genesis 2. 7) "the FIRST Adam." quickening—not only living, but making alive (John 5. 21; 6. 33, 39, 40, 54, 57, 62, 63; Romans 8. 11). As the natural or animal-souled body (v. 44) is the fruit of our union with the first Adam, an animal-souled man, so the spiritual body is the fruit of our union with the second Adam, who is the quickening Spirit (2 Corinthians 3. 17). As He became representative of the whole of humanity in His union of the two natures, He exhausted in His own person the sentence of death passed on all men, and giveth spiritual and everlasting life to whom He will. 46. afterward—Adam had a soul not necessarily mortal, as it afterwards became by sin, but "a living soul," and destined to live for ever, if he had eaten of the tree of life (Genesis 3. 32); still his body was but an animal-souled body, not a spiritual body, such as believers shall have; much less was he a "life-giving spirit," as Christ. His soul had the germ of the Spirit, rather than the fulness of it, such as man shall have when restored "body, soul, and spirit," by the second Adam (1 Thessalonians 5. 2). As the first and lower Adam came before the second and heavenly Adam, so the animal-souled body comes first, and must die before it be changed into the spiritual body (i. e., that in which the Spirit predominates over the animal soul). 47. of the earth—inasmuch as being sprung from the earth, he is "earthly" (Genesis 2. 7; 3. 19, "dust thou art"); i. e., not merely earthly or born upon the earth, but terrene, or of earth. lit., "of heaped earth" or clay. adam means red earth. the Lord—Omitted in the oldest

MSS. and versions. from heaven—(John 8. 12, 31.) Humanity in Christ is generic. In Him man is impersonated in his true ideal as God originally designed him. Christ is the representative man, the federal head of redeemed man. 48. As is the earthy—viz., Adam. they . . . that are earthy—All Adam's posterity in their natural state (John 3. 6, 7). the heavenly—Christ. they . . . that are heavenly—His people in their regenerate state (Philippians 3. 20, 21). As the former precedes the latter state, so the natural bodies precede the spiritual bodies. 49. as—Greek, "even as" (see Genesis 5. 3). we shall also bear—or wear as a garment. [BENGEL.] The oldest MSS. and versions read, "We must also bear," or "let us also bear." It implies the Divine appointment (cf. "must," v. 53) and faith assenting to it. An exhortation, and yet implying a promise (so Romans 8. 29). The conformity to the image of the heavenly Representative man is to be begun here in our souls, in part, and shall be perfected at the resurrection in both bodies and souls. 50. (See Notes, v. 37, 39.) "Flesh and blood" of the same animal and corruptible nature as our present (v. 44) animal-souled bodies, cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Therefore the believer acquiesces gladly in the unrepealed sentence of the holy law, which appoints the death of the present body as the necessary preliminary to the resurrection body of glory. Hence he "dies daily" to the flesh and to the world, as the necessary condition to his regeneration here and hereafter (John 8. 6; Galatians 2. 20). As the being born of the flesh constitutes a child of Adam, so the being born of the Spirit constitutes a child of God. cannot—Not merely is the change of body possible, but it is necessary. The spirit extracted from the dregs of wine does not so much differ from them, as the glorified man does from the mortal man [BENGEL] of mere animal flesh and blood (Galatians 1. 16). The resurrection body will be still a body though spiritual, and substantially retaining the personal identity; as is proved by Luke 24. 39; John 20. 27, compared with Philippians 3. 21. the kingdom of God—which is not at all merely animal, but altogether spiritual. Corruption doth not inherit, though it is the way to, incorruption (v. 38, 52, 53). 51. Behold—Calling attention to the "mystery" heretofore hidden in God's purposes, but now revealed. you—emphatical in the Greek; I show (Greek, "tell," viz., by the word of the Lord, 1 Thessalonians 4. 15) you, who think you have so much knowledge, "a mystery" (cf. Romans 11. 25) which your reason could never have discovered. Many of the old MSS. and fathers read, "We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed;" but this is plainly a corrupt reading, inconsistent with 1 Thessalonians 4. 15, 17, and with the apostle's argument here, which is that a change is necessary (v. 53). English Version is supported by some of the oldest MSS. and fathers. The Greek is lit., "We all shall not sleep, but," &c. The putting off of the corruptible body for an incorruptible by an instantaneous change will, in the case of "the quick," stand as equivalent to death, appointed to all men (Hebrews 9. 27); of this Enoch and Elijah are types and forerunners. The "we" implies that Christians in that age and every successive age since and hereafter were designed to stand waiting, as if Christ might come again in their time, and as if they might be found among "the quick." 52. the last trump—at the sounding of the trumpet on the last day [VATABLUS] (Matthew 24. 31; 1 Thessalonians 4. 16). Or the Spirit by St. Paul hints that the other trumpets mentioned subsequently in the Apocalypse shall precede, and that this shall be the last of all (cf. Isaiah 27. 13; Zechariah 9. 14). As the law was given with the sound of a trumpet, so the final judgment according to it (Hebrews 12. 19; cf. Exodus 19. 16). As the Lord ascended "with the sound of a trumpet" (Psalm 47. 5), so He shall descend (Revelation 11. 15). The trumpet was sounded to convoke the people on solemn feasts, especially on the first day of the seventh month (the type of the completion of time; seven being the number for perfection; on the tenth of the same month was the atonement, and on the fifteenth the feast of tabernacles, commemorative of completed salvation out of the spiritual Egypt, cf. Zechariah 14. 18, 19); cf. Psalm 50. 1-7. of His calling forth of Lazarus from the grave "with a loud voice," John 11. 43, with 5. 25, 28. and—immediately, in consequence. 53. this—pointing to his own body and that of those whom he addresses. put on—as a garment (2 Corinthians 5. 2, 3). immortality—Here only, besides 1 Timothy 6. 16, the word "immortality" is found. Nowhere is the immortality of the soul, distinct from the body, taught; a notion which many erroneously have derived from heathen philosophers. Scripture does not contemplate the anomalous state brought about by death, as the consummation to be earnestly looked for (2 Corinthians 5. 4), but the resurrection. 54. then—not before. Death has as yet a sting even to the believer, in that his body is to be under its power till the resurrection. But then the sting and power of death shall cease for ever. Death is swallowed up in victory—In Hebrew of Isaiah 25. 8, from which it is quoted, "He (Jehovah) will swallow up death in victory; i. e., for ever: as "in victory" often means in Hebrew idiom (Jeremiah 3. 5; Lamentations 5. 20). Christ will swallow it up so altogether victoriously that it shall never more regain its power (cf. Hosea 6. 2; 13. 14; 2 Corinthians 5. 4; Hebrews 2. 14, 15; Revelation 20. 14; 21. 4)." 55. Quoted from Hosea 13. 14, substantially; but freely used by the warrant of the Spirit by which St. Paul wrote. The Hebrew may be translated, "O death, where are thy plagues? Where, O Hades, is thy destruction?" The LXX., "Where is thy victory (lit., in a lawsuit), O death? Where is thy sting, O Hades?" "Sting" answers to the Hebrew "plagues," viz., a poisoned sting causing plagues. Appropriate, as to the old serpent (Genesis 3.; Numbers 21. 6). "Victory" answers to the Hebrew "destruction." Cf. Isaiah 25. 7, "destroy . . . veil . . . over all nations, viz., victoriously destroy it; and to "in victory" (v. 54), which he triumphantly repeats. The "where" implies their past victorious destroying power and sting, now gone for ever; obtained through Satan's triumph over man in Eden, which enlisted God's law on the side of Satan and death against man (Romans 5. 12, 17, 21). The souls in Hades being freed by the resurrection, death's sting and victory are gone. For "O grave," the oldest MSS. and versions read, "O death," the second time." 56. If there were no sin, there would be no death. Man's transgression of the law gives death its lawful power. strength of sin is the law—Without the law sin is not perceived or imputed (Romans 3. 20; 4. 15; 5. 13). The law makes sin the more grievous by making God's will the clearer (Romans 7. 8-10). Christ's people are no longer "under the law" (Romans 6. 14). 57. to God—The victory was in no way due to ourselves (Psalm 98. 1). giveth—a present certainty. the victory—which death and Hades ("the grave") had aimed at, but which, notwithstanding the opposition of them, as well as of the law and sin, we have gained. The repetition of the word (v. 54, 55) is appropriate to the triumph gained. 58. beloved—Sound doctrine kindles Christian love. steadfast—not turning aside from the faith of the resurrection of yourselves. unmovable—not turned aside by others (v. 12; Colossians 1. 23). the work of the Lord—the promotion of Christ's kingdom (Philippians 2. 30). not in vain—as the deniers of the resurrection would make it (v. 14, 17). in the Lord—applying to the whole sentence and its several clauses: Ye, as being in the Lord by faith, know that your labour in the Lord (i. e., labour according to His will) is not to be without its reward in the Lord (through His merits and according to His gracious appointment).

CHAPTER XVI.

Ver. 1-24. DIRECTIONS AS TO THE COLLECTION FOR THE JUDEAN CHRISTIANS: ST. PAUL'S FUTURE PLANS: HE COMMENDS TO THEM TIMOTHY, APOLLOS, &c. SALUTATIONS AND CONCLUSIONS. 1. collection for the saints—at Jerusalem (Romans 15. 26) and in Judea (Acts 11. 29, 30; 13. 17; cf. 2 Corinthians 8. 4; 9. 1, 12). He says "saints" rather than "the poor," to remind the Corinthians that in giving it is to the Lord's people, their own brethren in the earth. Towards the close of the national existence of the

Jews, Judea and Jerusalem were harassed with various troubles, which in part affected the Jewish Christians. The community of goods which existed among them for a time gave temporary relief, but tended ultimately to impoverish all by paralyzing individual exertion (Acts 2. 44), and hence was soon discontinued. A beautiful fruit of grace it was, that he who had by persecutions robbed many of their all (Acts 26. 10), should become the foremost in exertions for their relief, as I have given—rather, "gave order," viz., during my journey through Galatia, that mentioned Acts 18. 23. The churches of Galatia and Phrygia were the last which Paul visited before writing this Epistle. He was now at Ephesus, and came thither immediately from visiting them (Acts 18. 23; 19. 1). That he had not been silent in Galatia on contributions for the poor, appears from the hint let fall in his Epistle to that Church (Galatians 2. 10): an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness. [PALEY'S Hore Paulinae.] He proposes the Galatians as an example to the Corinthians, the Corinthians to the Macedonians, the Corinthians and Macedonians to the Romans (Romans 15. 26, 27; 2 Corinthians 9. 2). There is great force in example. 2. first day of . . . week—already kept sacred by Christians as the day of the Lord's resurrection, the beginning day both of the physical and of the new spiritual creations: it gradually superseded the Jewish sabbath on the seventh day (Psalm 118. 22-24; John 20. 19, 26; Acts 20. 7; Revelation 1. 10). So the beginning of the year was changed from autumn to spring when Israel was brought out of Egypt. Three annual feasts, all typical of Christian truths, were directed to be kept on the first day of the week: the feast of the wave offering of the first sheaf, answering to the Lord's resurrection; Pentecost, or the feast of weeks, typical of the fruits of the resurrection in the Christian Church (Leviticus 23. 11, 15, 16, 36); the feast of tabernacles at harvest, typical of the ingathering of the full number of the elect from one end of heaven to the other. Easter was directed to be kept as a holy sabbath (Exodus 12. 16). The Christian Sabbath commemorates the respective works of the Three Persons of the Triune God—creation, redemption (the resurrection), and sanctification (on Pentecost the Holy Ghost being poured out). Jesus came to fulfil the Spirit of the Law, not to cancel it, or to lower its standard. The primary object of the sabbath is holiness, not merely rest: "Remember that thou keep holy the sabbath day." Cf. Genesis 2. 3, "God blessed and sanctified it, because . . . in it He had rested," &c. The word "Remember" implies that it was in existence before the giving of the law from Sinai, and refers to its institution in Paradise (cf. Exodus 16. 22, 23, 26, 30). "Six days shalt thou labour:" the spirit of the command is fulfilled whether the six days' labour be on the last six days or on the first. A perpetual sabbath would doubtless be the highest Christian ideal; but living in a world of business where the Christian ideal is not yet realized, if a law of definite times was necessary in Paradise, it is still more so now. every one of you—even those in limited circumstances. lay by him—though there be not a weekly public collection, each is privately to set apart a definite proportion of his weekly income for the Lord's cause and charity. in store—abundantly: the earnest of a better store laid up for the giver (1 Timothy 6. 19). as God hath prospered him—lit., "whatsoever he may be prospered in," or "may by prosperity have acquired" [ALFORD] (Matthew 25. 15-29; 2 Corinthians 8. 12). that there be no gatherings when I come—that they may not then have to be made, when your and my time ought to be employed in more directly spiritual things. When men give once for all, not so much is given. But when each lays by something every Lord's day, more is collected than one would have given at once. [BENGEL.] 3. approve by your letters—rather translate, "Whomsoever ye shall approve, them will I send with letters:" viz., letters to several persons at Jerusalem, which would be their credentials. There could be no need of letters from them before Paul's coming, if the persons recommended were not to be sent off before it. Lit., "by letters:" an abbreviated expression for: "I will send, recommending them by letters." [GROTIUS

the English Version be retained, the sense will be, "When I come, I will send those whom by your letters, then to be given them, ye shall approve." But the antithesis (opposition or contrast) to Paul himself (v. 4) favours GROTIIUS' view. So "by" means with (Romans 2. 27); and the Greek for "by" is translated, with (2 Corinthians 2. 4). liberality—est., gracious or free gift (2 Corinthians 8. 4). 4. meet—worth while. If your collections be large enough to be worth an apostle's journey (a stimulus to their liberality), I will accompany them myself instead of giving them letters credential (v. 3; cf. Acts 20. 1-4). with me—to guard against all possible suspicion of evil (2 Corinthians 8. 4, 13-21). 5-7. His first intention had been (2 Corinthians 1. 15, 16) to pass through them (Corinth) to Macedonia, and again return to them from Macedonia, and so to Judea; this he had announced in the lost epistle (ch. 5. 9); now having laid aside this intention (for which he was charged with levity, 2 Corinthians 1. 17, &c., whereas it was through lenity, 2 Corinthians 1. 23; 2. 1), he announces his second plan of "not seeing them now by the way," but "passing through Macedonia" first on his way to them, and then "tarrying a while," and even "abiding and wintering with them." for I do pass—As much as to say, "This is what I at last resolve upon" (not as the erroneous subscription of the Epistle represents it, as if he was THEN at Philippi, on his way through Macedonia); implying that there had been some previous communication upon the subject of the journey, and also that there had been some indecisiveness in the apostle's plan. [PALEY.] In accordance with his second plan, we find him in Macedonia when 2 Corinthians was written (2 Corinthians 2. 13; 8. 1; 1. 2, 4), and on his way to Corinth (2 Corinthians 12. 14; 13. 1; cf. Acts 20. 1, 2). "Pass through" is opposed to "abide" (v. 6). He was not yet in Macedonia (as v. 8 shows), but at Ephesus; but he was thinking of passing through it (not abiding as he proposed to do at Corinth). 6. He did "abide and even winter" for the three WINTER months in Greece (Corinth), Acts 20. 3, 6; from which passage it seems that Paul probably left Corinth about a month before the "days of unleavened bread" or the Passover (so as to allow time to touch at Thessalonica and Berea, from which cities two of his companions were; as we read he did at Philippi); so that thus the three months at Corinth would be December, January, and February. [BIRKS, Horæ Apostolicæ.] ye—emphatical in the Greek. whithersoever I go—He purposed to go to Judea (2 Corinthians 1. 16) from Corinth, but his plans were not positively fixed as yet (Note, v. 4; cf. Acts 19. 21). 7. I will not see you now by the way—lit., "I do not wish to see you this time in passing;" i. e., to pay you now what would have to be a merely passing visit as I did in the second visit (2 Corinthians 12. 14). In contrast to "a while," i. e., some time, as the Greek might better be translated. but—The oldest MSS. read "for." 8. at Ephesus—whence St. Paul writes this Epistle. Cf. v. 19, "Asia," wherein Ephesus was. until Pentecost—He seems to have stayed as he here purposes: for just when the tumult which drove him away broke out, he was already intending to leave Ephesus (Acts 19. 21, 22). Combined with ch. 5. 7, 8, this verse fixes the date of this Epistle to a few weeks before Pentecost, and very soon after the Passover. 9. door—(2 Corinthians 2. 12.) An opening for the extension of the Gospel. Wise men are on the watch for, and avail themselves of, opportunities. So "door of hope," Hosea 2. 15. "Door of faith," Acts 14. 27. "An open door," Revelation 3. 8. "A door of utterance," Colossians 4. 3. "Great," i. e., extensive. "Effectual," i. e., requiring great labours [ESTIUS]; or opportune for effecting great results. [BEZA.] many adversaries—who would block up the way and prevent us from entering the open door. Not here false teachers, but open adversaries: both Jews and heathen. After St. Paul, by his now long-continued labours at Ephesus, had produced effects which threatened the interests of those whose gains were derived from idolatry, "many adversaries" arose (Acts 19. 1-23). Where great good is, there evil is sure to start up as its antagonist. 10. Now—rather, But. Therefore Timothy was not the bearer of the Epistle; for it would not then be said "If Timothy come." He must therefore have been sent by Paul from Ephesus before this Epistle was written, to accord with ch. 4. 17-19; and yet the passage here implies, that St. Paul did not expect him to arrive at Corinth till after the letter was received. He tells them how to treat him "if" he should arrive. Acts 19. 21, 22 clears up the difficulty: Timothy, when sent from Ephesus, where this Epistle was written, did not proceed direct to Corinth, but went first to Macedonia; thus though sent before the letter, he might not reach Corinth till after it was received in that city. The undesigned coincidence between the Epistle and the history, and the clearing up of the meaning of the former (which does not mention the journey to Macedonia at all) by the latter, is a sure mark of genuineness. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] It is not certain that Timothy actually reached Corinth; for in Acts 19. 22 only Macedonia is mentioned; but it does not follow that though Macedonia was the immediate object of his mission, Corinth was not the ultimate object. The "If Timothy come," implies uncertainty. 1 Corinthians 1. 1 represents him with Paul in Macedonia; and 2 Corinthians 12. 18, speaking of Titus and others sent to Corinth, does not mention Timothy, which it would have probably done, had one so closely connected with the apostle as Timothy was, stayed as his delegate at Corinth. The mission of Titus then took place, when it became uncertain whether Timothy could go forward from Macedonia to Corinth, Paul being anxious for immediate tidings of the state of the Corinthian Church. ALFORD argues that if so, St. Paul's adversaries would have charged him with fickleness in this case also (2 Corinthians 1. 17), as in the case of his own change of purpose. But Titus was sent directly to Corinth, so as to arrive there before Timothy could by the route through Macedonia. Titus' presence would thus make amends for the disappointment as to the intended visit of Timothy, and would disarm adversaries of a charge in this respect (2 Corinthians 7. 6, 7). without fear—Referring perhaps to a nervous timidity in Timothy's character (1 Timothy 3. 15; 5. 22, 24). His youth would add to this feeling, as well as his country, Lystra, likely to be despised in refined Corinth. 11. despise—This charge is not given concerning any other of the many messengers whom Paul sent. 1 Timothy 4. 12 accounts for it (cf. Psalm 119. 141). He was a young man, younger probably than those usually employed in the Christian missions; whence St. Paul apprehending lest he should, on that account, be exposed to contempt, cautions him, "Let no man despise thy youth." [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] conduct—set him on his way with every mark of respect, and with whatever he needs (Titus 3. 13). in peace—(Acts 15. 33; Hebrews 11. 31.) "Peace" is the salutation of kindness and respect in the East; and so it stands for every blessing. Perhaps here there is too a contrast between "peace" and the "contentions" prevalent at Corinth (ch. 1. 11). I look for him—He and Titus were appointed to meet St. Paul in Troas, whither the apostle purposed proceeding from Ephesus (2 Corinthians 2. 12, 13). St. Paul thus claims their respect for Timothy as one whom he felt so necessary to himself as "look for" to him. [THEOPHYL.] with the brethren—Others besides Erastus accompanied Timothy to Macedonia (cf. v. 12; Acts 19. 22). 12. Apollos, I greatly desired . . . to come unto you—He says this, lest they should suspect that he from jealousy prevented Apollos' coming to them; perhaps they had expressly requested Apollos to be sent to them. Apollos was not at Ephesus when St. Paul wrote (cf. v. 19, and ch. 1. 1). Probably Apollos' unwillingness to go to Corinth at this time was because being aware of the undue admiration of his rhetorical style which led astray many at Corinth, he did not wish to sanction it (ch. 1. 12; 3. 4). St. Paul's noble freedom from all selfish jealousy led him to urge Apollos to go; and on the other hand, Apollos, having heard of the abuse of his name at Corinth to party purposes, perseveringly refused to go. St. Paul, of course, could not state in his letter particularly these reasons in the existing state of division prevalent there. He calls Apollos "brother" to mark the unity that was between the two. with the brethren—who bear this letter (v. 17). (See subscription added to the Epistle.) CONYBEARE thinks Titus was one of the bearers of this first letter (2 Corinthians 8. 3, 16-24; 12. 18). ALFORD thinks "the brethren" here may be the same as in v. 11. convenient time—Apollos did return to Corinth when their divisions were moderated (JEROME), and so it was a more reasonable time. 13. He shows that they ought to make their hopes of salvation to depend not on Apollos or any other teacher; that it rests with themselves. "Watch ye:" for ye are slumbering. "Stand:" for ye are like men tottering. "Quit you like men; be strong:" for ye are effeminate (v. 14). "Let all your things be done with charity" (ch. 8. 1; 13. 1): not with strifes as at present. [CHRYSOSTOM.] "In the faith" which was assailed by some (ch. 15. 1, 2, 12-17). 15. first-fruits of Achaia—the first Achæan converts (cf. Romans 16. 5). The image is from the first-fruits offered to the Lord (Leviticus 23. 10; cf. ch. 15. 20). The members of this family had been baptized by Paul himself (ch. 1. 16). addicted the uselves to the ministry of the saints—translate, "Set themselves (i. e., voluntarily) to minister unto the saints" (cf. 2 Corinthians 8. 4). 16. That ye—translate, "That ye also," &c., in your turn . . . in return for their self-devotion. [ALFORD.] helpeth with—them. laboureth—by himself. 17. Fortunatus . . . Achalcus—probably of Stephanas' household. that . . . lacking on your part—So far as you were unable yourselves to "refresh my spirit," in that you are absent from me, "they have supplied" by coming to me from you, and so supplying the means of intercourse between you and me. They seem to have carried this letter back; see the subscription below: hence the exhortations v. 18, as though they would be at Corinth when the Epistle arrived. 18. refreshed my spirit and yours—"yours" will be refreshed on receiving this letter, by knowing that "my spirit is refreshed" by their having come to me from you; and (perhaps) by the good report they gave of many of you (ch. 1. 4-8); my refreshment of spirit redounds to yours, as being my disciples (2 Corinthians 7. 13; cf. Zechariah 6. 8). acknowledge—render them due acknowledgments by a kind reception of them: 1 Thessalonians 5. 12, "know" them in their true worth, and treat them accordingly. 19. Asia—not all Asia Minor, but Lydian Asia only, of which Ephesus was the capital. much—with especial affection. Âquila . . . Priscilla—(cf. Acts 18. 2; Romans 16. 3, 4.) Originally driven out of Italy by Claudius, they had come to Corinth (whence their salutation of the Corinthians is appropriate here), and then had removed with Paul from Corinth to Ephesus (Acts 18. 2, 18, 19, 26); here, as at Rome subsequently, they set up a Church (or assembly of believers) at their house (Romans 16. 3, 5). A pattern to Christian husbands and wives. Their Christian self-devoting love appears wherever they were (Romans 16. 3, 4). Even the gifted Apollos, so highly admired at Corinth, owed much of his knowledge to them (Acts 18. 24-26). In v. 20, "All the brethren" (i. e., the whole Church) seem to be distinguished from "the Church that is in their house," which was but a partial and private assembly out of the general

Church at Corinth. NEANDER thinks Romans 16. 23 refers to "the whole Church" meeting at the house of Gaius (cf. Colossians 4. 15). "Synagogue" implies an assembly in general, without reference to the character or motives of its members. "Church," like the Hebrew Kahal, implies an assembly legally convened; as, for instance, the Jews met as a body politic to receive the law (hence Stephen calls it "the Church in the wilderness," Acts 7. 38), and having a legal bond of union. Christ's followers when dispersed from one another cease to be a congregation (synagogue), but still are a Church, having the common bond of union to the same Head by the same faith and hope. [VITRINGA. Synagogue and Temple.] From this we may explain St. Paul's entering "into every house and haling men and women:" he would in searching for Christians go to their several "houses" of prayer. in the Lord—They pray for all blessings on you from the Lord, the source of every good. [GROTIUS.] ALFORD explains, "in a Christian manner," as mindful of your common Lord. "In the Lord" seems to me to refer to their union together in Christ, their prayers for one another's good being in virtue of that union. 20. holy kiss—the token of the mutual love of Christians, especially at the Lord's Supper (cf. Romans 16. 16; 1 Thessalonians 5. 26), "in which all the dissensions of the Corinthians would be swallowed up." [BENGEL.] 21. salutation . . . with mine own hand—he therefore dictated all the rest of the Epistle. 22. A solemn closing warning added in his own hand: as in Ephesians 6. 24; Colossians 4. 18. the Lord—who ought to be "loved" above Paul, Apollos, and all other teachers. Love to one another is to be in connection with love to Him above all. IGNATIUS (Epistola ad Romanos 7) writes of Christ, "My love has been crucified" (cf. Song of Solomon 2. 7). Jesus Christ—Omitted in the oldest MSS. let him be Anathema—accursed with that curse which the Jews who call Jesus "accursed" (ch. 12. 3) are bringing righteously on their own heads. [BENGEL.] So far from "saluting" him, I bid him be accursed. Maranatha—Syriac for the Lord cometh. A motto or watchword to urge them to preparedness for the Lord's coming; as in Philippians 4. 5, "The Lord is at hand." 23. The grace, &c.—This is the salutation meant in v. 21; and from which unbelievers (v. 22; cf. 2 John 19. 11) are excluded. [BENGEL.] 24. My love, &c.—After having administered some severe rebukes, he closes with expressions of "love:" his very rebukes were prompted by love, and therefore are altogether in harmony with the profession of love here made: it was love in Christ Jesus, and therefore embraced "all" who loved Him.

The subscription represents the Epistle as written from Philippi. Verse 8 shows it was written at Ephesus. BENGEL conjectures that perhaps, however, it was sent from Philippi (v. 5), because the deputies of the Corinthians had accompanied Paul thither. From Ephesus there was a road to Corinth above Philippi.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE following reasons seem to have induced St. Paul to write this Second Epistle to the Corinthians: (1.) That he might explain the reasons for his having deferred to pay them his promised visit, by taking Corinth as his way to Macedonia (1 Corinthians 4. 19; ch. 1. 15, 16; cf. 1 Corinthians 16. 5); and so that he might set forth to them his apostolic walk in general (ch. 1. 12, 24; 6. 3-13; 7. 2). (2.) That he might commend their obedience in reference to the directions in his First Epistle, and at the same time direct them now to forgive the offender, as having been punished sufficiently (ch. 2. 1-11; 7. 6-16). (3.) That he might urge them to collect for the poor saints at Jerusalem (ch. 8. 1-9, 15). (4.) That he might maintain his apostolic authority and reprove gainsayers.

The external testimonies for its genuineness are IRENEUS, Hereses 3. 7. 1; ATHENAGORAS, De resurrectione mortuorum; CLEMENT of Alexandria, Stromata 3. sec. 94; 4. sec. 101; TERTULLIAN, De pudicitia, ch. 13.

THE TIME OF WRITING was after Pentecost, A. D. 57, when St. Paul left Ephesus for Troas. Having stayed in the latter place for some time preaching the Gospel with effect (ch. 2. 12), he went on to Macedonia, being eager to meet Titus there, having been disappointed in his not coming to Troas, as had been agreed on between them. Having heard from him the tidings he so much desired of the good effect produced on the Corinthians by his First Epistle, and after having tested the liberality of the Macedonian churches (ch. 8. 1), he wrote this Second Epistle, and then went on to Greece, where he abode for three months; and then, after travelling by land, reached Philippi on his return at Passover or Easter, 58 A. D. (Acts 20. 1-6.) So that this Epistle must have been written about autumn, 57 A. D.

Macedonia was THE PLACE from which it was written (ch. 9. 2, where the present tense "I boast," or "am boasting," implies his presence then in Macedonia). In Asia (Lydian Asia) he had undergone some great peril of his life (ch. 1. 8, 9), whether the reference be [PALEY] to the tumult at Ephesus (Acts 19. 23-41), or, as ALFORD thinks, to a dangerous illness in which he despaired of life. Thence he passed by Troas to Philippi, the first city which would meet him in entering Macedonia. The importance of the Philippian Church would induce him to stay there some time; as also his desire to collect contributions from the Macedonian churches for the poor saints at Jerusalem. His anxiety of mind is recorded (ch. 7. 5) as occurring when he came into Macedonia, and therefore must have been at Philippi, which was the first city of Macedonia in coming from Troas; and here, too, from ch. 7. 6, compared with v. 5 must have been the scene of his receiving the comforting tidings from Titus. "Macedonia" is used for Philippi in 2 Corinthians 11. 9, as is proved by comparison with Philipplans 4. 15, 16. So it is probably used here (ch. 7. 5). ALFORD argues from ch. 8. 1, where he speaks of the "grace bestowed on the churches (plural) of Macedonia," that Paul must have visited other churches in Macedonia, besides Philippi, when he wrote, e. g., Thessalonica, Berea, &c., and that Philippi, the first on his route, is less likely to have been the scene of his writing than the last on his route, whichever it was, perhaps Thessalonica. But Philippi, as being the chief town of the province, was probably the place to which all the collections of the churches were sent. Ancient tradition, too (as appears from the subscription to this Epistle), favours the view that Philippi was the place from which this Epistle was sent by the hands of Titus, who received, besides, a charge to prosecute at Corinth the collection which he had begun at his first visit (ch. 8. 6).

THE STYLE is most varied, and passes rapidly from one phase of feeling to another; now joyous and consolatory, again severe and full of reproof; at one time gentle and affectionate, at another, sternly rebuking opponents and upholding his dignity as an apostle. This variety of style accords with the warm and earnest character of the apostle, which nowhere is manifested more beautifully than in this Epistle. His bodily frailty, and the chronic malady under which he suffered, and which is often alluded to (ch. 4. 7; 5. 1-4; 12. 7-9; cf. Note, 1. 8), must have been especially trying to one of his ardent temperaments. But besides this, was the more pressing anxiety of the "care of all the churches." At Corinth, as elsewhere, Judaizing emissaries wished to bind legal fetters of letter and form (cf. ch. 3. 8-18) on the freedom and catholicity of the Church. On the other hand, there were free-thinkers who defended their immorality of practice by infidel theories (1 Corinthians 15. 12, 32-36). These were the "fightings without," and "fears within" (ch. 7. 5, 6) which agitated the apostle's mind, until Titus brought him comforting tidings from Corinth. Even then, whilst the majority at Corinth had testified their repentance, and, as St. Paul had desired, excommunicated the incestuous person, and contributed for the poor Christians of Judea, there was still a minority who, more contemptuously than ever, resisted the apostle. These accused him of crafty and mercenary motives, as if he had personal gain in view in the collection being made; and this, notwithstanding his scrupulous care to be above the possibility of reasonable suspicion, by having others besides himself to take charge of the money. This insinuation was palpably inconsistent with their other charge, that he could be no true apostle, as he did not claim maintenance from the churches which he founded. Another accusation they brought of cowardly weakness; that he was always threatening severe measures without daring to execute them (ch. 10. 8-16; 13. 2); and that he was vacillating in his teaching and practice, circumcising Timothy, and yet withholding circumcision from Titus; a Jew among the Jews, and a Greek among the Greeks. That most of these opponents were of the Judaizing party in the Church, appears from ch. 11. 22. They seem to have been headed by an emissary from Judea ("He that cometh," ch. 11. 4), who had brought "letters of commendation" (ch. 3. 1) from members of the Church at Jerusalem, and who boasted of his purity of Hebrew descent, and his close connection with Christ Himself (ch. 11. 13, 23). His partisans contrasted his high pretensions with the timid humility of St. Paul (1 Corinthians 2. 3); and his rhetoric with the apostle's plain and unadorned style (ch. 11. 6; 10. 10, 13). It was this state of things at Corinth, reported by Titus, that caused St. Paul to send him back forthwith thither with this Second Epistle, which is addressed, not to Corinth only (1 Corinthians 1. 2), but to all the churches also in Achaia (ch. 1. 1), which had in some degree been affected by the same causes as affected the Corinthian Church. The widely different tone in different parts of the Epistle is due to the diversity which existed at Corinth between the penitent majority and the refractory minority. The former he addresses with the warmest affection; the latter with menace and warning. Two deputies, chosen by the churches to take charge of the contribution to be collected at Corinth, accompanied Titus (ch. 8. 18, 19, 22).

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-24. THE HEADING; ST. PAUL'S CONSOLATIONS IN RECENT TRIALS IN ASIA; HIS SINCERITY TOWARDS THE CORINTHIANS; EXPLANATION OF HIS NOT HAVING VISITED THEM AS HE HAD PURPOSED. 1. Timothy our brother—When writing to Timothy himself, he calls him "my son" (1 Timothy 1. 18). Writing of him, "brother," &c., and "my beloved son" (1 Corinthians 4. 17). He had been sent before to Macedonia, and had met Paul at Philippi, when the apostle passed over from Troas to Macedonia (cf. ch. 2. 12, 13; Notes, 1 Corinthians 16. 10, 11). In all Achaia—comprising Hellas and the Peloponnesus. The Gentiles themselves, and Annæus Gallio, the proconsul (Acts 18.), strongly testified their disapproval of the accusation brought by the Jews against Paul. Hence, the apostle was enabled to labour in the whole province of Achaia with such success as to establish several churches there (1 Thessalonians 1. 8; 2 Thessalonians 1. 4), where, writing from Corinth, he speaks of the "churches," viz., not only the Corinthian, but others also—Athens, Cenchrea, and, perhaps, Sicyon, Argos, &c. He addresses "the Church in Corinth," directly, and all "the saints" in the province, indirectly. In Galatians 1. 2 all the "churches" are addressed directly in the same circular Epistle. Hence, here he does not say, all the churches, but "all the saints." 3. This thanksgiving for his late deliverance forms a suitable introduction for conciliating their favourable reception of his reasons for not having fulfilled his promise of visiting them (v. 15-24). Father of merits

—i. e., the SOURCE of all mercies (cf. James 1. 17; Romans 2. 1). comfort—which flows from His “mercies” experienced. Like a true man of faith, he mentions “mercies” and “comfort,” before he proceeds to speak of afflictions (v. 4, 5, 6). The “tribulation” of believers is not inconsistent with God’s mercy, and does not beget in them suspicion of it; nay, in the end they feel that He is “the God of ALL comfort,” i. e., who imparts the only true and perfect comfort in every instance (Psalm 146. 3, 5, 8; James 5. 11). 4. us—idiomatic for me (1 Thessalonians 2. 18). that we may . . . comfort them which are in any trouble—Translate, as the Greek is the same as before, “tribulation.” The apostle lived, not to himself, but to the Church; so, whatever graces God conferred on him, he considered granted not for himself alone, but that he might have the greater ability to help others. [CALVIN.] No participation in all the afflictions of man peculiarly qualified Jesus to be man’s comforter in all his various afflictions (Isaiah 50. 4-6; Hebrews 4. 15). 5. sufferings—standing in contrast with “salvation” (v. 6); as “tribulation” (distress of mind), with comfort or “consolation.” of Christ—Cf. Colossians 1. 24. The sufferings endured, whether by Himself, or by His Church, with which He considers Himself identified (Matthew 25. 40, 45; Acts 9. 4; 1 John 4. 17-21). Christ calls His people’s sufferings His own suffering, (1.) because of the sympathy and mystical union between Him and us (Romans 8. 17; 1 Corinthians 4. 10). (2.) They are borne for His sake. (3.) They tend to His glory (Ephesians 4. 1; 1 Peter 4. 14, 16). abound in us—Greek, “abound unto us.” The order of the Greek following words is more forcible than in English Version, “Even so through Christ aboundeth also our comfort.” The sufferings (plural) are many; but the consolation (though singular) swallows up them all. Comfort preponderates in this Epistle above that in the first Epistle, as now by the effect of the latter most of the Corinthians had been much impressed. 6. we . . . afflicted . . . for your consolation—exemplifying the communion of saints. Their hearts were, so to speak, mirrors reflecting the likenesses of each other (Philippians 2. 26, 27). [BENGEI.] Alike the afflictions and the consolations of the apostle tend, as in him so in them, as having communion with him, to their consolation (v. 4 and ch. 4. 15). The Greek for “afflicted” is the same as before, and ought to be translated, “Whether we be in tribulation.” which is effectual—lit., worketh effectually. in the enduring, &c.—i. e., in enabling you to endure “the same sufferings which we also suffer.” Here follows, in the oldest MSS. (not as English Version in the beginning of v. 7), the clause, “And our hope is steadfast on your behalf.” 7. so shall ye be—rather, “So are ye.” He means, there is a community of consolation, as of suffering, between me and you. 8, 9. Referring to the imminent risk of life which he ran in Ephesus (Acts 19. 23, &c.), when the whole multitude were wrought up to fury by Demetrius, on the plea of St. Paul and his associates having assailed the religion of Diana of Ephesus. The words (v. 9), “we had the sentence of death in ourselves,” mean, that he looked upon himself as a man condemned to die. [PALEY.] ALFORD thinks the danger at Ephesus was comparatively so slight, that it cannot be supposed to be the subject of reference here, without exposing the apostle to a charge of cowardice, very unlike his fearless character; hence, he supposes St. Paul refers to some deadly sickness which he had suffered under (v. 9, 10). But there is little doubt that, had Paul been found by the mob in the excitement, he would have been torn in pieces; and probably, besides what St. Luke in Acts records, there were other dangers of an equally distressing kind, such as, “lyings in wait of the Jews” (Acts 20. 19), his ceaseless foes. They, doubtless, had incited the multitude at Ephesus (Acts 19. 9), and were the chief of the “many adversaries” and “(wild) beasts,” which he had to fight with there (1 Corinthians 15. 32; 16. 9). His weak state of health at the time combined with all this to make him regard himself as all but dead (ch. 11. 29; 12. 10). What makes my supposition probable is, that the very cause of his not having visited Corinth directly as he had intended, and for which he proceeds to apologize

(v. 15-23), was, that there might be time to see whether the evils arising there not only from Greek, but from Jewish disturbers of the Church (ch. 11. 29), would be checked by his first Epistle; there not being fully so was what entailed on him the need of writing this second Epistle. His not specifying this here expressly is just what we might expect in the outset of this letter; towards the close, when he had won their favourable hearing by a kindly and firm tone, he gives a more distinct reference to Jewish agitators (ch. 11. 22). above strength—i. e., ordinary, natural powers of endurance. despaired—as far as human help or hope from man was concerned. But in respect to help from God we were “not in despair” (ch. 4. 8). 9. But—“Yea.” in God which raiseth the dead—We had so given up all thoughts of life, that our only hope was fixed on the coming resurrection; so in 1 Corinthians 15. 32 his hope of the resurrection was what buoyed him up in contending with foes, savage as wild beasts. Here he touches only on the doctrine of the resurrection, taking it for granted that its truth is admitted by the Corinthians, and urging its bearing on their practice. 10. doth deliver—The oldest MSS. read, “will deliver,” viz., as regards immediately imminent dangers. “In whom we trust that He will also (so the Greek) yet deliver us,” refers to the continuance of God’s delivering help hereafter. 11. helping together by prayer for us—rather, “helping together on our behalf by your supplication,” the words “for us” in the Greek following “helping together,” not “prayer.” that for the gift, &c.—lit., “That on the part of many persons the gift (lit., gift of grace; the mercy) bestowed upon us by means of (i. e., through the prayers of) many may be offered thanks for (may have thanks offered for it) on our behalf.” 12. For—Reason why he may confidently look for their prayers for him. our rejoicing—Greek, “our glorying.” Not that he glories in the testimony of his conscience, as something to boast of; nay, this testimony is itself the thing in which his glorying consists. in simplicity—Most of the oldest MSS. read, “in holiness.” English Version reading is perhaps a gloss from Ephesians 6. 5. [ALFORD.] Some of the oldest MSS. and versions, however, support it. godly sincerity—lit., “sincerity of God;” i. e., sincerity as in the presence of God (1 Corinthians 5. 8). We glory in this in spite of all our adversities. Sincerity in Greek implies the non-admixture of any foreign element. He had no sinister or selfish aims (as some insinuated) in failing to visit them as he had promised: such aims belonged to his adversaries, not to him (ch. 2. 17). “Fleshly wisdom” suggests tortuous and insincere courses; but the “grace of God,” which influenced him by God’s gifts (Romans 12. 3; 15. 15), suggests holy straightforwardness and sincere faithfulness to promises (v. 17-20), even as God is faithful to His promises. The prudence which subserves selfish interests, or employs unchristian means, or relies on human means more than on the Divine Spirit, is “fleshly wisdom.” in the world—even in relation to the world at large, which is full of disingenuousness. more abundantly to you-ward—(Ch. 2. 4.) His greater love to them would lead him to manifest, especially to them, proofs of his sincerity, which his less close connection with the world did not admit of his exhibiting towards it. 13. We write none other things (in this Epistle, than what ye read (in my former Epistle [BENGEI]; present, because the Epistle continued still to be read in the Church as an apostolic rule). CONYBEARE and HOWSON think St. Paul had been suspected of writing privately to some individuals in the Church in a different strain from that of his public letters; and translates, “I write nothing else to you but what ye read openly (the Greek meaning, ‘ye read aloud,’ viz., when St. Paul’s Epistles were publicly read in the congregation, 1 Thessalonians 5. 27); yea, and what you acknowledge inwardly.” or acknowledge—Greek, “or even acknowledge.” The Greek for “read” and for “acknowledge” are words kindred in sound and root. I would translate, “None other things than what ye know by reading (by comparing my former Epistle with my present Epistle), or even know as a matter of fact” (viz., the consistency of my acts with my words) even to the end—of my life. Not excluding reference to the day of the Lord (v. 14, end; 1 Corinthians 4. 5). 14. in part—In contrast to “even to the end:” the testimony of his life was not yet completed. [THEOPHYL. and BENGEL.] Rather, “in part,” i. e., some of you, not all. [GROTIUS, ALFORD.] So in cl. 2. 5; Romans 11. 25. The majority at Corinth had shown a willing compliance with St. Paul’s directions in the first Epistle: but some were still refractory. Hence arises the difference of tone in different parts of this Epistle. See Introduction. your rejoicing—your subject of glorying or boast. “Are” (not merely shall be) implies the present recognition of one another as a subject of mutual glorying: that glorying being about to be realized in its fulness “in the day (of the coming) of the Lord Jesus.” 15. in this confidence—of my character for sincerity being “acknowledged” by you (v. 12-14). was minded—I was intending. before—“To come unto you before” visiting Macedonia (where he now was). Cf. Note, 1 Corinthians 18. 5; also 4. 18, which, combined with the words here, implies, that the insinuation of some at Corinth, that he would not come at all, rested on the fact of his having thus disappointed them. His change of intention, and ultimate resolution of going through Macedonia first, took place before his sending Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia, and therefore (1 Corinthians 4. 17) before his writing the first Epistle. Cf. Acts 19. 21, 22 (the order there is “Macedonia and Achaia,” not Achaia, Macedonia); 20. 1, 2. that ye might have a second benefit—one in going to, the other in returning from, Macedonia. The “benefit” of his visits consisted in the grace and spiritual gifts which he was the means of imparting (Romans 1. 11, 12). 16. This intention of visiting them on the way to Macedonia, as well as after having passed through it, must have reached the ears of the Corinthians in some way or other—perhaps in the lost Epistle (1 Corinthians 4. 18; 5. 9). The sense comes out more clearly in the Greek order, “By you to pass into Macedonia, and from Macedonia to come again unto you.” 17. use lightness—Was I guilty of levity? viz., by promising more than I performed. or . . . according to the flesh, that with me there should be yea, yea . . . nay, nay?—The “or” expresses a different alternative: Did I act with levity, or (on the other hand) do I purport what I purport like worldly (fleshly) men, so that my “yea” must at all costs be yea, and my “nay” nay [BENGEL, WINER, CALVIN], (Matthew 14. 7, 9)? The repetition of the “yea” and “nay” hardly agrees with ALFORD’s view, “What I purport do I purport according to the changeable purposes of the fleshly (worldly) man, that there may be with me the yea yea, and the nay nay (i. e., both affirmation and negation concerning the same thing)? The repetition will thus stand for the single yea and nay, as in Matthew 5. 37; James 5. 12. But the latter passage implies that the double “yea” here is not equivalent to the single “yea:” BENGEL’s view, therefore, seems preferable. 18. He adds this lest they might think his doctrine was changeable like his purposes (the change in which he admitted in v. 17, whilst denying that it was due to “lightness,” and at the same time implying that not to have changed, where there was good reason, would have been to imitate the fleshly-minded who at all costs obstinately hold to their purpose). true—Greek, “faithful” (1 Corinthians 1. 9). our word—the doctrine we preach. was not—The oldest MSS. read “is not.” yea and nay—i. e., inconsistent with itself. 19. Proof of the unchangeableness of the doctrine from the unchangeableness of the subject of it, viz., Jesus Christ. He is called “the Son of God” to show the impossibility of change in One who is co-equal with God himself (cf. 1 Samuel 15. 29; Malachi 8. 6). by me . . . Silvanus and Timotheus—The Son of God, though preached by different preachers, was one and the same, unchangeable. Silvanus is contracted into Silas (Acts 15. 22; cf. 1 Peter 5. 12). in him was yea—Greek, “is made yea in Him;” i. e., our preaching of the Son of God is confirmed as true in Him (i. e., through Him; through the miracles wherewith He has confirmed our preaching) [GROTIUS]; or rather, by the witness of the Spirit which He has given, v. 21, 22, and of which miracles were only one, and that a subordinate manifestation.

20. Rather, How many soever be the promises of God in Him is the “yea” (“faithfulness in His word:” contrasted with the “yea and nay,” v. 19, i. e., inconstancy as to one’s word). and in him Amen—The oldest MSS. read, “Wherefore through Him is the Amen;” i. e., In Him is faithfulness (“yea”) to His word, “wherefore through Him” is the immutable verification of it (“Amen”). As “yea” is His word, so “Amen” is His oath, which makes our assurance of the fulfilment doubly sure. Cf. “two immutable things (viz., His word and His oath) in which it was impossible for God to lie” (Hebrews 6. 18; Revelation 3. 14). The whole range of Old Testament and New Testament promises are secure in their fulfilment for us in Christ. unto the glory of God by us—Greek, “for glory unto God by us” (cf. ch. 4. 15), i. e., by our ministerial labours; by us His promises, and His unchangeable faithfulness to them, are proclaimed. CONYBEARE takes the “Amen” to be the Amen at the close of thanksgiving: but then “by us” would have to mean what it cannot mean here, “by us and you.” 21. stablisheth us . . . in Christ—i. e., in the faith of Christ—in believing in Christ. anointed us—As “Christ” is the “Anointed” (which His name means), so “He hath anointed (Greek, chrisas) us, alike ministers and believing people, with the Spirit (v. 22; 1 John 2. 20, 27). Hence we become “a sweet savour of Christ” (ch. 2. 15). 22. sealed—A seal is a token assuring the possession of property to one; “sealed” here answers to “stablisheth us” (v. 21; 1 Corinthians 9. 2). the earnest of the Spirit—i. e., the Spirit as the earnest (i. e., money given by a purchaser as a pledge for the full payment of the sum promised). The Holy Spirit is given to the believer now as a first instalment to assure him his full inheritance as a son of God shall be his hereafter (Ephesians 1. 13, 14). “Sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession” (Romans 8. 23). The Spirit is the pledge of the fulfilment of “all the promises” (v. 20). 23. Moreover I—Greek, “But I (for my part),” in contrast to God who hath assured us of His promises being hereafter fulfilled certainly (v. 20-22). call God—the all-knowing One, who avenges wilful unfaithfulness to promises. for a record upon my soul—As a witness as to the secret purposes of my soul, and a witness against it, if I lie (Malachi 3. 5). to spare you—in order not to come in a rebuking spirit, as I should have had to come to you, if I had come then. I came not as yet—Greek, no longer; i. e., I gave up my purpose of then visiting Corinth. He wished to give them time for repentance, that he might not have to use severity towards them. Hence he sent Titus before him. Cf. ch. 10. 10, 11, which shows that his detractors represented him as threatening; what he had not courage to perform (1 Corinthians 4. 18, 19). 24. Not for that—i. e., Not that. “Faith” is here emphatic. He had “dominion” or a right to control them in matters of discipline, but in matters of “faith” he was only a “fellow-helper of their joy” (viz., in believing, Romans 15. 13; Philippians 1. 25). The Greek is, “Not that we lord it over your faith.” This he adds to soften the magisterial tone of v. 23. His desire is to cause them not sorrow (ch. 2. 1, 2), but “joy.” The Greek for “helpers” implies a mutual leaning one on the other, like the mutually supporting buttresses of a sacred building. “By faith (Romans 11. 20) ye stand;” therefore it is that I bestow such pains in “helping” your faith, which is the source of all true “joy” (Romans 15. 13). I want nothing more, not to lord it over your faith.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-17. REASON WHY HE HAD NOT VISITED THEM ON HIS WAY TO MACEDONIA; THE INCESTUOUS PERSON OUGHT NOW TO BE FORGIVEN; HIS ANXIETY TO HEAR TIDINGS OF THEIR STATE FROM TITUS, AND HIS JOY WHEN AT LAST THE GOOD NEWS REACHES HIM. 1. with myself—In contrast to “you” (ch. 1. 23). The same antithesis between St. Paul and them appears in v. 2. not come again . . . in heaviness—“sorrow;” implying that he had already paid them one visit in sorrow since his coming for the first time to Corinth. At that visit he had warned them “he would not spare if he should come again" (Notes, ch. 13. 2; cf. ch. 12. 14; 13. 1). See Introduction to the first Epistle. The "in heaviness" implies mutual pain; they grieving him, and he them. Cf. v. 2, "I make you sorry," and v. 5, "If any have caused grief (sorrow)." In this verse he accounts for having postponed his visit, following up ch. 1. 23. 3. For—Proof that he shrinks from causing them sorrow ("heaviness"). If I—The "I" is emphatic. Some detractor may say that this (v. 1) is not my reason for not coming as I proposed; since I showed no scruple in causing "heaviness," or sorrow, in my Epistle (the first Epistle to the Corinthians). But I answer, if I be the one to cause you sorrow, it is not that I have any pleasure in doing so. Nay, my object was that he "who was made sorry by me" (viz., the Corinthians in general, v. 3; but with tacit reference to the incestuous person in particular) should repent, and so "make me glad," as has actually taken place; "for . . . who is he then that?" &c. 3. I wrote this same unto you—viz., that I would not come to you then (v. 1), as, if I were to come then, it would have to be "in heaviness" (causing sorrow both to him and them, owing to their impenitent state). He refers to the first Epistle (cf. 1 Corinthians 13. 7; cf. 4. 19, 21; 5. 2-7, 13). sorrow from them of whom I ought to have joy—i. e., sorrow from their impenitence, when he ought, on the contrary, to have joy from their penitent obedience. The latter happy effect was produced by his first Epistle, whereas the former would have been the result, had he then visited them as he had originally proposed. having confidence . . . that my joy is the joy of you all—trusting that you, too, would feel that there was sufficient reason for the postponement, if it interfered with our mutual joy. [ALFORD.] The communion of saints, he feels confident in them "ALL" (his charity overlooking, for the moment, the small section of his detractors at Corinth, 1 Corinthians 13. 7), will make his joy (v. 2) their joy. 4. So far from my change of purpose being due to "lightness" (ch. 1. 17), I wrote my letter to you (v. 3) "out of much affliction (Greek, 'trouble') and anguish of heart, and with many tears." not that ye should be grieved—Translate, "be made sorry," to accord with the translation, v. 2. My ultimate and main object was, "not that ye might be made sorry," but that through sorrow you might be led to repentance, and so to joy, redounding both to you and me (v. 2, 3). I made you sorry before going to you, that when I went it might not be necessary. He is easily made sorry, who is admonished by a friend himself weeping. [BENGEL.] that ye might know the love—of which it is a proof to rebuke sins openly and in season [ESTIUS] (Psalm 141. 5; Proverbs 27. 6). "Love" is the source from which sincere reproof springs; that the Corinthians might ultimately recognize this as his motive, was the apostle's aim. which I have more abundantly unto you—who have been particularly committed to me by God (Acts 18. 10; 1 Corinthians 4. 15; 9. 2). 5. grief . . . grieved—Translate as before, "sorrow . . . made sorry." The "any" is a delicate way of referring to the incestuous person. not . . . me, but in part—he has grieved me only in part (cf. ch. 1. 14; Romans 11. 25), i. e., I am not the sole party aggrieved; most of you, also, were aggrieved. that I may not overcharge—that I may not unduly lay the weight of the charge on you all, which I should do, if I made myself to be the sole party aggrieved. ALFORD punctuates, "He hath not made sorry me, but in part (that I press not too heavily; viz., on him) you all." Thus "you all" is in contrast to "me;" and "in part" is explained in the parenthetical clause. 6. Sufficient—without increasing it, which would only drive him to despair (v. 7), whereas the object of the punishment was, "that (his) spirit might be saved" in the last day. to such a man—a milder designation of the offender than if he had been named. [MEYER.] Rather, it expresses estrangement from such a one who had caused such grief to the Church, and scandal to religion (Acts 22. 22; 1 Corinthians 5. 5). this punishment—His being "delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh;" not only excommunication, but bodily disease (Notes, 1 Corinthians 5. 4, 5). inflicted of many—rather, "by the majority" (the more part of you). Not by an individual priest, as in the Church of Rome, nor by the bishops and clergy alone, but by the whole body of the Church. 7. with overmuch sorrow—Greek, "with HIS overmuch sorrow." 8. confirm your love toward him—by giving effect in act, and showing in deeds your love, viz., by restoring him to your fellowship, and praying for his recovering from the sickness penally inflicted on him. 9. For—Additional reason why they should restore the offender, viz., as a "proof" of their obedience "in all things;" now in love, as previously in punishing (v. 8), at the apostle's desire. Besides his other reasons for deferring his visit, he had the further view, though, perhaps, unperceived by them, of making an experiment of their fidelity. This accounts for his deferring to give, in his first Epistle, the reason for his change of plan (resolved on before writing it). This full discovery of his motive comes naturally from him now, in the second Epistle, after he had seen the success of his measures, but would not have been a seasonable communication before. All this accords with reality, and is as remote as possible from imposture. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] The interchange of feeling is marked (v. 4), "I wrote . . . that ye might know the love," &c.: here, "I did write, that I might know the proof of you." 10. Another encouragement to their taking on themselves the responsibility of restoring the offender. They may be assured of Paul's apostolic sanction to their doing so. for if I forgave anything, to whom I forgave it—The oldest MSS. read, "For even what I have forgiven, if I have forgiven anything." for your sakes forgave I it—He uses the past tense, as of a thing already determined on; as in 1 Corinthians 5. 3, "I have judged already;" or, as speaking generally of forgiveness granted, or to be granted. It is for your sakes I have forgiven, and do forgive, that the Church (of which you are constituent members) may suffer no hurt by the loss of a soul, and that ye may learn leniency as well as faithfulness. in the person of Christ—representing Christ, and acting by his authority; answering to 1 Corinthians 5. 4, "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ . . . my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ." 11. Lit., "That we may have no advantage gained over us by Satan," viz., by letting one of our members be lost to us through despair, we ourselves furnishing Satan with the weapon, by our repulsive harshness to one now penitent. The loss of a single sinner is a common loss; therefore, in v. 10, he said, "for your sakes." St. Paul had "delivered" the offender "to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the Spirit might be saved" (1 Corinthians 5. 5). Satan sought to destroy the spirit also: to let him do so, would be to give him an advantage, and let him overreach us. not ignorant of his devices—"Ignorant" and "devices" are words akin in sound and root in Greek: we are not without knowledge of his knowing schemes. 12. St. Paul expected to meet Titus at Troas, to receive the tidings as to the effect of his first Epistle on the Corinthian Church; but, disappointed in his expectation there, he passed on to Macedonia, where he met him at last (ch. 7. 5, 6, 7). The history (Acts) does not record his passing through Troas, in going from Ephesus to Macedonia; but it does in coming from that country (Acts 20. 6); also, that he had disciples there (Acts 20. 7), which accords with the Epistle (ch. 2. 12, "a door was opened unto me of the Lord"). An undesigned coincidence marking genuineness. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] Doubtless, St. Paul had fixed a time with Titus to meet him at Troas; and had desired him, if detained so as not to be able to be at Troas at that time, to proceed at once to Macedonia to Philippi, the next station on his own journey. Hence, though a wide door of Christian usefulness opened to him at Troas, his eagerness to hear from Titus the tidings from Corinth, led him not to stay longer there when the time fixed was past, but he hastened on to Macedonia to meet him there. [BIRKS.] to preach—lit., "for the Gospel." He had been at Troas before, but the vision of a man from Macedonia inviting him to come over, prevented his remaining there (Acts 13. 8-12). On his return to Asia, after the longer visit mentioned here, he stayed seven days (Acts 20. 6). and—i. e., though Paul would, under ordinary circumstances, have gladly stayed in Troas. door . . . opened . . . of the Lord—Greek, to the Lord, i. e., in His work, and by His gracious Providence. 13. no rest in my spirit—rather, “no rest for my spirit” (Genesis 8. 9). As here his “spirit” had no rest; so in ch. 7. 5, his “flesh.” His “spirit” under the Holy Spirit, hence, concluded that it was not necessary to avail himself of the “door” of usefulness at Troas any longer. taking. . . leave of them—the disciples at Troas. 14. Now—Greek, “But.” Though we left Troas disappointed in not meeting Titus there, and in having to leave so ~~wide~~ so wide a door, “thanks be unto God,” we were triumphantly blessed in both the good news of you from Titus, and in the victories of the Gospel everywhere in our progress. The cause of triumph cannot be restricted (as ALFORD explains) to the former; for “always,” and “in every place,” show that the latter also is intended. causeth us to triumph—The Greek is rather, as in Colossians 2. 15, “triumphs over us:” “leadeth us in triumph.” St. Paul regarded himself as a signal trophy of God’s victorious power in Christ. His Almighty Conqueror was leading him about, through all the cities of the Greek and Roman world, as an illustrious example of His power at once to subdue and to save. The foe of Christ was now the servant of Christ. As to be led in triumph by man is the most miserable, so to be led in triumph by God is the most glorious, lot that can befall any. [TRENCH.] Our only true triumphs are God’s triumphs over us. His defeats of us are our only true victories. [ALFORD.] The image is taken from the triumphal procession of a victorious general. The additional idea is perhaps included, which distinguishes God’s triumph from that of a human general, that the captive is brought into willing obedience (ch. 10. 5) to Christ, and so joins in the triumph: God “leads him in triumph” as one not merely triumphed over, but also as one triumphing over God’s foes with God (which last will apply to the apostle’s triumphant missionary progress under the leading of God). So BENGEL: “Who shows us in triumph, not [merely] as conquered, but as the ministers of His victory. Not only the victory, but the open ‘showing’ of the victory is marked: for there follows, Who maketh manifest.” savour—retaining the image of a triumph. As the approach of the triumphal procession was made known by the odour of incense scattered far and wide by the incense-bearers in the train, so God “makes manifest by us” (his now at once triumphed over and triumphing captives, cf. Luke 5. 10, “Catch,” lit., “Take captive so as to preserve alive:”) the sweet savour of the knowledge of Christ, the triumphant Conqueror (Colossians 2. 15), everywhere. As the triumph strikes the eyes, so the savour the nostrils; thus every sense feels the power of Christ’s Gospel. This manifestation (a word often recurring in his Epistles to the Corinthians, cf. 1 Corinthians 4. 5) refutes the Corinthian suspicions of his dishonestly, by reserve, hiding anything from them (v. 17; ch. 4. 2). 15. The order is in Greek, “For (it is) of Christ (that) we are a sweet savour unto God:” thus, the “for” justifies his previous words (v. 14), “the savour of His (Christ’s) knowledge.” We not only scatter the savour, but “we are the sweet savour” itself (Song of Solomon 1. 3; cf. John 1. 14, 16; Ephesians 5. 2; 1 John 2. 27). in them that are saved—rather, “that are being saved . . . that are perishing” (Note, 1 Corinthians 1. 18). As the light, though it blinds in darkness the weak, is for all that still light; and honey, though it taste bitter to the sick, is in itself still sweet; so the Gospel is still of a sweet savour, though many perish through unbelief [CHRYSOSTOM, Homilies, 5. 467] (ch. 4. 3, 4, 6). As some of the conquered foes led in triumph were put to death when the procession reached the capitol, and to them the smell of the incense was the “savour of death unto death,” whilst to those saved alive, it was the “savour of life,” so the Gospel was to the different classes respectively. in them—in the case of them. “Those being saved” (ch. 3. 1, to 4. 2): “Those that are perishing” (ch. 4. 3-5). 16. savour of death unto death . . . of life unto life—an odour arising out of death (a mere announcement of a dead Christ, and a virtually lifeless Gospel, in which light unbelievers regard the Gospel message), ending (as the just and natural consequence) in death (to the unbeliever).

(but to the believer) an odour arising out of life (i. e., the announcement of a risen and living Saviour), ending in life (to the believer) (Matthew 21. 44; Luke 2. 34; John 9. 35), who is sufficient for these things?—viz., for diffusing aright everywhere the savour of Christ, so diverse in its effects on believers and unbelievers. He here prepares the way for one purpose of his Epistle, viz., to vindicate his apostolic mission from its detractors at Corinth, who denied his sufficiency. The Greek order puts prominently foremost the momentous and difficult task assigned to him, “For these things, who is sufficient?” He answers his own question (ch. 3. 5), “Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, &c., but our sufficiency is of God, who hath made us able (Greek, ‘sufficient’) ministers,” &c. 17. not as many—(Ch. 11. 18; Philippians 2. 21.) Rather, “the many,” viz., the false teachers of whom he treats (chs. 10.-12., especially ch. 11. 13; 1 Thessalonians 2. 3). which corrupt—Greek, “adulterating, as hucksters do wine for gain” (ch. 4. 2; Isaiah 1. 22; 2 Peter 2. 3, “Make merchandise of you”). as of sincerity . . . as of God—as one speaking from (out of) sincerity, as from (i. e., by the command of, and so in dependence on) God. in Christ—as united to Him in living membership, and doing his work (cf. ch. 12. 19). The whole Gospel must be delivered such as it is, without concession to men’s corruptions, and without selfish aims, if it is to be blessed with success (Acts 20. 27).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. THE SOLE COMMENDATION HE NEEDS TO PROVE GOD’S SANCTION OF HIS MINISTRY HE HAS IN HIS CORINTHIAN CONVERTS: HIS MINISTRY EXCELS THE MOAIC, AS THE GOSPEL OF LIFE AND LIBERTY EXCELS THE LAW OF CONDEMNATION. 1. Are we beginning again to recommend ourselves (ch. 5. 12) (as some of them might say he had done in his first Epistle; or, a reproof to “some” who had begun doing so)? commendation—recommendation. (Cf. ch. 10. 18.) The “some” refers to particular persons of the “many” (ch. 2. 17) teachers who opposed him, and who came to Corinth with letters of recommendation from other churches; and when leaving that city obtained similar letters from the Corinthians to other churches. The 13th canon of the Council of Chalcedon (451 A. D.) ordained that “clergymen coming to a city where they were unknown, should not be allowed to officiate without letters commendatory from their own bishop.” The history (Acts 18. 27) confirms the existence of the custom here alluded to in the Epistle: “When Apollos was disposed to pass into Achaia (Corinth), the brethren (of Ephesus) wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him.” This was about two years before the Epistle, and is probably one of the instances to which St. Paul refers, as many at Corinth boasted of their being followers of Apollos (1 Corinthians 1. 12). 2. our Epistle—of recommendation. in our hearts—not letters borne merely in the hands. Your conversion through my instrumentality, and your faith which is “known of all men” by widespread report (1 Corinthians 1. 4-7), and which is written by memory and affection on my inmost heart, and is borne about wherever I go, is my letter of recommendation (1 Corinthians 9. 2). known and read—words akin in root, sound, and sense (so ch. 1. 13). “Ye are known to be my converts by general knowledge: then ye are known more particularly by your reflecting my doctrine in your Christian life.” The handwriting is first “known,” then the Epistle is “read” [GROTIUS] (ch. 4. 2, 1 Corinthians 14. 25). There is not so powerful a sermon in the world, as a consistent Christian life. The eye of the world takes in more than the ear. Christians’ lives are the only religious books the world reads. IGNATIUS (ad Ephesum, ch. 10.) writes, “Give unbelievers the chance of believing through you. Consider yourselves employed by God; your lives the form of language in which He addresses them. Be mild when they are angry, humble when they are haughty; to their blasphemy oppose prayer without ceasing; to their inconsistency, a steadfast adherence to your faith.” 3. declared—The letter is written so legibly that it can be “read by all men” (v. 2). Translates, “Being manifestly shown to be an Epistle of Christ”

a letter coming manifestly from Christ, and "ministered by us," i. e., carried about and presented by us as its (ministering) bearers to those (the world) for whom it is intended; Christ is the Writer and the Recommender, ye are the letter recommending us. written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God—St. Paul was the ministering pen or other instrument of writing, as well as the ministering bearer and presenter of the letter. "Not with ink" stands in contrast to the letters of commendation which "some" at Corinth (v. 1) used. "Ink" is also used here to include all outward materials for writing, such as the Sinaitic tables of stone were. These, however, were not written with ink, but "graven" by "the finger of God" (Exodus 31. 18; 32. 16). Christ's Epistle (his believing members converted by St. Paul) is better still: it is written not merely with the finger, but with the "Spirit of the living God." It is not the "ministration of death" as the law, but of the "living Spirit" that "giveth life" (v. 6-8). not in—not on tables (tablets) of stone, as the ten commandments were written (v. 7). in fleshy tables of the heart—ALL the best MSS. read, "On (your) hearts (which are) tables of flesh." Once your hearts were spiritually what the tables of the law were physically, tables of stone, but God has "taken away the stony heart out of your flesh, and given you a heart of flesh" (fleshy, not fleshly, i. e., carnal; hence it is written, "out of your flesh," i. e., your carnal nature), Ezekiel 11. 19; 36. 26. Cf. v. 2, "As ye are our Epistle written in our hearts," so Christ has in the first instance made you "His Epistle written with the Spirit in (on) your hearts." I bear on my heart, as a testimony to all men, that which Christ has by His Spirit written in your heart (ALFORD) (cf. Proverbs 3. 3; 7. 8; Jeremiah 31. 31-34). This passage is quoted by PALEY (Horæ Paulinæ) as illustrating one peculiarity of St. Paul's style, viz., his going off at a word into a parenthetical reflection: here it is on the word "Epistle." So "savour," ch. 2. 14-17. 4. And—Greek, "But." "Such confidence, however (viz., of our 'sufficiency,' v. 5, 6; ch. 2. 16 [to which he reverts after the parenthesis], as ministers of the New Testament, 'not fainting,' ch. 4. 1), we have through Christ (not through ourselves, cf. v. 18) toward God" (i. e., in our relation to God and His work, the ministry committed by Him to us, for which we must render an account to Him). Confidence toward God is solid and real, as looking to Him for the strength needed now, and also for the reward of grace to be given hereafter. Cf. Acts 24. 15, "Hope toward God." Human confidence is unreal in that it looks to man for its help and its reward. 5. The Greek is, "Not that we are (even yet after so long experience as ministers) sufficient to think anything of ourselves as (coming) FROM ourselves; but our sufficiency is (derived) FROM God." "From" more definitely refers to the source out of which a thing comes; "of" is more general. "To think," Greek, to "reason out" or "devise;" to attain to sound preaching by our reasonings. [THEODORET.] The "we" refers here to ministers (2 Peter 1. 21). anything—even the least. We cannot expect too little from man, or too much from God. 6. able—rather, as the Greek is the same, corresponding to v. 5, translate, "sufficient as ministers" (Ephesians 3. 7; Colossians 1. 23). the new testament—"the new covenant" as contrasted with the Old Testament or covenant (1 Corinthians 11. 25; Galatians 4. 24). He reverts here again to the contrast between the law on "tables of stone," and that "written by the Spirit on fleshy tables of the heart" (v. 3). not of the letter—joined with "ministers:" ministers not of the mere literal precept, in which the old law, as then understood, consisted; "but of the Spirit," i. e., the spiritual holiness which lay under the old law, and which the new covenant brings to light (Matthew 5. 17-48) with new motives added, and a new power of obedience imparted, viz., the Holy Spirit (Romans 7. 6). Even in writing the letter of the New Testament, St. Paul and the other sacred writers were ministers not of the letter, but of the spirit. No plea of spirit could exempt a man from the yoke of the letter of each legal ordinance under the Old Testament; for God had appointed this as the way in which he chose a devout Jew to express his state of mind towards God. Christianity, on the other hand, makes the spirit of our outward observances everything, and the letter a secondary consideration (John 4. 24). Still the moral law of the ten commandments, being written by the finger of God, is as obligatory now as ever; but put more on the Gospel spirit of "love," than on the letter of a servile obedience, and in a deeper and fuller spirituality (Matthew 5. 17-48; Romans 13. 9). No literal precepts could fully comprehend the wide range of holiness which LOVE, the work of the Holy Spirit, under the Gospel, suggests to the believer's heart instinctively from the word understood in its deep spirituality. letter killeth—by bringing home the knowledge of guilt and its punishment, death; v. 7. "ministration of death" (Romans 7. 9). spirit giveth life—The spirit of the Gospel when brought home to the heart by the Holy Spirit, gives new spiritual life to a man (Romans 6. 4, 11). This "spirit of life" is for us in Christ Jesus (Romans 8. 2, 10), who dwells in the believer as a "quickening" or "life-giving Spirit" (1 Corinthians 15. 45). Note, the spiritualism of rationalists is very different. It would admit no "stereotyped revelation," except so much as man's own inner instrument of revelation, the conscience and reason, can approve of; thus making the conscience judge of the written word, whereas the apostles make the written word the judge of the conscience (Acts 17. 11; 1 Peter 4. 1). True spirituality rests on the whole written word, applied to the soul by the Holy Spirit as the only infallible interpreter of its far-reaching spirituality. The letter is nothing without the spirit, in a subject essentially spiritual. The spirit is nothing without the letter, in a record substantially historical. 7. the ministration of death—the legal dispensation, summed up in the Decalogue, which denounces death against man for transgression. written and engraven in stones—There is no "and" in the Greek. The lit. translation is, "The ministration of death in letters," of which "engraven on stones" is an explanation. The preponderance of oldest MSS. is for the English Version reading. But one, perhaps the oldest existing MS., has "in the letter," which refers to the preceding words (v. 6), "the letter killeth," and this seems the probable reading. Even if we read as English Version, "The ministration of death (written) in letters," alludes to the literal precepts of the law as only bringing us the knowledge of sin and "death," in contrast to "the Spirit" in the Gospel bringing us "life" (v. 6). The opposition between "the letters" and "the Spirit" (v. 8) confirms this. This explains why the phrase in Greek should be "in letters," instead of the ordinary one which English Version has substituted, "written and." was glorious—lit., "was made (invested) in glory;" glory was the atmosphere with which it was encompassed. could not steadfastly behold—lit., "fix their eyes on." Exodus 34. 30, "The skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him." "Could not," therefore means here, for FEAR. The "glory of Moses' countenance" on Sinai passed away when the occasion was over: a type of the transitory character of the dispensation which he represented (v. 11), as contrasted with the permanency of the Christian dispensation (v. 11). 8. be rather glorious—lit., "be rather (i. e., still more, invested) in glory." "Shall be," i. e., shall be found to be in part now, but fully when the glory of Christ and His saints shall be revealed. 9. ministration of condemnation—the law regarded in the "letter" which "killeth" (v. 6; Romans 7. 9-11). The oldest existing MS. seems to read as English Version. But most of the almost contemporary MSS., versions, and fathers, read, "If to the ministration of condemnation there be glory." the ministration of righteousness—the Gospel, which especially reveals the righteousness of God (Romans 1. 17), and imputes righteousness to men through faith in Christ (Romans 3. 21-28 4. 8, 22-25), and imparts righteousness by the Spirit (Romans 8. 1-4). exceed—"abound." 10. For even the ministration of condemnation, the law, v. 7 (which has been glorified at Sinai in Moses' person) has now (English Version translates less fitly, "was made . . . had") lost its glory in this respect by reason of the surpassing glory (of the Gospel): as the light of the stars and moon fades in the presence of the sun. 11. was glorious—lit., “was with glory;” or “marked by glory.” that which remaineth—abideth (Revelation 14. 6). Not “the ministry,” but the Spirit, and His accompaniments, life and righteousness. is glorious—lit., “is in glory.” The Greek “with” or “by” is appropriately applied to that of which the glory was transient. “In” to that of which the glory is permanent. The contrast of the Old and New Testaments proves that St. Paul’s chief opponents at Corinth were Judaizers. 12. such hope—of the future glory, which shall result from the ministration of the Gospel (v. 8, 9). plainness of speech—openness; without reserve (ch. 2. 17; 4. 2). 13. We use no disguise, “as Moses put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel might not look steadfastly upon the end of that which was to be done away.” [ELLICOTT, &c.] The view of Exodus 34. 30-35, according to LXX., is adopted by St. Paul, that Moses in going in to speak to God removed the veil till he came out and had spoken to the people; and then when he had done speaking, he put on the veil that they might not look on the end, or the fading, of that transitory glory. The veil was the symbol of concealment, put on directly after Moses’ speaking; so that God’s revelations by him were interrupted by intervals of concealment. [ALFORD.] But ALFORD’S view does not accord with v. 7; the Israelites “could not look steadfastly on the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance.” Plainly Moses’ veil was put on because of their not having been able to “look steadfastly at him.” Paul here (v. 13) passes from the literal fact to the truth symbolized by it, the blindness of Jews and Judaizers to the ultimate end of the law: stating that Moses put on the veil that they might not look steadfastly at (Christ, Romans 10. 4) the end of that (law) which (like Moses’ glory) is done away. Not that Moses had this purpose; but often God attributes to His prophets the purpose which He has himself. Because the Jews would not see, God judicially gave them up so as not to see. The glory of Moses’ face is antitypically Christ’s glory shining behind the veil of legal ordinances. The veil which has been taken off to the believer is left on to the unbelieving Jew, so that he should not see (Isaiah 6. 10; Acts 28. 26, 27). He stops short at the letter of the law, not seeing the end of it. The evangelical glory of the law, like the shining of Moses’ face, cannot be borne by a carnal people, and therefore remains veiled to them until the Spirit comes to take away the veil (v. 14-17). [CAMERON.] 14-18. Parenthetical: Of Christians in general. He resumes the subject of the ministry, ch. 4. 1. 14. minds—Greek, “mental perceptions;” “understandings.” blinded—rather, “hardened.” The opposite to “looking steadfastly at the end” of the law (v. 13). The veil on Moses’ face is further typical of the veil that is on their hearts. untaken away . . . which veil—rather, “the same veil . . . remaineth untaken away [lit., not unveiled], so that they do not see THAT it (not the veil as English Version, but ‘THE OLD TESTAMENT,’ or covenant of legal ordinances) is done away (v. 7, 11, 13) in Christ;” or, as BENGEL, “Because it is done away in Christ,” i. e., it is not done away save in Christ: the veil therefore remains untaken away from them, because they will not come to Christ, who does away with the law as a mere letter. If they once saw that the law is done away in Him, the veil would be no longer on their hearts in reading it publicly in their synagogues (so “reading” means, Acts 15. 21). I prefer the former. 15. the veil is—rather, “a veil lieth upon their heart” (their understanding, affected by the corrupt will, John 8. 43; 1 Corinthians 2. 14). The Tallith was worn in the synagogue by every worshipper, and to this veil hanging over the breast there may be an indirect allusion here (note, 1 Corinthians 11. 4): the apostle making it symbolize the spiritual veil on their heart. 16. Moses took off the veil on entering into the presence of the Lord. So as to the Israelites whom Moses represents, “whosoever their heart (it) turns (not as English Version, ‘shall turn’) to the Lord, the veil is [by the very fact] (not as English Version, ‘shall be’) taken away.” Exodus 34. 34 is the allusion; not Exodus 34. 30, 31, as ALFORD thinks. Whenever the Israelites turn to the Lord, who is the Spirit of the law, the veil is taken off their hearts in the presence of the Lord: as the literal veil was taken off by Moses in going before God: no longer resting on the dead letter, the veil they by the Spirit commune with God and with the inner spirit of the Mosaic covenant (which answers to the glory of Moses’ face unveiled in God’s presence). 17. the Lord—Christ (v. 14, 16; ch. 4. 5). is that Spirit—is THE Spirit, viz., that Spirit spoken of in v. 6, and here resumed after the parenthesis (v. 7-16): Christ is the Spirit and “end” of the Old Testament, who giveth life to it, whereas “the letter killeth” (1 Corinthians 15. 45; Revelation 19. 10, end). where the Spirit of the Lord is—in a man’s “heart” (v. 15; Romans 8. 9, 10). there is liberty—(John 8. 33.) “There,” and there only. Such cease to be slaves to the letter, which they were whilst the veil was on their heart. They are free to serve God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus (Philippians 3. 3): they have no longer the spirit of bondage, but of free sonship (Romans 8. 15; Galatians 4. 7). “Liberty” is opposed to the letter (of the legal ordinances), and to the veil, the badge of slavery: also to the fear which the Israelites felt in beholding Moses’ glory unveiled (Exodus 34. 30; 1 John 4. 18). 18. But we all—Christians, as contrasted with the Jews who have a veil on their hearts, answering to Moses’ veil on his face. He does not resume reference to ministers till ch. 4. 1. with open face—translate, “with unveiled face” (the veil being removed at conversion): contrasted with “hid” (ch. 4. 3). as in a glass—in a mirror, viz., the Gospel, which reflects the glory of God and Christ (ch. 4. 4; 1 Corinthians 13. 12; James 1. 23, 25). are changed into the same image—viz., the image of Christ’s glory, spiritually now (Romans 8. 29; 1 John 3. 3); an earnest of the bodily change hereafter (Philippians 3. 21). However many they be, believers all reflect the same image of Christ more or less: a proof of the truth of Christianity. from glory to glory—from one degree of glory to another. As Moses’ face caught a reflection of God’s glory from being in His presence, so believers are changed into His image by beholding Him. even as, &c.—Just such a transformation “as” was to be expected from “the Lord the Spirit” (not as English Version, “the Spirit of the Lord”) [ALFORD] (v. 17): “who receives of the things of Christ, and shows them to us” (John 16. 14; Romans 8. 10 11). Cf. as to hereafter, Psalm 17. 15; Revelation 22. 4.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver 1-18. HIS PREACHING IS OPEN AND SINCERE, THOUGH TO MANY THE GOSPEL IS HIDDEN; for he preaches Christ, not himself: the human vessel is frail, that God may have the glory; yet, though frail, faith and the hope of future glory sustain him amidst the decay of the outward man. 1. Therefore—Greek, “For this cause:” Because we have the liberty-giving Spirit of the Lord, and with unveiled face behold His glory (ch. 3. 17, 18). seeing we have this ministry—“The ministration of the Spirit” (ch. 3. 8, 9): the ministry of such a spiritual, liberty-giving Gospel: resuming ch. 3. 6, 8. received mercy—from God, in having had this ministry conferred on us (ch. 3. 5). The sense of “mercy” received from God, makes men active for God (1 Timothy 1. 11-13). we faint not—in boldness of speech and action, and patience in suffering (v. 2, 8-10, &c.). 2. renounced—lit., “bid farewell to.” of dishonesty—rather, “of shame.” “I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ” (Romans 1. 16). Shame would lead to hiding (v. 3); whereas “we use great plainness of speech” (ch. 3. 12); “by manifestation of the truth.” Cf. ch. 3. 3, “manifestly declared.” He refers to the disingenuous artifices of “many” teachers at Corinth (ch. 2. 17; 3. 1; 11. 13-15). handling . . . deceitfully—So “corrupt” or adulterate “the word of God” (ch. 2. 17; cf. 1 Thessalonians 2. 3, 4). commending—recommending ourselves: recurring to ch. 3. 1. to—to the verdict of. every man’s conscience—(Ch. 5. 11.) Not to men’s carnal judgment, as there alluded to (ch. 3. 1). in the sight of God—(Ch. 2. 17; Galatians 1. 10.) 3. But if—Yea, even if (as I grant is the case) hid—rather (in reference to ch. 3. 13-18), “veiled.” “Hid” (Greek, Colossians 3. 3) is said of that withdrawn from new altogether "Veiled," of a thing within reach of the eye, but covered over so as not to be seen. So it was in the case of Moses' face. to them—in the case only of them: for in itself the Gospel is quite plain. that are lost—rather, "that are perishing" (1 Corinthians 1. 18). So the same cloud that was "light" to the people of God, was "darkness" to the Egyptian foes of God (Exodus 14. 20). 4. In whom—Translate, "In whose case," god of this world—the worldly make him their God (Philippians 3. 19). He is, in fact, "the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that ruleth in the children of disobedience" (Ephesians 2. 2). minds—"understandings;" "mental perceptions," as in ch. 3. 14. them which believe not—the same as "them that are lost" (or "are perishing"). Cf. 2 Thessalonians 1. 10-12. SOUTH quaintly says, "when the malefactor's eyes are covered, he is not far from his execution" (Esther 7. 8). Those perishing unbelievers are not merely veiled, but blinded (ch. 3. 14, 15); Greek, not "blinded," but "hardened." light of the glorious Gospel of Christ—Translate, "The illumination (enlightening: the propagation from those already enlightened, to others of the light) of the Gospel of the glory of Christ." "The glory of Christ" is not a mere quality (as "glorious" would express) of the Gospel, it is its very essence and subject-matter. image of God—implying identity of nature and essence (John 1. 18; Colossians 1. 15; Hebrews 1. 3). He who desires to see "the glory of God," may see it "in the face of Jesus Christ" (v. 6; 1 Timothy 6. 14-16). St. Paul here recurs to ch. 3. 18. Christ is "the image of God," into which "same image" we, looking on it in the mirror of the Gospel, are changed by the Spirit; but this image is not visible to those blinded by Satan. [ALFORD.] 5. For—Their blindness is not our fault, as if we had self-seeking aims in our preaching. preach . . . Christ . . . the Lord—rather, "Christ as Lord," and ourselves as your servants," &c. "Lord," or Master, is the correlative term to "servants." 6. For—Proof that we are true servants of Jesus unto you. commanded the light—Greek, "By speaking the word, commanded light" (Genesis 1. 3). hath shined—rather, as Greek, "is He who shined." (It is God) who commanded light, &c., that shined, &c. (Job 37. 15); Himself our Light and Sun, as well as the Creator of light (Malachi 4. 2; John 8. 12). The physical world answers to the spiritual. in our hearts—in themselves dark. to give the light—i. e., to propagate to others the light, &c., which is in us (cf. Note, v. 4). the glory of God—answering to "the glory of Christ" (Note, v. 4). in the face of Jesus Christ—Some of the oldest MSS. retain "Jesus." Others omit it. Christ is the manifestation of the glory of God, as His image (John 14. 9). The allusion is still to the brightness on Moses' "face." The only true and full manifestation of God's brightness and glory is "in the face of Jesus" (Hebrews 1. 3). 7. "Lest any should say, How then is it that we continue to enjoy such unspeakable glory in a mortal body? St. Paul replies, this very fact is one of the most marvellous proofs of God's power, that an earthen vessel could bear such splendour and keep such a treasure." [CHRYSTOSTOM, Homilies, 8. 496, A.] The treasure or "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God." The fragile "earthen vessel" is the body, the "outward man" (v. 16; cf. v. 10), liable to afflictions and death. So the light in Gideon's pitchers, the type (Judges 7. 16-20, 22). The ancients often kept their treasures in jars or vessels of earthenware. "There are earthen vessels which yet may be clean; whereas a golden vessel may be filthy." [BENGEL.] that the excellency of the power, &c.—that the power of the ministry (the Holy Spirit), in respect to its surpassing "excellency," exhibited in winning souls (1 Corinthians 2. 4) and in sustaining us ministers, might be ascribed solely to God, we being weak as earthen vessels. God often allows the vessel to be chipped and broken, that the excellency of the treasure contained, and of the power which that treasure has, may be all His (v. 10, 11) John 8. 30). may be of God . . . not of us—rather, as Greek, "may be God's (may be seen and be thankfully (v. 15) acknowledged to belong to God), and not (to come) from us." The power not merely comes from God, but belongs to Him continually, and is to be ascribed to him. 8. Greek, "BEING hard pressed, yet not inextricably straitened; reduced to inextricable straits" (nominative to "we have," v. 7). on every side—Greek, "in every respect" (cf. v. 10, "always;" ch. 7. 5). This verse expresses inward distresses; next verse, outward distresses (ch. 7. 5). "Without were fightings; within were fears." The first clause in each member of the series of contrasted participles, implies the earthiness of the vessel, the second clause, the excellency of the power. perplexed, but not in despair—Greek, "not utterly perplexed." As perplexity refers to the future, so "troubled" or "hard pressed" refers to the present. 9. not forsaken—by God and man. Jesus was forsaken by both; so much do His sufferings exceed those of His people (Matthew 27. 46), cast down—or "struck down;" not only "persecuted," i. e., chased as a deer or bird (1 Samuel 26. 20), but actually struck down as with a dart in the chase (Hebrews 11. 35-38). The Greek "always" in this verse means, "throughout the whole time;" in v. 11 the Greek is different, and means, "at every time," "in every case when the occasion occurs." bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus—i. e., having my body exposed to being put to death in the cause of Jesus (the oldest MSS. omit "the Lord"), and having in it the marks of such sufferings, I thus hear about wheresoever I go, an image of the suffering Saviour in my own person (v. 11; ch. 1. 5; cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 31). Doubtless, St. Paul was exposed to more dangers than are recorded in Acts (cf. ch. 7. 5 · 11. 26). The Greek for "the dying" is lit., "the being made a corpse;" such St. Paul regarded his body, yet a corpse which shares in the life-giving power of Christ's resurrection, as it has shared in His dying and death. that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body—rather "may he"—The name "Jesus," by itself, is often repeated here, as St. Paul seems, amidst sufferings, peculiarly to have felt its sweetness. In v. 11 the same words occur with the variation "in our mortal flesh." The fact of a dying, corpse-like body being sustained amidst such trials, manifests that "the (resurrection) life also," as well as the dying, "of Jesus," exerts its power in us. I thus hear about in my own person an image of the risen and living, as well as of the suffering, Saviour. The "our" is added here to "body," though not in the beginning of the verse. "For the body is ours not so much in death, as in life." [BENGEL.] 11. we which live—in the power of Christ's "life" manifested in us, in our whole man, body as well as spirit (Romans 8. 10, 11; Note, v. 10; cf. ch. 5. 15). St. Paul regards his preservation amidst so many exposures to "death," by which St. Stephen and St. James were cut off, as a standing miracle (ch. 11. 23). delivered unto—not by chance; by the ordering of Providence, who shows "the excellency of His power" (v. 7), in delivering unto DEATH His living saints, that He may manifest LIFE also in their dying flesh. "Flesh," the very element of decay (not merely their "body"), is by Him made to manifest life. 12. The "death" of Christ manifested in the continual "perishing of our outward man" (v. 16), works peculiarly in us, and is the means of working spiritual "life" in you. The life whereof we witness in our bodily dying, extends beyond ourselves, and is brought by our very dying to you. 13. Translate as Greek, "BUT having," &c., i. e., notwithstanding the trials just mentioned, we having, &c. the same spirit of faith, according as it, &c. Cf. Romans 8. 15, on the usage of "spirit of," &c. The Holy Spirit acting on our spirit. Though "death worketh in us, and life in you" (v. 12), yet as we have the same spirit of faith as you, we therefore [believingly] look for the same immortal life as you [ESTIUS], and speak as we believe. ALFORD not so well translates, "The same . . . faith with that described in the Scriptures" (Psalm 118. 10). The balance of the sentence requires the parallelism to be this, "According to that which is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak," viz., without fear, amidst "afflictions" and "deaths" (v. 17). 14. Knowing—by faith (ch. 5. 1) shall raise up us also—at the resurrection (1 Corinthians 6. 13, 14). by Jesus—The oldest MSS. have "with Jesus," present us—vividly picturing the scenes before the eyes (Jude 24). with you—(Ch. 1. 14; 1 Thessalonians 2. 19, 20; 3. 13.) 15. For—Confirming his assertion "with you" (v. 14), and "life . . . worketh in you" (v. 12), all things—whether the afflictions and labours of us ministers (v. 8-11), or your prosperity (v. 12; 1 Corinthians 1. 21, 22; 4. 8-13), for your sakes—(2 Timothy 2. 10.) abundant grace, &c.—rather, "That grace (the grace which preserves us in trials and works life in you), being made the greater (multiplied), by means of the greater number of its recipients, may cause the thanksgiving to abound &c." &c. [CHRYSOSTOM] (ch. 1. 11; 9. 11, 12). The Greek is susceptible also of this translation, "That grace, being made the greater (multiplied) on account of the thanksgiving of the greater number (for grace already received), may abound (abundantly redound) to," &c. Thus the Greek for "abound" has not to be taken in an active sense, but in its ordinary neuter sense, and so the other Greek words. Thanksgiving invites more abundant grace (2 Chronicles 20. 19-22; Psalm 18. 3; 50. 23). 16. we faint not—notwithstanding our sufferings. Resuming v. 1. outward man—the body, the flesh. perish—"is wearing away;" "is wasted away" by afflictions. inward man—our spiritual and true being. the "life" which even in our mortal bodies (v. 11) "manifests the life of Jesus." is renewed—"is being renewed," viz., with fresh "grace" (v. 15), and "faith" (v. 13), and hope (v. 17, 18). 17. which is but for a moment—"Our PRESENT light (burden of) affliction" (so the Greek; cf. Matthew 11. 30). [ALFORD.] Cf. "now for a season . . . in heaviness" (1 Peter 1. 6). The contrast, however, between this and the "ETERNAL weight of glory" requires, I think, the translation, "Which is but for the present passing moment." So WAHL. "The lightness of affliction" (he does not express "burden" after "light;" the Greek is "the light of affliction") contrasts beautifully with the "weight of the glory." worketh—rather, "worketh out." a far more exceeding and—rather, "in a surpassing and still more surpassing manner" [ALFORD]; "more and more exceedingly." [ELIOTT, TRENCH, &c.] Greek, "In excess and to excess." The glory exceeds beyond all measure the affliction. 18. look not at—as our alm. things . . . seen—"earthly things" (Philippians 3. 19). We mind not the things seen, whether affliction or refreshment come, so as to be seduced by the latter, or deterred by the former. [CHRYSOSTOM.] things . . . not seen—not "the invisible things" of Romans 1. 20, but the things which, though not seen now, shall be so hereafter. temporal—rather, "for a time;" in contrast to eternal. English Version uses "temporal" for temporary. The Greek is rightly translated in the similar passage, "the pleasures of sin for a season."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-21. THE HOPE (ch. 4. 17, 18) OF ETERNAL GLORY IN THE RESURRECTION BODY. Hence arises his ambition to be accepted at the Lord's coming judgment. Hence, too, his endeavour to deal openly with men, as with God, in preaching; thus giving the Corinthians whereof to boast concerning him against his adversaries. His constraining motive is the transforming love of Christ, by whom God has wrought reconciliation between Himself and men, and has committed to the apostle the ministry of reconciliation. 1. For—Assigning the reason for the statement (ch. 4. 17), that affliction leads to exceeding glory. we know—assuredly (ch. 4. 14; Job 19. 25). If—For all shall not die; many shall be "changed" without "dissolution" (1 Corinthians 15. 51-53). If this daily delivering unto death (ch. 4. 11) should end in actual death. earthly—not the same as earthy (1 Corinthians 15. 47). It stands in contrast to "in the heavens." house of this tabernacle—rather, "house of the tabernacle." "House" expresses more permanency than belongs to the body; therefore the qualification, "of the tabernacle" (implying that it is shifting, not stationary), is added (cf. Job 4. 19; 2 Peter 1. 13, 14). It thus answers to the tabernacle in the wilderness. Its wooden frame and curtains wore out in course of time when Israel dwelt in Canaan, and a fixed temple was substituted for it. The temple and the tabernacle in all esentials were one; there was the same ark, the same cloud of glory. Such is the relation between the "earthly" body and the resurrection body. The Holy Spirit is enshrined in the believer's body as in a sanctuary (1 Corinthians 3. 16). As the ark went first in taking down the wilderness tabernacle, so the soul (which like the ark is sprinkled with blood of atonement, and is the sacred deposit in the inmost shrine, 2 Timothy 1. 12) in the dissolution of the body; next the coverings were removed, answering to the flesh; lastly, the framework and boards, answering to the bones, which are last to give way (Numbers 4). St. Paul, as a tentmaker, uses an image taken from his trade (Acts 18. 3). dissolved—a mild word for death, in the case of believers. we have—in assured prospect of possession, as certain as if it were in our hands, laid up "in the heavens" for us. The tense is present (cf. John 3. 36; 6. 47, "hath"). a building of God—rather "from God." A solid building, not a temporary tabernacle or tent. "Our" body stands in contrast to "from God." For though our present body be also from God, yet it is not fresh and perfect from His hands, as our resurrection body shall be. not made with hands—contrasted with houses erected by man's hands (1 Corinthians 15. 44-49). So Christ's body is designated, as contrasted with the tabernacle reared by Moses (Mark 14. 58; Hebrews 9. 11). This "house" can only be the resurrection body, in contrast to the "earthly house of the tabernacle," our present body. The intermediate state is not directly taken into account. A comma should separate "eternal," and "in the heavens." 2. For in this—Greek, "For also in this;" "herein" (ch. 8. 10). ALFORD takes it, "in this" tabernacle. Verse 4, which seems parallel, favours this. But the parallelism is sufficiently exact by making "in this we groan" refer generally to what was just said (v. 1), viz., that we cannot obtain our "house in the heavens" except our "earthly tabernacle" be first dissolved by death. "We groan" (Romans 8. 23) under the body's weaknesses now and liability to death. earnestly desiring to be clothed upon—translate, "earnestly longing to have ourselves clothed upon," &c., viz., by being found alive at Christ's coming, and so to escape dissolution by death (v. 1, 4), and to have our heavenly body put on over the earthly. The groans of the saints prove the existence of the longing desire for the heavenly glory, a desire which cannot be planted by God within us in vain, as doomed to disappointment. our house—Different Greek from that in v. 1; translate, "our habitation," "our domicile;" it has a more distinct reference to the inhabitant than the general term "house" (v. 1). [BENGE.] from heaven—This domicile is "from heaven" in its origin, and is to be brought to us by the Lord at His coming again "from heaven" (1 Thessalonians 4. 16). Therefore this "habitation" or "domicile" is not heaven itself. 3. If so be, &c.—Our "desire" holds good, should the Lord's coming find us alive. Translate, "If so be that having ourselves clothed (with our natural body, cf. v. 4) we shall not be found naked" (stripped of our present body). 4. For—Resuming v. 2. burdened; not for that—rather, "in that we desire not to have ourselves unclothed (of our present body), but clothed upon" (with our heavenly body). that mortality, &c.—rather, "that what is mortal (our mortal part) may be swallowed up of (absorbed and transformed into) life." Believers shrink from, not the consequences, but the mere act of dying; especially as believing in the possibility of their being found alive at the Lord's coming (1 Thessalonians 4. 15), and so of having their mortal body absorbed into the immortal without death. Faith does not divest us of all natural feeling, but subordinates it to higher feeling. Scripture gives no sanction to the contempt for the body expressed by philosophers. 5. wrought us—framed us by redemption, justification, and sanctification. for the self-same thing—"unto" it; viz., unto what is mortal of us being swallowed up in life (v. 4). who also—The oldest MSS. omit "also." earnest of the Spirit—(Note, ch. 1. 22.) It is the Spirit (as "the first-fruits") who creates in us the groaning desire for our coming deliverance and glory (Romans 8. 23). 6. Translate as Greek, "Being therefore always confident and knowing," &c. He had intended to have made the verb to this nominative, "we are willing" (rather, "well content"), but digressing on the word "confident" (v. 6, 7), he resumes the word in a different form, viz., as an assertion: "We are confident and well content." "Being confident . . . we are confident" may be the Hebraic idiom of emphasis; as Acts 7. 34, Greek, "Having seen, I have seen," i. e., I have surely seen. always—under all trials. BENGEL makes the contrast between "always confident" and "confident," especially at the prospect of being "absent from the body," &c. We are confident as well at all times, as also most of all in the hope of a blessed departure. whilst . . . at home . . . absent—translate as Greek, "Whilst we sojourn in our home in the body, we are away from our home in the Lord." The image from a "house" is retained (cf. Philipplians 3. 20; Hebrews 11. 13-16; 13. 14). 7. we walk—in our Christian course here on earth. not by sight—Greek, "not by appearance." Our life is governed by faith in our immortal hope; not by the outward specious appearance of present things. [TITM. Synonyms.] Cf. "apparently," LXX., "by appearance," Numbers 12. 8. WAHL supports English Version. Ch. 4. 18 also confirms it (cf. Romans 8. 24; 1 Corinthians 13. 12, 13). God has appointed in this life faith for our great duty, and in the next, vision for our reward [SOUTH] (1 Peter 1. 8). 8. willing—lit., "well content." Translate also, "To go (lit., migrate) from our home in the body, and to come to our home with the Lord." We should prefer to be found alive at the Lord's coming, and to be clothed upon with our heavenly body (v. 2-4). But feeling, as we do, the sojourn in the body to be a separation from our true home "with the Lord," we prefer even dissolution by death so that in the intermediate disembodied state we may go to be "with the Lord" (Philipplians 1. 23). "To be with Christ" (the disembodied state) is distinguished from Christ's coming to take us to be with Him in soul and body (1 Thessalonians 4. 14-17, "with the Lord"). Perhaps the disembodied spirits of believers have fulness of communion with Christ unseen; but not the mutual recognition of one another, until clothed with their visible bodies at the resurrection (cf. 1 Thessalonians 4. 13-17), when they shall with joy recognize Christ's image in each other perfect. 9. Wherefore—with such a sure "confidence" of being blessed, whether we die before, or be found alive at Christ's coming. we labour—lit., "make it our ambition;" the only lawful ambition. whether present or absent—whether we be found at His coming present in the body, or absent from it. accepted—Greek, "well-pleasing." 10. appear—rather, "be made manifest," viz., in our true character. So "appear," Greek, "be manifested" (Colossians 3. 4; cf. 1 Corinthians 4. 5). We are at all times, even now, manifest to God; the: we shall be so to the assembled intelligent universe and to ourselves: for the judgment shall be not only in order to assign the everlasting portion to each, but to vindicate God's righteousness, so that it shall be manifest to all His creatures, and even to the conscience of the sinner himself. receive—his reward of grace proportioned to "the things done," &c. (ch. 9. 6-9; 3 John 8). Though salvation be of grace purely, independent of works, the saved may have a greater or less reward, according as he lives to, and labours for, Christ more or less. Hence there is scope for the holy "ambition" (Note, v. 9; Hebrews 6. 10). This verse guards against the Corinthians supposing that all share in the house . . . "from heaven" (v. 1, 2). There shall be a searching judgment which shall sever the bad from the good, according to their respective deeds, the motive of the deeds being taken into account, not the mere external act; faith and love to God are the sole motives recognized by God as sound and good (Matthew 12. 38, 37; 25. 35-45). done in his body—The Greek may be, "by the instrumentality of the body;" but English Version is legitimate (cf. Greek, Romans 2. 27). Justice requires that substantially the same body which has been the instrument of the unbelievers' sin, should be the object of punishment. A proof of the essential identity of the natural and the resurrection body. 11. terror of the Lord—the coming judgment, so full of terrors to unbelievers. [ESTIUS.] ELLIOTT and ALFORD, after

GEOTIUS and BENGEL, translate, "The fear of the Lord" (ch. 7. 1; Ecclesiastes 12. 13; Acts 9. 31; Romans 3. 18; Ephesians 5. 21). persuade—Ministers should use the terrors of the Lord to persuade men, not to rouse their enmity (Jude 23). BENGEL, ESTIUS, and ALFORD, explain: "Persuade men" (by our whole lives, v. 13), viz., of our integrity as ministers. But this would have been expressed after "persuade," had it been the sense. The connection seems as follows: He had been accused of seeking to please and win men, he therefore says (cf. Galatians 1. 10), "It is as knowing the terror (or fear) of the Lord that we persuade men; but (whether men who hear our preaching recognize our sincerity or not) we are made manifest unto God as acting on such motives (ch. 4. 2); and I trust also in your consciences." Those so "manifested" need have no "terror" as to their being "manifested (English Version, appear) before the judgment-seat" (v. 10). 12. For—The reason why he leaves the manifestation of his sincerity in preaching to their consciences (ch. 3. 1), viz., his not wishing to "commend" himself again. occasion to glory—(Ch. 1. 14)—viz., as to our sincerity. in appearance—Greek, "face" (cf. 1 Samuel 16. 7). The false teachers gloried in their outward appearance, and in external recommendations (ch. 11. 18) their learning, eloquence, wisdom, riches, not in vital religion in their heart. Their conscience does not attest their inward sincerity, as mine does (ch. 1. 12). 13. be—rather as Greek, "have been." The contrast is between the single act implied by the past tense, "If we have ever been beside ourselves," and the habitual state implied by the present, "Or whether we be sober," i. e., of sound mind. beside ourselves—The accusation brought by Festus against him (Acts 26. 24). The holy enthusiasm with which he spake of what God effected by His apostolic ministry, seemed to many to be boasting madness. sober—humbling myself before you, and not using my apostolic power and privileges. to God . . . for your cause—The glorifying of his office was not for his own, but for God's glory. The abasing of himself was in adaptation to their infirmity, to gain them to Christ (1 Corinthians 9. 22). 14. For—Accounting for His being "beside himself" with enthusiasm: the love of Christ towards us (in His death for us, the highest proof of it, Romans 5. 6-8), producing in turn love in us to him, and not mere "terror" (v. 11). constraineth us—with irresistible power limits us to the one great object to the exclusion of other considerations. The Greek implies to compress forcibly the energies into one channel. Love is jealous of any rival object engrossing the soul (ch. 11. 1-3). because we thus judge—lit., (as) "having judged thus:" implying a judgment formed at conversion, and ever since regarded as a settled truth. that if—i. e., that since. But the oldest MSS. omit "if." "That one died for all" (Greek, "in behalf of all"). Thus the following clause will be, "Therefore all (lit., 'the all,' viz., for whom He 'died') died." His dying is just the same as if they all died; and in their so dying, they died to sin and self, that they might live to God their Redeemer, whose henceforth they are (Romans 6. 2-11; Galatians 2. 20; Colossians 3. 3; 1 Peter 4. 1-3). 15. they which live—in the present life (ch. 4. 11, "we which live") [ALFORD]; or, they who are thus indebted to Him for life of soul as well as body. [MENOCHIUS.] died for them—He does not add, "rose again for them," a phrase not found in St. Paul's language. [BENGEL.] He died in their stead, He arose again for their good, "for (the effecting of) their justification" (Romans 4. 25), and that He might be their Lord (Romans 14. 7-9). ELLIOTT and ALFORD join "for them" with both "died" and "rose again," as Christ's death is our death, so His resurrection is our resurrection; Greek, "Who for them died and rose again." not henceforth—Greek, "no longer;" viz., now that His death for them has taken place, and that they know that His death saves them from death eternal, and His resurrection life brings spiritual and everlasting life to them. 16. Wherefore—because of our settled judgment (v. 14). henceforth—since our knowing Christ's constraining love in His death for us. know we no man after the flesh—i. e., according to his mere worldly and external relations (ch. 11. 18; John 8. 15; Philipplians 3. 4), as disanguished from what he is according to the Spirit, as a "new creature" (v. 17). For instance, the outward distinctions of Jew or Gentile, rich or poor, slave or free, learned or unlearned, are lost sight of in the higher life of those who are dead in Christ's death, and alive with Him in the new life of His resurrection (Galatians 2. 6; 3. 28). yea, though—The oldest MSS. read, "if even." known Christ after the flesh—Paul when a Jew had looked for a temporal reigning, not a spiritual, Messiah. (He says "Christ," not Jesus: for he had not known personally Jesus in the days of His flesh, but he had looked for Christ or the Messiah.) When once he was converted he no longer "conferred with flesh and blood" (Galatians 1. 16). He had this advantage over the Twelve, that as one born out of due time he had never known Christ save in His heavenly life. To the Twelve it was "expedient that Christ should go away" that the Comforter should come, and so they might know Christ in the higher spiritual aspect and in His new life-giving power, and not merely "after the flesh," in the carnal aspect of Him (Romans 6. 9-11; 1 Corinthians 15. 45; 1 Peter 3. 18; 4. 1, 2). Doubtless Judaizing Christians at Corinth prided themselves on the mere fleshly (ch. 11. 18) advantage of their belonging to Israel, the nation of Christ, or on their having seen Him in the flesh, and thence claimed superiority over others as having a nearer connection with Him (v. 12; ch. 10. 7). St. Paul here shows the true aim should be to know Him spiritually as new creatures (v. 15, 17), and that outward relations towards Him profit nothing (Luke 18. 19-21; John 16. 7, 22; Philipians 3. 3-10). This is at variance with both Romish Mariolatry and transubstantiation. Two distinct Greek verbs are used here for "know;" the first ("know we no man") means "to be personally acquainted with;" the latter ("known Christ . . . know . . . more") is to recognize, or estimate. St. Paul's estimate of Christ, or the expected Messiah, was carnal, but is so now no more. 17. Therefore—Connected with the words in v. 16, "We know Christ no more after the flesh." As Christ has entered on His new heavenly life by His resurrection and ascension, so all who are "in Christ" (i. e., united to Him by faith as the branch is in the vine) are new creatures (Romans 6. 9-11). "New" in the Greek implies a new nature quite different from anything previously existing, not merely recent, which is expressed by a different Greek word (Galatians 6. 15). creature—lit., "creation," and so the creature resulting from the creation (cf. John 3. 8, 5; Ephesians 2. 10; 4. 23; Colossians 3. 10, 11). As we are "in Christ" so "God was in Christ" (v. 19); hence He is Mediator between God and us. old things—selfish, carnal views (cf. v. 16) of ourselves, of other men, and of Christ. passed away—spontaneously, like the snow of early spring [BENJEL] before the advancing sun. behold—implying an allusion to Isaiah 43. 19, and 65. 17. 18. all [THE, Greek] things—all our privileges in this new creation (v. 14, 15). reconciled us—i. e., restored us ("the world," v. 19) to His favour by satisfying the claims of justice against us. Our position judicially considered in the eye of the law is altered, not as though the mediation of Christ had made a change in God's character, nor as if the love of God was produced by the mediation of Christ; nay, the mediation and sacrifice of Christ was the provision of God's love, not its moving cause (Romans 8. 32). Christ's blood was the price paid at the expense of God himself, and was required to reconcile the exercise of mercy with justice, not as separate, but as the eternally harmonious attributes in the one and the same God (Romans 3. 25, 26). The Greek "reconcile" is reciprocally used as in the Hebrew Hithpael conjugation, appeare, obtain the favour of. Matthew 5. 24, "Be reconciled to thy brother;" i. e., take measures that he be reconciled to thee, as well as thou to him, as the context proves. Dialogethi, however (Matthew 5. 24), implying mutual reconciliation, is distinct from Katallagethi here, the latter referring to the change of status wrought in one of the two parties. The manner of God reconciling the world to Himself is implied (v. 19), viz., by His "not imputing their trespasses to them." God not merely, as subsequently, reconciles the world by inducing them to lay aside their enmity, but in the first instance, does so by satisfying His own justice and righteous enmity against sin (Psalm 1. 11). Cf. 1 Samuel 29. 4, "Reconcile himself unto his master;" not remove his own anger against his master, but his master's against him. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE, Atonement.] The reconciling of men to God by their laying aside their enmity is the consequence of God laying aside His just enmity against their sin, and follows at v. 20. to us—ministers (v. 19, 20). 19. God was in Christ, reconciling—i. e., God was BY Christ (in virtue of Christ's intervention) reconciling, &c. "Was reconciling" implies the time when the act of reconciliation was being carried into effect (v. 21), viz., when "God made Jesus, who knew no sin, to be sin for us." The compound of "was" and the participle "reconciling," instead of the imperfect (Greek), may also imply the continuous purpose of God, from before the foundation of the world, to reconcile man to Himself, whose fall was foreseen. The expression "IN Christ" for "by Christ" may be used to imply additionally that God was IN Christ (John 10. 38; 14. 10), and so by Christ (the God-man) was reconciling, &c. The Greek for "by" or through Christ (the best MSS. omit "Jesus"), v. 18, is different. "In" must mean here in the person of Christ. The Greek Katallasson implies "changing" or altering the judicial status from one of condemnation to one of justification. The atonement (at-one-ment), or reconciliation, is the removal of the bar to peace and acceptance with a holy God, which His righteousness interposed against our sin. The first step towards restoring peace between us and God was on God's side (John 3. 16). The change therefore now to be effected must be on the part of offending man, God the offended One being already reconciled. It is man, not God, who now needs to be reconciled, and to lay aside his enmity against God (Romans 5. 10, 11). ("We have received the atonement" [Greek, "reconciliation"], cannot mean "We have received the laying aside of our own enmity.") Cf. Romans 3. 24, 25. the world—all men (Colossians 1. 20; 1 John 2. 2). The manner of the reconciling is by His "not imputing to men their trespasses," but imputing them to Christ the Sin-bearer. There is no incongruity that a Father should be offended with that son whom He loveth, and at that time offended with him when He loveth him. So, though God loved men whom He created, yet He was offended with them when they sinned, and gave His Son to suffer for them, that through that Son's obedience He might be reconciled to them [reconcile them to Himself, i. e., restore them with justice to His favour]. [BISHOP PEARSON, Creed.] hath committed unto us—Greek, "hath put into our hands." "Us," i. e., ministers. 20. For Christ . . . in Christ's stead—The Greek of both is the same; translate in both cases, "on Christ's behalf." be ye reconciled to God—English Version here inserts "ye," which is not in the original, and which gives the wrong impression, as if it were emphatic thus: God is reconciled to you, be ye reconciled to God. The Greek expresses rather, God was the RECONCILER in Christ . . . let this reconciliation then have its designed effect. Be reconciled to God, i. e., let God reconcile you to Himself (v. 18, 19). beseech . . . pray—rather, entreat [plead with you] . . . beseech." Such "beseeching" is uncommon in the case of "ambassadors," who generally stand on their dignity (cf. ch. 10. 2; 1 Thessalonians 2. 6, 7). 21. For—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The grand reason why they should be reconciled to God, viz., the great atonement in Christ provided by God, is stated without the "for" as being part of the message of reconciliation (v. 19). he—God. sin—not a sin offering, which would destroy the antithesis to "righteousness," and would make "sin" be used in different senses in the same sentence: not a sinful person, which would be untrue, and would require in the antithesis "righteous men," not "righteousness;" but "sin," i. e., the representative Sin-bearer (vicariously) of the aggregate sin of all men past, present, and future. The sin of the world is one, therefore the singular, not the plural, is used; though its manifestations are manifold (John 1. 29). "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Cf. "made a curse for us." Galatians 3. 13 for us—Greek

'in our behalf' Cf. John 3. 14, Christ being represented by the brazen serpent, the form, but not the substance, of the old serpent. At His death on the cross the sin-bearing for us was consummated. knew no sin—by personal experience (John 8. 46). [ALFORD.] Hebrews 7. 26; 1 Peter 2. 21; 1 John 3. 5. might be made—Not the same Greek as the previous "made." Rather, "might become." the righteousness of God—Not merely righteous, but righteousness itself; not merely righteousness, but righteousness of God, because Christ is God, and what He is we are (1 John 4. 17), and He is "made of God unto us righteousness." As our sin is made over to Him, so His righteousness to us (in His having fulfilled all the righteousness of the law for us all, as our representative (Jeremiah 23. 6; 1 Corinthians 1. 30). The innocent was punished voluntarily as if guilty, that the guilty might be gratuitously rewarded as if innocent (1 Peter 2. 24). "Such are we in the sight of God the Father, as is the very Son of God himself." [HOOKER.] in him—by virtue of our standing in Him, and in union with Him. [ALFORD.]

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-18. HIS APOSTOLIC MINISTRY IS APPROVED BY FAITHFULNESS IN EXHORTATION, IN SUFFERINGS, IN EXHIBITION OF THE FRUITS OF THE HOLY GHOST: HIS largeness of HEART TO THEM CALLS FOR ENLARGEMENT OF THEIR HEART TO HIM. EXHORTATIONS TO SEPARATION FROM POLLUTION. 1. workers together—with God (Acts 15. 4; 1 Corinthians 3. 9). Not only as "ambassadors," beseech—entreat (ch. 5. 20). He is describing his ministry, not exhorting directly. you also—rather, "I also (as well as God, ch. 5. 20) beseech" or "entreat you:" v. 14, 15, on to ch. 7. 1, is part of this entreaty or exhortation. in vain—by making the grace of God a ground for continuance in sin (v. 3). By a life of sin, showing that the word of reconciliation has been in vain, so far as you are concerned (Hebrews 12. 15; Jude 4). "The grace of God" here, is "the reconciliation" provided by God's love (ch. 5. 18, 19; cf. Galatians 2. 2). 2. For—God's own promise is the ground of our exhortation. he saith—God the Father saith to God the Son, and so to all believers who are regarded as one with Him. heard thee—In the eternal purposes of my love I have hearkened to thy prayer for the salvation of thy people (cf. John 17. 9, 15, 20, 24). accepted . . . accepted—The Greek of the latter is more emphatic, "well-accepted." What was "an accepted time" in the prophecy (Isaiah 49. 8, Hebrew, "in the season of grace"), becomes "the well-accepted time" in the fulfilment (cf. Psalm 69. 13). As it is God's time of receiving sinners, receive ye His grace: accept (v. 1) the word of reconciliation in His accepted time. in the day of salvation—"in a day of salvation" (Luke 4. 18, 19, 21; 19. 42; Hebrews 3. 7). 3. Resuming the connection with v. 1, interrupted by the parenthetical v. 2. "Giving no offence" (cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 33), "approving ourselves," and all the other participles down to v. 10, are nominatives to "we also entreat you" (v. 1), to show the pains he took to enforce his exhortation by example, as well as precept. [ALFORD.] "Offence" would be given, if we were without "patience" and the other qualifications which he therefore subjoins (cf. Romans 14. 13). 4. Translate, to mark the true order of the Greek words, "In everything, as God's ministers recommending ourselves," i. e., that our hearers may give our message a favourable hearing, through our consistency in every respect, not that they may glorify us. Alluding to ch. 3. 1, he implies, We commend ourselves, not like them by word, but by deed. patience—(Ch. 12. 12.) Put first. "Pure-minded" follows (v. 6). Three triplets of trials exercising the "patience" (patient endurance) follow: Afflictions (or "tribulations"), necessities, distresses (or "straits"); stripes, imprisonments, tumults; labours, watchings, fastings. The first triplet expresses afflictions generally; the second, those in particular arising from the violence of men; the third, those which he brought on himself directly or indirectly. 5. stripes—(Ch. 11. 23, 24; Acts 16. 23.) imprisonments—(Ch. 11. 23.) He had been, doubtless, elsewhere

imprisoned besides at Philippi, when he wrote this Epistle. tumults—(Acts 13. 50; 14. 5, 19; 16. 22; and recently 19. 23-41.) labours—in the cause of Christ (ch. 11. 23; Romans 16. 12). watchings—(Ch. 11. 27.) Sleepless nights, fastings—The context here refers to his trials, rather than devotional exercises (cf. ch. 11. 27). Thus "foodlessness" would seem to be the sense (cf. 1 Corinthians 4. 11, Philippians 4. 12). But the usual sense of the Greek is fasts, in the strict sense; and in ch. 11. 27 it is spoken of independently of "hunger and thirst." (Cf. Luke 2. 37; Acts 10. 30; 14. 23.) However, Matthew 15. 32; Mark 8. 2 justify the sense, more favoured by the context, foodlessness, though a rare use of the word. GAUSSEN remarks "The apostles combine the highest offices with the humblest exterior: as everything in the Church was to be cast in the mould of death and resurrection, the cardinal principle throughout Christianity." 6. By . . . by, &c.—rather, as Greek, "In . . . in," &c., implying not the instrument, but the sphere or element in which his ministry moved. knowledge—spiritual: in Gospel mysteries, unattainable by mere reason (1 Corinthians 2. 6-16; 2 Corinthians 3. 6, 17, 18). long-suffering . . . kindness—associated with "charity" or "love" (1 Corinthians 13. 4), as here. by the Holy Ghost—in virtue of His influences which produce these graces, and other gifts, "love unfeigned" being the foremost of them. 7. By the word of truth, by the power of God—rather, "IN . . . in," &c. As to "the word of truth" (cf. ch. 4. 2; Colossians 1. 5), and "the (miraculous) power of God" (ch. 4. 7); 1 Corinthians 2. 4, "in demonstration of the Spirit and of power," by the armour-Greek, "through" or "by means of the armour," &c. "Righteousness," which is the breastplate alone in Ephesians 6. 13-17, here is made the whole Christian panoply (cf. ch. 10. 4). on . . . right . . . and . . . left—i. e. guarding on every side. 8. Translate, "Through glory and dishonour" (disgrace), vis., from those in authority, and accruing to us present. "By," or "through evil report and good report," from the multitude, and affecting us absent. [BENGEL.] Regarded "as deceivers" by those who, not knowing (v. 9), dishonour and give us an evil report; "as true," by those who "know" (v. 9) us to be the real "glory" of our ministry. In proportion as one has more or less of glory and good report, in that degree has he more or less of dishonour and evil report. 9. unknown . . . yet well known—"unknown" in our true character to those who "evil report" of us. "Well known" to those who hold us in "good report" (v. 8). CONYBEARE explains, "Unknown by men, yet acknowledged by God" (1 Corinthians 13. 12). Perhaps both God and men (believers) are intended as knowing him (ch. 5. 11, and 11. 6). dying . . . live—(ch. 1. 9; 4. 10, 11; 11. 23.) Cf. GAUSSEN'S remark, Note, v. 5. "Behold" calls attention to the fact as something beyond all expectation. chastened . . . not killed—realizing Psalm 118. 18. 10. The "as" no longer is used to express the opinion of his adversaries, but the real state of him and his fellow-labourers. making many rich—Spiritually (1 Corinthians 1. 5), after the example of our Lord, who "by his poverty made many rich" (ch. 8. 9) having nothing—Whatever of earthly goods we have, and these are few, we have as though we had not; as tenants removable at will, not owners (1 Corinthians 7. 30). possessing all things—The Greek implies firm possession, holding fast in possession (cf. 1 Corinthians 3. 21, 22). The things both of the present and of the future are, in the truest sense, the believer's in possession, for he possesses them all in Christ, his lasting possession, though the full fruition of them is reserved for the future eternity. 11. mouth . . . open unto you—I use no concealment, such as some at Corinth have insinuated (ch. 4. 2). I use all freedom and openness of speech to you as to beloved friends. Hence he introduces here, "O Corinthians" (cf. Philippians 4. 15). The enlargement of his heart towards them (ch. 7. 3) produced his openness of mouth, i. e., his unreserved expression of his inmost feelings. As an unloving man is narrow in heart, so the apostle's heart is enlarged by love, so as to take in his converts at Corinth, not only with their graces, but with their many shortcomings (cf. 1 Kings 4. 29; Psalm 119. 36)

Isaiah 60. 5). 12. Any constraint ye feel towards me, or narrowness of heart, is not from want of largeness of heart on my part towards you, but from want of it on your part towards me; "bowels," i. e., affections (cf. ch. 12. 15). not straitened in us—i. e., for want of room in our hearts to take you in. 13. Translate, "As a recompense in the same kind . . . be enlarged also yourselves." [ELLICOTT, &c.] "In the same way" as my heart is enlarged towards you (v. 11), and "as a recompense" for it (Galatians 4. 12). I speak as unto my children—as children would naturally be expected to recompense their parents' love with similar love. 14. Be not—Greek*, "Become not." unequally yoked—"yoked with one alien in spirit." The image is from the symbolical precept of the law (Leviticus 19. 19), "Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind;" or the precept (Deuteronomy 22. 10), "Thou shalt not plough with an ox and an ass together." Cf. Deuteronomy 7. 3, forbidding marriages with the heathen; also 1 Corinthians 7. 39. The believer and unbeliever are utterly heterogeneous. Too close intercourse with unbelievers in other relations also is included (v. 13; 1 Corinthians 8. 10; 10. 14). fellowship—i. e., share, or participation. righteousness—the state of the believer, justified by faith. unrighteousness—rather, as always translated elsewhere, "iniquity;" the state of the unbeliever, the fruit of unbelief. light—of which believers are the children (1 Thessalonians 5. 5). 15. Belial—Hebrew*, "worthlessness, unprofitableness, wickedness." As Satan is opposed to God, and Antichrist to Christ; Belial being here opposed to Christ, must denounce all manner of Antichristian uncleanness. [BENGEL.] he that believeth with an infidel—translate*, "a believer with an unbeliever." 16. agreement—accordance of sentiments (cf. 1 Kings 18. 21; Ephesians 5. 7, 11). the temple of God—i. e., you believers (1 Corinthians 3. 16; 6. 19). with idols—Cf. Dagon before the ark (1 Samuel 5. 24). as—"even as God said." Quotation from Leviticus 26. 12; Jeremiah 31. 33; 32. 38; Ezekiel 37. 28, 27; cf. Matthew 28. 20; John 14. 23. walk in them—rather, "among them." As "dwell" implies the Divine presence, so "walk," the Divine operation. God's dwelling in the body and soul of saints may be illustrated by its opposite, demoniacal possession of body and soul. my people—rather, "they shall be to me a people." 17. Quoted from Isaiah 52. 11, with the freedom of one inspired, who gives variations sanctioned by the Holy Spirit. be ye separate—"be separated" (Hosea 4. 17). touch not the unclean thing—rather, "anything unclean" (ch. 7. 1; Micah 2. 10). Touching is more polluting, as implying participation, than seeing. receive you—The Greek implies, "to myself;" as persons heretofore out of doors, but now admitted within (ch. 5. 1-10). With this accords the clause, "Come out from among them," viz., so as to be received to me. So Ezekiel 20. 41, "I will accept you;" and Zephaniah 3. 19, "gather her that was driven out." "The intercourse of believers with the world should resemble that of angels, who, when they have been sent a message from heaven, discharge their office with the utmost promptness, and joyfully fly back home to the presence of God" (1 Corinthians 7. 31; 5. 9, 10). 18. Translate, "I will be to you in the relation of a Father, and ye shall be to me in the relation of sons," &c. This is a still more endearing relation than (v. 16), "I will be their God, and they . . . my people." Cf. the promise to Solomon (1 Chronicles 28. 6; Isaiah 43. 6; Revelation 21. 3, 7; Jeremiah 31. 1, 9). Lord Almighty—The Lord the Universal Ruler: nowhere else found but in Revelation. The greatness of the Promiser enhances the greatness of the promises.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-16. SELF-PURIFICATION THEIR DUTY RESULTING FROM THE FOREGOING. HIS LOVE TO THEM, AND JOY AT THE GOOD EFFECTS ON THEM OF HIS FORMER EPISTLE, AS REPORTED BY TITUS. 1. cleanse ourselves—This is the conclusion of the exhortation (ch. 6. 1, 14; 1 John 3. 3; Revelation 22. 11). filthiness—"the unclean thing" (ch. 4. 17). of the flesh—for instance, fornication, prevalent at Corinth (1 Corinthians 6. 15-18). and spirit—for instance, idolatry, direct or indirect (1 Corinthians 6. 8; 3. 1, 7; 10. 7, 21, 22). The spirit (Psalm 32. 2) receives pollution through the flesh, the instrument of uncleanness. perfecting holiness—The cleansing away impurity is a positive step towards holiness (ch. 6. 17). It is not enough to begin; the end crowns the work (Galatians 3. 3; 5. 7; Philippians 1. 6). fear of God—often conjoined with the consideration of the most glorious promises (ch. 5. 11; Hebrews 4. 1). Privilege and promise go hand in hand. 2. Receive us—with enlarged hearts (ch. 6. 13). we have wronged . . . corrupted . . . defrauded no man—(cf. v. 9.) This is the ground on which he asks their reception of (making room for) him in their hearts. We wronged none by an undue exercise of apostolic authority; v. 13 gives an instance in point. We have corrupted none, viz., by beguilements and flatteries, while preaching "another Gospel," as the false teachers did (ch. 11. 3, 4). We have defrauded none by "making a gain" of you (ch. 12. 17). Modestly he leaves them to supply the positive good which he had done; suffering all things himself that they might be benefited (v. 9, 12; ch. 12. 13). 3. In excusing myself, I do not accuse you, as though you suspected me of such things [MENOCHIUS], or as though you were guilty of such things; for I speak only of the false apostles. [ESTIUS, and Greek commentators.] Rather, "as though you were ungrateful and treacherous." [BEZA.] I . . . said before—in ch. 6. 11, 12; cf. Philippians 1. 7. die and live with you—the height of friendship. I am ready to die and live with you and for you (Philippians 1. 7, 20, 24; 2. 17, 18). Cf. as to Christ, John 10. 11. 4. boldness of speech—(cf. ch. 6. 11.) glorying of you—Not only do I speak with unreserved openness to you, but I glory (boast) greatly to others in your behalf, in speaking of you. filled with comfort—at the report of Titus (v. 6, 7, 9, 13; ch. 1. 4). exceeding joyful—Greek*, I overabound with joy (v. 7, 9, 16). our tribulation—described in v. 5; also in ch. 4. 7, 8; 6. 4, 5. Greek, "For also" (for "even"). This verse is thus connected with ch. 2. 12, 13, "When I came to Troas, I had no rest in my spirit;" so "also" now, when I came to Macedonia, my "flesh" had no rest (he, by the term "flesh," excepts his spiritual consolations) from "fightings with adversaries "without" (1 Corinthians 5. 12), and from fears for the Corinthian believers "within" the Church, owing to "false brethren" (ch. 11. 26). Cf. ch. 4. 8. Deuteronomy 32. 25, to which he seems to allude. 6. Translate in the order required by the Greek, "But he that comforteth those that are cast down, even God." Those that are of an high spirit are not susceptible of such comfort. 7. when he told us—Greek*, "telling us." We shared in the comfort which Titus felt in recording your desire (v. 13). He rejoiced in telling the news; we in hearing them. [ALFORD.] earnest desire—Greek*, "longing desire," viz., to see me [GROTIUS]; or, in general, towards me, to please me. mourning—over your own remissness in not having immediately punished the sin (1 Corinthians 5. 1, &c.) which called forth my rebuke. servent mind—Greek*, "zeal" (cf. v. 11; John 2. 17). toward me—Greek*, "for me;" for my sake. They in Paul's behalf showed the zeal against the sin which Paul would have shown had he been present. rejoiced the more—more than before, at the mere coming of Titus. 8. with a letter—Greek*, "in the letter," viz., the first Epistle to the Corinthians. I do not repent, though I did repent—translate*, "I do not regret it, though I did regret it." The Greek words for regret and repent are distinct. St. Paul was almost regretting, through parental tenderness, his having used rebukes calculated to grieve the Corinthians; but now that he has learned from Titus the salutary effect produced on them, he no longer regrets it. for I perceive, &c.—This is explanatory of "I did repent" or "regret it," and is parenthetical ("for I perceive that that Epistle did make you sorry, though it was but for a season"). 9. Now I rejoice—Whereas "I did repent" or regret having made you sorry by my letter, I rejoice now, not that ye were caused sorrow, but that your sorrow resulted in your repentance. ye sorrowed—rather, as before, "ye were made sorry." after a godly manner—i. e.*, "according to God," i. e., your sorrow having regard to God, and rendering your mind conformable to God (Romans 12. 22; 1 Peter 4. 6). that—translate in Greek order, "to the end that (cf. ch. 11. 9) ye might in nothing receive damage from us," which ye would have received, had your sorrow been other than that "after a godly manner" (v. 10). 10. worketh . . . worketh—In the best Greek reading the translation is, "worketh (simply) . . . worketh out." "Sorrow" is not repentance, but, where it is "godly," "worketh" it; i. e., contributes or tends to it (the same Greek word is in Romans 13. 10). The "sorrow of the world" (i. e., such as is felt by the worldly) "worketh out," as its result at last, (eternal) death (the same Greek verb is in ch. 4. 17, where see the Note). repentance . . . not to be repented of—There is not in the Greek this play on words, so that the word qualified is not "repentance" merely, but "repentance unto salvation;" this, he says, none will ever regret, however attended with "sorrow" at the time. "Repentance" implies a coming to a right mind; "regret" implies merely uneasiness of feeling at the past or present, and is applied even to the remorse of Judas (Matthew 27. 3; Greek, "stricken with remorse," not as English Version, "repented himself"); so that, though always accompanying repentance, it is not always accompanied by repentance. "Repentance" removes the impediments in the way of "salvation" (to which "death," viz., of the soul, is opposed). "The sorrow of the world" is not at the sin itself, but at its penal consequences: so that the tears of pain are no sooner dried up, than the pleasures of iniquity are renewed. So Pharaoh, Exodus 9. 27, 28-30; and Saul, 1 Samuel 15. 23-30. Cf. Isaiah 9. 13; Revelation 16. 10, 11. Contrast David's "godly sorrow," 2 Samuel 12. 13, and St. Peter's, Matthew 26. 75. 11. Confirmation of v. 10 from the Corinthians' own experience. carefulness—solicitude, lit., "diligence:" opposed to their past negligence in the matter. in you—Greek, "for you." yea—not only "carefulness" or diligence, but also "clearing of yourselves," viz., to me by Titus: anxiety to show you disapproved of the deed. indignation—against the offender. fear—of the wrath of God, and of sinning any more [SCLATER and CALVIN]: fear of Paul [GROTIUS] (1 Corinthians 4. 2, 19-21). vehement desire—longing for restoration to Paul's approval. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] "Fear" is in spite of one's self. "Longing desire" is spontaneous, and implies strong love and an aspiration for correction. [CALVIN.] "Desire" for the presence of Paul, as he had given them the hope of it (1 Corinthians 4. 19; 16. 5). [GROTIUS and ESTIUS.] zeal—for right and for God's honour against what is wrong. Or, "for the good of the soul of the offender." [BENGL.] revenge—translate, "Exacting of punishment" (1 Corinthians 5. 2, 3). Their "carefulness" was exhibited in the six points just specified: "clearing of themselves," and "indignation" in relation to themselves; "fear" and "vehement desire" in respect to the apostle; "zeal" and "revenge" in respect to the offender [BENGL.] (cf. v. 7). In all—the respects just stated. clear—Greek, "pure," viz., from complicity in the guilty deed. "Approved yourselves," Greek, "commended yourselves." Whatever suspicion of complicity rested on you (1 Corinthians 5. 2, 6) through your former remissness, you have cleared off by your present strenuousness in reprobating the deed. 12. though I wrote unto you—"making you sorry with my letter" (v. 8). his cause that suffered wrong—the father of the incestuous person who had his father's wife (1 Corinthians 5. 1). The father, thus it seems, was alive. that our care for you, &c.—Some of the oldest MSS. read thus, "That YOUR care for us might be made manifest unto you," &c. But the words, "unto you," thus, would be rather obscure; still the obscurity of the genuine reading may have been the very reason for the change being made by correctors into the reading of English Version. ALFORD explains the reading: "He wrote in order to bring out their zeal on his behalf (i. e., to obey his command), and make it manifest to themselves in God's sight, i. e., to bring out among them their zeal to regard and obey him." But some of the oldest MSS. and versions (including the Vulgate and old Italian) support English Version. And the words, "to you," suit it better than the other reading. Ch. 2. 4, "I wrote . . . that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you," plainly accords with it, and disproves ALFORD's assertion that English Version is inconsistent with the fact as to the purpose of his letter. His writing, he says was not so much for the sake of the individual offender, or the individual offended, but from his "earnest care" or concern for the welfare of the Church. 13. The oldest MSS. read thus, "Therefore (Greek, "for this cause," viz., because our aim has been attained) we have been (English Version, "were," is not so accurate) comforted; yea (Greek, "but"), in our comfort we exceedingly the more joyed for the joy of Titus," &c. (cf. v. 7). 14. anything—i. e., at all. I am not ashamed—"I am not put to shame," viz., by learning from Titus that you did not realize the high character I gave him of you. as . . . all things . . . in truth, even so our boasting . . . is found a truth—As our speaking in general to you was true (ch. 1. 18), so our particular boasting rather Titus concerning you is now, by his report, proved to be truth (cf. ch. 9. 2). Some oldest MSS. read expressly, "concerning you:" this in either reading is the sense. 15. his inward affection—lit., bowels (cf. ch. 6. 12; Philippians 1. 8; 2. 1; Colossians 3. 12). obedience—(Ch. 2. 9.) fear and trembling—with trembling anxiety to obey my wishes, and fearful lest there should be aught in yourselves to offend him and me (v. 11; cf. 1 Corinthians 2. 3). 16. therefore—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The conclusion is more emphatical without it. that I have confidence in you in all things—rather, as Greek, "that in everything I am of good courage concerning (lit., in the case of) you," as contrasted with my former doubts concerning you.

CHAPTER VIII.

VER. 1-24. THE COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS; THE READINESS OF THE MACEDONIANS A PATTERN TO THE CORINTHIANS; CHRIST THE HIGHEST PATTERN; EACH IS TO GIVE WILLINGLY AFTER HIS ABILITY; TITUS AND TWO OTHERS ARE THE AGENTS ACCREDITED TO COMPLETE THE COLLECTION. 1. we do you to wit—we make known to you. the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia—Their liberality was not of themselves naturally, but of God's grace bestowed on them, and enabling them to be the instrument of God's "grace" to others (v. 6, 19). The importance given in this Epistle to the collection, arose as well from St. Paul's engagement (Galatians 2. 10), as also chiefly from his hope to conciliate the Judaizing Christians at Jerusalem to himself and the Gentile believers, by such an act of love on the part of the latter towards their Jewish brethren. 2. trial of affliction—The Greek expresses, "In affliction (or "tribulation") which tested them;" lit., "in a great testing of affliction." abundance of their joy—The greater was the depth of their poverty, the greater was the abundance of their joy. A delightful contrast in terms, and triumph, in fact, of spirit over flesh. their deep poverty—Greek, "their poverty down to the death of it." abounded unto the riches, &c.—Another beautiful contrast in terms: Their poverty had the effect, not of producing stinted gifts, but of "abounding in the riches of liberality" (not as Margin, "simplicity;" though the idea of singleness of motive to God's glory and man's good, probably enters into the idea) (cf. Romans 12. 8, and Margin; ch. 9. 11, Note, 13; James 1. 5). 3-5. they were willing—rather, supply from v. 5, the ellipsis thus, "According to their power . . . yea, and beyond their power, THEY GAVE." of themselves—not only not being besought, but themselves beseeching us. 4. that we would receive—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Translate therefore, "Beseeching of us . . . the grace and fellowship of (i. e., to grant them the favour of sharing in) the ministering unto the saints." The Macedonian contributions must have been from Philippi, because Philippi was the only Church that contributed to St. Paul's support (Philippians 4. 10, 15, 16). 5. And this they did, not as we hoped—translate, "And not as we hoped (i. e., far beyond our hopes), but their own selves gave them first to the Lord." "First," not indicating

priority of time, but first of all, above all in importance. The giving of themselves takes precedence of their other gifts, as being the motive which led them to the latter (Romans 15. 16). by the will of God—not “according to the will of God,” but “moved by the will of God, who made them willing” (Philippians 2. 13). It is therefore called (v. 1), “the grace of God.” 6. Inasmuch that—As we saw the Macedonians’ alacrity in giving, we could not but exhort Titus, that as we collected in Macedonia, so he in Corinth should complete the work of collecting which he had already begun there, lest ye, the wealthy people of Corinth, should be outdone in liberality by the poor Macedonians. as he had begun—Greek, “previously begun,” viz., the collection at Corinth, before the Macedonians began to contribute, during the visit to Corinth from which he had just returned. finish in you the same grace—complete among you this act of grace or beneficence on your part. also—as well as other things which he had to do among them. [ALFORD.] 7. in faith—(ch. 1. 24.) utterance—(Note, 1 Corinthians 1. 5.) Not as ALFORD, “doctrine” or “word.” knowledge—(1 Corinthians 8. 1.) diligence—in everything that is good. your love to us—lit., “love from you (i. e., on your part) in us” (i. e., which has us for its object; which is felt in the case of us). 8. not by commandment—“not by way of commandment.” by the occasion of the forwardness of others, and, &c.—rather, “But by (mention of) the forwardness of others (as an inducement to you), and to prove (lit., proving) the sincerity of your love.” The Greek is “by means of,” not “on account of the forwardness,” &c. BENGEL, ELLICOTT, &c. translate, “By means of the forwardness of others, proving the sincerity of your love also.” The former is the simpler construction in the Greek. 9. ye know the grace—the act of grateful love whereby the Lord emptied Himself of His previous heavenly glory (Philippians 2. 6, 7) for your sakes. became poor—Yet this is not demanded of you (v. 14); but merely that, without impoverishing yourselves, you should relieve others with your abundance. If the Lord did so much more, and at so much heavier a cost, for your sakes; much more may you do an act of love to your brethren at so little a sacrifice of self. might be rich—in the heavenly glory which constitutes His riches, and all other things, so far as is really good for us (cf. 1 Corinthians 3. 21, 22). 10. advice—Herein he does not (as some misinterpret the passage) disclaim inspiration for the advice he gives; but under the Spirit, states that it is his “opinion” [ALFORD] or “judgment” [ELLICOTT, &c.], not a command, that so their offering might be free and spontaneous. this—my giving you an advice, not a command. who have begun before—“seeing that ye have begun before” the Macedonian churches; “a year ago” should be connected with this clause. not only to do, but also to be forward—There were three steps: (1.) the forwardness, more lit., “the will;” (2.) the setting about it, lit., “doing it;” (3.) completion of it. [ALFORD.] In the two former, not only the act, but the intention, the Corinthians preceded the Macedonians. BENGEL explains, “Not only to do” FOR THE PAST YEAR, “but also to be forward” or willing FOR THIS YEAR. ELLICOTT translates, “already,” instead of “before:” “Ye began already a year ago, not only to do, but also to be forward.” It appears hence, that something had been done in the matter a year before; other texts, however, show the collection was not yet paid (cf. v. 11 and ch. 9. 5, 7). This agrees with one, and only one, supposition, viz., that every man had laid by in store the fund from which he was afterwards to contribute, the very case which is shown by 1 Corinthians 16. 2 to have existed. [PALEY’S Horæ Paulinæ.] 11. perform—“complete the doing also” (Note, v. 10). a readiness to will—Greek, “the readiness of will;” referring to v. 10, where the Greek for “to be forward,” ought to be translated as here, “to will.” performance—“completion.” [ALFORD.] The godly should show the same zeal to finish, as well as to begin well, which the worldly exhibit in their undertakings (Jeremiah 44. 25). 12. For—Following up the rule “out of that which ye have” (v. 11), and no more. a willing mind—rather, as Greek, “the readiness,” viz., to will, referring to v. 11. accepted—Greek “favourably accepted.” according to that a man hath—The oldest MSS. omit “a man.” Translate, “According to whatsoever it have;” the willing mind, or “readiness” to will, is personified. [ALFORD.] Or better, as BENGEL, “He is accepted according to whatsoever he have;” so ch. 9. 7, “The Lord loveth a cheerful giver.” Cf. as to David, 1 Kings 8. 18. God accepts the will for the deed. He judges not according to what a man has the opportunity to do, but according to what he would do if he had the opportunity (cf. Mark 14. 8; and the widow’s mite, Luke 21. 3. 4). 13. For—Supply from v. 8, “I speak.” My aim is not that others (viz., the saints at Jerusalem) may be relieved at the cost of your being “distressed” (so the Greek for “burdened”). The golden rule is, “Love thy neighbour as thyself,” not more than thyself. 14. by an equality—“by the rule of equality” [ALFORD]: lit., “out of equality.” now at this time—Greek, “at the present juncture” or season. that their abundance also—The Greek being distinct from the previous “that,” translate “in order that,” viz., at another season, when your relative circumstances may be reversed. The reference is solely to temporal wants and supplies. Those, as BENGEL, who quote Romans 15. 27 for interpreting it of spiritual supplies from the Jews to the Gentiles, forget that Romans 15. 27 refers to the past benefit spiritually, which the Jews have conferred on the Gentiles, as a motive to gratitude on the part of the latter, not to a prospective benefit to be looked for from the former, which the text refers to. 15. Exodus 16. 18; LXX. As God gave an equal portion of manna to all the Israelites, whether they could gather much or little; so Christians should promote by liberality an equality, so that none should need the necessities of life whilst others have superfluities. “Our luxuries should yield to our neighbour’s comforts; and our comforts to his necessities.” [J. HOWARD.] 16, 17. Returning to the subject of v. 6. for you—translate, “Which put the same earnest care for you into the heart of Titus,” as was in myself. My care for you led me to “desire” him (v. 6 and 17, “exhortation,” the same Greek); but Titus had of himself the same care, whence he “accepted (gladly) my exhortation” (v. 17) to go to you (v. 6). being more forward—more earnest than to need such exhortation. he went—Greek, “went forth.” We should say, he is going forth; but the ancients put the past tense in letter-writing, as the things will have been past by the time that the correspondent receives the letter. “Of his own accord,” i. e., it is true he has been exhorted by me to go, but he shows that he has anticipated my desires, and already, “of his own accord,” has desired to go. 18. the brother, whose praise is in the Gospel—whose praise is known in connection with the Gospel: Luke may be meant; not that “the Gospel” here refers to his written Gospel; but the language implies some one well known throughout the churches, and at that time with Paul, as Luke then was (Acts 20. 6). Not a Macedonian, as appears from ch. 9. 4. Of all Paul’s “companions in travel” (v. 19; Acts 19. 29), St. Luke was the most prominent, having been his companion in preaching the Gospel at his first entrance into Europe (Acts 16. 10). The fact that the person here referred to was “chosen of the churches” as their trustee to travel with Paul in conveying the contribution to Jerusalem, implies that he had resided among them some time before: this is true of St. Luke, who after parting from St. Paul at Philippi (as he marks by the change from “we” to “they,” Acts 16.) six years before, he now again found in his company in Macedonia. In the interim he had probably become so well known that “his praise was throughout all the churches.” Cf. ch. 12. 18. Philemon 24. He who is faithful in the Gospel will be faithful also in matters of inferior importance. [BENGEL.] 19. not that only—not only praised in all the churches. chosen—by vote: so the Greek. of the churches—therefore these companions of Paul are called “messengers of the churches” (v. 23). to travel—to Jerusalem. with this grace—Greek, “in the case of this grace,” or “gift.” to the glory of the same Lord—The oldest MSS. omit “same.” declaration of your ready mind—The oldest

MSS. read, "our," not your. This and the previous clause, "to the glory of the same Lord," do not follow "administered by us," but "chosen of the churches to travel," &c. The union of the brother with St. Paul in this affair of the collection was done to guard against suspicious injurious "to the glory" of the Lord. It was also done in order to produce a "readiness" on the part of Paul and the brother to undertake the office which each, by himself, would have been less ready to undertake, for fear of suspicions arising (v. 20) as to their appropriation of any of the money. 20. Avoiding—taking precautions against this. In this abundance—in the case of this abundance. 21. LXX. (Proverbs 3. 4; Romans 12. 17). The oldest MSS. read, "For we provide." honest things—things honourable. 22. This second brother, BIRKS supposes to be Trophimus; for a Macedonian is not meant (ch. 9. 4); probably the same as was sent before with Titus (ch. 12. 18); and therefore sent from Ephesus, and probably an Ephesian: all this is true of Trophimus. oftentimes . . . in many things—Join and translate as in the Greek, "many times in many things." upon the great confidence which I have in you—"through the great confidence WHICH HE HAS towards you." [ALFORD.] BENGEL better supports English Version, "We have sent, &c., through the confidence WHICH WE FEEL in regard to your liberality." 23. fellow-helper concerning you—Greek, "fellow-worker towards you." our brethren—the two mentioned v. 18 and 22. messengers—rather, as the Greek, "apostles:" in the less strict sense (Acts 14. 14). of the churches—sent by the churches, as we are by the Lord (Philippians 3. 25). There was in the synagogue an ecclesiastical officer, called "the angel of the Church," whence the title seems derived (cf. Revelation 2. 1). 24. The oldest MSS. read "[continue] manifesting to them in the face of the churches the manifestation of your love, and of our boasting on your behalf."

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-15. REASONS FOR HIS SENDING TITUS. THE GREATER THEIR BOUNTIFULNESS, THE MORE SHALL BE THE RETURN OF BLESSING TO THEM, AND THANKSGIVING TO GOD. 1. For—connected with ch. 8. 16: "Show love to the messengers of the churches; for as concerns the ministrations for the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you who are so forward already." write—emphatical: It is superfluous to write, for you will have witnesses present. [BENGEL.] 2. ready a year ago—to send off the money, owing to the apostle's former exhortation (1 Corinthians 16. 1, 2). your zeal—Greek, "the zeal from you," i. e., on your part; propagated from you to others. provoked—i. e., stimulated. very many—Greek, "the greater number," viz., of the Macedonians. 3. have I sent—we should say, "I send;" whereas the ancients put it in the past, the time which it would be by the time that the letter arrived. the brethren—(Ch. 8. 18, 22)—Titus and the two others. should be in vain in this behalf—"should be proved futile in this particular," however true in general (ch. 7. 4). A tacit compliment, softening the sharp monition. as I said—as I was saying (v. 2). 4. if they of Macedonia—rather as Greek, "if Macedonians, unprepared—with your collection; see v. 2, "ready," Greek, "prepared." we, not to say ye—Ye would naturally feel more ashamed for yourselves, than we (who boasted of you) would for you. confident boasting—The oldest MSS. read simply "confidence," viz., in your liberality. 5. that they would go before—translate, "that they should," &c. whereof ye had notice before—rather, "promised before;" "long announced by me to the Macedonians" (v. 2). [BENGEL.] "Your promised bounty." [ELLCOTT, &c.] not as of covetousness—translate, "not as matter of covetousness," which it would be, if you gave sparingly. 6. I say—ELLCOTT, &c., supply the ellipsis thus: "But remember this." bountifully—lit., "with," or "in blessings." The word itself implies a beneficent spirit—the giver (cf. v. 7, and), and the plural implies the abundance and liberality of the gifts. "The reaping shall correspond to the proportions and spirit of the sowing"

[BENGEL.] Cf. Ezekiel 34. 26, "Showers of blessing." according as he purposeth in his heart—Let the full consent of the free will go with the gift. [ALFORD.] Opposed to "of necessity," as "grudgingly" is opposed to "a cheerful giver" (Proverbs 22. 9; 11. 25; Isaiah 32. 8). 8. all grace—even in external goods, and even while ye bestow on others. [BENGEL.] that—"in order that." God's gifts are bestowed on us, not that we may have them to ourselves, but that we may the more "abound in good works" to others. sufficiency—so as not to need the help of others, having yourselves from God "bread for your food" (v. 10). in all things—Greek, "in everything." every good work—of charity to others, which will be "your seed sown" (v. 10). 9. As it is written—realizing the highly blessed character portrayed in Psalm 112. 9. He—the "good man" (Psalm 112. 5). dispersed—as seed sown with full and open hand, without anxious thought in what direction each grain may fall. It is implied also that he has always what he may disperse. [BENGEL.] So in Psalm 112. 9. the poor—The Greek word is here only found in New Testament, "one in straitened circumstances, who earns his bread by labour." The word usually employed means "one so poor as to live by begging." his righteousness—Here "beneficence;" the evidence of his being righteous before God and man. Cf. Deuteronomy 24. 13; Matthew 6. 1, "alms;" Greek, "righteousness." remaineth—unexhausted and unfailling. 10. Translate, as in Isaiah 55. 10, "He that ministereth (supplieth) seed to the sower and bread for food" (lit., "bread for eating"). minister—rather future, as the oldest MSS., "Shall minister (supply) and multiply." your seed—your means for liberality. the fruits of your righteousness—the heavenly rewards for your Christian charity (Matthew 10. 42). Righteousness shall be itself the reward, even as it is the thing rewarded (Hosea 10. 12; Matthew 5. 6; 6. 33). 11. Cf. v. 8. bountifulness—Greek, "single-minded liberality." Translated "simplicity," Romans 12. 8. causeth through us—lit., "worketh through us;" i. e., through our instrumentality as the distributors. thanksgiving—on the part of the recipients. 12. Greek, "The ministrations of this public service (on your part) is not only still further supplying the wants of the saints (besides the supplies from other quarters), but is abounding also (viz., in respect to relieving the necessities of others in poverty) through many thanksgivings to God." 13. by—through occasion of. experiment—translate, "the experience." [ELLCOTT, &c.] Or, "the experimental proof" of your Christian character, afforded by "this ministrations" they—the recipients. for your professed subjection—Greek, "for the subjection of your profession;" i. e., your subjection in accordance with your profession, in relation to the Gospel. Ye yield yourselves in willing subjection to the Gospel precepts, evinced in acts, as well as in profession. your liberal distribution—Greek, "the liberality of your contribution in relation to them," &c. 14. Translate, "Themselves also with prayer for you, longing after you on account of the exceeding grace of God (resting) upon you." English Version is, however, good sense: They glorify God (v. 13) by the experimental proof, &c., "and by their prayer for you." But the Greek favours the former. 15. his unspeakable gift—the gift of His own Son, which includes all other inferior gifts (ch. 8. 9; Romans 8. 32). If we have received from God "His unspeakable gift," what great thing is it, if we give a few perishing gifts for His sake?

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-18. HE VINDICATES HIS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY AGAINST THOSE WHO DEPRECIATED HIM FOR HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE. HE WILL MAKE HIS POWER FELT WHEN HE COMES. HE BOASTS NOT, LIKE THEM, BEYOND HIS MEASURE. 1. I Paul myself—no longer "we," "us," "our" (ch. 9. 11): I who am represented by depreciators as "base," &c., I, the same Paul, of my own accord "beseech you;" or rather "entreat," "exhort" you for your sake. As "I beseech you" (a distinct Greek verb, v. 2) for my sake. by the meekness and gentleness of Christ—He men-

None these graces of Christ especially (Psalm 18.35; Matthew 11. 29), as on account of his imitation of them in particular he was despised. [GROTIUS.] He entreats them by these, in order to show that though he must have recourse to more severe measures, he is naturally inclined to gentle ones after Christ's example. [MENOCHIUS.] "Meekness" is more in the mind internally; "gentleness" in the external behaviour, and in relation to others; for instance, the condescending yieldingness of a superior to an inferior, the former not insisting on his strict rights. [TRENCH.] BENDEL explains it, "By the meekness and gentleness derived by me from Christ," not from my own nature: he objects to understanding it of Christ's meekness and gentleness, since nowhere else is "gentleness" attributed to Him. But though the exact Greek word is not applied to Him, the idea expressed by it is (cf. Isaiah 40. 11; Matthew 12. 19, 20). in presence—in personal appearance when present with you. base—Greek, "lowly;" timid, humbly diffident; opposed to "bold." "Am" stands here by ironical concession for "am reputed to be" (cf. v. 10). 2. I beseech you—Intimating that, as he can beseech in letters, so he can be severe in their presence. that I may not be—that I may not have to be bold, &c. with that confidence—that authoritative sternness. I think—I am minded to be, as if we walked according to the flesh—His Corinthian detractors judged of him by themselves, as if he were influenced by fleshly motives, the desire of favour or fear of giving offence, so as not to exercise his authority when present. 3. For—Reason why they should regard him "beseeching" them (v. 2) not to oblige him to have recourse to "bold" and stern exercise of authority. "We walk in the flesh," and so in weakness: but not "according to the flesh" (v. 2). Moreover, though we walk in it, we do not war according to it. A double contrast or antithesis. "They who accense us of walking after the flesh, shall find [to their cost] that we do not war after the flesh; therefore compel us not to use our weapons." [ALFORD.] 4. A confutation of those who try to propagate their creed by force and persecution (cf. Luke 9. 54-56). carnal—translate, "fleshly," to preserve the allusion to v. 2, 8. weapons—for punishing offending members (v. 6; 1 Corinthians 4. 21; 5. 5, 13); boldness of speech, ecclesiastical discipline (v. 8; ch. 13. 10), the power of the word, and of the sacraments, the various extraordinary gifts of the Spirit. mighty through God—Greek, "mighty to God," i. e., mighty before God: not humanly, but divinely powerful. The power is not ours, but God's. Cf. "fair to God," i. e., divinely fair (Margin, Acts 7. 20) Also above (ch. 2. 15), "unto God a sweet savour." "The efficacy of the Christian religion proves its truth." [BENDEL.] pulling down—As the Greek is the same as in v. 5, translate, "casting down." Cf. Jeremiah 1. 10: the inspired servants of God inherit the commission of the Old Testament prophets. strongholds—(Proverbs 21. 22)—viz., in which sinners entrench themselves against reproof; all that opposes itself to Christ; the learning, and eloquence, and philosophical subtleties on which the Corinthians prided themselves. So Joshua's trumpet blast was "mighty" under God to overthrow the walls of Jericho. 5. imaginations—rather, "reasonings." Whereas "thought" expresses men's own purpose and determination of living after their own pleasure. [TITTM.] high thing—So it ought to be translated, Romans 8. 39. A distinct Greek word from that in Ephesians 3. 18, "height," and Revelation 21. 16, which belongs to God and heaven from whence we receive nothing hurtful. But "high thing" is not so much "height" as something made high, and belongs to those regions of air where the powers of darkness "exalt themselves" against Christ and us (Ephesians 2. 2; 6. 12; 2 Thessalonians 2. 4). exalteth itself—2 Thessalonians 2. 4 supports English Version rather than the translation of ELLICOTT, &c., "is lifted up." Such were the high towers of Judaic self-righteousness, philosophic speculations, and rhetorical sophistries, the "knowledge" so much prized by many (opposed to "the knowledge of God"), which endangered a section of the Corinthian Church. against the knowledge of God—True knowledge makes men humble. Where there is exaltation of self, there knowledge of God is wanting. [BENDEL.] Arrange the words following thus: "Bringing every thought (i. e., intent of the mind or will) into captivity to the obedience of Christ," i. e., to obey Christ. The three steps of the apostle's spiritual warfare are: (1.) It demolishes what is opposed to Christ; (2.) It leads captive; (3.) It brings into obedience to Christ (Romans 1. 5; 16. 26). The "reasonings" (English Version, "imagination") are utterly "cast down." The "mental intents" (English Version, "thoughts") are taken willing captives, and tender the voluntary obedience of faith to Christ the Conqueror. 6. Translate, "Having ourselves (i. e., being) in readiness to exact punishment for all disobedience," &c. We have this in store for the disobedient: it will be brought into action in due time. when your obedience, &c.—He charitably assumes that most of the Corinthian Church will act obediently; therefore he says "YOUR obedience." But perhaps some will act otherwise; in order, therefore, to give all an opportunity of joining the obedient, he will not prematurely exact punishment, but wait until the full number of those gathered out to Christ has been "completed," and the remainder have been proved incorrigible. He had acted already so at Corinth (Acts 18. 6-11; cf. Exodus 32. 34; Matthew 13. 28-30). 7. Do ye regard mere outward appearance (mere external recommendations, personal appearance, voice, manner oratory of teachers present face to face, such as they admired in the false teachers to the disparagement of Paul, v. 10; Note, ch. 5. 12)? Even in outward bearing when I shall be present with you (in contrast to "by letters," v. 9) I will show that I am more really armed with the authority of Christ, than those who arrogate to themselves the title of being peculiarly "Christ's" (1 Corinthians 1. 12). A Jewish emissary seems to have led this party. let him of himself think this again—He may "of himself," without needing to be taught it in a more severe manner, by "thinking again," arrive at "this" conclusion, "that even as," &c. St. Paul modestly demands for himself only an equal place with those whom he had begotten in the Gospel. [BENDEL.] 8. "For even if I were to boast somewhat more exceedingly (than I do, v. 8-6) of our (apostolic) authority (v. 6; ch. 13. 10) . . . I should not be put to shame (by the fact; as I should be if my authority proved to be without foundation: my threats of punishment not being carried into effect). for edification . . . not for . . . destruction—Greek, "for building up . . . not for . . . CASTING DOWN" (the same Greek as in v. 5): the image of a building as in v. 4, 5. Though we "cast down reasonings," this is not in order to destroy, but really to build up ("edify"), by removing those things which are hindrances to edification, and testing what is unsound, and putting together all that is true in the building. [CHRYSOSTOM.] 9. I say this lest I should seem to be terrifying you, as children, with empty threats. [BENDEL.] ESTIUS explains, "I might boast more of my authority, but I forbear to do so, that I may not seem as if," &c. But this ellipsis is harsh: and v. 10, 11 confirm BENDEL's view. 10. letters—implying that there had been already more letters of St. Paul received by the Corinthians than the one we have, viz., 1 Corinthians; and that they contained strong reproofs. say they—Greek, "says one," "such a one" (v. 11) seems to point to some definite individual. Cf. Galatians 5. 10; a similar slanderer was in the Galatian Church. weak—(Ch. 12. 7; 1 Corinthians 2. 3.) There was nothing of majesty or authority in his manner; he bore himself tremblingly among them, whereas the false teachers spoke with authoritative bearing and language. 11. think this—"consider this." such will we be—or "are," in general, not merely shall we be at our next visit. 12. "We do not presume (irony) to judge ourselves among, or in comparison with, some of them that commend themselves." The charge falsely brought against him of commending himself (ch. 1. 1; 5. 12), really holds good of the false teachers. The phrase, "judge ourselves of the number," is drawn from the testing of athletes and senators, the "approved" being set down on the roll. [WAHL.] measuring themselves by themselves—"among themselves:" to correspond to the previous verb. "Judge ourselves among them." 12-stead of measuring themselves by the public standard, they measure themselves by one made by themselves: they do not compare themselves with others who excel them, but with those like themselves: hence their high self-esteem. The one-eyed is easily king among the blind. are not wise—with all their boasted "wisdom" (1 Corinthians 1. 19-26), they are anything but "wise." 13. not boast without measure—Greek, "to unmeasured bounds." There is no limit to a man's high opinion of himself, so long as he measures himself by himself (v. 13) and his fellows, and does not compare himself with his superiors. It marks the personal character of this Epistle that the word "boast" occurs twenty-nine times in it, and only twenty-six times in all the other Epistles put together. Undeterred by the charge of vanity, he felt he must vindicate his apostolic authority by facts. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] It would be to "boast of things without our measure," were we to boast of conversions made by "other men's labours" (v. 15). distributed—apportioned. [ALFORD.] a measure—as a measure. [ALFORD.] to reach—"that we should reach as far as even to you:" not that he meant to go no further (v. 16; Romans 15. 20-24). St. Paul's "measure" is the apportionment of his sphere of Gospel labours ruled for him by God. A "rule" among the so-called "apostolic canons" subsequently was, that no bishop should appoint ministers beyond his own limits. At Corinth no minister ought to have been received without St. Paul's sanction, as Corinth was apportioned to him by God as his apostolic sphere. The Epistle here incidentally, and therefore undesignedly, confirms the independent history, the Acts, which represents Corinth as the extreme limit as yet of his preaching, at which he had stopped, after he had from Philippi passed southward successively through Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, Berea, and Athens. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] 14. "We are not stretching ourselves beyond our measure, as (we should be) if we did not reach unto you: (but we do), for as far as even to you have we come in preaching the Gospel." 15. "Not boasting to unmeasured bounds (i. e., not exceeding our own bounds by boasting) of (lit., "in") other men's labours." when—"AS your faith goes on increasing." The cause of his not yet reaching with the Gospel the regions beyond Corinth, was the weakness as yet of their faith. He desired not to leave the Corinthians before the proper time, and yet not to put off preaching to others too long. enlarged by you—Greek, "in your case." Our success in your case will give us an important step towards further progress beyond you (v. 16). according to our rule—according to our divinely-assigned apportionment of the area or sphere of our work; for "we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure" (v. 14). abundantly—Greek, "unto exceeding abundance:" so as to exceed the limits we have yet reached (v. 16). 16. To—i. e., so as to preach . . . beyond you (and) not to boast, &c. in another man's line of things made ready to our hand—Do not connect "line of things," &c.; but "boast of things," &c. To make this clearer, arrange the words thus, "Not to boast as to things (already made by the preaching of others) ready to our hand in another man's line (i. e., within the line, or sphere of labour, apportioned by God to another). 17. glorieth—translate, to accord with v. 16, "boasteth." In contrast to his opponents' practice of boasting in another's line or sphere, St. Paul declares the only true boasting is in the Lord (1 Corinthians 1. 31; 15. 10). 18. (Proverbs 27. 2.) whom the Lord commendeth—to whom the Lord has given as his "Epistle of commendation," the believers whom he has been the instrument of converting: as was St. Paul's case (ch. 3. 1-3). is approved—can stand the test of the final trial. A metaphor from testing metals (Romans 16. 10; 1 Corinthians 11. 19). So on the other hand those finally rejected by the Lord are termed "reprobate silver" (Jeremiah 6. 30).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-33. THROUGH JEALOUSY OVER THE CORINTHIANS, WHO MADE MORE ACCOUNT OF THE FALSE APOSTLES THAN

OF HIM, HE IS OBLIGED TO COMMEND HIMSELF IN MANY RESPECTS SUPERIOR. 1. Would to God—Greek, "I would that." bear with me—I may ask not unreasonably to be borne with; not so the false apostles (v. 4, 20). my—Not in the oldest MSS. folly—The Greek is a milder term than that for "foolishness" in 1 Corinthians 3. 19; Matthew 5. 22; 25. 2. The Greek for "folly" here implies imprudence; the Greek for "foolishness" includes the idea of perversity and wickedness. and indeed bear—A request (so v. 16). But the Greek and the sense favour the translation, "But indeed (I need not wish it, for) ye do bear with me;" still I wish you to bear with me further, whilst I enter at large into self-commendations. 2. For I am jealous—The justification of his self-commendations lies in his zealous care lest they should fall from Christ, to whom he, as "the friend of the Bridegroom" (John 3. 29), has espoused them; in order to lead them back from the false apostles to Christ, he is obliged to boast as an apostle of Christ, in a way which, but for the motive, would be "folly." godly jealousy—lit., "jealousy of God" (cf. ch. 1. 12, "godly slucidity," lit., "sincerity of God"). "If I am immoderate, I am immoderate to God." [BENGEL.] A jealousy which has God's honour at heart (1 Kings 19. 10). I . . . espoused you—St. Paul uses a Greek term applied properly to the bridegroom, just as he ascribes to himself "jealousy," a feeling properly belonging to the husband; so entirely does he identify himself with Christ. present you as a chaste virgin to Christ—at His coming, when the heavenly marriage shall take place (Matthew 25. 6; Revelation 19. 7, 9). What St. Paul here says he desires to do, viz., "present" the Church as "a chaste virgin" to Christ, Christ Himself is said to do in the fuller sense. Whatever ministers do effectively, is really done by Christ (Ephesians 5. 27-32). The espousals are going on now. He does not say "chaste virgins;" for not individual members, but the whole body of believers conjointly constitute the Bride. 3. I fear—(ch. 12. 20)—not inconsistent with love. His source of fear was their yielding character. subtlety—the utter foe of the simplicity which is intent on ONE object, Jesus, and seeks none "other," and no "other" and different Spirit (v. 4): but loves him with tender SINGLENESSE OF AFFECTION. Where Eve first gave way, was in mentally harbouring for a moment the possibility insinuated by the serpent, of God not having her truest interests at heart, and of this "other" professing friend being more concerned for her than God. corrupted—so as to lose their virgin purity through seducers (v. 4). The same Greek stands for "minds" as for "thoughts" (ch. 10. 5, where see note); intents of the will, or mind. The oldest MSS., after "simplicity," add, "and the purity" or "chastity." In Christ—rather, "that is towards Christ." 4. If, &c.—which in fact is impossible. However, if it were possible, ye might then bear with them (see Note, v. 1). But there can be no new Gospel; there is but the one which I first preached; therefore it ought not to be "borne" by you, that the false teachers should attempt to supersede me. he that cometh—the high-sounding title assumed by the false teachers, who arrogated Christ's own peculiar title (Greek, Matthew 11. 3, and Hebrews 10. 37), "He that is coming." Perhaps he was leader of the party which assumed peculiarly to be "Christ's" (ch. 10. 7; 1 Corinthians 1. 12); hence his assumption of the title. preacheth . . . receive—is preaching . . . ye are receiving. Jesus—the "Jesus" of Gospel history. He therefore does not say "Christ," which refers to the office. another . . . another—Greek, "another Jesus . . . a different Spirit . . . a different Gospel." Another implies a distinct individual of the same kind; different implies one quite distinct in kind. which ye have not received—from us. Spirit . . . received . . . Gospel . . . accepted—The will of man is passive in RECEIVING the "Spirit;" but it is actively concurrent with the will of God (which goes before to give the good will in ACCEPTING the "Gospel." ye might well bear with him—There would be an excuse for your conduct, though a bad one (for ye ought not to give heed to no Gospel other than what ye have already heard from me, Galatians 1. 6, 7); but the false teachers do not even pretend they have "another Jesus" and a "different Gospel" to bring before you; they merely try to supplant me, your accredited Teacher. Yet ye not only "bear with" them, but prefer them. 5. For—my claim is superior to that of the false teachers, "For," &c. I suppose—I reckon. [ALFORD.] I was not—Greek, "That I have not been, and am not." the very chiefest apostles—James, Peter, and John, the witnesses of Christ's transfiguration and agony in Gethsemane. Rather, "those overmuch apostles," those superiores of the apostles in their own esteem. This sense is proved by the fact that the context contains no comparison between him and the apostles, but only between him and the false teachers; v. 6 also alludes to these, and not to the apostles; cf. also the parallel phrase, "false apostles" (Note, v. 13, and ch. 12. 11). [ALFORD.] 6. rude—Greek, "a common man;" a "laid;" not rhetorically trained; unskilled in finish of diction. 1 Corinthians 2. 1-4, 13; ch. 10. 10, 11, shows his words were not without weight, though his "speech" was deficient in oratorical artifice. "Yet I am not so in my knowledge" (ch. 12. 1-5; Ephesians 3. 1-5). have been . . . made manifest—Read with the oldest MSS., "We have made things (Gospel truths) manifest," thus showing our "knowledge." English Version would mean, I leave it to yourselves to decide whether I be rude in speech, &c.: for we have been thoroughly (lit., "in everything") made manifest among you (lit., "in respect to you;" "in relation to you"). He had not by reserve kept back his "knowledge" in Divine mysteries from them (ch. 2. 17; 4. 2; Acts 20. 20, 27). in all things—The Greek rather favours the translation, "among all men;" the sense then is, we have manifested the whole truth among all men with a view to your benefit. [ALFORD.] But the Greek in Philippians 4. 12, "In each thing and in all things," sanctions English Version, which gives a clearer sense. 7. Have I—lit., "Or have I?" Connected with last verse, "Or will any of you make it an objection that I have preached to you gratuitously?" He leaves their good feeling to give the answer, that this, so far from being an objection, was a decided superiority in him above the false apostles (1 Corinthians 9. 6-15). abasing myself—in my mode of living waiving my right of maintenance, and earning it by manual labour; perhaps with slaves as his fellow-labourers (Acts 18. 3; Philippians 4. 12). ye . . . exalted—spiritually, by your admission to Gospel privileges. because—"In that." Gospel of God—"of God" implies its Divine glory to which they were admitted. freely—"without charge." 8. I robbed—i. e., took from them in order to spare you more than what was their fair share of contribution to my maintenance, e. g., the Philippian Church (Philippians 4. 15, 16). wages—"subsidy." to do you service—Greek, "with a view to ministraton to you;" cf. "supplied" (Greek, "in addition"), v. 9, implying, he brought with him from the Macedonians, supplies towards his maintenance at Corinth; and (v. 9) when those resources failed ("when I wanted") he received a new supply, whilst there, from the same source. 9. wanted—"was in want." chargeable—Greek, "burdensome," lit., "to torpify," and so to oppress. JEROME says it is a Cilician word (ch. 12. 14, 16). the brethren which came—rather, as Greek, "the brethren when they came." Perhaps Timothy and Silas (Acts 8. 1, 5). Cf. Philippians 4. 15, 16, which refers to donations received from the Philippians (who were in Macedonia) at two distinct periods ("once and again"), one at Thessalonica, the other after his departure from Macedonia, that is, when he came into Achaia to Corinth from the Church in which city he would receive no help); and this "in the beginning of the Gospel," i. e., at its first preaching in these parts. Thus all three, the two Epistles and history, mutually, and no doubt undesignedly, coincide; a sure test of genuineness. supplied—Greek, "supplied in addition," viz., in addition to their former contributions; or as BENGEL, in addition to the supply obtained by my own manual labour. 10. Greek, "There is the truth of Christ in me that," &c. (Romans 9. 1). no man shall stop me of—The oldest MSS. read, "This boasting shall not be shut (i. e., stopped) as regards me." "Boasting is as it were personified . . . shall not have its mouth stopped as regards me." [ALFORD.] 11. Love is often offended at its favours being not accepted, as though the party to whom they are offered wished to be under no obligation to the offerer. 12. I will do—I will continue to decline help. occasion—Greek, "the occasion," viz., of misrepresenting my motives, which would be afforded to my detractors, if I accepted help. that wherein they glory they may be found even as we—BENGEL joins this clause with "the occasion," viz., of glorying or boasting, the occasion "that they may be found (a point wherein they glory) even as we," i. e., quite as disinterested, or virtually, quite as gain-seeking and self-seeking. It cannot mean that the false teachers taught gratuitously even as Paul (cf. v. 20; 1 Corinthians 9. 12). ALFORD less clearly explains by reference to v. 18, &c., where the "glorying" here is taken up and described as "glorying after the flesh;" thus it means, that in the matters of which they boast they may be found even as we, i. e., we may be on a fair and equal footing; that there may be no adventitious comparisons made between us, arising out of misrepresentations of my course of procedure, but that in every matter of boasting we may be fairly compared and judged by facts; FOR (v. 13) really they have none, no weapons but misrepresentation, being false apostles. 13. For—Reason why he is unwilling they should be thought like him. [BENGEL.] such—they and those like them. false apostles—those "overmuch apostles" (Note v. 5) are no apostles at all. deceitful workers—pretending to be "workmen" for the Lord, and really seeking their own gain. 14. is transformed—rather, "transforms himself" (cf. Job 1. 6); habitually; the first occasion of his doing so was in tempting Eve. "Himself" is emphatical: If their master himself, who is the "prince of darkness," the most alien to light, does so, it is less marvellous in the case of them who are his servants (Luke 22. 54; Ephesians 6. 12). 15. no great thing—no difficult matter. if his ministers also—as well as himself. righteousness—answering to "light" (v. 14); the manifestation wherewith God reveals Himself in Christ (Matthew 6. 33; Romans 1. 17). end—the test of things is the end which strips off every specious form into which Satan's agents may now "transform" themselves (cf. Philippians 3. 19, 21). according to their works—not according to their pretensions. 16. I say again—again taking up from v. 1 the anticipatory apology for his boasting. if otherwise—but if ye will not grant this; if ye will think me a fool. yet as a fool—"yet even as a fool receive me;" grant me the indulgent hearing conceded even to one suspected of folly. The Greek denotes one who does not rightly use his mental powers; not having the idea of blame necessarily attached to it; one deceived by foolish vanities, yet boasting himself [TITM.] (v. 17, 19). that I—The oldest MSS. read, "that I, too," viz., as well as they, may boast myself. 17. not after the Lord—by inspired guidance he excepts this "glorying" or "boasting" from the inspired authoritativeness which belongs to all else that he wrote; even this boasting, though undesirable in itself, was permitted by the Spirit, taking into account its aim, viz., to draw off the Corinthians from their false teachers to the apostle. Therefore this passage gives no proof that any portion of Scripture is uninspired. It merely guards against his boasting being made a justification of boasting in general, which is not ordinarily "after the Lord," i. e., consistent with Christian humility. foolishly—Greek, "in foolishness." confidence of boasting—(ch. 9. 4). 18. many—including the "false teachers." after the flesh—as fleshly men are wont to boast, viz., of external advantages, as their birth, doings, &c. (cf. v. 22). I will glory also—i. e., I also will boast of such fleshly advantages, to show you that even in these I am not their inferiors, and therefore ought not to be supplanted by them in your esteem; though these are not what I desire to glory in (ch. 10. 17). 19. gladly—willingly. Irony. A plea why they should "bear with" (v. 1) him in his folly, i. e., boasting; ye are, in sooth, so "wise" (1 Corinthians 4. 8, 10; St. Paul's real view of their wisdom was very different, 1 Corinthians 3. 1-4) yourselves that ye can "bear with" the folly of others more complacently. Not only can ye do so, but ye are actually doing this and more. ❧ or—Ye may well “bear with” fools; for ye even “bear with” oppressors. Translate, “Ye bear with them.” a man—as the false apostles do. bring you into bondage—to himself. Translate “brings,” not “bring;” for the case is not merely a supposed case, but a case actually then occurring. Also “devours” (viz., by exactions, Matthew 23. 14; Psalm 53. 4), “takes,” “exalts,” “smites.” take of you—So the Greek for “take” is used for “take away from” (Revelation 6. 4). ALFORD translates, as in ch. 12. 16, “catches you.” exalt himself—under the pretext of apostolic dignity. smite you on the face—under the pretext of Divine zeal. The height of insolence on their part, and of servile endurance on yours (1 Kings 22. 24; Nehemiah 13. 25; Luke 22. 64; Acts 23. 2; 1 Timothy 3. 3). 21. as concerning reproach—rather, “by way of dishonour (i. e., self-disparagement) I say it.” as though we . . . weak—in not similarly (v. 20) showing our power over you. “An ironical reminiscence of his own abstinence when among them from all these acts of self-exaltation at their expense” [as if such abstinence was weakness]. [ALFORD.] The “we” is emphatically contrasted with the false teachers who so oppressively displayed their power. I speak so as though WE had been weak when with you, because we did not show our power this way. Howbeit (we are not really weak; for), whereinssoever any is bold, &c., I am bold also. 22. Hebrews . . . Israelites . . . the seed of Abraham—A climax. “Hebrews,” referring to the language and nationality; “Israelites,” to the theocracy and descent from Israel, the “prince who prevailed with God” (Romans 9. 4); “the seed of Abraham,” to the claim to a share in the Messiah (Romans 11. 1; 9. 7). Cf. Philippians 3. 5, “An Hebrew of the Hebrews,” not an Hellenist or Greek-speaking Jew, but a Hebrew in tongue, and sprung from Hebrews. 23. I speak as a fool—rather, as Greek, “I speak as if beside myself;” stronger than “as a fool.” I am more—viz., in respect to the credentials and manifestations of my ministry, more faithful and self-denying; and richer in tokens of God’s recognition of my ministry. Old authorities read the order thus, “In prisons above measures, in stripes more abundantly” (English Version, less accurately, “more frequent”). Acts 16. 23, &c., records one case of his imprisonment with stripes. CLEMENT (1 Epistle to Corinthians) describes him as having suffered bonds seven times. in death oft—(Ch. 4. 10; Acts 9. 23; 13. 50; 14. 5, 6, 19; 17. 5, 13.) 24. Deuteronomy 25. 3 ordained that not more than forty stripes should be inflicted. To avoid exceeding this number, they gave one short of it: thirteen strokes with a treble lash. [BENGEL.] This is one of those minute agreements with Jewish usage, which a forger would have not been likely to observe. 25. The beating by Roman magistrates at Philippi (Acts 16. 23) is the only one recorded in Acts, which does not profess to give a complete journal of his life, but only a sketch of it in connection with the design of the book, viz., to give an outline of the history of the Gospel Church from its foundation at Jerusalem, to the period of its reaching Rome, the capital of the Gentile world. once was I stoned—(Acts 14. 19.) thrice . . . shipwreck—before the shipwreck at Melita (Acts 27). Probably in some of his voyages from Tarsus, where he stayed for some time after his conversion, and from which, as being a seafaring place, he was likely to make missionary voyages to adjoining places (Acts 9. 30; 11. 25; Galatians 1. 21). a night and a day . . . in the deep—probably in part swimming or in an open boat. 26. In—rather, “By:” connected with v. 23, but now not with “in,” as there, and as in v. 27, where again he passes to the idea of surrounding circumstances or environments. [ALFORD, ELICOTT, &c.] waters—rather, as Greek, “rivers,” viz., perils by the flooding of rivers, as on the road often traversed by Paul between Jerusalem and Antioch, crossed as it is by the torrents rushing down from Lebanon. So the traveller soon lost his life. robbers—perhaps in his journey from Perga to Antioch in Pisidia. Pisidia was notorious for robbers; as indeed were all the mountains that divided the high land of Asia from the sea. the heathen—Gentiles, in the city—Damascus, Acts 9. 24, 25; Jerusalem, Acts 9. 29; Ephesus, Acts 19. 23. false brethren—(Galatians 2. 4) 27. fastings—voluntary, in order to kindle devotions (Acts 13. 2, 3; 14. 23; 1 Corinthians 9. 27); for they are distinguished from “hunger and thirst,” which were involuntary. [GROTIUS.] See, however, Note, ch. 6. 5. The context refers solely to hardships, not to self-imposed devotional mortification. “Hunger and thirst” are not synonymous with “foodlessness” (as the Greek of “fasting” means), but are its consequences cold . . . nakedness—“cold” resulting from “nakedness,” or insufficient clothing, as the Greek often means as “hunger and thirst” result from “foodlessness.” (Cf. Acts 28. 2; Romans 8. 35.) “When we remember that he who endured all this was a man constantly suffering from infirm health (2 Corinthians 4. 7-12; 12. 7-10; Galatians 4. 13, 14), such heroic self-devotion seems almost superhuman.” [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 28. without—“Beside” trials falling on me externally, just recounted, there is “that which cometh upon me (lit., the impetuous concourse to me of business; properly, a crowd rising up against me again and again, and ready to bear him down), the care of all the churches” (including those not yet seen in the flesh, Colossians 2. 1): an internal and more weighty anxiety. But the oldest MSS., for “that which cometh,” read, “the pressure.” “the pressing care-taking” or “inspection that is upon me daily.” ALFORD translates. “Omitting what is BESIDES;” viz., those other trials besides those recounted. But the Vulgate, ESTIUS, and BENGEL, support English Version. the care—The Greek implies, “my anxious solicitude for all the churches.” 29. I . . . weak—in condescending sympathy with the weak (1 Corinthians 9. 22). “Care generates sympathy, which causes the minister of Christ personally to enter into the feelings of all his people, as if he stood in their position, so as to accommodate himself to all.” [CALVIN.] offended—by some stumbling-block put in his way by others: the “weak” is most liable to be “offended.” I burn not—The “I” in the Greek is emphatic, which it is not in the former clause, “I am not weak.” I not only enter into the feeling of the party offended, but I burn with indignation at the offender, I myself taking up his cause as my own. “Who meets with a stumbling-block and I am not disturbed even more than himself.” [NEANDER.] 30. glory of . . . infirmities—A striking contrast! Glorying or boasting of what others make matter of shame, viz., infirmities; for instance, his humbling mode of escape in a basket (v. 33). A character utterly incompatible with that of an enthusiast (cf. ch. 12. 5, 9, 10). 31. This solemn asseveration refers to what follows. The persecution at Damascus was one of the first and greatest, and having no human witness of it to adduce to the Corinthians, as being a fact that happened long before and was known to few, he appeals to God for its truth. Luke (Acts 9. 25) afterwards recorded it (cf. Galatians 1. 20). [BENGEL.] It may ALSO refer to the revelation in ch. 12. 1, standing in beautiful contrast to his humiliating escape from Damascus. 32. governor—Greek, “Ethnarch:” a Jewish officer to whom heathen rulers gave authority over Jews in large cities where they were numerous. He was in this case under Aretas, king of Arabia. Damascus was in a Roman province. But at this time, 38 or 39 A. D., three years after St. Paul’s conversion, 38 A. D., Aretas, against whom the emperor Tiberius as the ally of Herod Agrippa had sent an army under Vitellius, had got possession of Damascus on the death of the emperor, and the consequent interruption of Vitellius’ operations. His possession of it was put an end to immediately after by the Romans. [NEANDER.] Rather, it was granted by Caligula (38 A. D.) to Aretas, whose predecessors had possessed it. This is proved by our having no Damascus coins of Caligula or Claudius, though we have of their immediate imperial predecessors and successors. [ALFORD.]

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1-21. REVELATIONS IN WHICH HE MIGHT GLORY BUT HE RATHER GLORIES IN INFIRMITIES, AS CALLING FORTH CHRIST’S POWER: SIGNS OF HIS APOSTLESHIP

HIS DISINTERESTEDNESS: NOT THAT HE IS EXCUSING HIMSELF TO THEM; BUT HE DOES ALL FOR THEIR GOOD, LEST HE SHOULD FIND THEM NOT SUCH AS HE DESIRED, AND SO SHOULD HAVE TO BE SEVERE AT HIS COMING. 1. He proceeds to illustrate the "glorying in infirmities" (ch. 11. 30). He gave one instance which might expose him to ridicule (ch. 11. 33); he now gives another, but this one connected with a glorious revelation of which it was the sequel: but he dwells not on the glory done to himself, but on the infirmity which followed it, as displaying Christ's power. The oldest MSS. read, "I MUST NEEDS boast (or glory) though it be not expedient; for I will come." The "for" gives a proof that it is "not expedient to boast:" I will take the case of revelations, in which if anywhere boasting might be thought harmless. "Visions" refers to things seen: "revelations," to things heard (cf. 1 Samuel 9. 15) or revealed in any way. In "visions" their signification was not always vouchsafed; in "revelations" there was always an unveiling of truths before hidden (Daniel 2. 19, 31). All parts of Scripture alike are matter of inspiration; but not all of revelation. There are degrees of revelation; but not of inspiration. of—i. e., from the Lord; Christ, v. 2. 2. Translate, "I know," not "I knew." a man—meaning himself. But he purposely thus distinguishes between the rapt and glorified person of v. 2, 4, and himself the infirmity-laden victim of the "thorn in the flesh" (v. 7). Such glory belonged not to him, but the weakness did. Nay he did not even know whether he was in or out of the body when the glory was put upon him, so far was the glory from being his. [ALFORD.] His spiritual self was his highest and truest self: the flesh with its infirmity merely his temporary self (Romans 7. 25). Here, however, the latter is the prominent thought. in Christ—a Christian (Romans 18. 7). above—rather, simply "fourteen years ago." This Epistle was written 55–57 A. D. Fourteen years before will bring the vision to 41–43 A. D., the time of his second visit to Jerusalem (Acts 22. 17). He had long been intimate with the Corinthians, yet had never mentioned this revelation before: it was not a matter lightly to be spoken of. I cannot tell—rather as Greek, "I know not." If in the body, he must have been caught up bodily; if out of the body, as seems to be Paul's opinion, his spirit must have been caught up out of the body. At all events he recognizes the possibility of conscious receptivity in disembodied spirits. caught up—(Acts 8. 39.) to the third heaven—"even to," &c. These raptures (note the plural, "visions," "revelations") had two degrees: first he was caught up "to the third heaven," and from thence to "Paradise" (v. 4) [CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, Stromata 5. 427], which seems to denote an inner recess of the third heaven [BENGEL] (Luke 23. 43; Revelation 2. 7). St. Paul was permitted not only to "hear" the things of Paradise, but to see also in some degree the things of the third heaven (cf. "visions," v. 1). The occurrence TWICE of "whether in the body, &c., I know not, God knoweth," and of "lest I should be exalted above measure," marks two stages in the revelation. "Ignorance of the mode does not set aside the certain knowledge of the fact. The apostles were ignorant of many things." [BENGEL.] The first heaven is that of the clouds, the air; the second, that of the stars, the sky; the third is spiritual (Ephesians 4. 10). 3. Translate, "I know," out of—Most of the oldest MSS. read "apart from." 4. unspeakable—not in themselves, otherwise Paul could not have heard them; but as the explanation states, "which it is not lawful . . . to utter." [ALFORD.] They were designed for Paul's own consolation, and not for communication to others. Some heavenly words are communicable (Exodus 24. 6; Isaiah 6. 3). These were not so. St. Paul had not the power adequately to utter; nor if he had, would he have been permitted; nor would earthly men comprehend them (John 3. 12; 1 Corinthians 2. 9). A man may hear and know more than he can speak. of myself—concerning myself. Self is put in the background, except in respect to his infirmities his glorying in his other self, to which the revelations were vouchsafed, was not in order to give glory to his fleshly self but to bring out in

contrast the "infirmities" of the latter, that Christ might have all the glory. 6. For—Not but that I might glory as to "myself" (v. 5); "FOR if I should desire to glory, I shall not be a fool;" for I have things to glory, or boast of which are good matter for glorying of (not mere external fleshly advantages which when he gloried in (ch. 11.) he termed such glorying "folly," ch. 11. 1, 16, 17). think of me—Greek, "form his estimate respecting me." heareth of me—Greek, "heareth ought from me." Whatever haply he heareth from me in person. If on account of healing a cripple (Acts 14. 12, 13), and shaking off a viper (Acts 28.), the people thought him a god, what would they have not done, if he had disclosed those revelations? [ESTIUS.] I wish each of you to estimate me by "what he sees" my present acts and "hears" my teaching to be; not by my boasting of past revelations. They who allow themselves to be thought of more highly than is lawful, defraud themselves of the honour which is at God's disposal [BENGEL] (John 5. 44; 12. 43). 7. exalted above measure—Greek, "overmuch uplifted." How dangerous must self-exaltation be, when even the apostle required so much restraint! [BENGEL.] abundance—Greek, "the excess;" exceeding greatness. given . . . me—viz., by God (Job 5. 6; Philippians 1. 29). thorn in the flesh—(Numbers 33. 55; Ezekiel 28. 24.) ALFORD thinks it to be the same bodily affliction as in Galatians 4. 13, 14. It certainly was something personal, affecting him individually, and not as an apostle: causing at once acute pain (as "thorn" implies) and shame ("buffet:" as slaves are buffeted, 1 Peter 2. 20). messenger of Satan—who is permitted by God to afflict His saints, as Job (Job 2. 7; Luke 13. 16). to buffet me—In Greek, present: to buffet me even now continuously. After experiencing the state of the blissful angels, he is now exposed to the influence of an evil angel. The chastisement from hell follows soon upon the revelation from heaven. As his sight and hearing had been ravished with heavenly "revelations," so his touch is pained with the "thorn in the flesh." 8. For—"concerning this thing." thrice—To his first and second prayer no answer came. To his third the answer came, which satisfied his faith and led him to bow his will to God's will. So Paul's master, Jesus, thrice prayed on the Mount of Olives, in resignation to the Father's will. The thorn seems (from v. 9, and Greek, v. 7, "that he may buffet me") to have continued with Paul when he wrote, lest still he should be "overmuch lifted up." the Lord—Christ. Escape from the cross is not to be sought even indirectly from Satan (Luke 4. 7). "Satan is not to be asked to spare us." [BENGEL.] 9. said—lit., "He hath said;" implying that his answer is enough. [ALFORD.] is sufficient—The trial must endure, but the grace shall also endure and never fail thee [ALFORD] (Deuteronomy 33. 25). The Lord puts the words into Paul's mouth, that following them up he might say, "O Lord, thy grace is sufficient for me." [BENGEL.] my strength—Greek, "power." is made perfect—has its most perfect manifestation. in weakness—Do not ask for sensible strength, FOR my power is perfected in man's "strengthlessness" (so the Greek). The "for" implies, thy "strengthlessness" (the same Greek as is translated "weakness;" and in v. 10, "infirmities") is the very element in which my "power" (which moves coincident with "my grace") exhibits itself more perfectly. So that Paul instead of desiring the infirmity to "depart," "rather" henceforth "glories in infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest (Greek, 'tabernacle upon;') cover my infirmity all over as with a tabernacle; cf. Greek, John 1. 12) upon" him. This effect of Christ's assurance on him appears, ch. 4. 7; 1 Corinthians 2. 8, 4; cf. 1 Peter 4. 14. The "my" is omitted in some of the oldest MSS.; the sense is the same, "power" (referring to God's power) standing absolutely, in contrast to "weakness" (put absolutely, for man's weakness). Paul often repeats the word "weakness" or infirmity" (chs. 11., 12., and 13.) as being Christ's own word. The Lord has more need of our weakness than of our strength: our strength is often His rival; our weakness, His servant, drawing on His resources, and showing forth His glory. Man's extremity is God's opportunity; man's security is Satan's opportunity God's way is not to take His children out of trial, but to give them strength to bear up against it (Psalm 88. 7; John 17. 15). 10. take pleasure in—Too strongly. Rather as the Greek, "I am well contented in." infirmities—the genus. Two pairs of species follow, partly coming from "Satan's messenger," partly from men. reproaches—"insults," when—in all the cases just specified. then—then especially. strong—"powerful" in "the power of Christ" (v. 9; ch. 13. 4; Hebrews 11. 34). 11. in glorying—Omitted in the oldest MSS. "I am become a fool." He sounds a retreat. [BENGEL.] ye—Emphatic. "It is ye who have compelled me; for I ought to have been commended by you," instead of having to commend myself. am I behind—rather as Greek, "was I behind," when I was with you? the very chiefest—rather, as in ch. 11. 5, "those overmuch apostles." though I be nothing—in myself (1 Corinthians 15. 9, 10). 12. Truly, &c.—There is understood some such clause as this, "And yet I have not been commended by you." in all patience, in signs, &c.—The oldest MSS. omit "in." "Patience" is not one of the "signs," but the element in which they were wrought: endurance of opposition which did not cause me to leave off working. [ALFORD.] Translate, "In . . . patience, by signs," &c. His mode of expression is modest, putting himself, the worker, in the background, "were wrought," not "I wrought." As the signs have not been transmitted to us, neither has the apostleship. The apostles have no literal successors (cf. Acts 1. 21, 22). mighty deeds—palpable works of Divine omnipotence. The silence of the apostles in fourteen Epistles, as to miracles, arises from the design of those Epistles being hortatory, not controversial. The passing allusions to miracles in seven Epistles prove that the writers were not enthusiasts to whom miracles seem the most important thing. Doctrines were with them the important matter, save when convincing adversaries. In the seven Epistles the mention of miracles is not obtrusive, but marked by a calm air of assurance, as of facts acknowledged on all hands, and therefore unnecessary to dwell on. This is a much stronger proof of their reality, than if they were formally and obtrusively asserted. Signs and wonders is the regular formula of the Old Testament, which New Testament readers would necessarily understand of supernatural works. Again, in the Gospels the miracles are so inseparably and congruously tied up with the history, that you cannot deny the former without denying the latter also. And then you have a greater difficulty than ever, viz., to account for the rise of Christianity; so that the infidel has something infinitely more difficult to believe than that which he rejects, and which the Christian more rationally accepts. 13. wherein you were inferior—i. e., were treated with less consideration by me than were other churches. I myself—I made a gain of you neither myself, nor by those others whom I sent, Titus, &c. (v. 17, 18). wrong—His declining support from the Corinthians might be regarded as the denial to them of a privilege, and a mark of their spiritual inferiority, and of his looking on them with less confidence and love (cf. ch. 11. 9, 11). 14. the third time—See Introduction to First Corinthians. His second visit was probably a short one (1 Corinthians 16. 7), and attended with humiliation through the scandalous conduct of some of his converts (cf. v. 21; ch. 2. 1). It was probably paid during his three years' sojourn at Ephesus, from which he could pass so readily by sea to Corinth (cf. ch. 1. 15, 16; 13. 1, 2). The context here implies nothing of a third preparation to come; but, "I am coming, and the third time, and will not burden you this time any more than I did at my two previous visits." [ALFORD.] not yours, but you—(Philippians 4. 17.) children . . . parents—St. Paul was their spiritual father (1 Corinthians 4. 14, 15). He does not, therefore, seek earthly treasure from them, but lays up the best treasure (viz., spiritual) "for their souls" (v. 15). 15. I will . . . spend—all I have. be spent—all that I am. This is more than even natural parents do. They "lay up treasures for their children." But I spend not merely my treasures, but myself. for you—Greek, "for your souls;" not for your mere bodies. the less I be loved—Love rather descends than ascends. [BENGEL.] Love him as a true friend who seeks your good more than your good will. 16. I did not burden you—The "I" in the Greek is emphatic. A possible insinuation of the Corinthians is hereby anticipated and refuted: "But, you may say, granted that I did not burden you myself; nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you (in my net) with guile;" viz., made a gain of you by means of others (1 Thessalonians 2. 8). 17. Paul's reply: You know well I did not. My associates were as disinterested as myself. An important rule to all who would influence others for good. I desired Titus—viz., to go unto you. Not the mission mentioned ch. 8. 6, 17, 22; but a mission previous to this Epistle, probably that from which he had just returned announcing to Paul their penitence (ch. 7. 6, &c.). a brother—rather "OUR (ill., the) brother;" one well known to the Corinthians, and perhaps a Corinthian; probably one of the two mentioned ch. 8. 18, 22. same spirit—inwardly. steps—outwardly. 19. Again—The oldest MSS. read, "This long time ye think that we are excusing ourselves unto you? (Nay.) It is before God (as opposed to 'unto you') that we speak in Christ" (ch. 2. 17). English Version Greek text was a correction from ch. 8. 1; 5. 12. 20. For—Assigning cause why they needed to be thus spoken to "for their edification;" viz., his fear that at his coming he should find them "not such as he would," and so he should be found by them "such as they would not" like, viz., severe in punishing misconduct. debates—Greek, "strifes," "contentions." envyings—The oldest MSS. read "envying," singular. strifes—"factions," "intrigues," "factious schemes." [WAHL.] Ambitious self-seeking; from a Greek root, "to work for hire." backbitings, whisperings—open "slandering," and "whispering backbitings" (Galatians 5. 20). swellings—arrogant elation; puffing up of yourselves. Jude 16, "great swelling words" (2 Peter 2. 18). 21. my God—his God, however trying the humiliation that was in store for him. will humble me—The indicative implies that the supposition will actually be so. The faithful pastor is "humbled" at, and "bewails" the falls of his people, as though they were his own. sinned already—before my last coming [BENGEL], i. e., before the second visit which he paid, and in which he had much at Corinth to rebuke. have not repented—shall not have repented. [ALFORD.] uncleanness—for example, of married persons (1 Thessalonians 4. 7). fornication—among the unmarried.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1-14. HE THREATENS A SEVERE PROOF OF HIS APOSTOLIC AUTHORITY, BUT PREFERS THEY WOULD SPARE HIM THE NECESSITY FOR IT. This is the third time I am coming to you—not merely preparing to come to you. This proves an intermediate visit between the two recorded in Acts 18. 1, &c.; 20. 2. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established—Quoted from Deuteronomy 19. 15, LXX. "I will judge not without examination, nor will I abstain from punishing upon due evidence." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] I will no longer be among you "in all patience" towards offenders (ch. 12. 12). The apostle in this case, where ordinary testimony was to be had, does not look for an immediate revelation, nor does he order the culprits to be cast out of the Church before his arrival. Others understand the "two or three witnesses" to mean his two or three visits as establishing either (1.) the truth of the facts alleged against the offenders, or (2.) the reality of his threats. I prefer the first explanation to either of the two latter. 2. Rather, "I have already said (at my second visit), and tell you (now) beforehand, AS (I did) WHEN I WAS PRESENT THE SECOND TIME, so also NOW in my absence (the oldest MSS. omit the 'I write,' which here wrongly follows in English Version Greek text) to them which heretofore have sinned (viz., before my second visit, ch. 12. 21), and to all others" (who have sinned since my second visit, or are in danger of sinning), &c. The English Version, "as if I were present the second time," viz., this next time, is quite inconsistent with v. 1, "this is the third time I am coming to you," as Paul could not have called the same journey at once "th-second" and "the third time" of his coming. The antithesis between "the second time" and "now" is palpable. if I come again, &c.—i. e., whenever I come again (Acts 20. 2). These were probably the very words of his former threat which he now repeats again. 3. Since—The reason why he will not spare: Since ye challenge me to give a "proof" that Christ speaks in me. It would be better if ye would "prove your own selves" (v. 5). This disproves the assertion of some that Scripture nowhere asserts the infallibility of its writers when writing it, which—"who" (Christ). is not weak—in relation to you, by me and in this very Epistle, in exercising upon you strong discipline. mighty in you—has given many proofs of His power in miracles, and even in punishing offenders (ch. 5. 11, 20, 21). Ye have no need to put me to the proof in this, as long ago Christ has exhibited great proofs of His power by me among you (ch. 12. 12). [GROTIUS.] It is therefore not me, but Christ, whom ye wrong: it is His patience that ye try in despising my admonitions, and derogating from my authority. [CALVIN.] 4. though—Omitted in some of the oldest MSS.; then translata, "For He was even crucified," &c. through weakness—Greek, "from weakness;" i. e., His assumption of our weakness was the source, or necessary condition, from which the possibility of His crucifixion flowed (Hebrews 2. 14; Philippians 2. 7, 8). by—Greek, "from;" "owing to." the power of God—the Father (Romans 1. 4; 8. 4; Ephesians 1. 20). weak in him—i. e., in virtue of our union with Him, and after His pattern, weakness predominates in us for a time (exhibited in our "infirmities" and weak "bodily presence," ch. 10. 10; 12. 5, 9, 10; and also in our not putting into immediate exercise our power of punishing offenders, just as Christ for a time kept in abeyance His power). we shall live with him—not only hereafter with Him, free from our present infirmities, in the resurrection life (Philippians 3. 21), but presently in the exercise of our apostolic authority against offenders, which flows to us in respect to you from the power of God, however "weak" we now seem to you. "With Him," i. e., even as He now exercises His power in His glorified resurrection life, after His weakness for a time. 5. Examine—Greek, "Try (make trial of) yourselves." prove your own selves—This should be your first aim, rather than "seeking a proof of Christ speaking in me" (v. 3). your own selves—I need not speak much in proof of Christ being in me, your minister (v. 3), for if ye try your own selves ye will see that Christ is also in you [CHRYSOSTOM] (Romans 8. 10). Finding Christ dwelling in yourselves by faith, ye may well believe that He speaks in me, by whose ministry ye have received this faith. [ESTIUS.] To doubt it would be the sin of Israel, who, after so many miracles and experimental proofs of God's presence, still cried (Exodus 17. 7), "Is the Lord among us or not" (cf. Mark 8. 11)? except ye be reprobates—The Greek softens the expression, "somewhat reprobates," i. e., not abiding the "proof" (alluding to the same word in the context); falling when tested. Image from metals (Jeremiah 6. 30; Daniel 5. 27; Romans 1. 28). 6. we . . . not reprobates—not unable to abide the "proof" to which ye put us (v. 6). "I trust that" your own Christianity will be recognized by you (observe, "ye shall know," answers to "know your own selves," v. 5) as sufficient "proof" that ye are not

reprobates, but that "Christ speaks in me," without needing a proof from me more trying to yourselves. If ye doubt my apostleship, ye must doubt your own Christianity, for ye are the fruits of my apostleship. 7. I pray—The oldest MSS. read, "we pray." not that we should appear approved—not to gain credit for ourselves, your ministers, by your Christian conduct; but for your good. [ALFORD.] The antithesis to "reprobates" leads me to prefer explaining with BENGEL, "We do not pray that we may appear approved," by restraining you when ye do evil; "but that ye should do what is right" (English Version, "honest"). though we be as reprobates—though we be thereby deprived of the occasion for exercising our apostolic power (viz., in punishing), and so may appear "as reprobates" (incapable of affording proof of Christ speaking in us). 8. Our apostolic power is given us that we may use it not against, but for the furtherance of, the truth. Where you are free from fault, there is no scope for its exercise: and this I desire. Far be it from me to use it against the innocent, merely in order to increase my own power (v. 10). 9. are glad—Greek, "rejoice." when we are weak—having no occasion for displaying our power; and so seeming "weak," as being compassed with "infirmities" (ch. 10. 10; 11. 29, 30). ye . . . strong—"mighty" in faith and the fruits of the Spirit. and—Not in the oldest MSS. we wish—Greek, "pray for." your perfection—lit., "perfect restoration;" lit., that of a dislocated limb. Cf. v. 11, "Be perfect," the same Greek word; also in 1 Corinthians 1. 10, "perfectly joined together;" Ephesians 4. 12, "the perfecting of the saints." 10. Therefore—Because I wish the "sharpness" to be in my letters rather than in deeds. [CHRYSOSTOM.] edification . . . not to destruction—for building up . . . not for casting down. To "use sharpness" would seem to be casting down, rather than building up; therefore he prefers not to have to use it. 11. farewell—meaning in Greek also "rejoice;" thus in bidding farewell he returns to the point with which he set out, "we are helpers of your joy" (ch. 1. 24; Philippians 4. 4). Be perfect—Become perfect by filling up what is lacking in your Christian character (Ephesians 4. 13). be of good comfort—(Ch. 1. 6; 7. 8-13; 1 Thessalonians 4. 18.) 14. The benediction which proves the doctrine of the Divine Trinity in unity. "The grace of Christ" comes first, for it is only by it we come to "the love of God" the Father (John 14. 6). The variety in the order of Persons proves that "in this Trinity none is afore or after other." [ATHANAS., Creed.] communio—joint fellowship, or participation, in the same Holy Ghost, which joins in one catholic Church, His temple, both Jews and Gentiles. Whoever has "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost," has also "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," and "the love of God;" and vice versa. For the three are inseparable, as the three Persons of the Trinity itself. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The doctrine of the Trinity was not revealed clearly and fully till Christ came, and the whole scheme of our redemption was manifested in Him, and we know the Holy Three in One more in their relations to us (as set forth summarily in this benediction), than in their mutual relations to one another (Deuteronomy 29. 29). Amen—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Probably added subsequently for the exigencies of public joint worship.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

The internal and external evidence for St. Paul's authorship is conclusive. The style is characteristically Pauline. The superscription, and allusions to the apostle of the Gentiles in the first person, throughout the Epistle, establish the same truth (ch. 1. 1, 13-24; 2. 1-14). His authorship is also upheld by the unanimous testimony of the ancient Church: of IRENEUS, adversus Hæreses 3. 7. 2 (Galatians 3. 19); POLYCARP (Philippians, ch. 3.) quotes Galatians 4. 23 and 6. 7. JUSTIN MARTYR, or whoever wrote the Oratio ad Græcos, alludes to Galatians 4. 12 and 5. 21.

GALATIANS.

The Epistle was written "TO THE CHURCHES OF GALATIA" (ch. 1. 2), a district of Asia Minor, bordering on Phrygia, Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia. The inhabitants (Gallo-græci, contracted into Galati, another form of the name Kelts) were Gauls in origin, the latter having overrun Asia Minor, after they had pillaged Delphi, about B. C. 280, and at last permanently settled in the central parts, thence called Gallo-græcia or Galatia. Their character, as shown in this Epistle, is in entire consonance with that ascribed to the Gallic race by all writers. CÆSAR, B. G., 4. 5, "The infirmity of the Gauls is that they are fickle in their resolves and fond of change, and not to be trusted." So THIERRY [quoted by ALFORD], "Frank, impetuous, impressible, eminently intelligent, but at the same time extremely changeable, inconstant, fond of show, perpetually quarrelling, the fruit of excessive vanity." They received St. Paul at first with all joy and kindness; but soon wavered in their allegiance to the Gospel and to him, and hearkened as eagerly now to Judaizing teachers as they had before to him (ch. 4. 14-16). The apostle himself had been the first preacher among them (Acts 18. 6; Galatians 1. 8; 4. 13 [see Note; "on account of infirmity of flesh I preached unto you at the first:" implying that sickness detained him among them], 19); and had then probably founded churches, which at his subsequent visit he "strengthened" in the faith (Acts 18. 23). His first visit was about A. D. 51, during his second missionary journey. JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 18. 62, testifies that many Jews resided in Ancyra in Galatia. Among these and their brethren, doubtless, as elsewhere, he began his preaching. And though subsequently the majority in the Galatian churches were Gentiles (ch. 4. 8, 9), yet these were soon infected by Judaizing teachers, and almost suffered themselves to be persuaded to undergo circumcision (ch. 1. 6; 2. 1, 3; 5. 2, 3; 6. 12, 13). Accustomed as the Galatians had been, when heathen, to the mystic worship of Cybele (prevailing in the neighbouring region of Phrygia), and the theosophistic doctrines connected with that worship, they were the more readily led to believe that the full privileges of Christianity could only be attained through an elaborate system of ceremonial symbolism (ch. 4. 9-11; 5. 7-12). They even gave ear to the insinuation that Paul himself observed the law among the Jews, though he persuaded the Gentiles to renounce it, and that his motive was to keep his converts in a subordinate state, excluded from the full privileges of Christianity, which were enjoyed by the circumcised alone (ch. 5. 11; 4. 18, cf. with 2. 17); and that in "becoming all things to all men," he was an interested flatterer (ch. 1. 10), aiming at forming a party for himself: moreover, that he falsely represented himself as an apostle divinely commissioned by Christ, whereas he was but a messenger sent by the Twelve and the Church at Jerusalem, and that his teaching was now at variance with that of St. Peter and James, "pillars" of the Church, and therefore ought not to be accepted.

His PURPOSE, then, in writing this Epistle was (1.) to defend his apostolic authority (ch. 1. 11-19; 2. 1-14); (2.) to counteract the evil influence of the Judaizers in Galatia (ch. 3. and 4.), and to show that their doctrine destroyed the very essence of Christianity, by lowering its spirituality to an outward ceremonial system; (3.) to give exhortation for the strengthening of Galatian believers in faith towards Christ, and in the fruits of the Spirit (ch. 5. and 6). He had already face to face, testified against the Judaizing teachers (ch. 1. 9; 4. 16; Acts 18. 23); and now that he has heard of the continued and increasing prevalence of the evil, he writes with his own hand (ch. 6. 11: a labour which as usually delegated to an amanuensis) this Epistle to oppose it. The sketch he gives in it of his apostolic career confirms and expands the account in Acts, and shows his independence of human authority, however exalted. His protest against Peter in ch. 2. 14-21, disproves the figment, not merely of papal, but even of that apostle's supremacy: and shows that Peter, save when specially inspired, was fallible like other men.

There is much in common between this Epistle and that to the Romans on the subject of justification by faith only, and not by the law. But the Epistle to the Romans handles the subject in a didactic and logical mode, without any special reference; this Epistle, in a controversial manner, and with special reference to the Judaizers in Galatia.

The STYLE combines the two extremes, sternness (ch. 1.; 3. 1-5) and tenderness (ch. 4. 19, 20), the characteristics of a man of strong emotions, and both alike well suited for acting on an impressible people such as the Galatians were. The beginning is abrupt, as was suited to the urgency of the question and the greatness of the danger. A tone of sadness, too, is apparent, such as might be expected in the letter of a warm-hearted teacher who had just learned that those whom he loved were forsaking his teachings for those of perverters of the truth, as well as giving ear to calumnies against himself.

The TIME OF WRITING was after the visit to Jerusalem recorded in Acts 15. 1, &c., i. e., A. D. 50, if that visit be, as seems probable, identical with that in ch. 2. 1, &c. Further, as ch. 1. 9 ("as we said before"), and 4. 16 ("Have [ALFORD] I become your enemy?" viz., at my second visit, whereas I was welcomed by you at my first visit), refer to his second visit (Acts 18. 23), this Epistle must have been written after the date of that visit (the autumn of A. D. 54). Ch. 4. 18, "Ye know how . . . I preached . . . at the first" (Greek, "at the former time"), implies that Paul, at the time of writing, had been twice in Galatia; and ch. 1. 6, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed," implies that he wrote not long after having left Galatia for the second time; probably in the early part of his residence at Ephesus (Acts 18. 23; 19. 1, &c., from A. D. 54, the autumn, to A. D. 57, Pentecost). [ALFORD.] CONYBEARE and HOWSON, from the similarity between this Epistle and that to the Romans, the same line of argument in both occupying the writer's mind, think it was not written till his stay at Corinth (Acts 20. 2, 3), during the winter of 57-58, whence he wrote his Epistle to the Romans; and certainly, in the theory of the earlier writing of it from Ephesus, it does seem unlikely that the two Epistles to the Corinthians, so dissimilar, should intervene between those so similar as the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans; or that the Epistle to the Galatians should intervene between the second to the Thessalonians and the first to the Corinthians. The decision between the two theories rests on the words, "so soon." If these be not considered inconsistent with little more than three years having elapsed since his second visit to Galatia, the argument, from the similarity to the Epistle to the Romans, seems to me conclusive. This to the Galatians seems written on the urgency of the occasion, tidings having reached him at Corinth from Ephesus of the Judaizing of many of his Galatian converts, in an admonitory and controversial tone, to maintain the great principles of Christian liberty and justification by faith only; that to the Romans is a more deliberate and systematic exposition of the same central truths of theology, subsequently drawn up in writing to a Church with which he was personally unacquainted. See Note, ch. 1. 8, for BIRKS' view. PALEY (Horæ Paulinæ) well remarks how perfectly adapted the conduct of the argument is to the historical circumstances under which the Epistle was written! Thus, that to the Galatians, a Church which Paul had founded, he puts mainly upon authority; that to the Romans to whom he was not personally known entirely upon argument.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-24. SUPERScription. GREETINGS. THE CAUSE OF HIS WRITING IS THEIR SPEEDY FALLING AWAY FROM THE GOSPEL HE TAUGHT. DEFENCE OF HIS TEACHING: HIS APOSTOLIC CALL INDEPENDENT OF MAN. Judaizing teachers had persuaded the Galatians that St. Paul had taught them the new religion imperfectly, and at second hand that the founder of their Church himself possessed only a deputed commission, the seal of truth and authority being in the apostles at Jerusalem: moreover, that whatever he might profess among them, he had himself at other times, and in other places, given way to the doctrine of circumcision. To refute this, he appeals to the history of his conversion, and to the manner of his conferring with the apostles when he met them at Jerusalem; that so far was his doctrine from being derived from them, or they from exercising any superiority over him, that they had simply assented to what he had already preached among the Gentiles, which preaching was communicated, not by them to him, but by himself to them. [PALEY.] Such an apologetic Epistle could not be a later forgery, the objections which it meets only coming out incidentally, not being obtruded as they would be by a forger; and also being such as could only arise in the earliest age of the Church, when Jerusalem and Judaism still held a prominent place. 1. apostle—in the earliest Epistles, the two to the Thessalonians, through humility, he uses no title of authority; but associates with him "Silvanus and Timotheus;" yet here, though "brethren" (v. 2) are with him, he does not name them, but puts his own name and apostleship prominent; evidently because his apostolic commission needs now to be vindicated against deniers of it. of—Greek, "from." Expressing the origin from which his mission came, "not from men," but from Christ and the Father (understood) as the source. "By" expresses the immediate operating agent in the call. Not only was the call from God as its ultimate source, but by Christ and the Father as the immediate agent in calling him (Acts 22. 15, and 26. 16-18). The laying on of Ananias' hands (Acts 9. 17) is no objection to this; for that was but a sign of the fact, not an assisting cause. So the Holy Ghost calls him specially (Acts 13. 2, 3); he was an apostle before this special mission. man—singular; to mark the contrast to "Jesus Christ." The opposition between "Christ" and "man," and His name being put in closest connection with God the Father, imply His Godhead. raised him from the dead—Implying that, though he had not seen Him in His humiliation as the other apostles (which was made an objection against him), he had seen and been constituted an apostle by Him in His resurrection power (Matthew 28. 18; Romans 1. 4, 5). Cf. as to the ascension, the consequence of the resurrection, and the cause of His giving "apostles," Ephesians 4. 11. He rose again, too, for our justification (Romans 4. 25); thus St. Paul prepares the way for the prominent subject of the Epistle, justification in Christ, not by the law. 2. all the brethren—I am not alone in my doctrine; all my colleagues in the Gospel-work, travelling with me (Acts 19. 29, Galus and Aristarchus at Ephesus Acts 20. 4, Sopater, Secundus, Timotheus, Tychicus, Trophimus, some, or all of these), join with me. Not that these were joint authors with St. Paul of the Epistle; but joined him in the sentiments and salutations. The phrase, "all the brethren," accords with a date when he had many travelling companions, he and they having to bear jointly the collection to Jerusalem. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] the churches—Pessinus and Ancyra were the principal cities; but doubtless there were many other churches in Galatia (Acts 18. 23; 1 Corinthians 16. 1). He does not attach any honourable title to the churches here, as elsewhere, being displeased at their Judaizing. See 1 Corinthians; 1 Thessalonians, &c. The first Epistle of Peter is addressed to Jewish Christians sojourning in Galatia (1 Peter 1. 1), among other places mentioned. It is interesting thus to find the apostle of the circumcision, as well as the apostle of the uncircumcision, once at issue (ch. 2. 7-15), co-operating to build up the same churches. 3. from . . . from—Omit

the second "from." The Greek joins God the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ in closest union, by there being but the one preposition. 4. gave himself—(ch. 2. 20)—nits death, as an offering. Found only in this and the Pastoral Epistles. The Greek is different in Ephesians 5. 25 (Note) for our sins—which enslaved us to the present evil world. deliver us from this—Greek, "out of the," &c. The Father and Son are each said to "deliver us," &c. (Colossians 1. 13); but the Son, not the Father, "gave Himself for" us in order to do so, and make us citizens of a better world (Philippians 3. 20). The Galatians in desiring to return to legal bondage are, he implies, renouncing the deliverance which Christ wrought for us. This he more fully repeats, ch. 3. 13. "Deliver" is the very word used by the Lord as to His deliverance of Paul himself (Acts 26. 17); an undesigned coincidence between St. Paul and Luke. world—Greek, "age;" system or course of the world, regarded from a religious point of view. The present age opposes the "glory" (v. 5) of God, and is under the authority of the Evil One. The "ages of ages" (Greek, v. 5) are opposed to "the present evil age," according to the will of God and the Father—Greek, "Of Him who is at once God [the sovereign Creator] and our Father" (John 6. 38, 39; 10. 18, end). Without merit of ours. His sovereignty as "God," and our filial relation to Him as "OUR FATHER," ought to keep us from blending our own legal notions (as the Galatians were doing) with His will and plan. This paves the way for his argument. 5. be glory—rather, as Greek, "Be the glory;" the glory which is peculiarly and exclusively His. Cf. Ephesians 3. 21, Note. 6. Without the usual expressions of thanksgiving for their faith, &c., he vehemently plunges into his subject, zealous for "the glory" of God (v. 6), which was being disparaged by the Galatians falling away from the pure Gospel of the "grace" of God. I marvel—Implying that he had hoped better things from them, whence his sorrowful surprise at their turning out so different from his expectations. so soon—after my last visit; when I hoped and thought you were untainted by the Judaizing teachers. If this Epistle was written from Corinth, the interval would be a little more than three years, which would be "soon" to have fallen away, if they were apparently sound at the time of his visit. Ch. 4. 18, 20 may imply that he saw no symptom of unsoundness then, such as he hears of in them now. But English Version is probably not correct there. See Note, also see Introduction. If from Ephesus, the interval would be not more than one year. BIRKS holds the Epistle to have been written from Corinth after his first visit to Galatia; for this agrees best with the "so soon" here; with ch. 4. 18, "It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you." If they had persevered in the faith during three years of his first absence, and only turned aside after his second visit, they could not be charged justly with adhering to the truth only when he was present; for his first absence was longer than both his visits, and they would have obeyed longer in his "absence" than in his "presence." But if their decline had begun immediately after he left them, and before his return to them, the reproof will be just. But see Note, ch. 4. 13. removed—translate, "are being removed," i. e., ye are suffering yourselves so soon (whether from the time of my last visit, or from the time of the first temptation held out to you) [PARÆUS] to be removed by Jewish seducers. Thus he softens the censure by implying that the Galatians were tempted by seducers from without, with whom the chief guilt lay; and the present, "ye are being removed," implies that their seduction was only in process of being effected, not that it was actually effected. WAHL, ALFORD, &c., take the Greek as middle voice, "Ye are removing" or "passing over." "Shifting your ground." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] But thus the point of St. Paul's oblique reference to their misdoers is lost; and in Hebrews 7. 12 the Greek is used passively, justifying its being taken so here. On the impulsiveness and fickleness of the Gauls, whence the Galatians sprang (another form of Kelts, the progenitors of the Erse, Gauls, Cymri, and Belgians), as Introduction and CÆSAR, B. G., 3. 19. from him that called you—God the Father (v. 15; ch. 5. 8; Romans 8. 30; 1 Corinthians 1. 9; 1 Thessalonians 2. 12; 5. 24). into—rather, as Greek, “IN the grace of Christ,” as the element in which, and the instrument by which, God calls us to salvation. Cf. Note, 1 Corinthians 7. 15; Romans 5. 15, “the gift by (Greek, ‘in’) grace (Greek, ‘the grace’) of (the) one man.” “The grace of Christ,” is Christ’s gratuitously purchased and bestowed justification, reconciliation, and eternal life. another—rather, as Greek, “a second and different Gospel,” i. e., into a so-called Gospel, different altogether from the only true Gospel. 7. another—A distinct Greek word from that in v. 6. Though I called it a Gospel (v. 6), it is not really so. There is really but one Gospel, and no other Gospel. but—translate, “Only that there are some that trouble you,” &c. (ch. 5. 10, 12). All I meant by the “different Gospel” was nothing but a perversion by “some” of the one Gospel of Christ. would pervert—Greek, “wish to pervert;” they could not really pervert the Gospel, though they could pervert Gospel professors (cf. ch. 4. 9, 17, 21; 6. 12, 13; Colossians 2. 18). Though acknowledging Christ, they insisted on circumcision and Jewish ordinances, and professed to rest on the authority of other apostles, viz., Peter and James. But Paul recognizes no Gospel, save the pure Gospel. 8. But—However weighty they may seem “who trouble you.” Translate as Greek, “Even though we,” viz., I and the brethren with me, weighty and many as we are (v. 1, 2). The Greek implies a case supposed which never has occurred. angel—in which I might ye at first received me (cf. ch. 4. 14; 1 Corinthians 13. 1), and whose authority is the highest possible next to that of God and Christ. A new revelation, even though seemingly accredited by miracles, is not to be received if it contradict the already existing revelation. For God cannot contradict Himself (Deuteronomy 13. 1-3; 1 Kings 13. 18; Matthew 24. 24; 2 Thessalonians 2. 9). The Judaizing teachers sheltered themselves under the names of the great apostles, James, John, and Peter; “Do not bring these names up to me, for even if an angel,” &c. Not that he means, the apostles really supported the Judaizers; but he wishes to show, when the truth is in question, respect of persons is inadmissible. [CHRYSOSTOM.] preach—i. e., “should preach.” any other gospel . . . than—The Greek expresses not so much “any other Gospel different from what we have preached,” as, “any Gospel BESIDE that which we preached.” This distinctly opposes the traditions of the Church of Rome, which are at once besides and against (the Greek includes both ideas) the written Word, our only attested rule. 9. said before—when we were visiting you (so “before” means, 2 Corinthians 13. 2). Cf. ch. 5. 2, 3, 21. Translate, “If any man preacheth unto you any Gospel BESIDE that which,” &c. Observe the indicative, not the subjunctive or conditional mood, is used, “preacheth,” lit., “furnisheth you with any Gospel.” The fact is assumed, not merely supposed as a contingency, as in v. 8, “preach,” or “should preach.” This implies that he had already observed (viz., during his last visit) the machinations of the Judaizing teachers; but his surprise (v. 6) now at the Galatians being misled by them, implies that they had not apparently been so then. As in v. 8 he had said, “which we preached,” so here, with an augmentation of the force, “which ye received;” acknowledging that they had truly accepted it. accused—The opposite appears, ch. 6. 16. 10. For—Accounting for the strong language he has just used. do I now—Resuming the “now” of v. 9. “Am I now persuading men” [ALFORD], i. e., conciliating? Is what I have just now said a sample of men-pleasing, of which I am accused? His adversaries accused him of being an interested flatterer of men, “becoming all things to all men,” to make a party for himself, and so observing the law among the Jews (for instance, circumcising Timothy), yet persuading the Gentiles to renounce it (ch. 5. 11) (in order to flatter those, really keeping them in a subordinate state, not admitted to the full privileges which the circumcised alone enjoyed). NEANDER explains the “now” thus: Once, when a Pharisee, I was actuated only by a regard to human authority and to please men, Luke 16.

15; John 5. 44), but NOW I teach as responsible to God alone (1 Corinthians 4. 3). or God?—Regard is to be had to God alone. for if I yet pleased men—The oldest MSS. omit “for.” “If I were still pleasing men,” &c. (Luke 6. 26; John 15. 19; 1 Thessalonians 2. 4; James 4. 4; 1 John 4. 6). On “yet,” cf. ch. 5. 11. servant of Christ—and so pleasing Him in all things (Titus 2. 9; Colossians 3. 22). 11. certify—I made known to you as to the Gospel which was preached by me, that it is not after man, i. e., not of, by, or from man (v. 1, 12). It is not according to man; not influenced by mere human considerations, as it would be, if it were of human origin. brethren—He not till now calls them so. 12. Translate, “For not even did I myself (any more than the other apostles) receive it from man, nor was I taught it (by man).” “Received it,” implies the absence of labour in acquiring it. “Taught it,” implies the labour of learning. by the revelation of Jesus Christ—translate, “By revelation of (i. e., from) Jesus Christ.” By His revealing it to me. Probably this took place during the three years, in part of which he sojourned in Arabia (v. 17, 18), in the vicinity of the scene of the giving of the law; a fit place for such a revelation of the Gospel of grace, which supersedes the ceremonial law (ch. 4. 25). He, like other Pharisees who embraced Christianity, did not at first recognize its independence of the Mosaic law, but combined both together. Ananias, his first instructor, was universally esteemed for his legal piety, and so was not likely to have taught him to sever Christianity from the law. This severance was partially recognized after the martyrdom of Stephen. But St. Paul received it by special revelation (1 Corinthians 11. 23; 15. 3; 1 Thessalonians 4. 15). A vision of the Lord Jesus is mentioned (Acts 22. 18), at his first visit to Jerusalem (v. 18); but this seems to have been subsequent to the revelation here meant (cf. v. 15-18), and to have been confined to giving a particular command. The vision “fourteen years before” (2 Corinthians 12. 1), &c. was in A. D. 43, still later, six years after his conversion. Thus Paul is an independent witness to the Gospel. Though he had received no instruction from the apostles, but from the Holy Ghost, yet when he met them his Gospel exactly agreed with theirs. 13. heard—even before I came among you. conversation—“my former way of life.” Jews’ religion—the term “Hebrew,” expresses the language. “Jew,” the nationality, as distinguished from the Gentiles. “Israelite,” the highest title, the religious privileges, as a member of the theocracy. the Church—Here singular, marking its unity, though constituted of many particular churches, under the one Head, Christ. of God—added to mark the greatness of his sinful alienation from God (1 Corinthians 15. 19). wasted—laid it waste: the opposite of “building it up.” 14. profited—Greek, “I was becoming a proficient;” “I made progress.” above—beyond. my equals—Greek, “Of mine own age, among my countrymen.” traditions of my fathers—viz., those of the Pharisees, Paul being “a Pharisee, and son of a Pharisee” (Acts 23. 6; 26. 5). “My fathers,” show that it is not to be understood generally of the traditions of the nation. 15. separated—“set me apart:” in the purposes of His electing love (cf. Acts 9. 15; 22. 14), in order to show in me His “pleasure,” which is the farthest point that any can reach in inquiring the causes of his salvation. The actual “separating” or “setting apart” to the work marked out for him, is mentioned Acts 13. 2; Romans 1. 1. There is an allusion, perhaps, in the way of contrast, to the derivation of Pharisee from Hebrew, pharash, “separated.” I was once a so-called Pharisee or Separatist, but God had separated me to something far better. from . . . womb—Thus merit in me was out of the question, in assigning causes for His call (Romans 9. 11). Grace is the sole cause (Psalm 22. 9; 71. 3; Isaiah 49. 1, 5; Jeremiah 1. 5; Luke 1. 15). called me—on the way to Damascus (Acts 9). 16. reveal his Son in me—within me, in my inmost soul, by the Holy Spirit (ch. 3. 20). Cf. 2 Corinthians 4. 6, “Shined in our hearts.” The revealing of His Son by me to the Gentiles (so translate for “heathen”) was impossible, unless He had first revealed His Son in me; at first on my conversion, but especially the subsequent revelation from Jesus Christ (v. 12), whereby I learnt the Gospel's independence of the Mosaic law. that I might preach—The present in the Greek, which includes the idea "that I may preach Him," implying an office still continuing. This was the main commission entrusted to him (ch. 2. 7, 9). immediately—connected chiefly with "I went into Arabia" (v. 17). It denotes the sudden fitness of the apostle. So Acts 9. 20, "Straightway he preached Christ in the synagogue." I conferred not—Greek, "I had not further (viz., in addition to revelation) recourse to . . . for the purpose of consulting." The Divine revelation was sufficient for me. [BENJAMIN.] flesh and blood—(Matthew 16. 17.) 17. went I up—Some of the oldest MSS. read, "went away." to Jerusalem—the seat of the apostles. into Arabia—This journey (not recorded in Acts) was during the whole period of his stay at Damascus, called by St. Luke (Acts 9. 23), "many (Greek, a considerable number of) days." It is curiously confirmatory of the legitimacy of taking "many days" to stand for "three years," that the same phrase exactly occurs in the same sense (1 Kings 2. 38, 39). This was a country of the Gentiles; here doubtless he preached as he did before and after (Acts 9. 20, 22) at Damascus: thus he shows the independence of his apostolic commission. He also here had that comparative retirement needed, after the first fervour of his conversion, to prepare him for the great work before him. Cf. Moses (Acts 7. 29, 30). His familiarity with the scene of the giving of the law, and the meditations and revelations which he had there, appear in ch. 4. 24, 25; Hebrews 12. 18. See Note, v. 12. The Lord from heaven communed with him, as He on earth in the days of His flesh communed with the other apostles. returned again—Greek "returned back again." 18. after three years—dating from my conversion, as appears by the contrast to "immediately" (v. 16). This is the same visit to Jerusalem as in Acts 9. 26, and at this visit occurred the vision (Acts 22. 17, 18). The incident which led to his leaving Damascus (Acts 9. 25; 2 Corinthians 11. 33) was not the main cause of his going to Jerusalem. So that there is no discrepancy in the statement here that he went "to see Peter;" or rather, as Greek, "to make the acquaintance of;" "to become personally acquainted with." The two oldest MSS. read, "Cephas," the name given Peter elsewhere in the Epistle, the Hebrew name; as Peter is the Greek (John 1. 42). Appropriate to the view of him here as the apostle especially of the Hebrews. It is remarkable that Peter himself, in his Epistles, uses the Greek name Peter, perhaps to mark his antagonism to the Judaizers who would cling to the Hebraic form. He was prominent among the apostles, though James, as bishop of Jerusalem, had the chief authority there (Matthew 16. 18). fifteen days—only fifteen days; contrasting with the long period of three years, during which, previously, he had exercised an independent commission in preaching: a fact proving on the face of it, how little he owed to Peter in regard to his apostolical authority or instruction. The Greek for "to see," at the same time implies, visiting a person important to know, such as Peter was. The plots of the Jews prevented him staying longer (Acts 9. 29). Also, the vision directing him to depart to the Gentiles, for that the people of Jerusalem would not receive his testimony (Acts 22. 17, 18). abode—or "tarried." [ELLIOTT, &c.] 19. Cf. Acts 9. 27, 28, wherein Luke, as an historian, describes more generally what St. Paul, the subject of the history, himself details more particularly. The history speaks of "apostles;" and St. Paul's mention of a second apostle besides Peter, reconciles the Epistle and the history. At Stephen's martyrdom, and the consequent persecution, the other ten apostles, agreeably to Christ's directions, seem to have soon (though not immediately, Acts 8. 14) left Jerusalem to preach elsewhere. James remained in charge of the mother Church, as its bishop. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, was present during Paul's fifteen days' stay; but he, too, presently after (Acts 9. 32), went on a circuit through Judea. James, the Lord's brother—This designation, to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee, was appropriate whilst that apostle was alive. But before St. Paul's second visit to Jerusalem (ch. 2. 1; Acts 15.), he had been beheaded by Herod (Acts 12. 2). Accordingly, in the subsequent mention of James here (ch. 2. 9, 12), he is not designated by this distinctive epithet: a minute, undesigned coincidence, and proof of genuineness. James was the Lord's brother, not in our strict sense, but in the sense, "cousin," or "kinsman" (Matthew 23. 10; John 20. 17). His brethren are never called "sons of Joseph," which they would have been had they been the Lord's brothers strictly. However, cf. Psalm 69. 8, "I am an alien to my mother's children." In John 7. 3, 5, the "brethren" who believed not in Him may mean His near relations, not including the two of His brethren, i. e., relatives (James and Jude) who were among the Twelve apostles. Acts 1. 14, "His brethren," refer to Simon and James, and others (Matthew 13. 55) of His kinsmen, who were not apostles. It is not likely there would be two pairs of brothers named alike, of such eminence as James and Jude; the likelihood is that the apostles James and Jude, are also the writers of the Epistles, and the brethren of Jesus. James and James were sons of Alphaeus and Mary, sister of the Virgin Mary. 20. Solemn asseveration that his statement is true that his visit was but for fifteen days, and that he saw no apostle save Peter and James. Probably it had been reported by Judaizers that he had received a long course of instructions from the apostles in Jerusalem from the first; hence his earnestness in asserting the contrary facts. 21. I came into . . . Syria and Cilicia—"preaching the faith" (v. 23), and so, no doubt, founding the churches in Syria and Cilicia, which he subsequently confirmed in the faith (Acts 15. 23, 41). He probably went first to Caesarea, the main seaport, and thence by sea to Tarsus of Cilicia, his native place (Acts 9. 30), and thence to Syria; Cilicia having its geographical affinities with Syria, rather than with Asia Minor, as the Taurus mountains separate it from the latter. His placing "Syria" in the order of words before "Cilicia," is due to Antioch being a more important city than Tarsus, as also to his longer stay in the former city. Also "Syria and Cilicia," from their close geographical connection, became a generic geographical phrase, the more important district being placed first. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] This sea journey accounts for his being "unknown by face to the churches of Judea" (v. 22). He passes by in silence his second visit, with alms, to Judea and Jerusalem (Acts 11. 30); doubtless because it was for a limited and special object, and would occupy but a few days (Acts 12. 25), as there raged at Jerusalem at the time a persecution in which James, the brother of John, was martyred, and Peter was in prison, and James seems to have been the only apostle present (Acts 12. 17); so it was needless to mention this visit, seeing that he could not at such a time have received the instructions which the Galatians alleged he had derived from the primary fountains of authority, the apostles. 22. So far was I from being a disciple of the apostles, that I was even unknown in the churches of Judea (excepting Jerusalem, Acts 9. 26-29), which were the chief scene of their labours. 23. Translate as Greek, "They were hearing;" tidings were brought them from time to time. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] he which persecuted us in times past—"our former persecutor." [ALFORD.] The designation by which he was known among Christians still better than by his name "Saul," destroyed—Greek, "was destroying." 24. in me—"in my case." "Having understood the entire change, and that the former wolf is now acting the shepherd's part, they received occasion for joyful thanksgiving to God in respect to me." [THEODORET.] How different, he implies to the Galatians, their spirit from yours!

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-21. HIS CO-ORDINATE AUTHORITY AS APOSTLE OF THE CIRCUMCISION RECOGNIZED BY THE APOSTLES. PROVED BY HIS REBUKING PETER FOR TEMPORIZING AT ANTIOCH: HIS REASONING AS TO THE INCONSISTENCY OF JUDAIZING WITH JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH. 1. Verse

ide, "After fourteen years;" viz., from Paul's conversion inclusive. [ALFORD.] In the fourteenth year from his conversion. [BIRKS.] The same visit to Jerusalem as in Acts 15. (A. D. 50), when the council of the apostles and Church decided that Gentile Christians need not be circumcised. His omitting allusion to that decree is, (1.) because his design here is to show the Galatians his own independent apostolic authority, whence he was not likely to support himself by their decision. Thus we see that general councils are not above apostles. (2.) Because he argues the point upon principle, not authoritative decisions. (3.) The decree did not go the length of the position maintained here: the council did not impose Mosaic ordinances; the apostle maintains, the Mosaic institution itself is at an end. (4.) The Galatians were Judaizing, not because the Jewish law was imposed by authority of the Church as necessary to Christianity, but because they thought it necessary to be observed by those who aspired to higher perfection (ch. 3. 3; 4. 21). The decree would not at all disprove their view, and therefore would have been useless to quote. St. Paul meets them by a far more direct confutation, "Christ is of no effect unto you whosoever are justified by the law" (ch. 5. 4). [PALEY.] Titus . . . also—Specified on account of what follows as to him, in v. 3. Paul and Barnabas, and others, were deputed by the Church of Antioch (Acts 15. 2) to consult the apostles and elders at Jerusalem on the question of circumcision of Gentile Christians. 2. by revelation—Not from being absolutely dependent on the apostles at Jerusalem, but by independent Divine "revelation." Quite consistent with his at the same time, being a deputy from the Church of Antioch, as Acts 15. 2 states. He by this revelation was led to suggest the sending of the deputation. Cf. the case of Peter being led by vision, and at the same time by Cornelius' messengers, to go to Cæsarea, Acts 10. I . . . communicated unto them—viz., "to the apostles and elders" (Acts 15. 2): to the apostles in particular (v. 9). privately—that he and the apostles at Jerusalem might decide previously on the principles to be adopted and set forward before the public council (Acts 15). It was necessary that the Jerusalem apostles should know beforehand that the Gospel Paul preached to the Gentiles was the same as theirs, and had received Divine confirmation in the results it wrought on the Gentile converts. He and Barnabas related to the multitude, not the nature of the doctrine they preached (as Paul did privately to the apostles), but only the miracles vouchsafed in proof of God's sanctioning their preaching to the Gentiles (Acts 15. 12). to them . . . of reputation—James, Cephas, and John, and probably some of the "elders;" v. 6, "those who seemed to be somewhat." lest, &c.—"lest I should be running, or have run, in vain;" i. e., that they might see that I am not running, and have not run, in vain. Paul does not himself fear lest he be running, or had run, in vain; but lest he should, if he gave them no explanation, seem so to them. His race was the swift-running proclamation of the Gospel to the Gentiles (cf. "run," Margin, for "Word . . . have free course," 2 Thessalonians 3. 1). His running would have been in vain, had circumcision been necessary, since he did not require it of his converts. 3. But—So far were they from regarding me as running in vain, that "not even Titus who was with me, who was a Greek (and therefore uncircumcised), was compelled to be circumcised." So the Greek should be translated. The "false brethren," v. 4 ("certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed," Acts 15. 5), demanded his circumcision. The apostles, however, constrained by the firmness of Paul and Barnabas (v. 5), did not compel or insist on his being circumcised. Thus they virtually sanctioned Paul's course among the Gentiles, and admitted his independence as an apostle: the point he desires to set forth to the Galatians. Timothy, on the other hand, as being a proselyte of the gate, and son of a Jewess (Acts 16. 1), he circumcised (Acts 16. 3). Christianity did not interfere with Jewish usages, regarded merely as social ordinances, though no longer having their religious significance, in the case of Jews and proselytes, whilst the Jewish polity and temple will stand; after the overthrow of the latter. These usages naturally ceased. To have insisted on Jewish usages for Gentile converts, would have been to make them essential parts of Christianity. To have rudely violated them at first in the case of Jews, would have been inconsistent with that charity which (in matters indifferent) is made all things to all men, that by all means it may win some (1 Corinthians 9. 22; cf. Romans 14. 1-7, 13-23). Paul brought Titus about with him as a living example of the power of the Gospel upon the uncircumcised heathen. 4. And that—i. e., What I did concerning Titus (viz., my not permitting him to be circumcised) was not from contempt of circumcision, but "on account of the false brethren" (Acts 15. 1-24) who, had I yielded to the demand for his being circumcised, would have perverted the case into a proof that I deemed circumcision necessary. unawares—"in an underhand manner brought in." privily—stealthily. to spy out—as foes in the guise of friends, wishing to destroy and rob us of—our liberty—from the yoke of the ceremonial law. If they had found that we circumcised Titus through fear of the apostles, they would have made that a ground for insisting on imposing the legal yoke on the Gentiles. bring us into bondage—The Greek future implies the certainty and continuance of the bondage as the result. 5. Greek, "To whom not even for an hour did we yield by subjection." ALFORD renders the Greek article, "with THE subjection required of us." The sense rather is, We would willingly have yielded for love [BEN-GEL] (if no principle was at issue), but not in the way of subjection, where "the truth of the Gospel" (v. 14; Colossians 1. 5) was at stake (viz., the fundamental truth of justification by faith only, without the works of the law contrasted with another Gospel, ch. 1. 6). Truth precise unaccommodating, abandons nothing that belongs to itself, admits nothing that is inconsistent with it. [BEN-GEL.] might continue with you—Gentiles. We defended for your sakes your true faith and liberties, which you are now renouncing. 6. Greek, "From those who," &c. He meant to complete the sentence with "I derived no special advantage;" but he alters it into "they . . . added nothing to me." seemed to be somewhat—i. e. not that they seemed to be what they were not, but "were reputed as persons of some consequence;" not insinuating a doubt but that they were justly so reputed. accepteth—so as to show any partiality; "respecteth no man's person" (Ephesians 6. 9). in conference added—or "imparted;" the same Greek as in ch. 1. 16, "I conferred not with flesh and blood." As I did not by conference impart to them aught at my conversion, so they now did not impart aught additional to me, above what I already knew. This proves to the Galatians his independence as an apostle. 7. contrariwise—on the contrary. So far from adding any new light to ME, THEY gave in THEIR adhesion to the new path on which Barnabas and I, by independent revelation, had entered. So far from censuring, they gave a hearty approval to my independent course, viz., the innovatio of preaching the Gospel without circumcision to the Gentiles. when they saw—from the effects which I showed them, were "wrought" (v. 8; Acts 15. 12). was committed unto me—Greek, "I was entrusted with, &c., as Peter was with," &c. gospel of the uncircumcision—i. e., of the Gentiles, who were to be converted without circumcision being required. circumcision . . . unto Peter—Peter had originally opened the door to the Gentiles (Acts 10. and 15. 7). But in the ultimate apportionment of the spheres of labour, the Jews were assigned to him (cf. 1 Peter 1. 1). So Paul on the other hand wrote to the Hebrews (cf. also Colossians 4. 11), though his main work was among the Gentiles. The non-mention of Peter in the list of names, presciently through the Spirit, given in Romans 16., shows that Peter's residence at Rome, much more primacy, was then unknown. The same is palpable from the sphere here assigned to him. 8. he—God (1 Corinthians 12. 6). wrought effectually—i. e., made the preached word efficacious to conversion, not only by sensible miracles, but by the secret mighty power of the Holy Ghost. in Peter—ELLICOTT, &c., translates, "For Peter." GROTIUS translates as English Version do—with a view to. was mighty—translate as before, the Greek being the same, wrought effectually." In me—"for (or 'in') me also."

9. James—Placed first in the oldest MSS., even before Peter, as being bishop of Jerusalem, and so presiding at the council (Acts 15). He was called "the Just," from his strict adherence to the law, and so was especially popular among the Jewish party, though he did not fall into their extremes; whereas Peter was somewhat estranged from them through his intercourse with the Gentile Christians. To each apostle was assigned the sphere best suited to his temperament: to St. James, who was tenacious of the law, the Jerusalem Jews; to Peter, who had opened the door to the Gentiles, but who was Judaically disposed, the Jews of the dispersion; to Paul, who, by the miraculous and overwhelming suddenness of his conversion, had the whole current of his early Jewish prejudices turned into an utterly opposite direction, the Gentiles. Not separately and individually, but collectively the apostles together represented Christ, the One Head, in the apostleship. The Twelve foundation stones of various colours are joined together to the one great foundation stone on which they rest (1 Corinthians 3. 11; Revelation 21. 14, 19, 20). John had got an intimation in Jesus' lifetime of the admission of the Gentiles (John 12. 20-24). seemed—i. e., were reputed to be (Note, v. 2, 6) pillars, i. e., weighty supporters of the Church (cf. Proverbs 9. 1; Revelation 3. 12). perceived the grace . . . given unto me—(2 Peter 3. 15.) gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship—recognizing me as a colleague in the apostleship, and that the Gospel I preached by special revelation to the Gentiles was the same as theirs. Cf. the phrase, Lamentations 5. 6; Ezekiel 17. 18. heathen—the Gentiles.

10. remember the poor—of the Jewish Christians in Judea, then distressed. Paul and Barnabas had already done so (Acts 11. 28-30). the same—the very thing. I . . . was forward—or "zealous" (Acts 24. 17; Romans 15. 25; 1 Corinthians 16. 1; 2 Corinthians 8. and 9). Paul was zealous for good works, whilst denying justification by them.

11. Peter—"Cephas" in the oldest MSS. Paul's withstanding Peter is the strongest proof that the former gives of the independence of his apostleship in relation to the other apostles, and upsets the Romish doctrine of St. Peter's supremacy. The apostles were not always inspired; but were so always in writing the Scriptures. If then the inspired men who wrote them were not invariably at other times infallible, much less were the uninspired men who kept them. The Christian fathers may be trusted generally as witnesses to facts, but not implicitly followed in matters of opinion. come to Antioch—then the citadel of the Gentile Church: where first the Gospel was preached to idolatrous Gentiles, and where the name "Christians" was first given (Acts 11. 20, 26), and where Peter is said to have been subsequently bishop. The question at Antioch was not whether the Gentiles were admissible to the Christian covenant without becoming circumcised—that was the question settled at the Jerusalem council just before—but whether the Gentile Christians were to be admitted to social intercourse with the Jewish Christians without conforming to the Jewish institution. The Judaizers, soon after the council had passed the resolutions recognizing the equal rights of the Gentile Christians, repaired to Antioch, the scene of the gathering in of the Gentiles (Acts 11. 20-26), to witness, what to Jews would look so extraordinary, the receiving of men to communion of the Church without circumcision. Regarding the proceeding with prejudice, they explained away the force of the Jerusalem decision; and probably also desired to watch whether the Jewish Christians among the Gentiles violated the law, which that decision did not verbally sanction them in doing, though giving the Gentiles latitude (Acts 15. 19). to be blamed—rather, "(self) condemned;" his act at one time condemning his contrary acting at another time.

12. certain—men: perhaps James' view (in which he was not infallible, any more than Peter) was that the Jewish converts were still to observe Jewish ordinances, from which he had decided with the council the Gentiles should be free (Acts 15. 19). NKANDER, however, may be right in thinking these self-styled delegates from James were not really from him. Acts 15. 24 favours this. "Certain from James," may mean merely that they came from the Church at Jerusalem under James' bishopric. Still James' leanings were to legalism, and this gave him his influence with the Jewish party (Acts 21. 18-26). eat with . . . Gentiles—as in Acts 10. 10-20, 48, according to the command of the vision (Acts 11. 3-17). Yet after all, this same Peter, through fear of man (Proverbs 29. 25), was faithless to his own so distinctly avowed principles (Acts 15. 7-11). We recognize the same old nature in him as led him, after faithfully witnessing for Christ, yet for a brief space, to deny him. "Ever the first to recognize, and the first to draw back from great truths." [ALFORD.] An undesigned coincidence between the Gospels and the Epistle in the consistency of character as portrayed in both. It is beautiful to see how earthly misunderstandings of Christians are lost in Christ. For in 2 Peter 3. 15, Peter praises the very Epistles of Paul which he knew contained his own condemnation. Though apart from one another, and differing in characteristics, the two apostles were one in Christ. withdrew—Greek, "began to withdraw," &c. This implies a gradual drawing back. "Separated," entire severance. 13. the other—Greek, "the rest." Jews—Jewish Christians. dissembled likewise—Greek, "Joined in hypocrisy," viz., in living as though the law were necessary to justification, through fear of man, though they knew from God their Christian liberty of eating with Gentiles, and had availed themselves of it already (Acts 11. 2-17). The case was distinct from that in 1 Corinthians chs. 8.-10.; Romans 14. It was not a question of liberty, and of bearing with others' infirmities, but one affecting the essence of the Gospel, whether the Gentiles are to be virtually "compelled to live as do the Jews," in order to be justified (v. 14). Barnabas also—"Even Barnabas:" one least likely to be led into such an error, being with Paul in first preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles; showing the power of bad example and numbers. In Antioch, the capital of Gentile Christianity, and the central point of Christian missions, the controversy first arose, and in the same spot it now broke out afresh; and here Paul had first to encounter the party that afterwards persecuted him in every scene of his labours (Acts 15. 30-35.) 14. walked not uprightly—lit., "straight;" "were not walking with straightforward steps." Cf. ch. 6. 16. truth of the Gospel—which teaches that justification by legal works and observances is inconsistent with redemption by Christ. Paul alone here maintained the truth against Judaism, as afterwards against heathenism (2 Timothy 4. 16, 17). Peter—"Cephas" in the oldest MSS. before . . . all—(1 Timothy 5. 20.) If thou, &c.—"If thou, although being a Jew (and therefore one who might seem to be more bound to the law than the Gentiles), livest (habitually, without scruple and from conviction, Acts 15. 10, 11) as a Gentile (freely eating of every food, and living in other respects also as if legal ordinances in no way justify, v. 12), and not as a Jew, how is it that (so the oldest MSS. read, for "why") thou art compelling (virtually, by thine example) the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" (lit., to Judaize, i. e., to keep the ceremonial customs of the Jews: What had been formerly obedience to the law, is now mere Judaism). The high authority of Peter would constrain the Gentile Christians to regard Judaizing as necessary to all, since Jewish Christians could not consort with Gentile converts in communion without it. 15, 16. Connect these verses together, and read with most of the oldest MSS. "But" in the beginning of v. 16: "We (I and thou, Peter) by nature (not by proselytism), Jews, and not sinners as (Jewish language termed the Gentiles) from among the Gentiles, YET (lit., BUT) knowing that, &c., even we (resuming the 'we' of v. 15, 'we also,' as well as the Gentile sinners; casting away trust in the law), have believed," &c. not justified by the works of the law—as the GROUND of justification. "The works of the law" are those which have the law for their object—which are wrought to fulfil the law. [ALFORD.] but by—translating, "But only (in no other way save) through faith in Jesus Christ," as the MEAN and instrument of justification.

GALATIANS III.

Gen. Jesus Christ In the second case, read with the oldest MSS., "Christ Jesus," the Messiahship coming into prominence in the case of Jewish believers, as "Jesus" does in the first case, referring to the general proposition. justified by the faith of Christ—i. e., by Christ, the object of faith, as the ground of our justification. for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified—He rests his argument on this as an axiom in theology, referring to Psalm 143. 2, "Moses and Jesus Christ; The law and the promise; Doing and believing; Works and faith; Wages and the gift; The curse and the blessing—are represented as diametrically opposed." [BENGEI.] The moral law is, in respect to justification, more legal than the ceremonial, which was an elementary and preliminary (Gopel: So "Sinal" (ch. 4. 24), which is more famed for the Decalogue than for the ceremonial law, is made pre-eminently the type of legal bondage. Thus, justification by the law, whether the moral or ceremonial, is excluded (Romans 8. 20). 17. Greek, "But if, seeking to be justified (i. e., in believing union with) Christ (who has in the Gospel theory fulfilled the law for us), we (you and I) ourselves also were found (in your and my former communion with Gentiles) sinners (such as from the Jewish standpoint that now we resume, we should be regarded, since we have cast aside the law, thus having put ourselves in the same category as the Gentiles, who, being without the law, are, in the Jewish view, 'sinners,' v. 15), is therefore Christ, the minister of sin?" (Are we to admit the conclusion, in this case inevitable, that Christ having failed to justify us by faith, so has become to us the minister of sin, by putting us in the position of "sinners," as the Judaic theory, if correct, would make us, along with all others who are "without the law," Romans 2. 14; 1 Corinthians 9. 21; and with whom, by eating with them, we have identified ourselves?) The Christian mind revolts from so shocking a conclusion, and so, from the theory which would result in it. The whole sin lies, not with Christ, but with him who would necessitate such a blasphemous inference. But his false theory, though "seeking" from Christ, we have not "found" salvation (in contradiction to Christ's own words, Matthew 7. 7), but "have been ourselves also (like the Gentiles) found" to be "sinners," by having entered into communion with Gentiles (v. 12). 18. Greek, "For if the things which I overthrew (by the faith of Christ), those very things I build up again (viz., legal righteousness, by subjecting myself to the law), I prove myself (lit., 'I commend myself') a transgressor." Instead of commending yourself as you sought to do (v. 12, end), you merely commend yourself as a transgressor. The "I" is intended by Paul for Peter to take to himself, as it is his case, not Paul's own, that is described. A "transgressor" is another word for "sinner" (in v. 17), for "sin is the transgression of the law." You, Peter, by now asserting the law to be obligatory, are proving yourself a "sinner," or "transgressor," in your having set it aside by living as the Gentiles, and with them. Thus you are debarred by transgression from justification by the law, and you debar yourself from justification by Christ, since in your theory He becomes a minister of sin. 19. Here Paul seems to pass from his exact words to Peter, to the general purport of his argument on the question. However, his direct address to the Galatians seems not to be resumed till ch. 3. 1, "O foolish Galatians," &c. For—But I am not a "transgressor" by forsaking the law. "For," &c. Proving his indignant denial of the consequence that "Christ is the minister of sin" (v. 17), and of the premises from which it would follow. Christ, so far from being the minister of sin and death, is the establisher of righteousness and life. I am entirely in Him. [BENGEI.] I—here emphatical. Paul himself, not Peter, as in the "I" (v. 18). through the law—which was my "schoolmaster to bring me to Christ" (ch. 3. 24); both by its terrors (ch. 3. 18; Romans 8. 20) driving me to Christ, as the refuge from God's wrath against sin, and, when spiritually understood, teaching that itself is not permanent, but must give place to Christ, whom it prefigures as its scope and end (Romans 10. 4); and drawing me to Him by its promises (in the prophe-cles which form part of the Old Testament law) of a better righteousness, and of God's law written in the heart (Deuteronomy 10. 15-19; Jeremiah 31. 33; Acts 10. 43). and dead to the law—lit., "I died to the law," and so am dead to it, i. e., am passed from under its power, in respect to non-justification or condemnation (Colossians 2. 20; Romans 6. 14; 7. 4, 6); just as a woman once married and bound to a husband, ceases to be so bound to him when death interposes, and may be lawfully married to another husband. So by believing union to Christ in His death, we, being considered dead with him, are severed from the law's past power over us (cf. ch. 6. 14; 1 Corinthians 7. 39; Romans 6. 6-11; 1 Peter 2. 24). live unto God—(Romans 6. 11; 2 Corinthians 5. 15; 1 Peter 4. 1, 2). 20. I am crucified—lit., "I have been crucified with Christ." This more particularizes the foregoing. "I am dead" (v. 19; Philippians 3. 10). nevertheless I live; yet not I—*Greek "nevertheless I live, no longer (indeed) I." Though crucified I live; (and this) no longer that old man such as I once was (cf. Romans 7. 17). No longer Saul the Jew (ch. 5. 24; Colossians 3. 11, but "another man," cf. 1 Samuel 10. 6). ELLICOTT, &c., translate, "And it is no longer I that live, but Christ that liveth in me." But the plain antithesis between "crucified" and "live," requires the translation, "Nevertheless." the life which I now live—as contrasted with my life before conversion. in the flesh—my life seems to be a mere animal life "in the flesh," but this is not my true life; "it is but the mask of life under which lives another, viz., Christ, who is my true life." [LUTHER.] I live by the faith, &c.—*Greek, "in faith (viz.), that of (i. e., which rests on) the Son of God." "In faith," answers by contrast to "in the flesh." Faith, not the flesh, is the real element in which I live. The phrase, "the Son of God," reminds us that His Divine Sonship is the source of His life-giving power. loved me—His eternal gratuitous love is the link that unites me to the Son of God, and His "giving Himself for me," is the strongest proof of that love. 21. I do not frustrate the grace of God—I do not make it void, as thou, Peter, art doing by Judaizing. for—justifying the strong expression "frustrate," or "make void." is dead in vain—*Greek, "Christ died needlessly," or "without just cause." Christ's having died, shows that the law has no power to justify us; for if the law can justify or make us righteous, the death of Christ is superfluous. [CHRYSOSTOM.]

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-29. REPROOF OF THE GALATIANS FOR ABANDONING FAITH FOR LEGALISM. JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH VINDICATED: THE LAW SHOWN TO BE SUBSEQUENT TO THE PROMISE: BELIEVERS ARE THE SPIRITUAL SEED OF ABRAHAM, WHO WAS JUSTIFIED BY FAITH. THE LAW WAS OUR SCHOOLMASTER TO BRING US TO CHRIST, THAT WE MIGHT BECOME CHILDREN OF GOD BY FAITH. 1. that ye should not obey the truth—Omitted in the oldest MSS. bewitched—fascinated you so that you have lost your wits. THEMISTIUS says the Galatians were naturally very acute in intellect. Hence, St. Paul wonders they could be so misled in this case. you—Emphatical. "You, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been graphically set forth (lit., in writing, viz., by vivid portraiture in preaching) among you, crucified" (so the sense and Greek order require rather than English Version). As Christ was "crucified," so ye ought to have been by faith "crucified with Christ," and so "dead to the law" (ch. 2. 19, 20). Reference to the "eyes" is appropriate, as fascination was supposed to be exercised through the eyes. The sight of Christ crucified ought to have been enough to counteract all fascination. 2. "Was it by the works of the law that ye received the Spirit (manifested by outward miracles, v. 5; Mark 16. 17; Hebrews 2. 4; and by spiritual graces, v. 14; Galatians 4. 5, 6; Ephesians 1. 13), or by the hearing of faith?" The "only" implies, "I desire, omitting other arguments, to rest the question on this alone," I who was your teacher, desire now to "learn" this one thing from you. The epithet "Holy" is not prefixed to "Spirit," because that epithet is a joyous one, whereas this Epistle is

stern and reprovng. [BENGEI.] hearing of faith—Faith consists not in working, but in receiving (Romans 10. 16, 17). 3. begun—the Christian life (Philippians 1. 6). in the Spirit—Not merely was Christ crucified, “graphically set forth” in my preaching, but also “the Spirit” confirmed the word preached, by imparting His spiritual gifts. “Having thus begun” with the receiving His spiritual gifts, “are ye now being made perfect” (so the Greek), i. e., are ye seeking to be made perfect with fleshly ordinances of the law? [ESTIUS.] Cf. Romans 2. 28; Philippians 3. 8; Hebrews 9. 10. Having begun in the Spirit, i. e., the Holy Spirit ruling your spiritual life as its “essence and active principle” [ELIICOTT], in contrast to “the flesh,” the element in which the law works. [ALFORD.] Having begun your Christianity in the Spirit, i. e., in the Divine life that proceeds from faith, are ye seeking after something higher still (the perfecting of your Christianity) in the sensuous and the earthly, which cannot possibly elevate the inner life of the Spirit, viz., outward ceremonies? [NEANDER.] No doubt the Galatians thought that they were going more deeply into the Spirit; for the flesh may be easily mistaken for the Spirit, even by those who have made progress, unless they continue to maintain a pure faith. [BENGEI.] 4. Have ye suffered so many things—viz., persecution from Jews and from unbelieving fellow-countrymen, incited by the Jews, at the time of your conversion. in vain—fruitlessly, needlessly, since ye might have avoided them by professing Judaism. [GROTIUS.] Or, snail ye, by falling from grace, lose the reward promised for all your sufferings, so that they shall be “in vain” (ch. 4. 11; 1 Corinthians 15. 2, 17–19, 29–32; 2 Thessalonians 1. 5–7; 2 John 8)? yet—rather, “If it be really (or ‘indeed’) in vain.” [ELIICOTT, &c.] “If, as it must be, what I have said, ‘in vain,’ is really the fact.” [ALFORD.] I prefer understanding it as a mitigation of the preceding words. I hope better things of you, for I trust you will return from legalism to grace; if so, as I confidently expect, you will not have “suffered so many things in vain.” [ESTIUS.] For “God has given you the Spirit, and has wrought mighty works among you” (v. 5; Hebrews 10. 32–36). [BENGEI.] 5. He . . . that ministereth—or “supplieth,” God (2 Corinthians 9. 10). He who supplied and supplies to you the Spirit still, to the present time. These miracles do not prove grace to be in the heart (Mark 9. 38, 39). He speaks of these miracles as a matter of unquestioned notoriety among those addressed; an undesigned proof of their genuineness (cf. 1 Corinthians 12). worketh miracles among you—rather, “IN you,” as ch. 2. 8; Matthew 14. 2; Ephesians 2. 2; Philippians 2. 13; at your conversion and since. [ALFORD.] doeth he it by the works of the law—i. e., as a consequence resulting from (so the Greek) the works of the law (cf. v. 2). This cannot be, because the law was then unknown to you when you received those gifts of the Spirit. 6. The answer to the question in v. 5 is here taken for granted, It was by the hearing of faith; following this up, he says, “Even as Abraham believed,” &c. (Genesis 15. 4–6; Romans 4. 3). God supplies unto you the Spirit as the result of faith, not works, just as Abraham obtained justification by faith, not by works (v. 6, 8, 11; ch. 4. 22, 26, 28). Where justification is, there the Spirit is, so that if the former comes by faith, the latter must also. 7. they which are of faith—as the source and starting-point of their spiritual life. The same phrase is in the Greek of Romans 3. 26. the same—these, and these alone, to the exclusion of all the other descendants of Abraham. children—Greek, “sons” (v. 29). 8. And—Greek, “Moreover.” foreseeing—One great excellency of Scripture is, that in it all points liable ever to be controverted, are, with prescient wisdom, decided in the most appropriate language. would justify—rather, “justifieth.” Present indicative. It is now, and at all times, God’s one way of justification. the heathen—rather, “the Gentiles;” or “the nations,” as the same Greek is translated at the end of the verse. God justifieth the Jews, too, “by faith, not by works.” But he specifies the Gentiles in particular here, as it was their case that was in question, the Galatians being Gentiles. preached before the Gospel—“announced beforehand the Gospel.” For the “promise” was substantially the Gospel by anticipation. Cf. John 8. 56; Hebrews 4. 2. A proof that “the old fathers did not look only for transitory promises” (Article VII., Church of England). Thus the Gospel, in its essential germ, is older than the law, though the full development of the former is subsequent to the latter. In thee—not “in thy seed,” which is a point not here raised; but strictly “in thee,” as followers of thy faith, it having first shown the way to justification before God [ALFORD]; or “in thee,” as Father of the promised seed, viz., Christ (v. 16), who is the Object of faith (Genesis 22. 18; Psalm 72. 17), and imitating thy faith (see Note, v. 9). all nations—or as above, “all the Gentiles” (Genesis 12. 3; 18. 18; 22. 18). be blessed—an act of grace, not something earned by works. The blessing of justification was to Abraham by faith in the promise, not by works. So to those who follow Abraham, the father of the faithful, the blessing, i. e., justification, comes purely by faith in Him who is the subject of the promise. 9. they—and they alone. of faith—Note v. 7, beginning. with—together with. faithful—Implying what it is in which they are “blessed together with him,” viz., faith, the prominent feature of his character, and of which the result to all who like Him have it, is justification. 10. Confirmation of v. 9. They who depend on the works of the law cannot share the blessing, for they are under the curse “written,” Deuteronomy 27. 26, LXX. PERFECT obedience is required by the words, “in all things.” CONTINUAL obedience by the word, “continueth.” No man renders this obedience (cf. Romans 3. 19, 20). It is observable. Paul quotes Scripture to the Jews who were conversant with it, as in Epistle to the Hebrews, as said or spoken but to the Gentiles, as written. So Matthew, writing for Jews, quotes it as said, or spoken; Mark and Luke, writing for Gentiles, as written (Matthew 1. 22; Mark 1. 2; Luke 2. 22, 23). [TOWNSON.] 11. by the law—Greek, “in the law.” Both in and by are included. The syllogism in this verse and v. 12, is, according to Scripture, The just shall live by faith. But the law is not of faith, but of doing, or works (i. e., does not make faith, but works, the conditional ground of justifying). Therefore “in,” or “by the law, no man is justified before God” (whatever the case may be before men, Romans 4. 2),—not even if he could, which he cannot, keep the law, because the Scripture element and conditional mean of justification is faith. The just shall live by faith—(Romans 1. 17; Habakkuk 2. 4.) Not as BENGEI and ALFORD, “He who is just by faith shall live.” The Greek supports English Version. Also the contrast is between “live by faith” (viz., as the ground and source of his justification), and “live in them,” viz., in his doings or works (v. 12), as the conditional element wherein he is justified. 12. doeth—Many depended on the law, although they did not keep it; but without doing, saith Paul, it is of no use to them (Romans 2. 13, 17, 23; 10. 5). 13. Abrupt exclamation, as he breaks away impatiently from those who would involve us again in the curse of the law, by seeking justification in it, to “Christ,” who “has redeemed us from its curse.” The “us” refers primarily to the Jews, to whom the law principally appertained, in contrast to “the Gentiles” (v. 14; cf. ch. 4. 3, 4). But it is not restricted solely to the Jews, as ALFORD thinks; for these are the representative people of the world at large, and their “law” is the embodiment of what God requires of the whole world. The curse of its non-fulfilment affects the Gentiles through the Jews; for the law represents that righteousness which God requires of all, and which, since the Jews failed to fulfil, the Gentiles are equally unable to fulfil. Verse 10, “As many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse,” refers plainly, not to the Jews only, but to all, even Gentiles (as the Galatians), who seek justification by the law. The Jews’ law represents the universal law which condemned the Gentiles, though with less clear consciousness on their part (Romans 2). The revelation of God’s “wrath” by the law of conscience, in some degree prepared the Gentiles for appreciating redemption through Christ when revealed. The curse had to be removed from off the heathen, too, as well as the Jews, in order that the blessing, through Abraham, might flow to them. Accordingly, the “we,” in “that we might receive the promise of the Spirit," plainly refers to both Jews and Gentiles. redeemed us—bought us off from our former bondage (ch. 4. 5), and "from the curse" under which all He who trust to the law and the works of the law for justification. The Gentile Galatians, by putting themselves under the law, were involving themselves in the curse from which Christ has redeemed the Jews primarily, and through them the Gentiles. The ransom-price He paid was His own precious blood (1 Peter 1. 18, 19; cf. Matthew 20. 28; Acts 20. 28; 1 Corinthians 6. 20; 7. 23; 1 Timothy 2. 6; 2 Peter 2. 1; Revelation 5. 9). being made—Greek, "having become." a curse for us—Having become what we were, in our behalf, "a curse," that we might cease to be a curse. Not merely accursed (in the concrete), but a curse in the abstract, bearing the universal curse of the whole human race. So 2 Corinthians 5. 21, "Sin for us," not sinful, but bearing the whole sin of our race, regarded as one vast aggregate of sin. See Note there. "Anathema" means "set apart to God," to His glory, but to the person's own destruction. "Curse," an execration. written—Deuteronomy 21. 23. Christ's bearing the particular curse of hanging on the tree, is a sample of the general curse which He representatively bore. Not that the Jews put to death malefactors by hanging; but after having put them to death otherwise, in order to brand them with peculiar ignominy, they hung the bodies on a tree, and such malefactors were accursed by the law (cf. Acts 5. 30; 10. 39). God's providence ordered it so that to fulfil the prophecy of the curse and other prophecies, Jesus should be crucified, and so hang on the tree, though that death was not a Jewish mode of execution. The Jews accordingly, in contempt, call Him "the hanged one," Tolvi, and Christians, "worshippers of the hanged one;" and make it their great objection that He died the accursed death. [TRYPHO, in Justin Martyr, p. 249; 1 Peter 2. 24.] Hung between heaven and earth as though unworthy of either! 14. The intent of "Christ becoming a curse for us:" "To the end that upon the Gentiles the blessing of Abraham (i. e., promised to Abraham, viz., justification by faith) might come in Christ Jesus" (cf. v. 8). that we might receive the promise of the Spirit—the promised Spirit (Joel 2. 28, 29; Luke 24. 49). This clause follows not the clause immediately preceding (for our receiving the Spirit is not the result of the blessing of Abraham coming on the Gentiles), but "Christ hath redeemed us," &c. through faith—not by works. Here he resumes the thought in v. 2. "The Spirit from without, kindles within us some spark of faith whereby we lay hold of Christ, and even of the Spirit Himself, that He may dwell within us." [FLACIUS.] 15. I speak after the manner of men—I take an illustration from a merely human transaction of every-day occurrence. but a man's covenant—whose purpose it is far less important to maintain. if it be confirmed—when once it hath been ratified. no man disannulleth—"none setteth aside," not even the author himself, much less any second party. None does so who acts in common equity. Much less would the righteous God do so. The law is here, by personification, regarded as a second person, distinct from, and subsequent to, the promise of God. The promise is everlasting, and more peculiarly belongs to God. The law is regarded as something extraneous, afterwards introduced, exceptional, and temporary (v. 17-19, 21-24). addeth—none addeth new conditions "making" the covenant "of none effect" (v. 17). So legal Judaism could make no alteration in the fundamental relation between God and man, already established by the promises to Abraham; it could not add a new condition the observance of the law, in which the fulfilment of the promise would be attached to a condition impossible for man to perform. The "covenant" here is one of free grace, a promise afterwards carried into effect in the Gospel. 16. This verse is parenthetical. The covenant of promise was not "spoken" (so Greek for "made") to Abraham alone, but "to Abraham and his seed;" to the latter especially; and this means Christ (and that which is inseparable from Him, the literal Israel, and the spiritual, His body, the Church). Christ not having come when the law was given, the covenant could not have been then fulfilled but awaited the coming of Him, the Seed, to whom it was spoken. promises—plural, because the same promise was often repeated (Genesis 12. 8, 7; 15. 5, 18; 17. 7; 22. 18), and because it involved many things; earthly blessings to the literal children of Abraham in Canaan, and spiritual and heavenly blessings to his spiritual children; but both promised to Christ, "the Seed" and representative Head of the literal and spiritual Israel alike. In the spiritual seed there is no distinction of Jew or Greek; but to the literal seed, the promises still in part remain to be fulfilled (Romans 11. 26). The covenant was not made with "many seeds" (which if there had been, a pretext might exist for supposing there was one seed before the law, another under the law; and that those sprung from one seed, say the Jewish, are admitted on different terms, and with a higher degree of acceptability, than those sprung from the Gentile seed), but with the one seed; therefore, the promise that in Him "all the families of the earth shall be blessed" (Genesis 12. 3), joins in this one Seed, Christ Jew and Gentile, as fellow-heirs on the same terms of acceptability, viz., by grace through faith (Romans 4. 13) not to some by promise, to others by the law, but to all alike, circumcised and uncircumcised, constituting but one seed in Christ (Romans 4. 16). The law, on the other hand, contemplates the Jews and Gentiles as distinct seeds. God makes a covenant, but it is one of promise; whereas the law is a covenant of works. Whereas the law brings in a mediator, a third party (v. 19, 20), God makes His covenant of promise with the one seed, Christ (Genesis 17. 7), and embraces others only as they are identified with, and represented by, Christ. one . . . Christ—not in the exclusive sense, the man Christ Jesus, but "Christ" (Jesus is not added, which would limit the meaning), including His people who are part of Himself, the Second Adam, and Head of redeemed humanity. Verses 28, 29 prove this, "Ye are all ONE in Christ Jesus" (Jesus is added here as the person is indicated). "And ye be Christ's, ye are Abraham's SEED, heirs according to the promise." 17. this I say—"this is what I mean," by what I said in v. 15. confirmed . . . of God—"ratified by God" (v. 15). in Christ—rather, "unto Christ" (cf. v. 16). However, Vulgate and the old Italian versions translate as English Version. But the oldest MSS. omit the words altogether, the law which was—Greek, "which came into existence 430 years after" (Exodus 12. 40, 41). He does not, as in the case of "the covenant," add "enacted by God" (John 1. 17). The dispensation of "the promise" began with the call of Abraham from Ur into Canaan, and ended on the last night of his grandson Jacob's sojourn in Canaan, the land of promise. The dispensation of the law, which engenders bondage, was beginning to draw on from the time of his entrance into Egypt, the land of bondage. It was to Christ in him, as in his grandfather Abraham, and his father Isaac, not to him or them as persons, the promise was spoken. On the day following the last repetition of the promise orally (Genesis 46. 1-6), at Beersheba, Israel passed into Egypt. It is from the end, not from the beginning of the dispensation of promise, that the interval of 430 years between it and the law is to be counted. At Beersheba, after the covenant with Abimelech, Abraham called on the everlasting God and the well was confirmed to him and his seed as an everlasting possession. Here God appeared to Isaac. Here Jacob received the promise of the blessing, for which God had called Abraham out of Ur, repeated for the last time, on the last night of his sojourn in the land of promise. cannot—Greek, "doth not disannul." make . . . of none effect—The promise would become so, if the power of conferring the inheritance be transferred from it to the law (Romans 4. 14). 18. the inheritance—all the blessings to be inherited by Abraham's literal and spiritual children, according to the promise made to him and to his Seed, Christ, justification and glorification (ch. 4. 7, Romans 8. 17; 1 Corinthians 6. 9). but God, &c.—The Greek order requires rather, "But to Abraham it was by promise that God hath given it." The conclusion is Therefore the inheritance is not of, or from, the law (Romans 4. 14). 19. "Wherefore then serveth the law?" as it is of no avail for justification, is it either useless, or contrary to the covenant of God? [CALVIN.] added—to the original covenant of promise. This is not inconsistent with v. 15, "No man addeth thereto;" for there the kind of addition meant, and therefore denied, is one that would add new conditions, inconsistent with the grace of the covenant of promise. The law, though misunderstood by the Judaizers as doing so, was really added for a different purpose, viz., "because of (or as the Greek, 'for the sake of') the transgressions," i. e., to bring out into clearer view the transgressions of it (Romans 7. 7-9); to make men more fully conscious of their sins, by being perceived as transgressions of the law, and so to make them long for the promised Saviour. This accords with v. 23, 24; Romans 4. 15. The meaning can hardly be "to check transgressions," for the law rather stimulates the corrupt heart to disobey it (Romans 5. 20; 7. 13). till the seed—during the period up to the time when the seed came. The law was a preparatory dispensation for the Jewish nation (Romans 5. 20; Greek, "the law came in additionally and incidentally"), intervening between the promise and its fulfilment in Christ. come—(Cf. "faith came," v. 23.) the promise—(Romans 4. 21.) ordained—Greek, "constituted" or "disposed," by angels—as the instrumental enactors of the law. [ALFORD.] God delegated the law to angels as something rather alien to Him and severe (Acts 7. 53; Hebrews 2. 2, 3; cf. Deuteronomy 33. 2, "He came with ten thousands of saints," i. e., angels, Psalm 68. 17). He reserved "the promise" to Himself, and dispensed it according to His own goodness. in the hand of a mediator—viz., Moses. Deuteronomy 5. 5, "I stood between the Lord and you:" the very definition of a mediator. Hence the phrase often recurs, "By the hand of Moses." In the giving of the law, the "angels" were representatives of God; Moses, as mediator, represented the people. 20. "Now a mediator cannot be of one (but must be of two parties whom he mediates between); but God is one" (not two: owing to His essential unity not admitting of an intervening party between Him and those to be blessed; but as the ONE Sovereign, His own representative, giving the blessing directly by promise to Abraham, and, in its fulfilment, to Christ, "the Seed," without new condition, and without a mediator such as the law had). The conclusion understood is, Therefore a mediator cannot appertain to God; and consequently, the law, with its inseparable appendage of a mediator, cannot be the normal way of dealing of God, the one, and unchangeable God, who dealt with Abraham by direct promise, as a sovereign, not as one forming a compact with another party, with conditions and a mediator attached thereto. God would bring man into immediate communion with Him, and not have man separated from Him by a mediator that keeps back from access, as Moses and the legal priesthood did (Exodus 19. 12, 13, 17, 21-24; Hebrews 12. 19-24). The law that thus interposed a mediator and conditions between man and God, was an exceptional state limited to the Jews, and parenthetically preparatory to the Gospel, God's normal mode of dealing, as He dealt with Abraham, viz., face to face directly; by promise and grace, and not conditions; to all nations united by faith in the one seed (Ephesians 2. 14, 16, 18), and not to one people to the exclusion and severance from the ONE common Father, of all other nations. It is no objection to this view, that the Gospel, too, has a mediator (1 Timothy 2. 5). For Jesus is not a mediator separating the two parties in the covenant of promise or grace, as Moses did, but ONE in both nature and office with both God and man (cf. "God in Christ," v. 17): representing the whole universal manhood (1 Corinthians 15. 22, 45, 47), and also bearing in Him "all the fulness of the Godhead." Even His mediatorial office is to cease when its purpose of reconciling all things to God shall have been accomplished (1 Corinthians 15. 24); and God's ONENESS (Zechariah 14. 9), as "all in all," shall be fully manifested. Cf. John 1. 17, where the two mediators—Moses, the severing mediator of legal conditions, and Jesus, the uniting mediator of grace—are contrasted. The Jews began their worship by setting the Schemah, opening thus. "Jehovah our God is

ONE Jehovah;" which words their Rabbis (as JAROHUS interpret as teaching not only the unity of God, but the future universality of His Kingdom on earth (Zechariah 2. 9). St. Paul (Romans 3. 30) infers the same truth from the ONENESS of God (cf. Ephesians 4. 4-6). He, as being ONE, unites all believers, without distinction, to Himself (v. 8, 16, 28; Ephesians 1. 10; 2. 14; cf. Hebrews 2. 11) in direct communion. The unity of God involves the unity of the people of God, and also His dealing directly without intervention of a mediator. 21. "Is the law (which involves a mediator) against the promises of God (which are without a mediator, and rest on God alone and immediately)? God forbid." life—The law, as an externally prescribed rule, can never internally impart spiritual life to men naturally dead in sin, and change the disposition. If the law had been a law capable of giving life, "verily (in very reality, and not in the mere fancy of legalists) righteousness would have been by the law" (for where life is, there righteousness, its condition, must also be). But the law does not pretend to give life, and therefore not righteousness; so there is no opposition between the law and the promise. Righteousness can only come through the promise to Abraham, and through its fulfilment in the Gospel of grace. 22. But—as the law cannot give life or righteousness. [ALFORD.] Or the "But" means, So far is righteousness from being of the law, that the knowledge of sin is rather what comes of the law. [BENGEL.] the Scripture—which began to be written after the time of the promise, at the time when the law was given. The written letter was needed so as PERMANENTLY to convict man of disobedience to God's command. Therefore he says, "the Scripture," not the "Law." Cf. v. 8, "Scripture," for "the God of the Scripture." concluded—"shut up," under condemnation, as in a prison. Cf. Isaiah 24. 22, "As prisoners gathered in the pit and shut up in the prison." Beautifully contrasted with "the liberty wherewith Christ makes free," which follows, v. 7, 9, 25, 26; ch. 5. 1; Isaiah 61. 1. all—Greek neuter, "the universe of things:" the whole world, man, and all that appertains to him. under sin—(Romans 8. 9, 19; 11. 32.) the promise—the inheritance promised (v. 18). by faith of Jesus Christ—i. e., which is by faith in Jesus Christ. might be given—The emphasis is on "given:" that it might be a free gift; not something earned by the works of the law (Romans 6. 23). to them that believe—to them that have "the faith of (in) Jesus Christ" just spoken of. 23. faith—viz., that just mentioned (v. 22), of which Christ is the object. kept—Greek, "kept in ward:" the effect of the "shutting up" (v. 22; ch. 4. 2; Romans 7. 6). unto—with a view to the faith," &c. We were, in a manner, morally forced to it, so that there remained to us no refuge but faith. Cf. the phrase, Psalm 78. 50; Margin, 31. 8. which should afterwards, &c.—"which was afterwards to be revealed." 24. "So that the law hath been (i. e., hath turned out to be) our schoolmaster (or 'tutor,' lit., 'pedagogue': this term, among the Greeks, meant a faithful servant entrusted with the care of the boy from childhood to puberty, to keep him from evil, physical and moral, and accompany him to his amusements and studies) to guide us unto Christ," with whom we are no longer "shut up" in bondage, but are freemen. "Children" (lit., infants) need such tutoring (ch. 4. 8). might be—rather, "that we may be justified by faith;" which we could not be till Christ, the object of faith, had come. Meanwhile the law, by outwardly checking the sinful propensity which was constantly giving fresh proof of its refractoriness—as thus the consciousness of the power of the sinful principle became more vivid, and hence the sense of need both of forgiveness of sin and freedom from its bondage was awakened—the law became a "schoolmaster to guide us unto Christ." [NEANDER.] The moral law shows us what we ought to do, and so we learn our inability to do it. in the ceremonial law we seek, by animal sacrifices, to answer for our not having done it, but find dead victims no satisfaction for the sins of living men, and that outward purifying will not cleanse the soul; and that therefore we need an infinitely better Sacrifice, the anti-type of all the legal sacrifices. Thus delivered up to the justicial law, we see how awful is the doom we deserve: thus the law at last leads us to Christ, with whom we find righteousness and peace. "Sin, sin!" is the word heard again and again in the Old Testament. Had it not there for centuries rung in the ear, and fastened on the conscience, the joyful sound, 'grace for grace,' would not have been the watchword of the New Testament. This was the end of the whole system of sacrifices." [THOLUCK.] 25. "But now that faith is come," &c. Moses the lawgiver cannot bring us into the heavenly Canaan, though he can bring us to the border of it. At that point he is superseded by Joshua, the type of Jesus, who leads the true Israel into their inheritance. The law leads us to Christ, and there its office ceases. 26. children—(Greek, "sons." by—Greek, "through faith." "Ye all" (Jews and Gentiles alike) are no longer children requiring a tutor, but sons emancipated and walking at liberty. 27. baptized into Christ—(Romans 6. 3.) have put on Christ—ye did, in that very act of being baptized into Christ, put on, or clothe yourselves with, Christ: so the Greek expresses. Christ is to you the toga virilis (the Roman garment of the full-grown man, assumed when ceasing to be a child). [BENGEL.] GATAKER defines a Christian, "One who has put on Christ." The argument is, By baptism ye have put on Christ; and therefore, He being the Son of God, ye become sons by adoption, by virtue of His Sonship by generation. This proves that baptism, where it answers to its ideal, is not a mere empty sign, but a means of spiritual transference from the state of legal condemnation to that of living union with Christ, and of sonship through Him in relation to God (Romans 12. 14). Christ alone can, by baptizing with His Spirit, make the inward grace correspond to the outward sign. But as He promises the blessing in the faithful use of the means, the Church has rightly presumed, in charity, that such is the case, nothing appearing to the contrary. 28. There is in this sonship by faith in Christ, no class privileged above another, as the Jews under the law had been above the Gentiles (Romans 10. 12; 1 Corinthians 12. 13; Colossians 3. 11). bond nor free—Christ alike belongs to both by faith; whence he puts "bond" before "free." Cf. Notes, 1 Corinthians 7. 21, 22; Ephesians 6. 8. neither male nor female—rather, as Greek, "there is not male and female." There is no distinction into male and female. Difference of sex makes no difference in Christian privileges. But under the law the male sex had great privileges. Males alone had in their body circumcision, the sign of the covenant (contrast baptism applied to male and female alike); they alone were capable of being kings and priests, whereas all of either sex are now "kings and priests unto God" (Revelation 1. 6); they had prior right to inheritances. In the resurrection the relation of the sexes shall cease (Luke 20. 35). one—Greek, "one man;" masculine, not neuter, viz., "one new man" in Christ (Ephesians 2. 15). 29. and heirs—The oldest MSS. omit "and." Christ is "Abraham's seed" (v. 16): ye are "one in Christ" (v. 28), and one with Christ, as having "put on Christ" (v. 27); therefore YE are "Abraham's seed," which is tantamount to saying (whence the "and" is omitted), ye are "heirs according to the promise" (not "by the law," v. 18); for it was to Abraham's seed that the inheritance was promised (v. 16). Thus he arrives at the same truth which he set out with (v. 7). But one new "seed" of a righteous succession could be found. One single faultless grain of human nature was found by God Himself, the source of a new and imperishable seed: "the seed" (Psalm 22. 30) who receive from Him a new nature and name (Genesis 3. 15; Isaiah 53. 10, 11; John 12. 24). In Him the lineal descent from David becomes extinct. He died without posterity. But He lives and shall reign on David's throne. No one has a legal claim to sit upon it but Himself, He being the only living direct representative (Ezekiel 21. 27). His spiritual seed derive their birth from the travail of His soul, being born again of His word, which is the incorruptible seed (John 1. 12; Romans 9. 8; 1 Peter 1. 23).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-31. THE SAME SUBJECT CONTINUED: ILLUSTRATION OF OUR SUBJECTION TO THE LAW ONLY TILL CHRIST

CAME, FROM THE SUBJECTION OF AN HEIR TO HIS GUARDIAN TILL HE IS OF AGE. ST. PETER'S GOOD-WILL TO THE GALATIANS SHOULD LEAD THEM TO THE SAME GOOD-WILL TO HIM AS THEY HAD AT FIRST SHOWN. THEIR DESIRE TO BE UNDER THE LAW SHOWN BY THE ALLEGORY OF ISAAC AND ISHMAEL TO BE INCONSISTENT WITH THEIR GOSPEL LIBERTY. 1-7. The fact of God's sending His Son to redeem us who were under the law (v. 4), and sending the Spirit of His Son into our hearts (v. 6), confirms the conclusion (ch. 3. 29) that we are "heirs according to the promise." the heir—(Ch. 3. 29.) It is not, as in earthly inheritances, the death of the father, but our Father's sovereign will simply that makes us heirs. child—Greek, "one under age." differeth nothing, &c.—i. e., has no more freedom than a slave (so the Greek for "servant" means). He is not at his own disposal. lord of all—by title and virtual ownership (cf. 1 Corinthians 3. 21, 22). 2. tutors and governors—rather, "guardians (of the person) and stewards" (of the property). Answering to "the law was our schoolmaster" or "tutor" (ch. 3. 24). until the time appointed of the Father—in His eternal purposes (Ephesians 1. 9-11). The Greek is a legal term, expressing a time defined by law, or testamentary disposition. 3. we—the Jews primarily, and inclusively the Gentiles also. For the "we" in v. 5 plainly refers to both Jew and Gentile believers. The Jews in their bondage to the law of Moses, as the representative people of the world, include all mankind virtually amenable to God's law (Romans 2. 14, 15; cf. ch. 3. 18, 23, Notes). Even the Gentiles were under "bondage," and in a state of discipline suitable to nonage, till Christ came as the Emancipator. were in bondage—as "servants" (v. 1). under the elements—or "rudiments;" rudimentary religion teaching of a non-Christian character: the elementary lessons of outward things (lit., "of the [outward] world"); such as the legal ordinances mentioned, v. 10 (Colossians 2. 8, 20). Our childhood's lessons. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] Lit., The letters of the alphabet (Hebrews 5. 12). 4. the fulness of the time—viz., "the time appointed by the Father" (v. 2). Cf. Note, Ephesians 1. 10; Luke 1. 57 Acts 2. 1; Ezekiel 5. 2. "The Church has its own ages." [BENGEL.] God does nothing prematurely, but, foreseeing the end from the beginning, waits till all is ripe for the execution of His purpose. Had Christ come directly after the fall, the enormity and deadly fruits of sin would not have been realized fully by man, so as to feel his desperate state and need of a Saviour. Sin was fully developed. Man's inability to save himself by obedience to the law, whether that of Moses, or that of conscience, was completely manifested; all the prophecies of various ages found their common centre in this particular time; and Providence, by various arrangements in the social and political, as well as the moral, world, had fully prepared the way for the coming Redeemer. God often permits physical evil long before he teaches the remedy. The small pox had for long committed its ravages before inoculation, and then vaccination, was discovered. It was essential to the honour of God's law to permit evil long before he revealed the full remedy. Cf. "the set time" (Psalm 102. 13). was come—Greek, "came." sent forth—Greek, "Sent forth out of heaven from Himself." [ALFORD and BENGEL.] The same verb is used of the Father's sending forth the Spirit (v. 6). So in Acts 7. 12 Cf. with this verse, John 8. 42; Isaiah 48. 16. his—Emphatical. "His own Son." Not by adoption, as we are (v. 5); nor merely His Son by the anointing of the Spirit which God sends into the heart (v. 6; John 1. 18). made of a woman—"made" is used as in 1 Corinthians 15. 45, "The first man, Adam, was made a living soul." Greek, "made to be (born) of a woman." The expression implies a special interposition of God in His birth as man, viz., causing Him to be conceived by the Holy Ghost. So ESTIUS made under the law—"made to be under the law." Not merely as GROTIUS and ALFORD explain, "Born subject to the law as a Jew." But "made" by His Father's appointment, and His own free-will, "subject to the law," to keep it all, ceremonial and moral, perfectly for us as a representative Man, and to suffer and exhaust the penalty of our whole race's violation of it. This constitutes the significance of His circumcision, His being presented in the temple (Luke 2. 21, 22, 27; cf. Matthew 5. 17), and His baptism by John, when He said (Matthew 3. 15), "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." 5. To-Greek, "That He might redeem." them . . . under the law—Primarily the Jews; but as these were the representative people of the world, the Gentiles, too, are included in the redemption (ch. 3. 13). receive—The Greek implies the suitability of the thing as long ago predestined by God. "Receive as something destined or due" (Luke 23. 41; 2 John 8). Herein God makes of sons of men sons of God, inasmuch as God made of the Son of God the Son of man. [ST. AUGUSTINE on Psalm 52.] 6. because ye are sons, &c.—The gift of the Spirit of prayer is the consequence of our adoption. The Gentile Galatians might think, as the Jews were under the law before their adoption, that so they, too, must first be under the law. St. Paul, by anticipation, meets this objection by saying, YE ARE sons, therefore ye need not be as children (v. 1) under the tutorship of the law, as being already in the free state of "sons" of God by faith in Christ (ch. 3. 26), no longer in your nonage (as "children," v. 1). The Spirit of God's only Begotten Son in your hearts, sent from, and leading you to cry to, the Father, attests your sonship by adoption; for the Spirit is the "earnest of your inheritance" (Romans 8. 15, 16; Ephesians 1. 13). "It is because ye are sons that God sent forth" (the Greek requires this translation, not "hath sent forth") INTO OUR (so the oldest MSS. read for "your," in English Version) hearts the Spirit of His Son, crying, "Abba, Father" (John 1. 12). As in v. 5 he changed from "them," the third person, to "we," the first person, so here he changes from "ye," the second person, to "our," the first person: this he does to identify their case as Gentiles, with his own and that of his believing fellow-countrymen, as Jews. In another point of view, though not the immediate one intended by the context, this verse expresses, "Because ye are sons (already in God's electing purpose of love), God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts," &c.: God thus, by sending His Spirit in due time, actually conferring that sonship which He already regarded as a present reality ("are") because of His purpose, even before it was actually fulfilled. So Hebrews 2. 13, where "the children" are spoken of as existing in His purpose, before their actual existence. the Spirit of his Son—By faith ye are one with the Son, so that what is His is yours; His Sonship ensures your sonship; His Spirit ensures for you a share in the same. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His" (Romans 8. 9). Moreover, as the Spirit of God proceeds from God the Father, so the Spirit of the Son proceeds from the Son; so that the Holy Ghost, as the Creed saith, "proceedeth from the Father and the Son." The Father was not begotten: the Son is begotten of the Father; the Holy Ghost proceeding from the Father and the Son. crying—Here the SPIRIT is regarded as the agent in praying, and the believer as His organ. In Romans 8. 15, "The Spirit of adoption" is said to be that whereby we cry, "Abba, Father:" but in Romans 8. 26, "THE SPIRIT ITSELF maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." The believers' prayer is His prayer: hence arises its acceptability with God. Abba, Father—The Hebrew says, "Abba" (a Hebrew term), the Greek, "Father" ("Pater," a Greek term in the original), both united together in one Sonship and one cry of faith, "Abba, Father." So "Even so ('Nai,' Greek), Amen" (Hebrew), both meaning the same (Revelation 1. 7). Christ's own former cry is the believers' cry, "Abba, Father" (Mark 14. 36). 7. Wherefore—Conclusion inferred from v. 4-6. thou—Individualizing and applying the truth to each. Such an individual appropriation of this comforting truth God grants in answer to them who cry, "Abba, Father." heir of God through Christ—The oldest MSS. read, "an heir through God." This combines on behalf of man, the whole before-mentioned agency of THE TRINITY: the Father sent His Son and the Spirit; the Son has freed us from the law; the Spirit has completed our sonship. Thus the redeemed are heirs THROUGH THE TRIUNE GOD, not through the law, nor through fleshly descent [WINDISCHMANN in ALFORD] (ch. 3. 18 confirms this). heir—Confirming ch. 3. 29; cf. Romans 8. 17. 8-11. Appeal to them not to turn back from their privileges as free sons, to legal bondage again. then—when ye were "servants" (v. 7). ye knew not God—Not opposed to Romans 1. 21. The heathen originally knew God, as Romans 1. 21 states, but did not choose to retain God in their knowledge, and so corrupted the original truth. They might still have known Him, in a measure, from His works, but as a matter of fact they knew Him not, so far as His eternity, His power as the Creator, and His holiness, are concerned. are no gods—i. e., have no existence, such as their worshippers attribute to them, in the nature of things, but only in the corrupt imaginations of their worshippers (notes, 1 Corinthians 8. 4; 10. 19, 20; 2 Chronicles 13. 9). Your "service" was a different bondage from that of the Jews, which was a true service. Yet theirs, like yours, was a burdensome yoke; how then is it ye wish to resume the yoke after that God has transferred both Jews and Gentiles to a free service? 9. known God, or rather are known of God—They did not first know and love God, but God first, in His electing love, knew and loved them as His, and therefore attracted them to the saving knowledge of Him (Matthew 7. 23; 1 Corinthians 8. 3; 2 Timothy 2. 19; cf. Exodus 33. 12, 17; John 15. 16; Philippians 3. 12). God's great grace in this made their fall from it the more heinous. how—expressing indignant wonder at such a thing being possible, and even actually occurring (ch. 1. 6). "How is it that ye turn back again?" &c. weak—powerless to justify: in contrast to the justifying power of faith (ch. 3. 24; cf. Hebrews 7. 18). beggarly—contrasted with the riches of the inheritance of believers in Christ (Ephesians 1. 18). The state of the "child" (v. 1) is weak, as not having attained manhood; "beggarly," as not having attained the inheritance elements—"rudiments." It is as if a schoolmaster should go back to learning the A B C. [BENGEL.] again—There are two Greek words in the original. "Ye desire again, beginning afresh, to be in bondage." Though the Galatians, as Gentiles, had never been under the Mosiac yoke, yet they had been under "the elements of the world" (v. 3): the common designation for the Jewish and Gentile systems alike, in contrast to the Gospel (however superior the Jewish was to the Gentile). Both systems consisted in outward worship, and cleaved to sensible forms. Both were in bondage to the elements of sense, as though these could give the justification and sanctification which the inner and spiritual power of God alone could bestow. ye desire—or "will." Will-worship is not acceptable to God (Colossians 2. 18, 23). 10. To regard the observance of certain days as in itself meritorious as a work, is alien to the free spirit of Christianity. This is not incompatible with observing the Sabbath or the Christian Lord's day as obligatory, though not as a work (which was the Jewish and Gentile error in the observance of days), but as a holy man appointed by the Lord for attaining the great end, holiness. The whole life alike belongs to the Lord in the Gospel view, just as the whole world, and not the Jews only, belong to Him. But as in Paradise, so now one portion of time is needed wherein to draw off the soul more entirely from secular business to God (Colossians 2. 16). "Sabbaths, new moons, and set feasts" (1 Chronicles 23. 31; 2 Chronicles 31. 3), answer to "days, months, times." "Months," however, may refer to the first and seventh months, which were sacred on account of the number of feasts in them. times—Greek, "seasons," viz., those of the three great feasts, the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. years—The sabbatical year was about the time of writing this Epistle, A. D. 48. [BENGEL.] 11. lest—Greek, "lest haply." My fear is not for my own sake, but for yours. 12. be as I am—"As I have in my life among you cast off Jewish habits, so do ye; for I am become as ye are," viz., in the non-observance of legal ordinances. "The fact of my laying them aside among Gentiles, shows that I regard them as not at all profitable

ing to justification or sanctification. Do you regard them in the same light, and act accordingly." His observing the law among the Jews was not inconsistent with this, for he did so only in order to win them, without compromising principle. On the other hand, the Galatian Gentiles, by adopting legal ordinances, showed that they regarded them as needful for salvation. This St. Paul combats. ye have not injured me at all—viz., at the period when I first preached the Gospel among you, and when I made myself as you are, viz., living as a Gentile, not as a Jew. You at that time did me no wrong; "ye did not despise my temptation in the flesh" (v. 14); nay, you "received me as an angel of God." Then in v. 16, he asks, "Have I then, since that time, become your enemy by telling you the truth?" 13. how through infirmity—rather, as Greek, "Ye know that because of an infirmity of my flesh I preached," &c. He implies that bodily sickness, having detained him among them, contrary to his original intention, was the occasion of his preaching the Gospel to them. at the first—lit., "at the former time:" implying that at the time of writing he had been twice in Galatia. See my Introduction; also v. 16, and ch. 5. 21, Notes. His sickness was probably the same as recurred more violently afterward, "the thorn in the flesh" (2 Corinthians 12. 7), which also was overruled to good (2 Corinthians 12. 3, 10), as the "infirmity of the flesh" here. 14. my temptation—The oldest MSS. read, "your temptation." My infirmity, which was, or might have been, a "temptation," or trial, to you, ye despised not, i. e., ye were not tempted by it to despise me and my message. Perhaps, however, it is better to punctuate and explain as LACHMANN, connecting it with v. 13, "And (ye know) your temptation (i. e., the temptation to which ye were exposed through the infirmity) which was in my flesh. Ye despised not (through natural pride), nor rejected (through spiritual pride), but received me," &c. "Temptation does not mean here, as we now use the word, tendency to an evil habit, but BODILY TRIAL," as an angel of God—as a heaven-inspired and sent messenger from God: angel means messenger (Malachi 2. 7). Cf. the phrase, 2 Samuel 19. 27, a Hebrew and Oriental one for a person to be received with the highest respect (Zechariah 12. 8). An angel is free from the flesh, infirmity, and temptation. as Christ—being Christ's representative (Matthew 10. 40). Christ is Lord of angels. 15. Where, &c.—Of what value was your congratulation (so the Greek for "blessedness" expresses) of yourselves, on account of your having among you me, the messenger of the Gospel, considering how entirely you have veered about since? Once you counted yourselves blessed in being favoured with my ministry. ye would have plucked out your own eyes—one of the dearest members of the body—so highly did you value me: a proverbial phrase for the greatest self-sacrifice (Matthew 5. 29). CONYBEARE and HOWSON think that this particular form of proverb was used with reference to a weakness in St. Paul's eyes, connected with a nervous frame, perhaps affected by the brightness of the vision described, Acts 22. 11; 2 Corinthians 12. 1-7. "You would have torn out your own eyes to supply the lack of mine." The Divine power of Paul's words and works, contrasting with the feebleness of his person (2 Corinthians 10. 10), powerfully at first impressed the Galatians, who had all the impulsiveness of the Celtic race from which they sprang. Subsequently they soon changed with the fickleness which is equally characteristic of Kelts. 16. Translate, "Am I then, become your enemy (an enemy in your eyes) by telling you the truth" (ch. 2. 5, 14)? He plainly did not incur their enmity at his first visit, and the words here imply that he had since then, and before his now writing, incurred it; so that the occasion of his telling them the unwelcome truth, must have been at his second visit (Acts 18. 23; see my Introduction). The fool and sinner hate a reproof. The righteous love faithful reproof (Psalm 141. 5; Proverbs 9. 8). 17. They—your flatterers: in contrast to Paul himself, who tells them the truth. zealously—zeal in proselytism was characteristic especially of the Jews, and so of Judaizers (ch. 1. 14; Matthew 23. 15; Romans 10. 2). affect you—i. e., court you

(2 Corinthians 11. 2). not well—not in a good way, or for a good end. Neither the cause of their zealous courting of you, nor the manner, is what it ought to be. they would exclude you—"they wish to shut you out" from the kingdom of God (i. e., they wish to persuade you that as uncircumcised Gentiles, you are shut out from it), "that ye may zealously court them," i. e., become circumcised, as zealous followers of themselves. ALFORD explains it, that their wish was to shut out the Galatian from the general community, and attract them as a separate clique to their own party. So the English word "exclusive," is used. 18. good to be zealously affected—rather, to correspond to "zealously court" in v. 18, "to be zealously courted." I do not find fault with them for zealously courting you, nor with you for being zealously courted; provided it be "in a good cause" (translate so), "it is a good thing" (1 Corinthians 9. 20-23). My reason for saying the "not well" (v. 17: the Greek is the same as that for "good," and "in a good cause," in v. 28) is that their zealous courting of you is not in a good cause. The older interpreters, however, support English Version (cf. ch. 1. 14). always—translate and arrange the words thus, "At all times, and not only when I am present with you." I do not desire that I exclusively should have the privilege of zealously courting you. Others may do so in my absence with my full approval, if only it be in a good cause, and if Christ be faithfully preached (Philippians 1. 15-18). 19. My little children—(1 Timothy 1. 18; 2 Timothy 2. 1; 1 John 2. 1.) My relation to you is not merely that of one zealously courting you (v. 17, 18), but that of a father to his children (1 Corinthians 4. 15). I travail in birth—i. e., like a mother in pain till the birth of her child. again—a second time. The former time was when I was "present with you" (v. 18; cf. Note, v. 13). Christ be formed in you—that you may live nothing but Christ, and think nothing but Christ (ch. 2. 20), and glory in nothing but Him, and His death, resurrection, and righteousness (Philippians 3. 8-10; Colossians 1. 27). 20. Translate as Greek, "I could wish." If circumstances permitted (which they do not), I would gladly be with you [M. STUART.] now—as I was twice already. Speaking face to face is so much more effective towards loving persuasion than writing (2 John 12; 3 John 13, 14). change my voice—as a mother (v. 19): adapting my tone of voice to what I saw in person your case might need. This is possible to one present, but not to one in writing. [GROTIUS and ESTIUS.] I stand in doubt of you—rather, "I am perplexed about you," viz., how to deal with you, what kind of words to use, gentle or severe, to bring you back to the right path. 21. desire—of your own accord madly courting that which must condemn and ruin you. do ye not hear—do ye not consider the mystic sense of Moses' words? [GROTIUS.] The law itself sends you away from itself to Christ. [ESTIUS.] After having sufficiently maintained his point by argument, the apostle confirms and illustrates it by an inspired allegorical exposition of historical facts, containing in them general laws and types. Perhaps his reason for using allegory was to confute the Judaizers with their own weapons: subtle, mystical, allegorical interpretations, unauthorized by the Spirit, were their favourite arguments, as of the Rabbins in the synagogues. Of the Jerusalem Talmud, Tractatu Succa, cap. Hechalil. St. Paul meets them with an allegorical exposition, not the work of fancy, but sanctioned by the Holy Spirit. History, if properly understood, contains in its complicated phenomena, simple and continually-recurring Divine laws. The history of the elect people, like their legal ordinances had, besides the literal, a typical meaning (cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 1-4; 15. 45, 47; Revelation 11. 8). Just as the extraordinarily-born Isaac, the gift of grace according to promise, supplanted, beyond all human calculations, the naturally-born Ishmael, so the new theocratic race, the spiritual seed of Abraham by promise, the Gentile, as well as Jewish believers, were about to take the place of the natural seed, who had imagined that to them exclusively belonged the kingdom of God. 22. (Genesis 16. 8-16; 21. 2.) Abraham—whose sons ye wish to be (cf. Romans 9. 7-9). a bond maid . . . a free woman—rather, as Greek, the bond maid . . . the free woman. 23. after the flesh—corn according to the usual course of nature: in contrast to Isaac, who was born "by virtue of the promise" (so the Greek), as the efficient cause of Sarah's becoming pregnant out of the course of nature (Romans 4. 19). Abraham was to lay aside all confidence in the flesh (after which Ishmael was born), and to live by faith alone in the promise (according to which Isaac was miraculously born, contrary to all calculations of flesh and blood). 24. are an allegory—rather, "are allegorical," i. e., have another besides the literal meaning. these are the two covenants—these (women) are (i. e., mean. Omit 'the' with all the oldest MSS.) two covenants." As among the Jews the bondage of the mother determined that of the child, the children of the free covenant of promise, answering to Sarah, are free; the children of the legal covenant of bondage are not so. one from—i. e., taking his origin from Mount Sinai. Hence, it appears, he is treating of the moral law (ch. 3. 19) chiefly (Hebrews 12. 18). Paul was familiar with the district of Sinai in Arabia (ch. 1. 17), having gone thither after his conversion. At the gloomy scene of the giving of the Law, he learned to appreciate, by contrast, the grace of the Gospel, and so to cast off all his past legal dependencies. which gendereth—i. e., bringing forth children unto bondage. Cf. the phrase (Acts 3. 25), "children of the covenant which God made . . . saying unto Abraham." Agar—i. e., Hagar. 25. Translate, 'For this word, Hagar, is (imports) Mount Sinai in Arabia' (i. e., among the Arabians—in the Arabian tongue). So CHRYSOSTOM explains. HARAUT, the traveller, says that to this day the Arabians call Sinai, "Hadschar," i. e., Hagar, meaning a rock or stone. Hagar twice fled into the desert of Arabia (Genesis 16. and 21.): from her the mountain and city took its name, and the people were called Hagarenes. Sinai, with its rugged rocks, far removed from the promised land, was well suited to represent the law which inspires with terror, and the spirit of bondage. answereth—lit., "stands in the same rank with;" "she corresponds to," &c. Jerusalem which now is—i. e., the Jerusalem of the Jews, having only a present temporary existence, in contrast with the spiritual Jerusalem of the Gospel, which in germ, under the form of the promise, existed ages before, and shall be forever in ages to come. and—The oldest MSS. read, "For she is in bondage." As Hagar was in bondage to her mistress, so Jerusalem that now is, is in bondage to the law, and also to the Romans: her civil state thus being in accordance with her spiritual state. [BENGEL.] 26. This verse stands instead of the sentence which we should expect, to correspond to v. 24, "One from Mount Sinai," viz., the other covenant from the heavenly mount above, which is (answers in the allegory to) Sarah. Jerusalem . . . above—Hebrews 12. 22, "the heavenly Jerusalem." "New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God" (Revelation 3. 12; 21. 2). Here "the Messianic theocracy, which before Christ's second appearing is the Church, and after it, Christ's kingdom of glory." [MEYER.] free—as Sarah was; opposed to "she is in bondage" (v. 25). all—Omitted in many of the oldest MSS., though supported by some. "Mother of us," viz., believers who are already members of the invisible Church, the heavenly Jerusalem, hereafter to be manifested (Hebrews 12. 22). 27. (Isaiah 54. 1.) thou barren—Jerusalem above: the spiritual Church of the Gospel, the fruit of "the promise," answering to Sarah, who bore not "after the flesh;" as contrasted with the law, answering to Hagar, who was fruitful in the ordinary course of nature. Isaiah speaks primarily of Israel's restoration after her long-continued calamities but his language is framed by the Holy Spirit so as to reach beyond this to the spiritual Zion: including not only the Jews, the natural descendants of Abraham and children of the law, but also the Gentiles. The spiritual Jerusalem is regarded as "barren" whilst the law trammelled Israel, for she then had no spiritual children of the Gentiles. break forth—into crying. cry—shout for joy. many more—translate as break, "Many are the children of the desolate (the New Testament Church made up in the greater part from the Gentiles, who once had not the promise, and so was destitute of God as her husband), more than of her which hath an (Greek, THE) husband" (the Jewish Church having God for her husband, Isaiah 54. 5; Jeremiah 2. 2). Numerous as were the children of the legal covenant, those of the Gospel covenant are more so. The force of the Greek article is, "Her who has THE husband of which the other is destitute." 28. we—the oldest MSS. and versions are divided between "we" and "ye." "We" better accords with v. 26, "Mother of us." children of promise—not children after the flesh, but through the promise (v. 23, 29, 31). "We are" so, and ought to wish to continue so. 29. persecuted—Ishmael "mocked" Isaac, which contained in it the germ and spirit of persecution (Genesis 21. 9). His mocking was probably directed against Isaac's piety and faith in God's promises. Being the elder by natural birth, he haughtily prided himself above him that was born by promise: as Cain hated Abel's piety. him . . . born after the Spirit—The language, though referring primarily to Isaac, born in a spiritual way (viz., by the promise or word of God, rendered by His Spirit efficient out of the course of nature, in making Sarah fruitful in old age), is so framed as especially to refer to believers justified by Gospel grace through faith, as opposed to carnal men, Judaizers, and legalists. even so it is now—(ch. 5. 11; 6. 12, 17; Acts 9. 29; 13. 45, 49, 50; 14. 1, 2, 19; 17. 5, 13; 18. 5, 6.) The Jews persecuted Paul, not for preaching Christianity in opposition to heathenism, but for preaching it as distinct from Judaism. Except in the two cases of Philippi and Ephesus (where the persons beginning the assault were peculiarly interested in his expulsion), he was nowhere set upon by the Gentiles, unless they were first stirred up by the Jews. The coincidence between Paul's Epistles and Luke's history (the Acts) in this respect, is plainly undesigned, and so a proof of genuineness (see PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ). 30. Genesis 21. 10, 12, where Sarah's words are, "Shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac." But what was there said literally, is here by inspiration expressed in its allegorical spiritual import, applying to the New Testament believer, who is antitypically "the son of the free woman." In John 8. 35, 36, Jesus refers to this. cast out—from the house and inheritance: literally, Ishmael; spiritually, the carnal and legalists. shall not be heir—The Greek is stronger, "must not be heir," or "inherit." 31. So then—The oldest MSS. read, "Wherefore." This is the conclusion inferred from what precedes. In ch. 3. 29 and 4. 7, it was established that we, New Testament believers, are "heirs." If, then, we are heirs, "we are not children of the bond woman (whose son, according to Scripture, was 'not to be heir,' v. 30), but of the free woman" (whose son was, according to Scripture, to be heir). For we are not "cast out" as Ishmael, but accepted as sons and heirs.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-26. PERORATION. EXHORTATION TO STAND FAST IN THE GOSPEL LIBERTY, JUST SET FORTH, AND NOT TO BE LED BY JUDAIZERS INTO CIRCUMCISION, OR LAW-JUSTIFICATION: YET THOUGH FREE, TO SERVE ONE ANOTHER BY LOVE: TO WALK IN THE SPIRIT, BEARING THE FRUIT THEREOF, NOT IN THE WORKS OF THE FLESH. 1. The oldest MSS. read, "In liberty (so ALFORD, MOBBLEY, HUMPHRY and ELLICOTT. But as there is no Greek for 'in,' as there is, 1 Corinthians 16. 13; Philippians 1. 27; 4. 1, I prefer translating, 'It is for freedom that'), Christ hath made us free (not in, or for, a state of bondage). Stand fast, therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage" (viz., the law, ch. 4. 24; Acts 15. 10). On "again," see Note, ch. 4. 9. 2. Behold—i. e., Mark what I say. I Paul—Though you now think less of my authority, I nevertheless give my name and personal authority as enough by itself to refute all opposition of adversaries. if ye be circumcised—Not as ALFORD, "If you w^dl go on being circumcised." Rather, "If ye suffer yourselves to be circumcised," viz., under the notion of its being necessary to justification (v. 4; Acts 15. 1). Circumcision here is not regarded simply by itself (for, viewed as a mere

rational rite, it was practised for conciliation's sake by Paul himself, Acts 16. 3), but as the symbol of Judaism and legalism in general. If this be necessary, then the Gospel of grace is at an end. If the latter be the way of justification, then Judaism is in no way so. Christ . . . profit . . . nothing—(Ch. 2. 21.) For righteousness of works and justification by faith cannot co-exist. "He who is circumcised [for justification] is so as fearing the law, and he who fears, disbelieves the power of grace, and he who disbelieves can profit nothing by that grace which he disbelieves. [CHRYSOSTOM.] 3. For—Greek, "Yea, more;" "Moreover." I testify . . . to every man—as well as "unto you" (v. 2). that is circumcised—that submits to be circumcised. Such a one became a "prose-lyte of righteousness," the whole law—impossible for man to keep even in part, much less wholly (James 2. 10); yet none can be justified by the law, unless he keep it wholly (ch. 3. 10). 4. Lit., "Ye have become void from Christ," i. e., your connection with Christ has become void (v. 2). Romans 7. 2, "Loosed from the law," where the same Greek occurs as here. whosoever of you are justified—"are being justified," i. e., are endeavouring to be justified. by the law—Greek, "IN the law," as the element in which justification is to take place. fallen from grace—ye no longer "stand" in grace (Romans 5. 2). Grace and legal righteousness cannot co-exist (Romans 4. 4, 5; 11. 6). Christ, by circumcision (Luke 2. 21), undertook to obey all the law, and fulfil all righteousness for us; any, therefore, that now seeks to fulfil the law for himself in any degree for justifying righteousness, severs himself from the grace which flows from Christ's fulfilment of it, and becomes "a debtor to do the whole law" (v. 3). The decree of the Jerusalem council had said nothing so strong as this; it had merely decided that Gentile Christians were not bound to legal observances. But the Galatians, whilst not pretending to be so bound, imagined there was an efficacy in them to merit a higher degree of perfection (ch. 3. 3). This accounts for St. Paul not referring to the decree at all. He took much higher ground. See PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ. The natural mind loves outward fetters, and is apt to forge them for itself, to stand in lieu of holiness of heart. 5. For—Proof of the assertion, "fallen from grace," by contrasting with the case of legalists, the "hope" of Christians. through the Spirit—Greek, rather, "by the Spirit;" in opposition to by the flesh (ch. 4. 29), or fleshly ways of justification, as circumcision and legal ordinances. "We" is emphatical, and contrasted with "whosoever of you would be justified by the law" (v. 4). the hope of righteousness—"We wait for the (realization of the) hope (which is the fruit) of the righteousness (i. e., justification which comes) by (lit., from—out of) faith," Romans 5. 1, 4, 5; 8. 24, 25, "Hope . . . we with patience wait for it." This is a farther step than being "justified;" not only are we this, but "wait for the hope" which is connected with it, and is its full consummation. "Righteousness," in the sense of justification, is by the believer once for all already attained; but the consummation of it in future perfection above is the object of hope to be waited for: "the crown of righteousness laid up" (2 Timothy 4. 8): "the hope laid up for you in heaven" (Colossians 1. 5; 1 Peter 1. 3). 6. For—Confirming the truth that it is "by faith" (v. 5). in Jesus Christ—Greek, "in Christ Jesus." In union with Christ (the ANOINTED SAVIOUR), that is, Jesus of Nazareth, nor uncircumcision—This is levelled against those who, being not legalists, or Judaizers, think themselves Christians on this ground alone. faith which worketh by love—Greek, "working," &c. This corresponds to "a new creature" (ch. 6. 15), as its definition. Thus in v. 5, 6, we have the three, "faith," "hope," and "love." The Greek expresses, "Which effectually worketh:" which exhibits its energy by love (so 1 Thessalonians 2. 13). Love is not joined with faith in justifying, but is the principle of the works which follow after justification by faith. Let not legalists, upholding circumcision, think that the essence of the law is set at naught by the doctrine of justification by faith only. Nay, "all the law is fulfilled in one word—love," which is the principle on which "faith worketh"

(v. 14). Let them, therefore, seek this "faith," which will enable them truly to fulfil the law. Again, let not those who pride themselves on uncircumcision think that, because the law does not justify, they are free to walk after "the flesh" (v. 13). Let them, then, seek that "love" which is inseparable from true faith (James 2. 8, 12-22). Love is utterly opposed to the enmities which prevailed among the Galatians (v. 15, 20). The Spirit (v. 5) is a Spirit of "faith" and "love" (cf. Romans 14. 17; 1 Corinthians 7. 19). 7. Translate, "Ye were running well" in the Gospel race (1 Corinthians 9. 24-26; Philippians 3. 13, 14). who, &c.—none whom you ought to have listened to [BEN-GEL]: alluding to the Judaizers (cf. ch. 3. 1). hinder—The Greek means, lit., "hinder by breaking up a road." not obey the truth—not submit yourselves to the true Gospel way of justification. 8. This persuasion—Greek, "The persuasion," viz., to which you are yielding. There is a play on words in the original, the Greek for persuasion being akin to "obey" (v. 7). This persuasion which ye have obeyed, cometh not of—i. e., from: Does not emanate from Him, but from an enemy. that calleth you—(V. 13; ch. 1. 6; Philippians 3. 14; 1 Thessalonians 5. 24.) The calling is the rule of the whole race. [BEN-GEL.] 9. A little leaven—The false teaching of the Judaizers. A small portion of legalism, if it be mixed with the Gospel, corrupts its purity. To add legal ordinances and works in the least degree to justification by faith, is to undermine "the whole." So "leaven" is used of false doctrine (Matthew 16. 12; cf. 13. 33). In 1 Corinthians 5. 6 it means the corrupting influence of one bad person; so BEN-GEL understands it here to refer to the person (v. 7, 8, 10) who misled them. Ecclesiastes 9. 18, "One slinger destroyeth much good" (1 Corinthians 15. 33). I prefer to refer it to false doctrine, answering to "persuasion" (v. 8). 10. Greek, "1 (emphatical: "I on my part") have confidence in the Lord with regard to you (2 Thessalonians 3. 4), that ye will be none otherwise minded" (than what by this Epistle I desire you to be, Philippians 3. 15). but he that troubleth you—(Ch. 1. 7; Acts 15. 24; Joshua 7. 25; 1 Kings 18. 17, 18). Some one, probably, was prominent among the seducers, though the denunciation applies to them all (ch. 1. 7; 4. 17). shall bear—as a heavy burden. his—his due and inevitable judgment from God. St. Paul distinguishes the case of the seduced, who were misled through thoughtlessness, and who, now that they are set right by him, he confidently hopes, in God's goodness, will return to the right way, from that of the seducer who is doomed to judgment. whosoever he be—whether great (ch. 1. 8) or small. 11. Translate, "If I am still preaching (as I did before conversion) circumcision, why am I still persecuted?" The Judaizing troubler of the Galatians had said, "Paul himself preaches circumcision," as is shown by his having circumcised Timothy (Acts 16. 3; cf. also Acts 20. 6; 21. 24). Paul replies by anticipation of their objection, As regards myself, the fact that I am still persecuted by the Jews, shows plainly that I do not preach circumcision; for it is just because I preach Christ crucified, and not the Mosaic law, as the sole ground of justification, that they persecute me. If for conciliation he lived as a Jew among the Jews, it was in accordance with his principle enunciated (1 Corinthians 7. 18, 20; 9. 20). Circumcision, or uncircumcision, are things indifferent in themselves; their lawfulness or unlawfulness depends on the animus of him who uses them. The Gentle Galatians' animus in circumcision could only be their supposition that it influenced favourably their standing before God. Paul's living as a Gentile among Gentiles, plainly showed that, if he lived as a Jew among Jews, it was not that he thought it meritorious before God, but as a matter indifferent, wherein he might lawfully conform as a Jew by birth to those with whom he was, in order to put no needless stumbling-block to the Gospel in the way of his countrymen. then—Presuming that I did so, "then," in that case, "the offence of (stumbling-block, 1 Corinthians 1. 23 occasioned to the Jews by) the cross has become done away." Thus the Jews' accusation against Stephen was not that he preached Christ crucified, but that "he spake blasphemous words against this holy place and law." They would, in some measure, have borne the former, if he had mixed with it justification in part by circumcision and the law, and if he had, through the medium of Christianity, brought converts to Judaism. But if justification in any degree depended on legal ordinances, Christ's crucifixion in that degree was unnecessary, and could profit nothing (v. 2. 4). Worldly Wiseman, of the town of Carnal Policy, turns Christian out of the narrow way of the Cross, to the house of Legality. But the way to it was up a mountain, which, as Christian advanced, threatened to fall on him and crush him, amidst flashes of lightning from the mountain (Pilgrim's Progress; Hebrews 12. 18-21). 12. they . . . which trouble you—translate, as the Greek is different from v. 10, "They who are unsettling you." were even cut off—even as they desire your foreskin to be cut off and cast away by circumcision, so would that they were even cut off from your communion, being worthless as a castaway foreskin (ch. 1. 7, 8; cf. Philippians 3. 2). The fathers, JEROME, AMBROSE, AUGUSTINE, and CHRYSOSTOM, explain it, "Would that they would even cut themselves off," i. e., cut off not merely the foreskin, but the whole member; if circumcision be not enough for them, then let them have excision also; an outburst hardly suitable to the gravity of an apostle. But v. 9, 10 plainly point to excommunication as the judgment threatened against the troublers; and danger of the bad "leaven" spreading, as the reason for it. 13. The "ye" is emphatical, from its position in the Greek, "Ye brethren," &c.; as opposed to those legalists "who trouble you." unto liberty—The Greek expresses, "On a footing of liberty." The state or condition in which ye have been called to salvation, is one of liberty. Gospel liberty consists in three things, freedom from the Mosaic yoke, from sin, and from slavish fear. only, &c.—translate, "Only turn not your liberty into an occasion for the flesh." Do not give the flesh the handle or pretext (Romans 7. 8, "occasion") for its indulgence which it eagerly seeks for; do not let it make Christian "liberty" its pretext for indulgence (v. 16. 17; 1 Peter 2. 16; 2 Peter 2. 19; Jude 4). but by love serve one another—Greek, "Be servants (be in bondage) to one another." If ye must be servants, then be servants to one another in love. Whilst free as to legalism, be bound by Love (the article in the Greek personifies love in the abstract) to serve one another (1 Corinthians 9. 19). Here he hints at their unloving strifes springing out of lust of power. "For the lust of power is the mother of heresies." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 14. all the law—Greek, "the whole law," viz., the Mosaic law. Love to God is presupposed as the root from which love to our neighbour springs; and it is in this tense the latter precept (so "word" means here) is said to be the fulfilling of "all the law" (Leviticus 19. 18). Love is "the law of Christ" (ch. 6. 2; Matthew 7. 12; 22. 39, 40; Romans 13. 9, 10). is fulfilled—Not as received text "is being fulfilled," but as the oldest MSS. read, "has been fulfilled;" and so "receives its full perfection," as rudimentary teachings are fulfilled by the more perfect doctrine. The law only united Israelites together; the Gospel unites all men, and that in relation to God. [GROTIUS.] 15. bite—backbite the character. devour—the substance, by injuring, extortion, &c. (Habakkuk 1. 13; Matthew 23. 14; 2 Corinthians 11. 20). consumed, &c.—Strength of soul, health of body, character, and resources, are all consumed by broils. [BENGEEL.] 16. This I say then—Repeating in other words, and explaining the sentiment in v. 13, "What I mean is 'his.'" Walk in the Spirit—Greek, "By (the rule of) the Holy Spirit." Cf. v. 16-18, 22, 25; ch. 6. 1-8, with Romans 7. 22; 8. 11. The best way to keep tares out of a bushel is to fill it with wheat. the flesh—the natural man, out of which flow the evils specified (v. 19-21). The spirit and the flesh mutually exclude one another. It is promised, not that we should have no evil lusts, but that we should "not fulfil" them. If the spirit that is in us can be at ease under sin, it is not a spirit that comes from the Holy Spirit. The gentle dove trembles at the sight even of a hawk's feather. 17. For—The reason why walking by the Spirit will exclude fulfilling the lusts of the flesh, viz., their mutual contrariety. the Spirit—not "lusteth," but

"tendeth (or some such word is to be supplied) against the flesh." so that ye cannot do the things that ye would—The Spirit strives against the flesh and its evil influence; the flesh against the Spirit and His good influence, so that neither the one nor the other can be fully carried out into action. "But" (v. 18) where "the Spirit" prevails, the issue of the struggle no longer continues doubtful (Romans 7. 15-20). [BENGEEL.] The Greek is, "that ye may not do the things that ye would," "The flesh and Spirit are contrary one to the other," so that you must distinguish what proceeds from the Spirit, and what from the flesh; and you must not fulfil what you desire according to the carnal self, but what the Spirit within you desires. [NEANDER.] But the antithesis of v. 18 ("But," &c.), where the conflict is decided, shows, I think, that here v. 17 contemplates the inability both for fully accomplishing the good we "would," owing to the opposition of the flesh, and for doing the evil our flesh would desire, owing to the opposition of the Spirit in the awakened man (such as the Galatians are assumed to be), until we yield ourselves wholly by the Spirit to "walk by the Spirit" (v. 16, 18). 18. "If ye are led (give yourselves up to be led) by (Greek) the Spirit, ye are not under the law." For ye are not working the works of the flesh (v. 19, 20-21) which bring one "under the law" (Romans 8. 2, 14). The "Spirit makes free from the law of sin and death" (v. 23). The law is made for a fleshly man, and for the works of the flesh (1 Timothy 1. 9), "not for a righteous man" (Romans 6. 14, 15). 19-23. Confirming v. 18, by showing the contrariety between the works of the flesh and the fruit of the Spirit. manifest—The hidden fleshly principle betrays itself palpably by its works, so that these are not hard to discover, and leave no doubt that they come not from the Spirit. which are these—Greek, "such as," for instance. Adultery—Omitted in the oldest MSS. lasciviousness—rather, "wantonness," petulance, capricious insolence; it may display itself in "lasciviousness," but not necessarily or constantly so (Mark 7. 21, 22, where it is not associated with fleshly lusts). [TRENCH.] "Works" (in the plural) are attributed to the "flesh," because they are divided, and often at variance with one another, and even when taken each one by itself, betray their fleshly origin. But the "fruit of the Spirit" (v. 23) is singular, because, however manifold the results, they form one harmonious whole. The results of the flesh are not dignified by the name "fruit;" they are but "works" (Ephesians 5. 9, 11). He enumerates those fleshly works (committed against our neighbour, against God, and against ourselves) to which the Galatians were most prone (the Kelts have always been prone to disputations and internal strifes); and those manifestations of the fruit of the Spirit most needed by them (v. 13, 15). This passage shows that "the flesh" does not mean merely sensuality, as opposed to spirituality; for "divisions" in the catalogue here do not flow from sensuality. The identification of "the natural (Greek, animal-souled) man," with the "carnal" or fleshly man (1 Corinthians 2. 14), shows that "the flesh" expresses human nature as estranged from God. TRENCH observes, as a proof of our fallen state, how much richer is every vocabulary in words for sins, than in those for graces. St. Paul enumerates seventeen "works of the flesh," only nine manifestations of "the fruit of the Spirit" (cf. Ephesians 4. 31). 20. witchcraft—sorcery; prevalent in Asia (Acts 19. 19; cf. Revelation 21). hatred—Greek, "hatreds." variance—Greek, "strife;" singular in the oldest MSS. emulations—In the oldest MSS. singular, "emulation," or rather, "jealousy;" for the sake of one's own advantage. "Envyings" (v. 21) are even without advantage to the person himself. [BENGEEL.] wrath—Greek, plural, "passionate outbreaks." [ALFORD.] strife—rather as Greek, "factions," "cabals;" derived from a Greek root, meaning "a worker for hire;" hence, unworthy means for compassing ends, factious practices. seditions—"dissensions," as to secular matters heresies—as to sacred things (Note, 1 Corinthians 11. 18). Self-constituted parties; from a Greek root, to choose. A schism is a more recent split in a congregation from a difference of opinion. Heresy is a schism become inveterate

[AUGUSTINE, Con. Crescon. Don., 2 7.] 21. tell . . . before—viz., before the event. I . . . told you in time past—when I was with you. you—who, though maintaining justification by the law, are careless about keeping the law (Romans 2 21-23). not inherit . . . kingdom of God—(1 Corinthians 6 9, 10; Ephesians 5 5.) 22. love—the leader of the band of graces (1 Corinthians 13.). gentleness—Greek, “benignity,” conciliatory to others; whereas “goodness,” though ready to do good, has not such suavity of manner. [JEROME.] ALFORD translates, “kindness.” faith—“faithfulness;” opposed to “heresies.” [BENGL.] ALFORD refers to 1 Corinthians 13 7, “Believe all things;” faith in the widest sense, toward God and man. “Trustfulness.” [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 23. temperance—The Greek root implies self-restraint as to one’s desires and lusts. against such—not persons, but things, as in v. 21. no law—Confirming v. 18, “Not under the law” (1 Timothy 1 9, 10). The law itself commands love (v. 14); so far is it from being “against such.” 24. The oldest MSS. read, “They that are of Christ Jesus;” they that belong to Christ Jesus; being “led by (His) Spirit” (v. 18). have crucified the flesh—They nailed it to the cross once for all when they became Christ’s, on believing and being baptized (Romans 6 3, 4); they keep it now in a state of crucifixion (Romans 6 6); so that the Spirit can produce in them, comparatively uninterrupted by it, “the fruit of the Spirit” (v. 22). “Man, by faith, is dead to the former standing-point of a sinful life, and rises to a new life (v. 25) of communion with Christ (Colossians 3 3). The act by which they have crucified the flesh with its lust, is already accomplished ideally in principle. But the practice, or outward conformation of the life, must harmonize with the tendency given to the inward life” (v. 25). [NEANDER.] We are to be executioners, dealing cruelly with the body of sin, which has caused the acting of all cruelties on Christ’s body. with the affections—transliterate, “with its passions.” Thus they are dead to the law’s condemning power, which is only for the fleshly, and their lusts (v. 23). 25. in . . . in—rather, as Greek, “If we live (Note, v. 24) BY the Spirit, let us also walk (v. 18; ch. 6 16) BY the Spirit.” Let our life in practice correspond to the ideal inner principle of our spiritual life, viz., our standing by faith as dead to, and severed from, sin, and the condemnation of the law. “Life by (or in) the Spirit” is not an occasional influence of the Spirit, but an abiding state, wherein we are continually alive, though sometimes sleeping and inactive. 26. Greek, “Let us not BECOME.” Whilst not asserting that the Galatians are “vain-glorious” now, he says they are liable to become so. provoking one another—an effect of “vain-gloriousness” on the stronger; as “envying” is its effect on the weaker. A danger common both to the orthodox and Judaizing Galatians.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-18. EXHORTATIONS CONTINUED; TO FORBEARANCE AND HUMILITY; LIBERALITY TO TEACHERS AND IN GENERAL. POSTSCRIPT AND BENEDICTION. 1. Brethren—An expression of kindness to conciliate attention. Translate as Greek, “If a man even be overtaken” (i. e., caught in the very act [ALFORD and ELLICOTT]; BEFORE he expects; unexpectedly). BENGL explains the “before” in the Greek compound verb, “If a man be overtaken in a fault before ourselves;” If another has really been overtaken in a fault the first; for often he who is first to find fault, is the very one who has first transgressed. a fault—Greek, “a transgression,” “a fall;” such as a falling back into legal bondage. Here he gives monition to those who have not so fallen, “the spiritual,” to be not “vain-glorious” (ch. 5 26), but forbearing to such (Romans 15 1). restore—The Greek is used of a dislocated limb, reduced to its place. Such is the tenderness with which we should treat a fallen member of the Church in restoring him to a better state. the spirit of meekness—the meekness which is the gift of the Holy Spirit working in our spirit (ch. 5 22, 25). “Meekness” is that temper of spirit towards God whereby we accept His dealings without disputing: then, towards men, whereby we endure meekly their provocations, and do not withdraw ourselves from the burdens which their sins impose upon us. [TRENCH.] considering thyself Transition from the plural to the singular. When congregations are addressed collectively, each individual should take home the monition to himself. thou also be tempted—as is likely to happen those who prove others without meekness (cf. Matthew 7 2-5; 2 Timothy 2 25; James 2 13). 2. If ye, legalists, must “bear burdens,” then instead of legal burdens (Matthew 23 4), “bear one another’s burdens,” lit., “weights.” Distinguished by BENGL from “burden,” v. 4 (a different Greek word, “load”): “weights” exceed the strength of those under them; “burden” is proportioned to the strength. so fulfil—or as other old MSS. read, “So ye will fulfil,” Greek, “fill up,” “thoroughly fulfil.” the law of Christ—viz., “love” (ch. 5 14). Since ye desire “the law,” then fulfil the law of Christ, which is not made up of various minute observances, but whose sole “burden” is “love” (John 13 34; 15 12); Romans 15 3 gives Christ as the example in the particular duty here. 3. Self-conceit, the chief hindrance to forbearance and sympathy towards our fellow-men, must be laid aside. something—possessed of some spiritual pre-eminence, so as to be exempt from the frailty of other men. when he is nothing—The Greek is subjective: “Being, if he would come to himself, and look on the real fact, nothing” [ALFORD] (v. 2, 6; Romans 12 3; 1 Corinthians 8 2). deceiveth himself—lit., “he mentally deceives himself.” Cf. James 1 26, “deceiveth his own heart.” 4. his own work—not merely his own opinion of himself. have rejoicing in himself alone—translate, “Have his (matter for) glorying in regard to himself alone, and not in regard to another” (viz., not in regard to his neighbour, by comparing himself with whom, he has fancied he has matter for boasting as that neighbour’s superior). Not that really a man by looking to “himself alone” is likely to find cause for glorying in himself. Nay, in v. 5, he speaks of a “burden” or load, not of matter for glorying, as what really belongs to each man. But he refers to the idea those whom he censures had of themselves: they thought they had cause for “glorying” in themselves, but it all arose from unjust self-conceited comparison of themselves with others, instead of looking at home. The only true glorying, if glorying it is to be called, is in the testimony of a good conscience, glorying in the cross of Christ. 5. For (by this way, v. 4, of proving himself, not deprecating his neighbour by comparison) each man shall bear his own “burden,” or rather, “load” (viz., of sin and infirmity), the Greek being different from that in v. 2. This verse does not contradict v. 2. There he tells them to bear with others’ “burdens” of infirmity in sympathy; here, that self-examination will make a man to feel he has enough to do with “his own load” of sin, without comparing himself boastfully with his neighbour. Cf. v. 8. Instead of “thinking himself to be something,” he shall feel the “load” of his own sin; and this will lead him to bear sympathetically with his neighbour’s burden of infirmity. Aesop says a man carries two bags over his shoulder, the one with his own sins hanging behind, that with his neighbour’s sins in front. 6. From the mention of bearing one another’s burdens, he passes to one way in which those burdens may be borne—by ministering out of their earthly goods to their spiritual teachers. The “but” in the Greek, beginning of this verse, expresses this: I said, Each shall bear his own burden; BUT I do not intend that he should not think of others, and especially of the wants of his ministers. communicate unto him—“impart a share unto his teacher;” lit., him that teacheth catechetically. In all good things—in every kind of the good things of this life, according as the case may require (Romans 15 27; 1 Corinthians 9 11, 14). 7. God is not mocked—The Greek verb is lit., to sneer with the nostrils drawn up in contempt. God does not suffer himself to be imposed on by empty words: He will judge according to works, which are seeds sown for eternity of either joy or woe. Excuses for illiberality in God’s cause (v. 6) seem valid before men, but are not so before God (Psalm 50 21). soweth—especially of his resources (2 Corinthians 9. 8). that—Greek, “this:” this and nothing else. reap—at the harvest, the end of the world (Matthew 13. 39). 8. Translate, “He that soweth unto his own flesh,” with a view to fulfilling its desires. He does not say, “His spirit,” as he does say, “His flesh.” For in ourselves we are not spiritual, but carnal. The flesh is devoted to selfishness. corruption—i. e., destruction (Philippians 3. 19). Cf. as to the deliverance of believers from “corruption” (Romans 8. 21). The use of the term “corruption” instead, implies that destruction is not an arbitrary punishment of fleshly-mindedness, but is its natural fruit; the corrupt flesh producing corruption, which is another word for destruction: corruption is the fault, and corruption the punishment (Note, 1 Corinthians 3. 17; 2 Peter 2. 12). Future life only expands the seed sown here. Men cannot mock God, because they can deceive themselves. They who sow tares cannot reap wheat. They alone reap life eternal who sow to the Spirit (Psalm 126. 6; Proverbs 11. 18; 22. 8; Hosea 8. 7; 10. 12; Luke 16. 25; Romans 8. 11; James 5. 7). 9. (2 Thessalonians 3. 13.) And when we do good, let us also persevere in it without fainting. in due season—in its own proper season, God’s own time (1 Timothy 6. 15). faint not—lit., “be relaxed.” Stronger than “be not weary.” Weary of well-doing refers to the will; “faint,” to relaxation of the powers. [BENGEL.] No one should faint, as in an earthly harvest sometimes happens. 10. Translate, “So then, according as (i. e., in proportion as) we have season (i. e., opportunity), let us work (a distinct Greek verb from that for “do,” in v. 9) that which is (in each case) good.” As thou art able, and whilst thou art able, and when thou art able (Ecclesiastes 9. 10). We have now the “season” for sowing, as also there will be hereafter the “due season” (v. 9) for reaping. The whole life is, in one sense, the “seasonable opportunity” to us; and, in a narrower sense, there occur in it more especially convenient seasons. The latter are sometimes lost in looking for still more convenient seasons (Acts 24. 25). We shall not always have the opportunity “we have” now. Satan is sharpened to the greater zeal in injuring us, by the shortness of his time (Revelation 12. 12). Let us be sharpened to the greater zeal in well-doing by the shortness of ours. them who are of the household—Every right-minded man does well to the members of his own family (1 Timothy 5. 8); so believers are to do to those of the household of faith, i. e., those whom faith has made members of “the household of God” (Ephesians 2. 19); “the house of God” (1 Timothy 3. 15; 1 Peter 4. 17). 11. Rather, “See in how large letters I have written.” The Greek is translated “how great,” Hebrews 7. 4, the only other passage where it occurs in the New Testament. Owing to his weakness of eyes (ch. 4. 15) he wrote in large letters. So JEROME. All the oldest MSS. are written in uncial, i. e., capital letters, the ursive, or small letters, being of more recent date. St. Paul seems to have had a difficulty in writing, which led him to make the uncial letters larger than ordinary writers did. The mention of these is as a token by which they would know that he wrote the whole Epistle with his own hand; as he did also the pastoral Epistles, which this Epistle resembles in style. He usually dictated his Epistles to an amanuensis, excepting the concluding salutation, which he wrote himself (Romans 16. 22; 1 Corinthians 16. 21). This letter, he tells the Galatians, he writes with his own hand, no doubt in order that they may see what a regard he had for them, in contrast to the Judaizing teachers (v. 12), who sought only their own ease. If English Version be retained, the words, “how large a letter” (lit., “in how large letters”), will not refer to the length of the Epistle absolutely, but that it was a large one for him to have written with his own hand. NEANDER supports English Version, as more appropriate to the earnestness of the apostle and the tone of the Epistle: “How large” will thus be put for “how many.” 12. Contrast between his zeal in their behalf implied in v. 11, and the zeal for self on the part of the Judaizers. make a fair show—(2 Corinthians 5. 12.) in the flesh—in outward things. they—it is “these” who, &c. constrain you—by example (v. 13) and importuning only lest—“only that they may not,” &c. (cf. ch. 5. 11). suffer persecution—They escaped in a great degree the Jews’ bitterness against Christianity and the offence of the cross of Christ, by making the Mosaic law a necessary preliminary; in fact, making Christian converts into Jewish proselytes. 13. Translate, “For not even do they who submit to circumcision, keep the law themselves (Romans 2. 17–23), but they wish you (emphatical) to be circumcised,” &c. They arbitrarily selected circumcision out of the whole law, as though observing it would stand instead of their non-observance of the rest of the law. that they may glory in your flesh—viz., in the outward change (opposed to an inward change wrought by the SPIRIT) which they have effected in bringing you over to their own Jewish-Christian party. 14. Translate, “But as for me (in opposition to those gloriers ‘in your flesh,’ v. 13), God forbid that I,” &c. in the cross—the atoning death on the cross. Cf. Philippians 3. 3, 7, 8, as a specimen of his glorying. The “cross,” the great object of shame to them, and to all carnal men, is the great object of glorying to me. For by it, the worst of deaths, Christ has destroyed all kinds of death. [AUGUSTINE, Tract 38, on John, sec. 4.] We are to testify the power of Christ’s death working in us, after the manner of crucifixion (ch. 5. 24; Romans 6. 5, 6). our—He reminds the Galatians by this pronoun, that they had a share in the “Lord Jesus Christ” (the full name is used for greater solemnity), and therefore ought to glory in Christ’s cross, as he did. the world—inseparably allied to the “flesh” (v. 13). Legal and fleshly ordinances are merely outward, and “elements of the world” (ch. 4. 3). is—rather, as Greek, “has been crucified to me” (ch. 2. 20). He used “crucified” for dead (Colossians 2. 20, “dead with Christ”), to imply his oneness with Christ crucified (Philippians 3. 10): “the fellowship of His sufferings being made conformable unto His death.” 15. avail—eth—The oldest MSS. read, “is” (cf. ch. 5. 6). Not only are they of no avail, but they are nothing.” So far are they from being matter for “glorying,” that they are “nothing.” But Christ’s cross is “all in all,” as a subject for glorying, in “the new creature” (Ephesians 2. 10, 15, 16). new creature—(2 Corinthians 5. 17.) A transformation by the renewal of the mind (Romans 12. 2). 16. as many—Contrasting with the “as many,” v. 12. rule—lit., a straight rule, to detect crookedness; so a rule of life. peace—from God (Ephesians 2. 14–17; 6. 23). mercy—(Romans 15. 9.) Israel of God—not the Israel after the flesh, among whom those teachers wish to enrol you; but the spiritual seed of Abraham by faith (ch. 3. 9, 29; Romans 2. 28, 29; Philippians 3. 3). 17. let no man trouble me—by opposing my apostolic authority, seeing that it is stamped by a sure seal, viz., “I (in contrast to the Judaizing teacher who gloried in the flesh) bear” (as a high mark of honour from the King of kings). the marks—properly, marks branded on slaves to indicate their owners. So St. Paul’s scars of wounds received for Christ’s sake, indicate to whom he belongs, and in whose free and glorious service he is (2 Corinthians 11. 23–25). The Judaizing teachers gloried in the circumcision mark in the flesh of their followers; St. Paul glories in the marks of suffering for Christ on his own body (cf. v. 14; Philippians 3. 10; Colossians 1. 24). the Lord—Omitted in the oldest MSS. 18. Brethren—Place it, as Greek last in the sentence, before the “Amen.” After much rebuke and monition, he bids them farewell with the loving expression of brotherhood as his last parting word (Note, ch. 1. 6). be with your spirit—which, I trust, will keep down the flesh (1 Thessalonians 5. 23; 2 Timothy 4. 22; Philemon 25.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE headings (ch. 1. 1), and ch. 3. 1, show that this Epistle claims to be that of St. Paul. This claim is confirmed by the testimonies of IRENÆUS, Hæreses 5. 2, 3, and 1. 8, 5; CLEMENS ALEXANDRINUS, Stromata, 4. sec. 65, and Pæd 1. sec. 8; ORIGEN, adv. Cels. 4. 211. It is quoted by VALENTINUS (120 A. D.), viz., ch. 3. 14-18, as we know from HIPPOLYTUS Refut. of Hæres., p. 193. POLYCARP, Ep. Philipp., ch. 12., testifies to its canonicity. So TERTULLIAN, adv. Marcion 5. 17. IGNATIUS, Eph. 12, which alludes to the frequent and affectionate mention made by St. Paul of the Christian state, privileges, and persons of the Ephesians in his Epistle.

Two theories, besides the ordinary one, have been held on the question, to whom the Epistle is addressed. GROTIUS, after the heretic Marcion, maintains that it was addressed to the Church at Laodicea, and that it is the Epistle to which St. Paul refers, Colossians 4. 16. But the Epistle to the Colossians was probably written before that to the Ephesians, as appears from the parallel passages in Ephesians bearing marks of being expanded from those in Colossians; and Marcion seems to have drawn his notion, as to our Epistle, from St. Paul's allusion (Colossians 4. 16) to an Epistle addressed by him to the Laodiceans. ORIGEN and CLEMENT of Alexandria, and even TERTULLIAN, who refers to Marcion, give no sanction to his notion. No single MS. contains the heading, "to the saints that are at Laodicea." The very resemblance of the Epistle to the Ephesians to that to the Colossians, is against the theory; for if the former were really the one addressed to Laodicea (Colossians 4. 16), St. Paul would not have deemed it necessary that the churches of Colosse and Laodicea should interchange Epistles. The greetings, moreover (Colossians 4. 15), which he sends through the Colossians to the Laodiceans, are quite incompatible with the idea that Paul wrote an Epistle to the Laodiceans at the same time, and by the same bearer, Tychicus (the bearer of our Epistle to the Ephesians, as well as of that to Colosse); for who, under such circumstances, but would send the greetings directly in the letter to the party saluted? The letter to Laodicea was evidently written some time before that to Colosse. Archbishop USHER has advanced the second theory: That it was an encyclical letter headed, as in MS. B., "to the saints that are . . . and to the faithful," the name of each Church being inserted in the copy sent to it; and that its being sent to Ephesus first, occasioned its being entitled, as now, the Epistle to the Ephesians. ALFORD makes the following objections to this theory: (1.) It is at variance with the spirit of the Epistle, which is clearly addressed to one set of persons throughout, co-existing in one place, and as one body, and under the same circumstances. (2.) The improbability that the apostle, who in two of his Epistles (2 Corinthians and Galatians) has so plainly specified their encyclical character, should have here omitted such specification. (3.) The still greater improbability that he should have, as on this hypothesis must be assumed, written a circular Epistle to a district, of which Ephesus was the commercial capital, addressed to various churches within that district, yet from its very contents (as by the opponents' hypothesis) not admitting of application to the Church of that metropolis, in which he had spent so long a time, and to which he was so affectionately bound. (4.) The inconsistency of this hypothesis with the address of the Epistle, and the universal testimony of the ancient Church. The absence of personal greetings is not an argument for either of the two theories; for similarly there are none in Galatians, Philippians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 Timothy. The better he knows the parties addressed, and the more general and solemn the subject, the less he seems to give of these individual notices. Writing, as he does in our Epistle, on the constitution and prospects of Christ's universal Church, he refers the Ephesians, as to personal matters, to the bearer of the Epistle, Tychicus (ch. 6. 21, 22). As to the omission of "which are at Ephesus" (ch. 1. 1), in MS. B., so "in Rome" (Romans 1. 7) is omitted in some old MSS.: it was probably done by churches among whom it was read, in order to generalize the reference of its contents, and especially where the subject of the Epistle is catholic. The words are found in the margin of B., from a first hand; and are found in all the oldest MSS. and versions.

St. Paul's first visit to Ephesus (on the sea-coast of Lydia, near the river Cayster) is related in Acts 18. 19-21. The work begun by his disputations with the Jews in his short visit, was carried on by Apollos (Acts 18. 24-26), and Aquila and Priscilla (26). At his second visit, after his journey to Jerusalem, and thence to the east regions of Asia Minor, he remained at Ephesus "three years" (Acts 19. 10, the "two years" in which verse are only part of the time, and Acts 20. 31); so that the founding and rearing of this Church occupied an unusually large portion of the apostle's time and care; whence his language in this Epistle shows a warmth of feeling, and a free outpouring of thought, and a union in spiritual privileges and hope between him and them (ch. 1. 3, &c.), such as are natural from one so long and so intimately associated with those whom he addresses. On his last journey to Jerusalem, he sailed by Ephesus and summoned the elders of the Ephesian Church to meet him at Miletus, where he delivered his remarkable farewell charge (Acts 20. 18-35).

Our Epistle was addressed to the Ephesians during the early part of his imprisonment at Rome, immediately after that to the Colossians, to which it bears a close resemblance in many passages, the apostle having in his mind generally the same great truths in writing both. It is an undesigned proof of genuineness that the two Epistles, written about the same date, and under the same circumstances, bear a closer mutual resemblance than those written at distant dates and on different occasions. Cf. ch. 1. 7 with Colossians 1. 14; ch. 1. 10 with Colossians 2. 20; ch. 3. 2 with Colossians 1. 25; ch. 5. 19 with Colossians 3. 16; ch. 6. 22 with Colossians 4. 8; ch. 1. 19; 2. 5 with Colossians 2. 12, 13; ch. 4. 2-4 with Colossians 3. 12-15; ch. 4. 16 with Colossians 2. 19; ch. 4. 32 with Colossians 3. 13; ch. 4. 22-24 with Colossians 3. 9, 10; ch. 5. 6-8 with Colossians 3. 6-8; ch. 5. 15, 16 with Colossians 4. 5; ch. 6. 19, 20 with Colossians 4. 3, 4; ch. 5. 22-33; 6. 1-4 with Colossians 3. 18; ch. 4. 24, 25 with Colossians 3. 9; ch. 5. 20-22 with Colossians 3. 17, 18. Tychicus and Onesimus were being sent to Colosse, the former bearing the two Epistles to the two churches respectively, the latter furnished with a letter of recommendation to Philemon, his former master, residing at Colosse. The date was probably about four years after his parting with the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20.), about 62 A. D., before his imprisonment had become of the more severe kind, which appears in his Epistle to the Philippians. From ch. 6. 19, 20 it is plain he had at the time, though a prisoner, some degree of freedom in preaching, which accords with Acts 28. 23, 30, 31, where he represented as receiving at his lodgings all inquirers. His imprisonment began in February 61 A. D., and lasted "two whole years" (Acts 28. 30) at least, and perhaps longer.

The Church of Ephesus was made up of converts partly from the Jews and partly from the Gentiles (Acts 19. 8-16). Accordingly, the Epistle so addresses a Church constituted (ch. 2. 14-22). Ephesus was famed for its idol temple of Artemis or Diana, which, after its having been burnt down by Herostratus on the night that Alexander the Great was born (B. C. 355), was rebuilt at enormous cost, and was one of the wonders of the world. Hence, perhaps, have arisen his images in this Epistle drawn from a beautiful temple: the Church being in true inner beauty that which the temple of the idol tried to realize in outward show (ch. 2. 19-22). The Epistle (ch. 4. 17; 5. 1-13) implies the profligacy for which the Ephesian heathen were notorious. Many of the same expressions occur in the Epistle as in St. Paul's address to the Ephesian elders. Cf. ch. 1. 6, 7 and 2. 7, as to "grace," with Acts 20. 24, 32: this may well be called "the Epistle of the grace of God." [ALFORD.] Also, as to his "bonds," ch. 3. 1, and 4. 1 with Acts 20. 23, 23. Also ch. 1. 11, as to "the counsel of God," with Acts 20. 27. Also ch. 1. 14, as to "the redemption of the purchased possession," with Acts 20. 28. Also ch. 1. 14, 18; ch. 2. 20, and ch. 5. 5, as to "building up" the "inheritance," with Acts 20. 32.

The object of the Epistle is "to set forth the ground, the course, and the aim and end of THE CHURCH OF THE FAITHFUL IN CHRIST. He speaks to the Ephesians as a type or sample of the Church universal." [ALFORD.] Hence, "the Church" throughout the Epistle is spoken of in the singular, not in the plural, "churches." The Church's foundation, its course, and its end, are his theme alike in the larger and smaller divisions of the whole Epistle. "Everywhere the foundation of the Church is in the will of the Father; the course of the Church is by the satisfaction of the Son; the end of the Church is the life in the Holy Spirit." [ALFORD.] Cf. respectively ch. 1. 11; ch. 2. 5; ch. 3. 18. This having been laid down as a matter of doctrine (this part closing with a sublime doxology, ch. 3. 14-21), is then made the ground of practical exhortations. In these latter also (from ch. 4. 1, onward), the same threefold division prevails, for the Church is represented as founded on the counsel of "God the Father, who is above all, through all, and in all," reared by the "one Lord," Jesus Christ, through the "one Spirit" (ch. 4. 4-6, &c.), who give their respective graces to the several members. These last are therefore to exercise all these graces in the several relations of life, as husbands, wives, servants, children, &c. The conclusion is that we must put on "the whole armour of God" (ch. 6. 18).

The sublimity of the STYLE and LANGUAGE corresponds to the sublimity of the subjects, and exceeds almost that of any part of his Epistles. It is appropriate that those to whom he so wrote were Christians long grounded in the faith. The very sublimity is the cause of the difficulty of the style, and of the presence of peculiar expressions occurring, not found elsewhere.

CHAPTER I.

Ver 1-23. INSCRIPTION: ORIGIN OF THE CHURCH IN THE FATHER'S ETERNAL COUNSEL, AND THE SON'S BLOODSHEDDING: THE SEALING OF IT BY THE SPIRIT. THANKSGIVING AND PRAYER THAT THEY MAY FULLY KNOW GOD'S GRACIOUS POWER IN CHRIST TOWARDS THE SAINTS. 1. by—rather, "through the will of God:" called to the apostleship through that same "will" which originated the Church (v. 5. 9, 11; cf. Galatians 1. 4). which are at Ephesus—See Introduction, to the saints . . . and to the faithful—The same persons are referred to by both designations, as the Greek proves: "to those who are saints, and faithful in Christ Jesus." The sanctification by God is here put before man's faith. The twofold aspect of salvation is thus presented, God's grace in the first instance sanctifying us (i. e., setting us apart in His eternal purposes as holy unto Himself); and our faith, by God's gift, lay hold of salvation (2 Thessalonians 2. 13; 1 Peter 1. 2). 2. (Romans 1. 7; 1 Corinthians 1. 3; 2 Corinthians 1. 2; Galatians 1. 3.) 3. The doxologies in almost all the Epistles imply the real sense of grace experienced by the writers and their readers (1 Peter 1. 3). From v. 3 to 14 sets forth summarily the Gospel of the grace of God: the FATHER'S work of love, v. 3 (choosing us to holiness, v. 4; to sonship, v. 5; to acceptance, v. 6); the SON'S, v. 7 (redemption, v. 7; knowledge of the mystery of His will, v. 9; an inheritance, v. 11); the HOLY SPIRIT'S, v. 13 (sealing, v. 13; giving an earnest of the inheritance, v. 14). the God and Father of . . . Christ—and so the God and Father of us who are in Him (John 20. 17). God is "the God" of the man Jesus, and "the Father" of the Divine Word. The Greek is, "Blessed us," not "hath blessed us;" referring to the past original counsel of God. As in creation (Genesis 1. 22) so in redemption (Genesis 12. 3; Matthew 5. 3-11; 25. 34) God "blesses" his children; and that not in mere words, but in acts. us—all Christians. blessings—Greek, "blessing." "All," i. e., "every possible blessing for time and eternity, which the Spirit has to bestow" (so "spiritual" means; not "spiritual," as the term is now used, as opposed to bodily). in heavenly places—A phrase five times found in this Epistle, and not elsewhere (v. 20; ch. 3. 6; 3. 10; 6. 12); Greek, "in the heavenly places." Christ's ascension is the means of introducing us into the heavenly places, which by our sin were barred against us.

Cf. the change made by Christ, Colossians 1. 20; ch. 1. 20. Whilst Christ in the flesh was in the form of a servant, God's people could not realize fully their heavenly privileges as sons. Now "our citizenship (Greek) is in heaven" (Philippians 3. 20), where our High Priest is ever "blessing" us. Our "treasures" are there (Matthew 6. 20, 21); our aims and affections (Colossians 3. 1, 2); our hope (Colossians 1. 5; Titus 2. 13); our inheritance (1 Peter 1. 4). The gift of the Spirit itself, the source of the "spiritual blessing," is by virtue of Jesus having ascended thither (ch. 4. 8). in Christ—the centre and source of all blessing to us. 4. hath chosen us—Greek, "chose us out for Himself" (viz., out of the world, Galatians 1. 4); referring to His original choice, spoken of as past. in Him—The repetition of the idea, "in Christ" (v. 3), implies the paramount importance of the truth that it is in Him, and by virtue of union to Him, the Second Adam, the Restorer ordained for us from everlasting, the Head of redeemed humanity, believers have all their blessings (ch. 3. 11). before the foundation of the world—This assumes the eternity of the Son of God (John 17. 5, 24), as of the election of believers in Him (2 Timothy 1. 9; 2 Thessalonians 2. 13). that we should be holy—Positively (Deuteronomy 14. 2). without blame—Negatively (ch. 5. 27; 1 Thessalonians 3. 13). before Him—It is to Him the believer looks, walking as in His presence, before whom he looks to be accepted in the judgment (Colossians 1. 22; cf. Revelation 7. 15). in love—Joined by BENGLI, &c., with v. 5, "in love having predestinated us," &c. But English Version is better. The words qualify the whole clause, "that we should be holy . . . before Him." Love, lost to man by the fall, but restored by redemption, is the root and fruit and sum of all holiness (ch. 5. 2; 1 Thessalonians 3. 12, 13). 5. predestinated—More special in respect to the end and precise means, than "chosen" or elect. We are "chosen" out of the rest of the world; "predestinated" to all things that secure the inheritance for us (v. 11; Romans 8. 29). "Foreordained," by Jesus—Greek "through Jesus," to himself—the Father (Colossians 1. 20). ALFORD explains, "adoption . . . into Himself," i. e., so that we should be partakers of the Divine nature (2 Peter 1. 4). LACHMANN reads, "unto Him." The context favours the explanation of CALVIN, &c.: God has regard to Himself and the glory of His grace (v. 6, 12, 14) as His ultimate end. He had one only begotten Son, and He was pleased for His own glory, to choose out of a lost world many to become His adopted sons. Translate, "unto Himself." the good pleasure of his will—So the Greek (Matthew 11. 23; Luke 10. 21). We cannot go beyond "the good pleasure of His will" in searching into the causes of our salvation, or of any of His works (v. 9). (Job 33. 18.) Why needest thou philosophize about an imaginary world of optimism? Thy concern is to take heed that thou be not bad. There was nothing in us which deserved His love (v. 1, 9, 11). [BENGEL.] 6. (Ver. 7, 17, 18.) The end aimed at (Psalm 50. 23), i. e., That the glory of His grace may be praised by all His creatures, men and angels. wherein—Some of the oldest MSS. read, "which." Then translate, "which He graciously bestowed on us." But English Version is supported by good MSS. and the oldest versions, us accepted—A kindred Greek word to "grace:" Charitos, charitosen: translate, "graciously accepted;" "made us subjects of His grace;" "embraced us in the arms of His grace" (Romans 3. 24; 5. 15). in the Beloved—Pre-eminently so called (Matthew 3. 17; 17. 5; John 3. 35; Colossians 1. 13). Greek, "Son of His love." It is only "in His Beloved" that He loves us (v. 3; 1 John 4. 9, 10). 7. In whom—"the Beloved" (v. 6; Romans 3. 24). we have—as a present possession. redemption—Greek, "our (lit., the) redemption;" THE redemption which is the grand subject of all revelation, and especially of the New Testament (Romans 3. 24), viz., from the power, guilt, and penal consequences of sin (Matthew 1. 21). If a man were unable to redeem himself from being a bond servant, his kinsman might redeem him (Leviticus 25. 48). Hence, antitypically the Son of God became the Son of man, that as our kinsman He might redeem us (Matthew 20. 28). Another "redemption" follows, viz., that "of the purchased possession" hereafter (v. 14). through his blood—(Ch. 2. 13)—as the instrument; the propitiation, i. e., the consideration (devised by His own love) for which He, who was justly angry (Isaiah 12. 1), becomes propitious to us; the explanation, the price paid to Divine justice for our sin (Acts 20. 28; Romans 3. 25; 1 Corinthians 6. 20; Colossians 1. 20; 1 Peter 1. 18, 19). the forgiveness of sins—Greek, "the remission of our transgressions;" not merely "pretermis-sion," as the Greek (Romans 3. 25) ought to be translated. This "remission," being the explanation of "redemption," includes not only deliverance from sin's penalty, but from its pollution and enslaving power, negatively; and the reconciliation of an offended God, and a satisfaction unto a just God, positively. riches of his grace—(Ch. 2. 7)—"the exceeding riches of His grace." Cf. v. 18, and ch. 3. 16, "according to the riches of His glory:" so that "grace" is His "glory." 8. Rather, "Which He made to abound towards us." all wisdom and prudence—"Wisdom" in devising the plan of redeeming mankind; "prudence" in executing it by the means, and in making all the necessary arrangements of Providence for that purpose. St. Paul attributes to the Gospel of God's grace "all" possible "wisdom and prudence," in opposition to the boasts of wisdom and prudence which the unbelieving Jews and heathen philosophers and false apostles arrogated for their teachings. Christ crucified, though esteemed "foolishness" by the world, is "the wisdom of God" (1 Corinthians 1. 18-30). Cf. ch. 3. 10, "the manifold wisdom of God." 9. "He hath abounded," or "made (grace) to abound towards us" (v. 8), in that He made known to us, viz., experimentally, in our hearts. the mystery—God's purpose of redemption hidden heretofore in His counsels, but now revealed (ch. 3. 19; Romans 16. 25; Colossians 1. 26, 27). This "mystery" is not like the heathen mysteries, which were imparted only to the initiated few. All Christians are the initiated. Only unbelievers are the uninitiated. according to his good pleasure—Showing the cause why "He hath made known to us the mystery," viz., His own loving "good pleasure" toward us; also the time and manner of His doing so, are according to His good pleasure. purposed—(V. 11.) in himself—God the Father. BENGEL takes it, "in Him," i. e., Christ, as v. 3, 4. But the proper name, "in Christ," v. 10, immediately after, is inconsistent with His being here meant by the pronoun. 10. Translate, "Unto the dispensation of the fulness of the times,"

i. e., "which He purposed in Himself" (v. 9) with a view to the economy of (the gracious administration belonging to) the fulness of the times (Greek, "fit times," "seasons"). More comprehensive than "the fulness of the time" (Galatians 4. 4). The whole of the Gospel times (plural) is meant, with the benefits to the Church dispensed in them severally and successively. Cf. "the ages to come" (ch. 2. 7). "The ends of the ages" (Greek, 1 Corinthians 10. 11); "the times (same Greek as here, 'the seasons,' or 'fitly appointed times') of the Gentiles" (Luke 21. 24); "the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power" (Acts 1. 7); "the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the prophets since the world began" (Acts 3. 20, 21). The coming of Jesus at the first advent, "in the fulness of time," was one of these "times." The descent of the Holy Ghost "when Pentecost was fully come" (Acts 2. 1), was another. The testimony given by the apostles to Him "in due time" ("in its own seasons," Greek) (1 Timothy 2. 6) was another. The conversion of the Jews "when the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled," the second coming of Christ, the "restitution of all things," the millennial kingdom, the new heaven and earth, shall be severally instances of "the dispensation of the fulness of the times," i. e., "the dispensation of" the Gospel events and benefits belonging to their respective "times," when severally filled up or completed. God the Father, according to His own good pleasure and purpose, is the Dispenser both of the Gospel benefits, and of their several fitting times (Acts 1. 7). gather together in one—Greek, "sum up under one head;" "recapitulate." The "good pleasure which He purposed," was "to sum up all things (Greek, 'THE whole range of things') in Christ" (Greek, "the Christ," i. e., His Christ). [ALFORD.] God's purpose is to sum up the whole creation in Christ, the Head of angels, with whom He is linked by His invisible nature, and of men with whom He is linked by His humanity; of Jews and Gentiles; of the living and the dead (ch. 3. 15); of animate and inanimate creation. Sin has disarranged the creature's relation of subordination to God. God means to gather up all together in Christ; or as Colossians 1. 20 saith, "By Him to reconcile all things unto Himself, whether things in earth or things in heaven." ALFORD well says, "The Church of which the apostle here mainly treats, is subordinated to Him in the highest degree of conscious and joyful union; those who are not His spiritually, in mere subjugation, yet consciously; the inferior tribes of creation unconsciously; but objectively, all are summed up in Him." 11. In whom—By virtue of union to whom. obtained an inheritance—lit., "We were made to have an inheritance." [WAHL.] Cf. v. 18, "His inheritance in the saints:" as His inheritance is there said to be in them, so theirs is here said to be in Him (Acts 26. 18). However, v. 12, "That we should be to . . . His glory" (not "that we should have"), favours the translation of BENGEL, ELLICOTT, &c., "We were made an inheritance." So the literal Israel (Deuteronomy 4. 20; 9. 29; 32. 9). "Also" does not mean "we also," nor as English Version, "in whom also;" but, besides His having "made known to us His will," we were also "made His inheritance," or "we have also obtained an inheritance." predestinated—(V. 5.) The foreordination of Israel as the elect nation, answers to that of the spiritual Israelites, believers, to an eternal inheritance, which is the thing meant here. The "we" here and in v. 12, means Jewish believers (whence the reference to the election of Israel nationally arises), as contrasted with "you" (v. 13) Gentile believers. purpose—Repeated from "purposed" (v. 9; ch. 3. 11). The Church existed in the mind of God eternally, before it existed in creation. counsel of his . . . will—v. 5, "the good pleasure of His will." Not arbitrary caprice, but infinite wisdom ("counsel") joined with sovereign will. Cf. his address to the same Ephesians, Acts 20. 27, "All the counsel of God" (Isaiah 23. 29). Alike in the natural and spiritual creations, God is not an agent constrained by necessity. "Whosoever counsel is, there is election, or else it is vain; where a will, there must be freedom, or else it is weak." [PEARSON.] 12. (V. 6. 14.) who first trusted in Christ—rather (we Jewish Christians), "who have before hoped in the Christ:" who before the Christ came, looked forward to His coming, waiting for the consolation of Israel. Cf. Acts 26. 6, 7, "I am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which our twelve wives, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come." Acts 26. 20, "the hope of Israel." [ALFORD.] Cf. v. 18; ch. 2. 12, 4. 4. 13. In whom ye also—Ye Gentiles, Supply as English Version, "trusted," from v. 12; or "are." The priority of us Jews does not exclude you Gentiles from sharing in Christ (cf. Acts 18. 46). the word of truth—the instrument of sanctification, and of the new birth (John 17. 17; 2 Timothy 2. 15; James 1. 18). Cf. Colossians 1. 5, where also, as here, it is connected with "hope." Also ch. 4. 21. sealed—as God's confirmed children, by the Holy Spirit as the seal (Acts 19. 1-6; Romans 8. 16, 23; Note, 2 Corinthians 1. 22; 1 John 3. 24). A seal impressed on a document gives undoubted validity to the contract in it (John 8. 38; 6. 27; cf. 2 Corinthians 3. 3). So the sense of "the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost" (Romans 5. 5), and the sense of adoption given through the Spirit at regeneration (Romans 8. 15, 16), assure believers of God's good-will to them. The Spirit, like a seal, impresses on the soul at regeneration the image of our Father. The "sealing" by the Holy Spirit is spoken of as past once for all. The witnessing to our hearts that we are the children of God, and heirs (v. 11), is the Spirit's present testimony, the "earnest of the (coming) inheritance" (Romans 8. 16-18), that Holy Spirit of promise—rather, as the Greek, "The Spirit of promise, even the Holy Spirit:" The Spirit promised both in the Old and New Testaments (Joel 2. 28; Zechariah 12. 10; John 7. 38, 39). "The word" promised the Holy Spirit. Those who "believed the word of truth" were sealed by the Spirit accordingly. 14. earnest—the first instalment paid as a pledge that the rest will follow (Romans 8. 23; 2 Corinthians 1. 22). until—rather, "Unto the redemption," &c.; joined thus, "ye were sealed (v. 12) unto," i. e., for the purpose of, and against, the accomplishment of "the redemption," viz., not the redemption in its first stage, made by the blood of Christ, which secures our title, but, in its final completion, when the actual possession shall be ours, the full "redemption of the body" (Romans 8. 23), as well as of the soul, from every infirmity (ch. 4. 80). The deliverance of the creature (the body, and the whole visible creation) from the bondage of corruption, and from the usurping prince of this world, into the glorious liberty of the children of God (Romans 8. 21-23; 2 Peter 3. 13) of the purchased possession—God's people purchased (acquired Greek) as His peculiar (Greek) possession by the blood of Christ (Acts 20. 28). We value highly that which we pay a high price for; so God, His Church (ch. 5. 25, 28; 1 Peter 1. 18; 2. 9; Malachi 3. 17, Margin, "my special treasure"). 15. Wherefore—Because ye are in Christ and sealed by His Spirit (v. 13, 14). I also—on my part, in return for God's so great benefits to you. after I heard—ever since I have heard. Not implying that he had only heard of their conversion; an erroneous argument used by some against the address of this Epistle to the Ephesians (Note, v. 1); but referring to the report he had heard since he was with them, as to their Christian graces. So in the case of Philemon, his "beloved fellow-labourer" (Philemon 1), he uses the same words (Philemon 4, 5). your faith—rather, as Greek, "the faith among you," i. e., which many (not all) of you have. love unto all the saints—of whatever name, simply because they are saints. A distinguishing characteristic of true Christianity (ch. 6. 24). "Faith and love he often joins together. A wondrous pair." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Hope is added, v. 18. 16. (Colossians 1. 9.) of you—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Then the translation may be as English Version still, or as ALFORD, "Making mention of them" (your "faith and love"). 17. A fit prayer for all Christians. the God of our Lord Jesus—Appropriate title here; as in v. 20-22 he treats of God's raising Jesus to be Head over all things to the Church. Jesus Himself called the Father "My God" (Matthew 27. 46). the Father of glory—(Cf. Acts 7. 2.)

The Father of that infinite glory which shines in the face of Christ, who is "the glory" (the true Shekinah); through whom also "the glory of the inheritance" (v. 18) shall be ours (John 17. 24; 2 Corinthians 3. 7 to 4. 6). the spirit of wisdom—whose attribute is infinite wisdom, and who works wisdom in believers (Isaiah 11. 2). and revelation—whose function it is to reveal to believers spiritual mysteries (John 16. 14, 15; 1 Corinthians 2. 10). in the knowledge—rather, as Greek (see Note, 1 Corinthians 13. 12), "in the full knowledge of Him," viz., God. 18. understanding—The oldest MSS., versions, and fathers, read "heart." Cf. the contrary state of the unbelieving, the heart being in fault (ch. 4. 18; Matthew 13. 15). Translate, "Having the eyes of your heart enlightened" (ch. 5. 14; Matthew 4. 16). The first effect of the Spirit moving in the new creation, as in the original physical creation (Genesis 1. 8; 2 Corinthians 4. 6). So THEOPHILUS to AUTOLYCHUS, 1. 3, "the ears of the heart." Where spiritual light is, there is life (John 1. 4). The heart is "the core of life" (HARLESS), and the fountain of the thoughts; whence "the heart" in Scripture includes the mind, as well as the inclination. Its "eye," or inward vision, both receives and contemplates the light (Matthew 6. 22, 23). The eye is the symbol of intelligence (Ezekiel 1. 18). the hope of his calling—the hope appertaining to His having called you; or, to the calling wherewith He has called you. and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. and versions. riches of the glory, &c.—(Colossians 1. 27.) his inheritance in the saints—The inheritance which he has in store in the case of the saints. I prefer explaining, "The inheritance which He has in his saints." (See Note, v. 11; Deuteronomy 32. 9.) 19. exceeding—"surpassing." power to us-ward who believe—The whole of the working of His grace, which He is carrying on, and will carry on, in us who believe. By the term "saints" (v. 18), believers are regarded as absolutely perfected, and so as being God's inheritance; in this verse, as in the course of fighting the good fight of faith, according to—in accordance with what might be expected from. working—Greek, "the energizing;" translate, "the effectual working" (ch. 3. 7). The same superhuman power was needed and exerted to make us believe, as was needed and exerted to raise Christ from the dead (v. 20). Cf. Philipians 3. 10, "the power of His resurrection" (Colossians 2. 12; 1 Peter 1. 3-5). of his mighty power—Greek, "of the strength of his might." 20. in Christ—as our "first-fruits" of the resurrection, and Head, in virtue of God's mighty working in whom His power to us-ward is made possible and actual. [ALFORD.] when he raised him—"in that He raised Him." The raising of Christ is not only an earnest of our bodies being hereafter raised, but has a spiritual power in it involving (by virtue of our living union with Him, as members with the Head) the resurrection, spiritually of the believer's soul now, and, consequently, of his body hereafter (Romans 6. 8-11; 8. 11). The Son, too, as God (though not as man), had a share in raising His own human body (John 2. 19; 10. 17, 18). Also the Holy Spirit (Romans 1. 4; 1 Peter 3. 18). set him—Greek, "made Him sit." The glorious spirits stand about the throne of God, but they do not sit at God's right hand (Hebrews 1. 13). at his own right hand—(Psalm 110. 1.) Where He remains till all His enemies have been put under His feet (1 Corinthians 15. 24). Being appointed to "rule in the midst of His enemies" during their rebellion (Psalm 110. 2), He shall resign His commission after their subjection [PEARSON] (Mark 16. 19; Hebrews 1. 8; 10. 12). in the heavenly places—(v. 3.) As Christ has a literal body, heaven is not merely a state, but a place; and where He is, there His people shall be (John 14. 3). 21. Greek, "Far (or high) above all (ch. 4. 10) principality (or rule, 1 Corinthians 15. 24), and authority, and power (Matthew 28. 18), and dominion (or lordship)." Cf. Philipians 2. 9; Colossians 1. 16; Hebrews 7. 26; 1 Peter 3. 22. Evil spirits (who are similarly divided into various ranks, ch. 6. 12), as well as angels of light, and earthly potentates, are included (cf. Romans 8. 38). Jesus is "King of kings, and Lord of lords" (Revelation 19. 16). The higher is His honour, the greater is that of His people, who are His members joined to Him the Head. Some philosophizing teachers of the school of Simon Magus, in Western Asia Minor, had, according to IRENAEUS and EPIPHANIUS, taught their hearers these names of various ranks of angels. St. Paul shows that the truest wisdom is to know Christ as reigning above them all, every name—every being whatever. "Any other creature" (Romans 8. 39). in this world—Greek, "age," i. e., the present order of things. "Things present . . . things to come" (Romans 8. 38). that . . . to come—Names which now we know not, but shall know hereafter in heaven. We know that the emperor goes before all, though we cannot enumerate all the satraps and ministers of his court; so we know that Christ is set above all, although we cannot name them all." [BENGEI.] 22. put . . . under—Greek, "put in subjection under" (Psalm 8. 6; 1 Corinthians 15. 27). gave . . . to the Church—for her special advantage. The Greek order is emphatic: "HIM He gave as Head over all things to the Church." Had it been any one save HIM, her Head, it would not have been the boon it is to the Church. But as He is Head over all things who is also her Head (and she the body), all things are hers (1 Corinthians 3. 21-23). He is OVER ("far above") all things; in contrast to the words, "to the Church," viz., for her advantage. The former are subject; the latter is joined with Him in His dominion over them. "Head" implies not only His dominion, but our union; therefore, while we look upon Him at the right hand of God, we see ourselves in heaven (Revelation 3. 21). For the Head and body are not severed by anything intervening, else the body would cease to be the body, and the Head cease to be the Head. [PEARSON from CHRYSOSTOM.] 23. his body—His mystical and spiritual, not literal, body. Not, however, merely figurative, or metaphorical. He is really, though spiritually, the Church's Head. His life is her life. She shares his crucifixion and His consequent glory. He possesses everything, His fellowship with the Father, His fulness of the Spirit, and His glorified manhood, not merely for Himself, but for her, who has a membership of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones (ch. 5. 30). fulness—"the filled-up receptacle." [EADIE.] The Church is dwelt in and filled by Christ. She is the receptacle, not of His inherent, but of His communicated, plenitude of gifts and graces. As His is the "fulness" (John 1. 16; Colossians 1. 19; 2. 9) inherently, so she is His "fulness" by His impartation of it to her, in virtue of her union to Him (ch. 5. 18; Colossians 2. 10). "The full manifestation of His being, because penetrated by His life." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] She is the continued revelation of His Divine life in human form; the fullest representative of His plenitude. Not the angelic hierarchy, as false teachers taught (Colossians 2. 9, 10, 18), but Christ Himself is the "fulness of the God-head," and she represents Him. ΚΟΠΙ Ε translates less probably, "the whole universal multitude." filleth all in all—Christ as the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of the world, constituted by God (Colossians 1. 16, &c.), fills all the universe of things with all things. "Fills all creation with whatever it possesses." [ALFORD.] The Greek is "Filleth for Himself."

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-22. GOD'S LOVE AND GRACE IN QUICKENING US, ONCE DEAD, THROUGH CHRIST. HIS PURPOSE IN DOING SO: EXHORTATION BASED ON OUR PRIVILEGES AS BUILT TOGETHER, AN HOLY TEMPLE, IN CHRIST, THROUGH THE SPIRIT. 1. And you—"You also," among those who have experienced his mighty power in enabling them to believe (v. 19-23). hath he quickened—Supplied from the Greek (v. 5). dead—spiritually (Colossians 2. 13). A living corpse: without the gracious presence of God's Spirit in the soul, and so unable to think, will, or do aught that is holy. in trespasses . . . sins—in them, as the element in which the unbeliever is, and through which he is dead to the true life. Sin is the death of the soul. Isaiah 9. 2; John 8. 25, "dead" (spiritually), 1 Timothy 5. 6. "Alienated from the life of God" (ch. 4. 18). Translate, as Greek, "in your trespasses," &c. "Trespass" in Greek, expresses a FALL or LAPSE, such as the transgression of Adam where-

by he fell. "Sin" (Greek, "Hamartia") implies innocent corruption and ALIENATION from God (lit., erring of the mind from the rule of truth), exhibited in acts of sin (Greek "Hamartemata"). BENGEI refers "trespasses" to the Jews who had the law, and yet revolted from it; "sins," to the Gentiles who know not God. 2. the course of this world—the career (lit., "the age," cf. Galatians 1. 4), or present system of this world (1 Corinthians 2. 6, 12; 3. 15, 19, as opposed to "the world to come"); alien from God, and lying in the wicked one (1 John 5. 19). "The age" (which is something more eternal and ethical) regulates "the world" (which is something more external). the prince of the power of the air—the unseen God who lies underneath guiding "the course of this world" (2 Corinthians 4. 4); ranging through the air around us: cf. Mark 4. 4, "fowls of the air" (Greek, "heaven") i. e., (v. 15), "Satan" and his demons. Cf. ch. 6. 12; John 12. 31. Christ's ascension seems to have cast Satan out of heaven (Revelation 12. 5, 9, 10, 12, 13), where he had been heretofore the accuser of the brethren (Job 1). No longer able to accuse in heaven those justified by Christ, the ascended Saviour (Romans 8. 33, 34), he assails them on earth with all trials and temptations; and "we live in an atmosphere poisonous and impregnated with deadly elements. But a mighty purification of the air will be effected by Christ's conlug" [AUBERLEN], for Satan shall be bound (Revelation 12. 12, 13, 15, 17; 20. 2, 3). "The power" is here used collectively for the "powers of the air;" in apposition with which "powers" stand the "spirits," comprehended in the singular, "the spirit," taken also collectively: the aggregate of the "seducing spirits" (1 Timothy 4. 1) which "work now (still; not merely, as in your case, "in time past") in the sons of disobedience" (a Hebraism: men who are not merely by accident disobedient, but who are essentially sons of disobedience itself: cf. Matthew 23. 7), and of which Satan is here declared to be "the prince." The Greek does not allow "the spirit" to refer to Satan "the prince" himself, but to "the powers of the air" of which he is prince. The powers of the air are the embodiment of that evil "spirit" which is the ruling principle of unbelievers, especially the heathen (Acts 26. 18), as opposed to the spirit of the children of God (Luke 4. 33). The potency of that "spirit" is shown in the "disobedience" of the former. Cf. Deuteronomy 32. 20, "children in whom is no faith" (Isaiah 30. 9; 57. 4). They disobey the Gospel both in faith and practice (2 Thessalonians 1. 8; 1. Corinthians 2. 12). 3. also we—i. e., we also. St. Paul here joins himself in the same category with them, passing from the second person (v. 1, 2) to the first person here. all—Jews and Gentiles. our conversation—"our way of life" (2 Corinthians 1. 12; 1 Peter 1. 18). This expression implies an outwardly more decorous course, than the open "walk" in gross sins on the part of the majority of Ephesians in times past, the Gentile portion of whom may be specially referred to in v. 2. Paul and his Jewish countrymen, though outwardly more seemly than the Gentiles (Acts 26. 4, 5, 18), had been essentially like them in living to the unrenewed flesh, without the Spirit of God. fulfilling—Greek, "doing." mind—Greek, "our thoughts." Mental suggestions and purposes (Independent of God), as distinguished from the blind impulses of "the flesh." and were by nature—He intentionally breaks off the construction, substituting "and we were" for "and being," to mark emphatically his and their past state by nature, as contrasted with their present state by grace. Not merely is it, we had our way of life fulfilling our fleshly desires, and so being children of wrath; but we were by nature originally "children of wrath," and so consequently had our way of life fulfilling our fleshly desires. "Nature," in Greek, implies that which has grown in us as the peculiarity of our being, growing with our growth, and strengthening with our strength, as distinguished from that which has been wrought on us by mere external influences; what is inherent, not acquired (Job 14. 4; Psalm 51. 5). An incidental proof of the doctrine of original sin. children of wrath—not merely "sons," as in the Greek, "sons of disobedience" (v. 2), but "children" by generation: not merely by adoption, as "sons" might

6. The Greek order more emphatically marks this innate corruption: "Those who in their (very) nature are children of wrath;" v. 5, "grace" is opposed to "nature" here; and salvation (implied in v. 5, 8, "saved") to "wrath." Cf. Article IX., Church of England Common Prayer Book. "Original, or birth-sin, standeth not in the following of Adam, but is the fault and corruption of the nature of every man, naturally engendered of Adam [Christ was supernaturally conceived by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin], whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil; and therefore, in every person born into this world, it deserveth God's wrath and damnation." St. Paul shows that even the Jews, who boasted of their birth from Abraham, were by natural birth equally children of wrath as the Gentiles, whom the Jews despised on account of their birth from idolaters (Romans 3. 9; 5. 12-14). "Wrath abideth" on all who disobey the Gospel in faith and practice (John 2. 36). The phrase, "children of wrath," is a Hebraism, i. e., objects of God's wrath from childhood, in our natural state, as being born in the sin which God hates. So "son of death" (Marginal, 2 Samuel 12. 5); "son of perdition" (John 17. 12; 2 Thessalonians 2. 3). as others—Greek, "as the rest" of mankind are (1 Thessalonians 4. 13). 4. God, who is rich—Greek "(as) being rich in mercy," for—i. e., "because of His great love." This was the special ground of God's saving us; as "rich in mercy" (cf. v. 7; Romans 2. 4; 10. 12) was the general ground. "Mercy takes away misery; love confers salvation." [BENGL.] 5. dead in sins—The best reading is in the Greek, "dead in our (lit., the) trespasses." quickened—"vivified" spiritually, and consequences hereafter, corporally. There must be a spiritual resurrection of the soul, before there can be a comfortable resurrection of the body [PEARSON] (John 11. 25, 26; Romans 8. 11). together with Christ—The Head being seated at God's right hand, the body also sits there with Him. [CHRYSOSTOM.] We are already seated there IN Him ("In Christ Jesus," v. 6), and hereafter shall be seated by Him; IN Him already as in our Head, which is the ground of our hope; by Him hereafter, as by the conferring cause, when hope shall be swallowed up in fruition. [PEARSON.] What God wrought in Christ, He wrought (by the very fact) in all united to Christ, and one with Him. by grace ye are saved—Greek, "Ye are in a saved state." Not merely "ye are being saved," but ye "are passed from death unto life" (John 5. 24). Salvation is to the Christian not a thing to be waited for hereafter, but already realized (1 John 3. 14). The parenthetical introduction of this clause here (cf. v. 8) is a burst of St. Paul's feeling, and in order to make the Ephesians feel that grace from first to last is the sole source of salvation; hence, too, he says "ye," not "we." 6. raised us up together—with Christ. The "raising up" presupposes previous quickening of Jesus in the tomb, and of us in the grave of our sins. made us sit together—with Christ, viz., in His ascension. Believers are bodily in heaven in point of right, and virtually so in spirit, and have each their own place assigned there, which in due time they shall take possession of (Philippians 3. 20, 21). He does not say, "on the right hand of God;" a prerogative reserved to Christ peculiarly; though they shall share His throne (Revelation 3. 21). in Christ Jesus—Our union with Him is the ground of our present spiritual, and future bodily, resurrection and ascension. "Christ Jesus" is the phrase mostly used in this Epistle, in which the office of the Christ, the Anointed prophet, priest and king, is the prominent thought; when the Person is prominent, "Jesus Christ" is the phrase used. 7. Greek, "That He might show forth (middle reflexive voice; for His own glory, ch. 1. 6, 12, 14) in the ages which are coming on," i. e., the blessed ages of the Gospel which supersede "the age (Greek, for 'course') of this world" (v. 2), and the past "ages" from which the mystery was hidden (Colossians 1. 26, 27). These good ages, though beginning with the first preaching of the Gospel, and thenceforth continually succeeding one another, are not consummated till the Lord's coming again (cf. ch. 1. 21; Hebrews 6. 5). The words, "coming on," do not exclude the time then present, but imply simply the ages following upon Christ's "raising them up together" spiritually (v. 6). kindness—"benignity; through Christ—rather, as Greek, "in Christ;" the same expression as is so often repeated, to mark that all our blessings centre "IN HIM." 8. For—illustrating "the exceeding riches of His grace in kindness." Translate as in v. 5, "Ye are in a saved state." through faith—The effect of the power of Christ's resurrection (ch. 1. 19, 20; Philippians 3. 10) whereby we are "raised together" with Him (v. 6; Colossians 2. 12). Some of the oldest MSS. read, "through your (lit., 'the') faith." The instrument or means of salvation on the part of the person saved; Christ alone is the meritorious agent. and that—viz., the act of believing, or "faith." "Of yourselves" stands in opposition to, "it is the gift of God" (Philippians 1. 29). "That which I have said, 'through faith,' I do not wish to be understood so as if I excepted faith itself from grace." [ESTIUS.] "God justifies the believing man, not for the worthiness of his belief, but for the worthiness of Him in whom he believes." [HOOKER.] The initiation, as well as the increase, of faith, is from the Spirit of God, not only by an external proposal of the word, but by internal illumination in the soul. [PEARSON.] Yet "faith" cometh by the means which man must avail himself of, viz., "hearing the word of God" (Romans 10. 17), and prayer (Luke 11. 13), though the blessing is wholly of God (1 Corinthians 3. 6, 7). 9. not of works—This clause stands in contrast to "by grace," and is confirmed by Romans 4. 4, 5; 11. 6. lest—rather, as Greek, "that no man should boast" (Romans 3. 27; 4. 2). 10. workmanship—lit., "a thing of His making;" "hand-work." Here the spiritual creation, not the physical, is referred to (v. 8, 9). created—having been created (ch. 4. 21; Psalm 102. 18; Isaiah 43. 21; 2 Corinthians 5. 5, 17). unto—"for good works." "Good works" cannot be performed until we are new "created unto" them. St. Paul never calls the works of the law "good works." We are not saved by, but created unto, good works. before ordained—Greek, "before made ready" (cf. John 5. 36). God marks out for each in His purposes beforehand, the particular good works, and the time and way which He sees best. God both makes ready by His providence the opportunities for the works, and makes us ready for their performance (John 15. 16; 2 Timothy 2. 21). that we should walk in them—not "be saved" by them. Works do not justify, but the justified man works (Galatians 5. 22-25). 11. The Greek order in the oldest MSS. is, "That in time past (lit., once) ye," &c. Such remembrance sharpens gratitude and strengthens faith (v. 19). [BENGL.] Gentiles in the flesh—i. e., Gentiles in respect to circumcision. called Uncircumcision—The Gentiles were called [in contempt], and were, the Uncircumcision; the Jews were called, but were not truly, the Circumcision. [ELLCOTT.] in the flesh made by hands—as opposed to the true "circumcision of the heart in the Spirit, and not the letter" (Romans 2. 29), "made without the hands in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ" (Colossians 2. 11). 12. without Christ—Greek, "separate from Christ;" having no part in Him; far from Him. A different Greek word (aneu) would be required to express, "Christ was not present with you." [TITM.] aliens—Greek, "alienated from." Not merely "separated from." The Israelites were cut off from the commonwealth of God, but it was as being self-righteous, indolent, and unworthy, not as aliens and strangers. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The expression, "alienated from," takes it for granted that the Gentiles before they had apostatized from the primitive truth, had been sharers in light and life (cf. ch. 4. 18, 23). The hope of redemption through the Messiah, on their subsequent apostasy, was embodied into a definite "commonwealth" or polity, viz., that "of Israel," from which the Gentiles were alienated. Contrast v. 13; ch. 3. 6; 4. 4, 5, with Psalm 147. 20. covenants of promise—rather ". . . of the promise," viz., "to thee and thy seed will I give this land" (Romans 9. 4; Galatians 3. 16). The plural implies the several renewals of the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and with the whole people at Sinai. [ALFORD.] "The promise" is singular, to signify that the covenant, in reality, and substantially, is one and the same at all times, but only different in its accidents and external circumstances (cf. Hebrews 1. 1, "at sundry times and in divers manners"). without . . . hope—beyond this life (1 Corinthians 15. 19). The CONJECTURES of heathen philosophers as to a future life were at best vague and utterly unsatisfactory. They had no Divine "promise," and therefore no sure ground of "hope." Epicurus and Aristotle did not believe in it at all. The Platonists believed the soul passed through perpetual changes, now happy, and then again miserable. The Stoics, that it existed no longer than till the time of the general burning up of all things. without God—Greek, "atheists," i. e., they had not "God" in the sense we use the word, the Eternal Being who made and governs all things (cf. Acts 14. 15, "Turn from these vanities unto the living God who made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things therein"), whereas the Jews had distinct ideas of God and immortality. Cf. also Galatians 4. 8, "Ye knew not God . . . ye did service unto them which are no gods" (1 Thessalonians 4. 5). So also pantheists are atheists, for an impersonal God is no God, and an ideal immortality no immortality. [THOLUCK.] in the world—In contrast to belonging to "the commonwealth of Israel." Having their portion and their all in this godless vain world (Psalm 17. 14), from which Christ delivers his people (John 15. 19; 17. 14; Galatians 1. 4). 13. now—In contrast to "at that time" (v. 12). in Christ Jesus—"Jesus" is here added, whereas the expression before (v. 12) had been merely "Christ," to mark that they know Christ as the personal Saviour, "Jesus." sometimes—Greek, "aforetime." far off—The Jewish description of the Gentiles. Far off from God and from the people of God (v. 17; Isaiah 57. 19; Acts 2. 30). are—Greek, "have been." by—Greek, "in." Thus "the blood of Christ" is made the seal of a covenant in which their nearness to God consists. In ch. 1. 7, where the blood is more directly spoken of as the instrument, it is "through His blood." [ALFORD.] 14. he—Greek, "Himself" alone, pre-eminently, and none else. Emphatical. our peace—not merely "Peacemaker," but "Himself" the price of our (Jews' and Gentiles' alike) peace with God, and so the bond of union between "both" in God. He took both into Himself, and reconciled them, united, to God, by His assuming our nature and our penal and legal liabilities (v. 15; Isaiah 9. 5, 6; 53. 5; Micah 5. 5; Colossians 1. 20). His title, "Shiloh," means the same (Genesis 49. 10). the middle wall of partition—Greek, ". . . of the partition" or "fence;" the middle wall which parted Jew and Gentile. There was a balustrade of stone which separated the court of the Gentiles from the holy place, which it was death for a Gentile to pass. But this, though incidentally alluded to, was but a symbol of the partition itself, viz., "the enmity" between "both" and God (v. 15), the real cause of separation from God, and so the mediate cause of their separation from one another. Hence there was a twofold wall of partition, one the inner wall, severing the Jewish people from entrance to the holy part of the temple where the priests officiated, the other the outer wall, separating the Gentile proselytes from access to the court of the Jews (cf. Ezekiel 41. 7; Acts 21. 23). Thus this twofold wall represented the Sinaitic law, which both severed all men, even the Jews, from access to God (through sin, which is the violation of the law), and also separated the Gentiles from the Jews. As the term "wall" implies the strength of the partition; so "fence" implies that it was easily removed by God when the due time came. 15. Rather, make "enmity" an apposition to "the middle wall of partition;" "Hath broken down the middle wall of partition (not merely as English Version, 'between us,' but also between all men and God), to wit, the enmity (Romans 8. 7) by his flesh" (cf. v. 16; Romans 8. 3). the law of commandments—contained in—Greek, "the law of the commandments [consisting] in ordinances." This law was "the partition" or "fence," which embodied the expression of the "enmity" (the "wrath" of God against our sin, and our enmity to Him, v. 3) (Romans 4. 15; 5. 20; 7. 10, 11; 8. 7). Christ has in, or by, His crucified flesh, abolished it so far as its condemning and enmity-creating power is concerned (Colossians 2. 14), substituting for it the law of love, which is the everlasting spirit of the law, and which flows from the realization in the soul of His love in His death for us. Translate what follows, "That He might make the two (Jews and Gentiles) into one new man." Not that He might merely reconcile the two to each other, but incorporate the two, reconciled in Him to God, into one new man; the old man to which both belonged, the enemy of God, having been slain in His flesh on the cross. Observe, too, ONE new man; we are all in God's sight but one in Christ, as we are but one in Adam. [ALFORD.] making peace—primarily between all and God, secondarily between Jews and Gentiles; He being "our peace." This "peace-making" precedes its publication (v. 17). 16. Translate, "Might altogether reconcile them both in one body (the Church, Colossians 3. 15) unto God through His cross." The Greek for "reconcile" (apocatalaxe), found only here and Colossians 1. 20, expresses not only a return to favour with one (catallage), but so to lay aside enmity that complete amity follows; to pass from enmity to complete reconciliation. [TITTM.] slain the enmity—viz., that had been between man and God; and so that between Jew and Gentile which had resulted from it. By His being slain, He slew it (cf. Hebrews 2. 14). thereby—Greek, "therein;" "in" or "by the cross," i. e., His crucifixion (Colossians 2. 15). 17. Translate, "He came and announced glad tidings of peace." "He came" of His own free love and "announced peace" with His own mouth to the apostles (Luke 24. 36; John 20. 19, 21, 26); and by them to others, through His Spirit present in His Church (John 14. 18). Acts 26. 23 is strictly parallel: after His resurrection "He showed light to the people ('them that were nigh') and to the Gentiles" ("you that were afar off"), by His Spirit in His ministers (cf. 1 Peter 3. 19). and to them—The oldest MSS. insert "peace" again: "And peace to them." The repetition implies the joy with which both alike would dwell again and again upon the welcome word "peace." So Isaiah 57. 19. 18. Translate, "For it is through Him (John 14. 6; Hebrews 10. 19) that we have our access (ch. 3. 12; Romans 5. 2), both of us, in (i. e., united in, i. e., by, 1 Corinthians 12. 13, Greek) one Spirit to the Father," viz., as our common Father, reconciled to both alike; whence flows the removal of all separation between Jew and Gentile. The oneness of "the Spirit," through which we both have our access, is necessarily followed by oneness of the body, the Church (v. 16). The distinctness of persons in the Divine Trinity appears in this verse. It is also fatal to the theory of sacerdotal priests in the Gospel through whom alone the people can approach God. All alike, people and ministers, can draw nigh to God through Christ, their ever-living Priest. 19. Now, therefore—rather, "So then." [ALFORD.] foreigners—rather, "sojourners;" opposed to "members of the household," as "strangers" is to "fellow-citizens." Philippians 3. 19, 20, "conversation," Greek, "citizenship." but—The oldest MSS. add, "are." with the saints—"the commonwealth of (spiritual) Israel" (v. 12). of God—THE FATHER; as JESUS CHRIST appears in v. 20, and THE SPIRIT in v. 22. 20. Translate as Greek, "Built up upon," &c. (participle; having been built up upon; omit, therefore, "and are"). Cf. 1 Corinthians 3. 11, 12. The same image in ch. 3. 18, recurs in his address to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20. 32), and in his Epistle to Timothy at Ephesus (1 Timothy 3. 15; 2 Timothy 2. 19), naturally suggested by the splendid architecture of Diana's temple; the glory of the Christian temple is eternal and real, not mere idolatrous gaud. The image of a building is appropriate also to the Jew-Christians; as the temple at Jerusalem was the stronghold of Judaism; as Diana's temple, of Paganism. foundation of the apostles, &c.—i. e., upon their ministry and living example (cf. Matthew 16. 18) Christ Himself, the only true Foundation, was the grand subject of their ministry, and spring of their life. As one with Him and His fellow-workers, they, too, in a secondary sense, are called "foundations" (Revelation 21. 14). The "prophets" are joined with them closely; for the expression is here not "foundations of the apostles and the prophets," but "foundations of the apostles and prophets. For the doctrine of both was essentially one (1 Peter 1. 10, 11; Revelation 19. 10). The apostles take the precedency (Luke 10. 24). Thus he appropriately shows regard to the claims of the Jews and Gentiles: "the prophets" representing the old Jewish dispensation, "the apostles" the new. The "prophets" of the new also are included. BENGEL and ALFORD refer the meaning solely to these (ch. 3. 5; 4. 11). These passages imply, I think, that the New Testament prophets are not excluded; but the apostle's plain reference to Psalm 118. 22, "the head stone of the corner," proves that the Old Testament prophets are a prominent thought. David is called a "prophet" in Acts 2. 30. Cf. also Isaiah 28. 16; another prophet present to the mind of St. Paul, which prophecy leans on the earlier one of Jacob (Genesis 49. 24). The sense of the context, too, suits this: Ye were once aliens from the commonwealth of Israel (in the time of her Old Testament prophets), but now ye are members of the true Israel, built upon the foundation of her New Testament apostles and Old Testament prophets. St. Paul continually identifies his teaching with that of Israel's old prophets (Acts 28. 22; 28. 23). The costly foundation stones of the temple (1 Kings 5. 17) typified the same truth (cf. Jeremiah 51. 26). The same stone is at once the corner stone and the foundation stone on which the whole building rests. St. Paul supposes a stone or rock so large and so fashioned as to be both at once; supporting the whole as the foundation, and in part rising up at the extremities, so as to admit of the side walls meeting in it, and being united in it as the corner stone. [ZANCHIUS.] As the corner stone, it is conspicuous, as was Christ (1 Peter 2. 6), and coming in men's way may be stumbled over, as the Jews did at Christ (Matthew 21. 42; 1 Peter 2. 7). 21. In whom—as holding together the whole. fitly framed—so as exactly to fit together. groweth—"is growing" continually. Here an additional thought is added to the image; the Church has the growth of a living organism, not the mere increase of a building. Cf. 1 Peter 2. 5, "lively stones . . . built up a spiritual house." Cf. ch. 4. 16; Zechariah 6. 12, "The Branch shall build the temple of the Lord," where similarly the growth of a branch, and the building of a temple, are joined. holy—as being the "habitation of God" (v. 22). So "in the Lord" (Christ) answers to "through the Spirit" (v. 22; cf. ch. 3. 16, 17). "Christ is the inclusive Head of all the building, the element in which it has its being and now its growth." [ALFORD.] 22. are builded together—translate, "Are being builded together." through—Greek, "In the Spirit." God, by His Spirit in believers, has them for His habitation (1 Corinthians 3. 16, 17; 6. 19; 2 Corinthians 6. 16).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-21. HIS APOSTOLIC OFFICE TO MAKE KNOWN THE MYSTERY OF CHRIST REVEALED BY THE SPIRIT: PRAYER THAT BY THE SAME SPIRIT THEY MAY COMPREHEND THE VAST LOVE OF CHRIST: DOXOLOGY ENDING THIS DIVISION OF THE EPISTLE. As the first chapter treated of THE FATHER'S office; and the second, THE SON'S, so this, that of THE SPIRIT. 1. of Jesus Christ—Greek, "Christ Jesus." The office is the prominent thought in the latter arrangement; the person, in the former. He here marks the Messiahship of "Christ," maintained by him as the origin of his being a "prisoner," owing to the jealousy of the Jews being roused at his preaching it to the Gentiles. His very bonds were profitable to ("for" or "in behalf of you") Gentiles (v. 13; 2 Timothy 2. 10). He digresses at "For this cause," and does not complete the sentence which he had intended, until v. 14, where he resumes the words, "For this cause," viz., because I know this your call of God as Gentiles (ch. 2. 11-22), to be "fellow-heirs" with the Jews (v. 6), "I bow my knees to" the Father of our common Saviour (v. 14, 15) to confirm you in the faith by His Spirit. "I Paul," expresses the agent employed by the Spirit to enlighten them, after he had been first enlightened himself by the same Spirit (v. 3-5, 9). 2. The Greek does not imply doubt: "Assuming (what I know to be the fact, viz.) that ye have heard," &c. "If, as I presume," &c. The indicative in the Greek, shows that no doubt is implied: "Seeing that doubtless," &c. He by this phrase delicately reminds them of their having heard from himself, and probably from others subsequently, the fact. See Introduction, showing that these words do not disprove the address of this Epistle to the Ephesians. Cf. Acts 20. 17-24. the dispensation—"The office of dispensing, as a steward, the grace of God which was (not 'is') given me to you-ward," viz., to dispense to you. 3. he made known—The oldest MSS., &c., read, "That by revelation was the mystery (viz., of the admission of the Gentiles, v. 6; ch. 1. 9) made known unto me (Galatians 1. 12), as I wrote afore—viz., in this Epistle (ch. 1. 9, 10), the words of which he partly repeats. 4. understand my knowledge—"perceive my understanding" [ALFORD], or "intelligence." "When ye read," implies that, deep as are the mysteries of this Epistle, the way for all to understand them is to read it (2 Timothy 3. 15, 16). By perceiving his understanding of the mysteries, they, too, will be enabled to understand. the mystery of Christ—The "mystery" is Christ Himself, once hidden, but now revealed (Colossians 1. 27). 5. in other ages—Greek, "generations." not made known—He does not say, "Has not been revealed." Making known by revelation, is the source of making known by preaching. [BENGEL.] The former was vouchsafed only to the prophets, in order that they might make known the truth so revealed to men in general. unto the sons of men—men in their state by birth, as contrasted with those illuminated "by the Spirit" (Greek, "IN the Spirit," cf. Revelation 1. 10), Matthew 16. 17. as—The mystery of the call of the Gentiles (of which Paul speaks here) was not unknown to the Old Testament prophets (Isaiah 56. 6, 7; 49. 6). But they did not know it with the same explicit distinctness "as" it has been now known (Acts 10. 19, 20; 11. 18-21). They probably did not know that the Gentiles were to be admitted without circumcision, or that they were to be on a level with the Jews in partaking of the grace of God. The gift of "the Spirit" in its fulness was reserved for the New Testament, that Christ might thereby be glorified. The epithet "holy," marks the special consecration of the New Testament "prophets" (who are here meant) by the Spirit, compared with which even the Old Testament prophets were but "sons of men" (Ezekiel 2. 3, and elsewhere). 6. Translate, "That the Gentiles are," &c., "and fellow-members of the same body, and fellow-partakers of the (so the oldest MSS. read, not 'His') promise, in Christ Jesus (added in the oldest MSS.), through the Gospel." It is "in Christ Jesus" that they are made "fellow-heirs" in the inheritance of God: "of the same body" under the Head, CHRIST JESUS; and "fellow-partakers of the promise" in the communion of THE HOLY SPIRIT (ch. 1. 13; Hebrews 6. 4). The Trinity is thus alluded to, as often elsewhere in this Epistle (ch. 2. 19, 20, 22). 7. Whereof—"of which" Gospel. according to—in consequence of, and in accordance with, "the gift of the grace of God." given—"which (gift of grace) was given to me by (Greek, according to, as v. 20; ch. 1. 19: as the result of, and in proportion to) the effectual working (Greek, 'energy,' or 'in-working') of His power." 8. am—Not merely was I in times past, but I still am the least worthy of so high an office (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 15, end). least of all saints—not merely "of all apostles" (1 Corinthians 15. 9, 10). is—Greek, "has been given." among—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Translate, "To announce to the Gentiles the glad tidings of the unsearchable (Job 5. 9) riches," &c., viz., of Christ's grace (ch. 1. 7; 2. 7). Romans 11. 33, "unsearchable" as a mine inexhaustible, whose treasures can never be fully explored (v. 18, 19). 9. to make all men see—Greek, "to enlighten all" (ch. 1. 18; Psalm 18. 23; Hebrews 6. 4). "All" (cf. Colossians 1. 28). fellowship—The oldest MSS. read, "economy," or "dispensation" (cf. Colossians 1. 25, 26; and Note, ch. 1. 10, above). "To make all see how it hath seemed good to God at this time to dispense (through me and others, His stewards) what heretofore was a mystery." ELLICOTT explains it, "the arrangement," or "regulation" of the mystery (the union &

Jews and Gentiles in Christ) which was now to be humbly traced and acknowledged in the fact of its having secretly existed in the counsel of God, and now having been revealed to the heavenly powers by means of the Church. from the beginning of the world—Greek, "from (the beginning of) the ages." Cf. ch. 1. 4; Romans 16. 25; 1 Corinthians 2. 7. The "ages" are the vast successive periods of time, marked by successive stages of creation and orders of beings. in God—"hidden in" His counsels (ch. 1. 9). created all things by Jesus Christ—God's creation of the world and all things therein is the foundation of the rest of the "economy," which is freely dispensed according to the universal power of God. [BENGE.] As God created "the whole range of things" (so the Greek), physical and spiritual alike, He must have an absolute right to adjust all things as He will. Hence, we may see His right to keep the mystery of world-wide salvation in Christ "hidden in Himself," till his own good time for revealing it. The oldest MSS., &c., omit "by Jesus Christ." 10. The design of God in giving St. Paul grace to proclaim to the Gentiles the mystery of salvation heretofore hidden. now—first: opposed to "hidden from the beginning of the world" (v. 5). unto the principalities and [Greek adds "the"] powers—unto the various orders of good angels primarily, as these dwell "in the heavenly places" in the highest sense; "known" to their adoring joy (1 Timothy 3. 16; 1 Peter 1. 12). Secondly, God's wisdom in redemption is made known to evil angels, who dwell "in heavenly places" in a lower sense, viz., the air (cf. ch. 2. 2 with 6. 12); "known" to their dismay (1 Corinthians 15. 24; Colossians 2. 15). might be known—translate, "may be known." by the Church—"by means of," or "through the Church," which is the "theatre" for the display of God's manifold wisdom (Luke 15. 10; 1 Corinthians 4. 9): "a spectacle (Greek, 'theatre') to angels." Hence, angels are but our "fellow-servants" (Revelation 19. 10). manifold wisdom—though essentially one, as Christ is one, yet varying the economy in respect to places, times, and persons (Isaiah 55. 8, 9; Hebrews 1. 1). Cf. 1 Peter 4. 10, "stewards of the manifold grace of God." Man cannot understand aright its single acts, till he can survey them as a connected whole (1 Corinthians 13. 12). The call of the Church is no haphazard remedy, or afterthought, but part of the eternal scheme, which, amidst manifold varieties of dispensation, is one in its end. 11. which he purposed—Greek, "made." ELICOTT translates, "wrought." 12. Translate, "Our boldness and our access (ch. 2. 18) in confidence through our faith in Him." ALFORD quotes as an instance, Romans 8. 38, &c. "THE access" (Greek) implies the formal introduction into the presence of a monarch. 13. "I entreat you not to be dispirited." for you—in your behalf. which is—rather, "which are your glory," viz., inasmuch as showing that God loved you so much, as both to give His Son for you, and to permit His apostles to suffer "tribulations" for you [CHRYSOStOM] in preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles. Note, v. 1, "prisoner for you Gentiles." My tribulations are your spiritual "glory," as your faith is furthered thereby (1 Corinthians 4. 10). 14. For this cause—Resuming the thread of v. 1, "For this cause." Because ye have such a standing in God's Church. [ALFORD.] bow my knees—the proper attitude in humble prayer. Posture affects the mind, and is not therefore unimportant. See Paul's practice, Acts 20. 36; and that of the Lord Himself on earth (Luke 22. 41). unto the Father—The oldest MSS. omit "of our Lord Jesus Christ." But Vulgate and some very old authorities retain them: v. 15, "From whom," in either case, refers to "the Father" (Paterna), as "family" (patria, akin in sound and etymology) plainly refers to Him. Still the foundation of all sonship is in Jesus Christ. 15. the whole family—ALFORD, MIDDLETON, &c., translate, "every family:" alluding to the several families in heaven: and in earth supposed to exist (THEOPHYLACT, OECUMENIUS, &c., in SUICER, 2. 633), the apostle thus being supposed to imply that God, in his relation of Father to us His adopted children, is the great prototype of the paternal relation wherever found. But the idea that "the holy angels are bound up in spiritual families or comparternities," is nowhere else in Scripture referred to. And Acts 2. 36, where the article is similarly omitted, and yet the translation is, "All the house of Israel," shows that in New Testament Greek the translation is justifiable, "all the family," or "the whole family:" which accords with Scripture views, that angels and men, the saints militant and those with God, are one holy family joined under the one Father in Christ, the mediator between heaven and earth (ch. 1. 10; Philippians 2. 14). Hence angels are termed our "brethren" (Revelation 19. 10), and "sons of God" by creation, as we are by adoption (Job 38. 7). The Church is part of the grand family, or kingdom, which comprehends, besides men, the higher spiritual world, where the archetype, to the realization of which redeemed man is now tending, is already realized. This universal idea of the "kingdom" of God as one Divine community, is presented to us in the Lord's Prayer. By sin men were estranged, not only from God, but from that higher spiritual world in which the kingdom of God is already realized. As Christ when He reconciled men to God, united them to one another in a Divine community (joined to Himself, the one Head), breaking down the partition wall between Jew and Gentile (ch. 2. 14), so also He joins them in communion with all those who have already attained that perfection in the kingdom of God, to which the Church on earth is aspiring (Colossians 1. 20). [NEANDER.] is named—derives its origin and its name as sons of God. To be named, and to be, are one with God. To bear God's name is to belong to God as His own peculiar people (Numbers 6. 27; Isaiah 48. 7; 44. 5; Romans 9. 25, 26). 16. according to—cf., in abundance consonant to the riches of His glory; not "according to" the narrowness of our hearts. Colossians 1. 11, "Strengthened with all might according to His glorious power." by—Greek, "through:" "by means of His Spirit." in—The Greek implies "infused into." the inner man—(Ch. 4. 22, 24; 1 Peter 3. 4)—"the hidden man of the heart." Not predicated of unbelievers, whose inward and outward man alike are carnal. But in believers, the "inner (new) man," their true self, stands in contrast to their old man, which is attached to them as a body of death daily being mortified, but not their true self. 17. That—So that. dwell—abidingly make His abode (John 14. 23). Where the Spirit is there Christ is (John 14. 16, 18). by faith—Greek, "through faith," which opens the door of the heart to Jesus (John 3. 20). It is not enough that He be on the tongue, or fit through the brain: the heart is His proper seat. [CALVIN.] "You being rooted and grounded in love" (cf. v. 19), is in the Greek connected with this clause, not with the clause, "that ye may be able to comprehend." "Rooted" is an image from a tree; "grounded" (Greek, "founded," "having your foundations resting on"), from a building (cf. Note, ch. 2. 20, 21; Colossians 1. 23; 2. 7). Contrast Matthew 13. 6, 21. "Love," the first fruit of the Spirit, flowing from Christ's love realized in the soul, was to be the basis on which should rest their further comprehension of all the vastness of Christ's love. 18. May be able—even still further. Greek, "May be fully able." breadth . . . length . . . depth . . . height—viz., the full dimensions of the spiritual temple, answering to "the fulness of God" (v. 19), to which the Church, according to its capacity, ought to correspond (cf. ch. 4. 10, 13) as to "the fulness of Christ." The "breadth" implies Christ's world-wide love, embracing all men; the "length," its being extended through all ages (v. 21); the "depth," its profound wisdom which no creature can fathom (Romans 11. 33); the "height," its being beyond the reach of any foe to deprive us of (ch. 4. 8). [BENGE.] I prefer to understand "the breadth," &c., to refer to the whole of the vast mystery of free salvation in Christ for all, Gentile and Jew alike, of which he had been speaking (v. 3-9), and of which he now prays they may have a fuller comprehension. As subsidiary to this, and the most essential part of it, he adds "and to know the love of Christ" (v. 19). GROTIUS understands depth and height of God's goodness raising us from the lowest depression to the greatest height. 19. passeth—surpasseth, exceeds. The paradox "to know . . . which passeth knowledge," implies that when he says "know," he does not mean that we can adequately know; all we know is, that His love exceeds far our knowledge of it, and with even our fresh accessions of knowledge hereafter, will still exceed them. Even as God's power exceeds our thoughts (v. 20). filled with—rather, as Greek, "filled even unto all the fulness of God" (this is the grand goal), i. e., filled, each according to your capacity, with the Divine wisdom, knowledge, and love; even as God is full, and as Christ who dwells in your hearts, hath "all the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in Him bodily" (Colossians 2. 9). 20. unto him—Contrasted with ourselves and our needs. Translate, "That is able above all things (what is above all things) to do exceeding abundantly above what we ask or (even) think;" thought takes a wider range than prayers. The word above, occurs thrice as often in St. Paul's writings, as in all the rest of the New Testament, showing the warm exuberance of Paul's spirit. according to the power—the indwelling Spirit (Romans 8. 26). He appeals to their and his experience. 21. Translate, "Unto Him be the glory (i. e., the whole glory of the gracious dispensation of salvation just spoken of) in the Church (as the theatre for the manifestation of the glory, v. 10) in Christ Jesus (as in Him all the glory centres, Zechariah 6. 13) to all the generations of eternal ages," id., "of the age of the ages." Eternity is conceived as consisting of "ages" (these again consisting of "generations") endlessly succeeding one another.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-32. EXHORTATIONS TO CHRISTIAN DUTIES RESTING ON OUR CHRISTIAN PRIVILEGES, AS UNITED IN ONE BODY, THOUGH VARYING IN THE GRACES GIVEN TO THE SEVERAL MEMBERS, THAT WE MAY COME UNTO A PERFECT MAN IN CHRIST. 1. Translate, according to the Greek order, "I beseech you, therefore (seeing that such is your calling of grace, chs. 1., 2., 3. 1, 14), I the prisoner in the Lord" (i. e., imprisoned in the Lord's cause). What the world counted ignominy, he counts the highest honour, and glories in his bonds for Christ, more than a king in his diadem. [THEODORET.] His bonds, too, are an argument which should enforce his exhortation. vocation—translate, "calling" to accord, as the Greek does, with "called" (v. 4; ch. 1. 18; Romans 8. 28, 30). Colossians 3. 15 similarly grounds Christian duties on our Christian "calling." The exhortations of this part of the Epistle are built on the conscious enjoyment of the privileges mentioned in the former part. Cf. ch. 4. 32, with ch. 1. 7; 5. 1, with 1. 5; 4. 30, with 1. 13; 5. 15, with 1. 8. 2, 3. lowliness—In classic Greek, the meaning is meanness of spirit: the Gospel has elevated the word to express a Christian grace, viz., the esteeming of ourselves small, inasmuch as we are so; the thinking truly, and because truly, therefore lowly, of ourselves. [TRENCH.] meekness—that spirit in which we accept God's dealings with us without disputing and resisting; and also the accepting patiently of the injuries done us by men, out of the thought that they are permitted by God for the chastening and purifying of His people (2 Samuel 16. 11; cf. Galatians 6. 1; 2 Timothy 2. 25; Titus 3. 2). It is only the lowly, humble heart that is also meek (Colossians 3. 12). As "lowliness and meekness" answer to "forbearing one another in love" (cf. "love," v. 15, 16), so "long-suffering" answers to (v. 4) "endeavouring (Greek, 'earnestly' or 'zealously giving diligence') to keep (maintain) the unity of the Spirit (the unity between men of different tempers, which flows from the presence of the Spirit, who is Himself 'one,' v. 4) in (united in) the bond of peace" (the "bond" by which "peace" is maintained, viz., "love," Colossians 3. 14, 15 [BENGEL]; or, peace itself is the "bond" meant, uniting the members of the Church [ALFORD]). 4. In the apostle's creed, the article as to THE CHURCH properly follows that as to THE HOLY GHOST. To the Trinity naturally is annexed the Church, as the house to its tenant, to God His temple, the state to its founder [AUGUSTINE, Enchir. ad Laurentium, c. 15.] There is yet to be a Church, not merely potentially, but actually catholic or world-wide; then the Church and

the world will be coextensive. Rome falls into the extricable error by setting up a mere man as a visible head, antedating that consummation which Christ, the true visible Head, at His appearing shall first realize. As the "SPIRIT" is mentioned here, so the "LORD" (Jesus), v. 5, and "God the Father," v. 6. Thus the Trinity is again set forth. hope—here associated with "the Spirit," which is the "earnest of our inheritance" (ch. 1. 13, 14). As "faith" is mentioned, v. 5, so "hope" here and "love," v. 2. The Holy Spirit, as the common higher principle of life (ch. 2. 18, 22), gives to the Church its true unity. Outward uniformity is as yet unattainable; but beginning by having one mind, we shall hereafter end by having "one body." The true "body" of Christ (all believers of every age) is already "one," as joined to the one Head. But its unity is as yet not visible, even as the Head is not visible; but it shall appear when He shall appear (John 17. 21-23; Colossians 3. 4). Meanwhile the rule is, "In essentials, unity; in doubtful questions, liberty; in all things, charity." There is more real unity where both go to heaven under different names, than when with the same name one goes to heaven, the other to hell. Truth is the first thing; those who reach it, will at last reach unity, because truth is one; whilst those who seek unity as the first thing, may purchase it at the sacrifice of truth, and so of the soul itself. of your calling—the one "hope" flowing from our "calling," is the element "IN" which we are "called" to live. Instead of privileged classes, as the Jews under the law, a unity of dispensation was henceforth to be the common privilege of Jew and Gentile alike. Spirituality, universality, and unity, were designed to characterize the Church; and it shall be so at last (Isaiah 2. 2-4; 11. 9, 13; Zephaniah 3. 9; Zechariah 14. 9). 5. Similarly "faith" and "baptism" (the sacramental seal of faith) are connected Mark 16. 16; Colossians 2. 12). Cf. 1 Corinthians 12. 13, "Faith" is not here that which we believe, but the act of believing, the mean by which we apprehend the "one Lord." "Baptism" is specified, being the sacrament whereby we are incorporated into the "one body." Not the Lord's Supper, which is an act of matured communion on the part of those already incorporate, "a symbol of union, not of unity." [ELICOTT.] In 1 Corinthians 10. 17, where a breach of union was in question, it forms the rallying point. [ALFORD.] There is not added, "One pope, one council, one form of government." [Cautions for Times.] The Church is one in unity of faith (v. 5; Jude 3); unity of origination (ch. 2. 19-21); unity of sacraments (v. 5; 1 Corinthians 10. 17; 12. 13); unity of "hope" (v. 4; Titus 1. 2); unity of charity (v. 3); unity (not uniformity) of discipline and government: for where there is no order, no ministry with Christ as the Head, there is no Church. [PEARSON, Creed, Article 9.] 6. above—"over all." The "one God over all" (in His sovereignty and by His grace) is the grand source and crowning apex of unity (ch. 2. 19, end). through all—by means of Christ "who filleth all things" (v. 10; ch. 2. 20, 21), and is "a propitiation" for all men (1 John 2. 2). in you all—The oldest MSS. omit "you." Many of the oldest versions and fathers and old MSS. read, "in us all." Whether the pronoun be read or not, it must be understood (either from the "ye," v. 4, or from the "us," v. 7); for other parts of Scripture prove that the Spirit is not "in all" men, but only in believers (Romans 8. 9, 14). God is "Father" both by generation (as Creator) and regeneration (ch. 2. 10; James 1. 17, 18; 1 John 5. 1). 7. But—Though "one" in our common connection with "one Lord, one faith, &c., one God," yet "each one of us" has assigned to him his own particular gift, to be used for the good of the whole: none is overlooked; none therefore can be dispensed with for the edifying of the Church (v. 12). A motive to unity (v. 3). Translate, "Unto each one of us was the grace (which was bestowed by Christ at His ascension, v. 8) given according to," &c. the measure—the amount "of the gift of Christ" (Romans 12. 3, 6). 8. Wherefore—"For which reason," viz., in order to intimate that Christ, the Head of the Church, is the author of all these different gifts, and that giving of them is an act of His "grace." [ESTIUS.] he saith—God, whose word the Scripture is (Psalm 68. 18)

When he ascended—God is meant in the Psalm, represented by the ark, which was being brought up to Zion in triumph by David, after that "the Lord had given him rest round about from all his enemies" (2 Samuel 6.; 7. 1; 1 Chronicles 15). St. Paul quotes it of Christ ascending to heaven, who is therefore God. captivity—i. e., a band of captives. In the Psalm, the captive foes of David. In the antitypical meaning, the foes of Christ the Son of David, the devil, death, the curse, and sin (Colossians 2. 15; 2 Peter 2. 4), led as it were in triumphal procession as a sign of the destruction of the foe. gave gifts unto men—In the Psalm, "Received gifts for men," Hebrew, "among men," i. e., Thou hast received gifts to distribute among men. As a conqueror distributes in token of his triumph the spoils of foes as donatives among his people. The impartation of the gifts and graces of the Spirit depended on Christ's ascension (John 7. 39; 14. 12). St. Paul stops short in the middle of the verse, and does not quote "that the Lord God might dwell among them." This, it is true, is partly fulfilled in Christians being an "habitation of God through the Spirit" (ch. 2. 22). But the Psalm (v. 16) refers to "the Lord dwelling in Zion for ever;" the ascension amidst attendant angels, having as its counterpart the second advent amidst "thousands of angels" (v. 17), accompanied by the restoration of Israel (v. 22), the destruction of God's enemies and the resurrection (v. 20, 21, 23), the conversion of the kingdoms of the world to the Lord at Jerusalem (v. 29-34). 9. St. Paul reasons that (assuming Him to be God) His ascension implies a previous descent; and that the language of the Psalm can only refer to Christ, who first descended, then ascended. For God the Father does not ascend or descend. Yet the Psalm plainly refers to God (v. 8, 17, 18). It must therefore be GOD THE SON (John 6. 33, 62). As He declares (John 3. 13), "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but He that came down from heaven." Others, though they did not previously descend, have ascended; but none save Christ can be referred to in the Psalm as having done so; for it is of God it speaks. lower parts of the earth—The antithesis or contrast to "far above all heavens," is the argument of ALFORD, &c., to show that this phrase means more than simply the earth, viz., the regions beneath it, even as He ascended not merely to the visible heavens, but "far above" them. Moreover, His design "that He might fill all things" (v. 10, Greek, "the whole universe of things"), may imply the same. But see Note on those words. Also the leading "captive" of the "captive band" ("captivity") of satanic powers, may imply that the warfare reached to their habitation itself (Psalm 63. 9). Christ, as Lord of all, took possession first of the earth and the unseen world beneath it (some conjecture that the region of the lost is in the central parts of our globe), then of heaven (Acts 2. 27, 28). However, all we surely know is, that His soul at death descended to Hades, i. e., underwent the ordinary condition of departed spirits of men. The leading captive of satanic powers here, is not said to be at His descent, but at His ascension; so that no argument can be drawn from it for a descent to the abodes of Satan. Acts 2. 27, 28, and Romans 10. 7, favour the view of the reference being simply to His descent to Hades. So PEARSON on Creed (Philippians 2. 10). 10. all heavens—Greek, "all the heavens" (Hebrews 7. 28; 4. 14), Greek, "passed through the heavens" to the throne of God itself. might fill—In Greek, the action is continued to the present time, both "might" and "may fill," viz., with His Divine presence and Spirit, not with His glorified body. "Christ, as God, is present everywhere; as glorified man, He can be present anywhere." [ELLICOTT.] 11. Greek, emphatical. "Himself" by His supreme power. "It is He that gave," &c. gave some, apostles—translate, ". . . some to be apostles, and some to be prophets," &c. The men who filled the office, no less than the office itself, were a Divine gift. [EADIE.] Ministers did not give themselves. Cf. with the list here, 1 Corinthians 12. 10, 28. As the apostles, prophets, and evangelists, were special and extraordinary ministers; so "pastors and teachers" are the ordinary stated ministers of a particular flock, including, probably, the bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Evangelists were itinerant preachers like our missionaries, as Philip the deacon (Acts 21. 8); as contrasted with stationary "pastors and teachers" (2 Timothy 4. 5). The evangelist founded the Church; the teacher built it up in the faith already received. The "pastor" had the outward rule and guidance of the Church: the bishop. As to revelation, the evangelist testified infallibly of the past; the prophet, infallibly of the future. The prophet derived all from the Spirit; the evangelist, in the special case of the Four, recorded matter of fact, cognizable to the senses, under the Spirit's guidance. No one form of Church polity as permanently unalterable is laid down in the New Testament, though the apostolical order of bishops, or presbyters, and deacons, superintended by higher overseers (called bishops after the apostolic times), has the highest sanction of primitive usage. In the case of the Jews, a fixed model of hierarchy and ceremonial unalterably bound the people, most minutely detailed in the law. In the New Testament, the absence of minute directions for Church government and ceremonies, shows that a fixed model was not designed; the general rule is obligatory as to ceremonies, "Let all things be done decently and in order" (cf. Article 34, Church of England); and that a succession of ministers be provided, not self-called, but "called to the work by men who have public authority given unto them in the congregation, to call and send ministers into the Lord's vineyard" (Article 23). That the "pastors" here were the bishops and presbyters of the Church, is evident from Acts 20. 28; 1 Peter 5. 1, 2, where the bishops' and presbyters' office is said to be "to feed" the flock. The term "shepherd," or "pastor," is used of guiding and governing and not merely instructing, whence it is applied to kings, rather than prophets or priests (Ezekiel 34. 23; Jeremiah 23. 4). Cf. the names of princes compounded of Pharnas, Hebrew, "pastor," Holo-phernes, Tissa-phernes (cf. Isaiah 44. 28). 12. For—with a view to; the ultimate aim. "Unto." perfecting—The Greek implies correcting in all that is deficient, instructing and completing in number and all parts. for—a different Greek word; the immediate object. Cf. Romans 15. 2, "Let every one . . . please his neighbour for his good unto edification." the ministry—Greek, "ministration;" without the article. The office of the ministry is stated in this verse. The good aimed at in respect to the Church (v. 13). The way of growth (v. 14, 15, 16). edifying—i. e., building up as the temple of the Holy Ghost. 13. come in—rather, "attain unto." ALFORD expresses the Greek order, "Until we arrive all of us at the unity," &c. faith and . . . knowledge—Full unity of faith is then found, when all alike thoroughly know Christ, the object of faith, and that in His highest dignity as "the Son of God" [DE WETTE] (ch. 3. 17, 19; 2 Peter 1. 5). Not even St. Paul counted himself to have fully "attained" (Philippians 3. 12-14). Amidst the variety of the gifts and the multitude of the Church's members, its "faith" is to be ONE: as contrasted with the state of "children carried about with EVERY WIND OF DOCTRINE" (v. 14). perfect man—unto the "full-grown man" (1 Corinthians 2. 6; Philippians 3. 15; Hebrews 5. 14); the maturity of an adult; contrasted with children (v. 14). Not "perfect men;" for the many members constitute but one Church joined to the one Christ. stature, &c.—The standard of spiritual "stature" is "the fulness of Christ," i. e., which Christ has (ch. 1. 23; 3. 19; cf. Galatians 4. 19); that the body should be worthy of the Head, the perfect Christ. 14. Translate "To the end that;" the aim of the bestowal of gifts stated negatively, as in v. 13 it is stated positively. tossed to and fro—inwardly, even without wind; like billows of the sea. So the Greek. Cf. James 1. 6. carried about—with every wind from without. doctrine—"teaching." The various teachings are the "winds" which keep them tossed on a sea of doubts (Hebrews 13. 9; cf. Matthew 11. 7). by—Greek, "in;" expressing "the evil atmosphere in which the varying currents of doctrine exert their force." [ELLICOTT.] sleight—lit., "dice-playing." The player frames his throws of the dice so that the number may turn up which best suit his purpose. of men—Contrasted with Christ (v. 13). and—Greek, "in" cunning craft-

a as, whereby they lie in wait to deceive—translate as εἰς, “craftiness tending to the methodized system of deceit” (“the schemes of error”). [ALFORD.] BENGE takes “deceit,” or “error,” to stand for “the parent of error,” Satan (cf. ch. 6. 11); referring to his concealed mode of acting. 15. speaking the truth—translate, “holding the truth;” “following the truth;” opposed to “error” or “deceit” (v. 14). in love—“Truth” is never to be sacrificed to so-called “charity;” yet it is to be maintained in charity. Truth in word and act, love in manner and spirit, are the Christian’s rule (cf. v. 21, 24). grow up—From the state of “children” to that of “full-grown men.” There is growth only in the spiritually alive, not in the dead. into him—so as to be more and more incorporated with Him, and become one with Him. the head—(Ch. 1. 22.) 16. (Colossians 2. 19.) fitly joined together—“being fitly framed together,” as in ch. 2. 21; all the parts being in their proper position, and in mutual relation. compact—Implying firm consolidation, by that which every joint supplieth—Greek, “By means of every joint of the supply;” joined with “maketh increase of the body,” not with “compact.” “By every ministering (supplying) joint.” The joints are the points of union where the supply passes to the different members, furnishing the body with the materials of its growth. effectual working—(Ch. 1. 19; 3. 7.) According to the effectual working of grace in each member (or else, rather, “according to each several member’s working”), proportioned to the measure of its need of supply. every part—Greek, “each one part;” each individual part. maketh increase—translate, as the Greek is the same as v. 15, “maketh (carrieth on) the growth of the body.” 17. therefore—Resuming the exhortation which he had begun with, “I therefore beseech you that ye walk worthy,” &c. (v. 1). henceforth . . . not—Greek, “no longer;” resumed from v. 14. testify in the Lord—in whom (as our element) we do all things pertaining to the ministry (1 Thessalonians 4. 1 [ALFORD]; Romans 9. 1). other—Greek, “the rest of the Gentiles.” in the vanity, &c.—as their element: opposed to “in the Lord.” “Vanity of mind” is the waste of the rational powers on worthless objects, of which idolatry is one of the more glaring instances. The root of it is departure from the knowledge of the true God (v. 18, 19; Romans 1. 21; 1 Thessalonians 4. 5). 18. More lit., “Being darkened in their understanding,” i. e., their intelligence, or perceptions (cf. ch. 5. 3; Acts 26. 18; 1 Thessalonians 5. 4, 5). alienated—This and “darkened,” imply that before the fall they (in the person of their first father) had been partakers of life and light: and that they had revolted from the primitive revelation (cf. ch. 2. 12). life of God—that life whereby God lives in his own people; as He was the life and light in Adam before the irruption of death and darkness into human nature; and as He is the life in the regenerate (Galatians 2. 20). “Spiritual life in believers is kindled from the life itself of God.” [BENGE.] through—rather as Greek, “on account of the ignorance,” viz., of God. Willful ignorance in the first instance, their fathers not choosing to retain God in their knowledge.” This is the beginning point of their misery (Acts 17. 30; Romans 1. 21, 23, 28; 1 Peter 1. 14). because of—“on account of.” blindness—Greek, “hardness,” lit., the hardening of the skin so as not to be sensible of touch. Hence a soul’s callousness to feeling (Mark 3. 5). Where there is spiritual “life” (“the life of God”) there is feeling; where there is not, there is “hardness.” 19. past feeling—senseless, shameless, hopeless; the ultimate result of a long process of “hardening,” or habit of sin (v. 18). “Being past hope,” or despairing, is the reading of the Vulgate; though not so well supported as English Version reading, “past feeling,” which includes the absence of hope (Jeremiah 2. 25; 18. 12). given themselves over—In Romans 1. 24 it is, “God gave them up to uncleanness.” Their giving themselves to it was punished in kind, God giving them up to it by withdrawing his preventing grace; their sin thus was made their punishment. They gave themselves up of their own accord to the slavery of their lust, to do all its pleasure, as captives who have ceased to strive with the foe. God save them ~~as to it~~ but not against their will;

for they give themselves up to it. [ZAKORIUM] lasciviousness—“wantonness.” [ALFORD.] So it is translated, Romans 13. 13; 2 Peter 2. 18. It does not necessarily include lasciviousness; but it means intemperate, reckless readiness for it, and for every self-indulgence. “The first beginnings of unchastity.” [GROTIUS.] “Lawless insolence, and wanton caprice.” [TRENCH.] to work all uncleanness—The Greek implies, “with a deliberate view to the working (as if it were their work or business, not a mere accidental fall into sin) of uncleanness of every kind.” with greediness—Greek, “in greediness.” Uncleanness and greediness of gain often go hand in hand (ch. 5. 3, 5; Colossians 3. 5); though “greediness” here includes all kinds of self-seeking. 20. learned Christ (Philippians 3. 10). To know Christ Himself, is the great lesson of the Christian life: this the Ephesians began to learn at their conversion. “Christ,” in reference to His office, is here specified as the object of learning. “Jesus,” in the following verse, as the person. 21. If so be that—Not implying doubt; assuming what I have no reason to doubt, that, &c. heard him—The Him is emphatic: heard Himself, not merely heard about Him. taught by him—Greek, “taught IN HIM,” i. e., being in vital union with Him (Romans 16. 7). as the truth is, &c.—translate in connection with “taught;” “And in Him have been taught, according as is truth in Jesus.” There is no article in the Greek. “Truth” is therefore used in the most comprehensive sense, truth in its essence, and highest perfection, in Jesus; “if according as it is thus in Him, ye have been so taught in Him;” in contrast to “the vanity of mind of the Gentiles” (v. 17; cf. John 1. 14, 17; 18. 37). Contrast John 8. 44. 22. That ye—Following “Ye have been taught” (v. 21). concerning the former conversation—“in respect to your former way of life.” the old man—your old unconverted nature (Romans 6. 6). is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts—rather, “which is being corrupted (‘perisheth,’ cf. Galatians 6. 8, ‘corruption,’ i. e., destruction) according to (i. e., as might be expected from) the lusts of deceit.” Deceit is personified lusts are its servants and tools. In contrast to “the holiness of the truth,” v. 24, and “truth in Jesus,” v. 21; and answering to Gentile “vanity,” v. 17. Corruption and destruction are inseparably associated together. The man’s old-nature-lusts are his own executioners, fitting him more and more for eternal corruption and death. 23. be renewed—The Greek (ananeousthai) implies “the continued renewal in the youth of the new man.” A different Greek word (anakainousthai) implies “renewal from the old state.” in the spirit of your mind—As there is no Greek for “in,” which there is at v. 17, “in the vanity of their mind,” it is better to translate, “By the Spirit of your mind,” i. e., by your new spiritual nature; the restored and divinely-informed leading principle of the mind. The “spirit” of man in New Testament, is only then used in its proper sense, as worthy of its place and governing functions, when it is one spirit with the Lord. The natural, or animal man, is described as “not having the Spirit” (Jude 19). [ALFORD.] Spirit is not in this sense attributed to the unregenerate (1 Thessalonians 5. 23). 24. put on the new man—Opposed to “the old man,” which is to be “put off” (v. 22). The Greek here (kainon) is different from that for “re-new-ed” (v. 25). Put on not merely a renovated nature, but a new, i. e., altogether different nature, a changed nature (cf. Colossians 3. 10, note). after God, &c.—translate, “Which hath been created (once for all: so the Greek aorist means: in Christ, ch. 2. 10; so that in each believer it has not to be created again, but to be put on) after (the image of) God” (Genesis 1. 27; Colossians 3. 10; 1 Peter 1. 15), &c. God’s image in which the first Adam was originally created, is restored to us far more gloriously in the second Adam, the image of the invisible God (2 Corinthians 4. 4; Colossians 1. 15; Hebrews 1. 3). in righteousness—“IN” it as the element of the renewed man. true holiness—rather, as the Greek, “holiness of the truth;” holiness flowing from sincere following of “the truth of God” (Romans 1. 25. 3. 7, 15. 8): opposed to “the lusts of deceit” (Greek, v. 23); cf. also v. 21, “truth is in Jesus.” “Righteousness” is in reation to our fellow-men, the second table of the law; "Holiness," in relation to God, the first table; the religious observance of offices of piety (cf. Luke 1. 75). In the parallel (Colossians 3. 10) it is, "renewed in knowledge after the image," &c. As at Colosse the danger was from false pretenders to knowledge, the true "knowledge" which flows from renewal of the heart is dwelt on; so at Ephesus, the danger being from the corrupt morals prevalent around, the renewal in "holiness," contrasted with the Gentile "uncleanness" (v. 19), and "righteousness," in contrast to "greediness," is made prominent.

25. Wherefore—From the general character of "the new man," there will necessarily result the particular features which he now details. putting away—Greek, "having put away" once for all. lying—"falsehood;" the abstract. "Speak ye truth each one with his neighbour," is quoted, slightly changed, from Zechariah 8. 16. For "to," he quotes it "with," to mark our inner connection with one another, as "members one of another." [STIER.] Not merely members of one body. Union to one another in Christ, not merely the external command, instinctively leads Christians to fulfil mutual duties. One member could not injure or deceive another, without injuring himself, as all have a mutual and common interest. 26. Be ye angry and sin not—So the LXX., Psalm 4. 4. Should circumstances arise to call for anger on your part, let it be as Christ's "anger" (Mark 3. 5), without sin. Our natural feelings are not wrong when directed to their legitimate object, and when not exceeding due bounds. As in the future literal, so in the present spiritual, resurrection, no essential constituent is annihilated, but all that is a perversion of the original design is removed. Thus indignation at dishonour done to God, and wrong to man, is justifiable anger. Passion is sinful (derived from "passio," suffering: implying that amidst seeming energy, a man is really passive, the slave of his anger, instead of ruling it). let not the sun go down upon your wrath—"wrath" is absolutely forbidden; "anger" not so, though, like poison sometimes used as medicine, it is to be used with extreme caution. The sense is not, Your anger shall not be imputed to you if you put it away before nightfall; but "let no wrath (i. e., as the Greek, personal 'irritation' or 'exasperation') mingle with your 'anger,' even though the latter be righteous." [TRENCH, Synonyms.] "Put it away before sunset" (when the Jewish day began), is proverbial for put it away at once before another day begin (Deuteronomy 24. 15); also before you part with your brother for the night, perhaps never in this world to meet again. So JONA, "Let not night and anger against any one sleep with you, but go and conciliate the other party, though he have been the first to commit the offence." Let not your "anger" at another's wickedness verge into hatred, or contempt, or revenge. [VATABLUS.] 27. Neither give place—i. e., occasion, or scope, to the devil, by continuing in "wrath." The keeping of anger through the darkness of night, is giving place to the devil, the prince of darkness (ch. 6. 12). 28. Greek, "Let him that stealeth." The imperfect or past tense is, however, mainly meant, though not to the exclusion of the present. "Let the stealing person steal no more." Bandits frequented the mountains near Ephesus. Such are meant by those called "thieves" in the New Testament. but rather—For it is not enough to cease from a sin, but the sinner must also enter on the path that is its very opposite. [CHRYSOSTOM.] The stealer, when repentant, should labour more than he would be called on to do, if he had never stolen. let him labour—Theft and idleness go together. the thing which is good—in contrast with theft, the thing which was evil in his past character. with his hands—in contrast with his former thievish use of his hands. that he may have to give—"that he may have wherewith to impart." He who has stolen should exercise liberality beyond the restitution of what he has taken. Christians in general should make not selfish gain their aim in honest industry, but the acquisition of the means of greater usefulness to their fellow-men and the being independent of the aims of others. So St. Paul himself (Acts 20. 35; 2 Thessalonians 3. 8) acted as he taught (1 Thessalonians 4. 11). 29. corrupt—lit., "insipid," without "the salt of grace" (Colossians 4. 6), so worthless and then becoming corrupt: included in "foolish talking" (ch. 5. 4). Its opposite is "that which is good to edifying." that which, &c.—Greek, "whatever is good." use of edifying—lit. "for edifying of the need," i. e., for edifying where it is needed. Seasonably edifying; according as the occasion and present needs of the hearers require, now censure, at another time consolation. Even words good in themselves must be introduced seasonably, lest by our fault they prove injurious instead of useful. FRENCH explains, Not vague generalities, which would suit a thousand other cases equally well, and probably equally ill: our words should be as nails fastened in a sure place, words suiting the present time and the present person, being "for the edifying of the occasion" (Colossians 4. 6). communication—language. minister—Greek, "give." The word spoken "gives grace to the hearers" when God uses it as His instrument for that purpose. 30. grieve not—A condescension to human modes of thought most touching. Cf. "vexed His Holy Spirit" (Isaiah 63. 10; Psalm 78. 40); "fretted me" (Ezekiel 16. 43: implying His tender love to us); and of hardened unbelievers, "resist the Holy Ghost" (Acts 7. 51). This verse refers to believers, who grieve the Spirit by inconsistencies such as in the context are spoken of, corrupt or worthless conversation, &c. whereby ye are sealed—rather, "wherein (or 'in whom') ye were sealed." As in ch. 1. 13, believers are said to be sealed "in Christ," so here "in the Holy Spirit," who is one with Christ, and who reveals Christ in the soul: the Greek implies that the sealing was done already once for all. It is the Father "BY" whom believers, as well as the Son Himself, were sealed (John 6. 27). The Spirit is represented as itself the seal (ch. 1. 13, where see, for the image employed, the Note). Here the Spirit is the element IN which the believer is sealed, His gracious influences being the seal itself. unto—kept safely against the day of redemption, viz., of the completion of redemption in the deliverance of the body as well as the soul from all sin and sorrow (ch. 1. 14; Luke 21. 28; Romans 8. 23). 31. bitterness—both of spirit and of speech: opposed to "kind." wrath—passion for a time: opposed to "tender-hearted." Whence BENGEL translates for "wrath," harshness. anger—lasting resentment: opposed to "forgiving one another." clamour—compared by CHRYSOSTOM to a horse carrying anger for its rider: "bridle the horse, and you dismount its rider." "Bitterness" begets "wrath;" "wrath," "anger;" "anger," "clamour;" and "clamour," the more chronic "evil-speaking," slander, insinuations, and surmises of evil. "Malice" is the secret root of all: "fires fed within, and not appearing to bystanders from without, are the most formidable." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 32. (Luke 7. 42; Colossians 3. 12.) even as—God hath shown Himself "kind, tender-hearted, and forgiving to you;" it is but just that you in turn shall be so to your fellow-men, who have not erred against you in the degree that you have erred against God (Matthew 18. 33). God for Christ's sake—rather as Greek, "God in Christ" (2 Corinthians 5. 19). It is in Christ that God vouchsafes forgiveness to us. It cost God the death of His Son, as man, to forgive us. It costs us nothing to forgive our fellow-man. hath forgiven—rather as Greek, "forgave you." God has, once for all, forgiven sin in Christ, as a past historical fact.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-33. EXHORTATIONS TO LOVE; AND AGAINST CARNAL LUSTS AND COMMUNICATIONS. CIRCUMSPECTION IN WALK: REDEEMING THE TIME: BEING FILLED WITH THE SPIRIT: SINGING TO THE LORD WITH THANKFULNESS. THE WIFE'S DUTY TO THE HUSBAND RESTS ON THAT OF THE CHURCH TO CHRIST. 1. therefore—seeing that "God in Christ forgave you" (ch. 4. 32). followers—Greek, "imitators" of God, in respect to "love" (v. 2). God's essential character (1 John 4. 16). as dear children—Greek, "as children beloved;" to which v. 2 refers, "As CHILDREN

also loved us' (1 John 4. 19). "We are sons of men, when we do ill; sons of God, when we do well." [AUGUSTINE, Psalm 52.] (cf. Matthew 5. 44, 45, 48). Sonship infers an absolute necessity of imitation, it being vain to assume the title of son without any similitude of the Father. [PEARSON.] 2. And—In proof that you are so. walk—Resuming ch. 4. 1, "walk worthy of the vocation," &c. as Christ . . . loved us—From the love of the Father he passes to the love of the Son, in whom God most endearingly manifests His love to us. given himself for us—Greek, "given himself up (viz., to death, Galatians 2. 20) for us." i. e., in our behalf: not here vicarious substitution, though that is indirectly implied "in our stead." The offerer, and the offering that He offered, were one and the same (John 15. 13; Romans 5. 8). offering and sacrifice—"Offering" expresses generally His presenting Himself to the Father, as the Representative undertaking the cause of the whole of our lost race (Psalm 40. 6-8), including His life of obedience; though not excluding His offering of His body for us (Hebrews 10. 10). It is usually an unbloody offering, in the more limited sense. "Sacrifice" refers to His death for us exclusively. Christ is here, in reference to Psalm 40. 6 (quoted again in Hebrews 10. 5), represented as the antitype of all the offerings of the law, whether the unbloody or bloody, eucharistical or propitiatory. for a sweet-smelling savour—Greek, "for an odour of a sweet smell," i. e., God is well pleased with the offering on the ground of its sweetness, and so is reconciled to us (ch. 1. 6; Matthew 3. 17; 2 Corinthians 5. 18, 19; Hebrews 10. 6-17). The ointment compounded of principal spices, poured upon Aaron's head, answers to the variety of the graces by which He was enabled to "offer Himself a sacrifice for a sweet-smelling savour." Another type, or prophecy by figure, was "the sweet savour" (savour of rest, Margin) which God smelled in Noah's sacrifice (Genesis 8. 21). Again, as what Christ is, believers also are (1 John 4. 17), and ministers are: St. Paul says (2 Corinthians 2. 17) "we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ." 3. once named—Greek, "Let it not be even named" (v. 4. 12). "Uncleanness" and "covetousness" are taken up again from ch. 4. 19. The two are so closely allied that the Greek for "covetousness" (pleonexia) is used sometimes in Scripture, and often in the Greek fathers, for sins of impurity. The common principle is the longing to fill one's desire with material objects of sense, outside of God. The expression, "not be even named," applies better to impurity, than to "covetousness." 4. filthiness—obscenity in act or gesture. foolish talking—the talk of fools, which is folly and sin together. The Greek of it, and of "filthiness," occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. nor—rather, "or" (cf. v. 3). jesting—Greek, "eutrapelia:" found nowhere else in the New Testament: implying strictly that versatility which turns about and adapts itself, without regard to principle, to the shifting circumstances of the moment, and to the varying moods of those with whom it may deal. Not scurrile buffoonery, but refined "persiflage" and "badinage," for which Ephesus was famed (PLAUTUS, Miles Gloriosus, 3. 1, 42-52), and which, so far from being censured, was and is thought by the world a pleasant accomplishment. In Colossians 3. 8, "filthy communication" refers to the foulness; "foolish talking," to the folly; "jesting," to the false refinement [and trifling witticism, TITTMANN] of discourse unseasoned with the salt of grace. [TRENCH.] not conveniently—"unseemly;" not such "as become saints" (v. 3). rather giving of thanks—A happy play on sounds in Greek, eucharistia contrasted with eutrapelia; refined "jesting" and subtle humour sometimes offend the tender feelings of grace; "giving of thanks" gives that real cheerfulness of spirit to believers which the worldly try to get from "jesting" (v. 19, 20; James 5. 13). 5. this ye know—The oldest MSS. read, "(O) this ye are sure knowing;" or as ALFORD, "This ye know being aware." covetous . . . idolater—(Colossians 3. 5.) The best reading may be translated, "That is to say, idolater, which is (in other words) an idolater. St. Paul himself had forsaken all for Christ (2 Corinthians 6. 10; 11. 27). Covetousness is worship of the creature instead of the

Creator, the highest treason against the King of kings (1 Samuel 15. 23; Matthew 6. 24; Philippians 3. 19; 1 John 2. 15). hath—The present impiles the fixedness of the excision, grounded on the eternal verities of that kingdom. [ALFORD.] of Christ and of God—rather, as one Greek article is applied to both, "of Christ and God," implying their perfect oneness, which is consistent only with the doctrine that Christ is God (cf. 2 Thessalonians 1. 12; 1 Timothy 5. 21; 6. 18). 6. vain—empty, unreal words, viz., palliations of "uncleanness," v. 3, 4; Isaiah 5. 20 (that it is natural to indulge in love), "covetousness" (that it is useful to society that men should pursue gain), and "jesting" (that it is witty and clever, and that God will not so severely punish for such things). because of these things—uncleanness, covetousness, &c. (v. 3-5). cometh—present, not merely "shall come." Is as sure as if already come. children—rather, "sons of disobedience" (ch. 2. 2, 3). The children of unbelief in doctrine (Deuteronomy 32. 20) are "children of disobedience" in practice, and these again are "children of wrath." 7. Here fellowship with wicked workers is forbidden; in v. 11, with their wicked works. 8. sometimes—"once." The emphasis is on "were." Ye ought to have no fellowship with sin, which is darkness, for your state as darkness is now PAST. Stronger than "in darkness" (Romans 2. 19). light—not merely "enlightened;" but light enlightening others (v. 13). in—in union with the Lord, who is THE LIGHT. children of light—not merely "of the light;" just as "children of disobedience" is used on the opposite side; those whose distinguishing characteristic is light. PLINY, a heathen writing to Trajan, bears unwilling testimony to the extraordinary purity of Christians' lives, contrasted with the people around them. 9. fruit of the Spirit—taken by transcribers from Galatians 5. 22. The true reading is that of the oldest MSS., &c., "The fruit of THE LIGHT;" in contrast with "the unfruitful works of darkness" (v. 11). This verse is parenthetical. Walk as children of light, i. e., in all good works and words, "FOR the fruit of the light is [borne] in [ALFORD; but BENGEL, 'consists in'] all goodness [opposed to 'malice,' ch. 4. 31], righteousness [opposed to 'covetousness,' v. 3] and truth" [opposed to "lying," ch. 4. 25]. 10. Proving—construed with "walk" (v. 8; Romans 12. 1, 2). As we prove a coin by the eye and the ear, and by using it, so by accurate and continued study, and above all by practice and experimental trial, we may prove or test "what is acceptable unto the Lord." This is the office of "light," of which believers are "children," to manifest what each thing is, whether slightly or unsightly. 11. unfruitful works of darkness—Sins are terminated in themselves, and therefore are called "works," not "fruits" (Galatians 5. 19, 22). Their only fruit is that which is not in a true sense fruit (Deuteronomy 32. 32), viz., "death" (Romans 6. 21; Galatians 6. 8). Plants cannot bear "fruit" in the absence of light. Sin is "darkness," and its parent is the prince of darkness (ch. 6. 12). Graces, on the other hand, as flourishing in "the light," are reproductive, and abound in fruits; which, as harmoniously combining in one whole, are termed (in the singular) "the FRUIT of the Spirit" (v. 9). rather, &c.—translate as Greek, "Rather even reprove them" (cf. Matthew 5. 14-16). Not only "have no fellowship, but even reprove them," viz., in words, and in your deeds, which, shining with "the light," virtually reprove all that is contrary to light (v. 13; John 3. 19-21). "Have no fellowship," does not imply that we can avoid all intercourse (1 Corinthians 5. 10), but "avoid such fellowship as will defile yourselves;" just as light, though it touch filth, is not soiled by it; nay, as light detects it, so, "even reprove sin." 12. The Greek order is, "For the things done in secret by them, it is a shame even to speak of." The "for" gives his reason for "not naming" (cf. v. 3) in detail the works of darkness, whereas he describes definitely (v. 9) "the fruit of the light." [BENGEL.] "Speak of," I think, is used here as "speaking of without reproof," in contrast to "even reprove them." Thus the "for" expresses this, Reprove them, for to speak of them without reproofing them, is a shame (v. 3). Thus "works of darkness" answers to "things done in secret." 13. that are reprov- rather, "when they are reprov'd," viz., by you (v. 11). whatsoever doth make manifest—rather, "everything that is (i. e., suffers itself to be) made manifest (or 'shone upon,' viz., by your 'reproving,' v. 11) is (thenceforth no longer 'darkness,' v. 8, but) light." The devil and the wicked will not suffer themselves to be made manifest by the light, but love darkness, though outwardly the light shines round them. Therefore, "light" has no transforming effect on them, so that they do not become light (John 3. 19, 20). But, says the apostle, you being now light yourselves (v. 8), by bringing to light through reproof those who are in darkness, will convert them to light. Your consistent lives and faithful reproofs will be your "armour of light" (Romans 13. 12) in making an inroad on the kingdom of darkness. 14. Wherefore—Referring to the whole foregoing argument (v. 8, 11, 13). Seeing that light (spiritual) dispels the pre-existing darkness, He (God) saith, &c. (cf. the same phrase, ch. 4. 8). Awake—The reading of all the oldest MSS. is, "Up!" or "Rouse thee!" a phrase used in stirring men to activity. The words are a paraphrase of Isaiah 60. 1, 2, not an exact quotation. The word "Christ," shows that in quoting the prophecy, he views it in the light thrown on it by its Gospel fulfilment. As Israel is called on to "awake" from its previous state of "darkness" and "death" (Isaiah 59. 10; 60. 2), for that her Light is come; so the Church, and each individual is similarly called to awake. Believers are called on to "awake" out of sleep; unbelievers, to "arise" from the dead (cf. Matthew 25. 5; Romans 13. 11; 1 Thessalonians 5. 6, with ch. 2. 1). Christ—"the true light," "the Sun of righteousness." give thee light—rather, as Greek, "Shall shine upon thee" (so enabling thee by being "made manifest" to become, and be, by the very fact, "light," v. 13; then being so "enlightened," ch. 1. 18, thou shalt be able, by "reproving," to enlighten others). 15. that—rather as Greek, "See how ye walk," &c. The double idea is compressed into one sentence: "See (take heed) how ye walk," and "See that ye walk circumspectly." The manner, as well as the act itself, is included. See how ye are walking, with a view to your being circumspect (lit., accurate, exact) in your walk. Cf. Colossians 4. 5, "Walk in wisdom (answering to 'as wise' here) toward them that are without" (answering to "circumspectly," i. e., correctly, in relation to the unbelievers around, not giving occasion of stumbling to any, but edifying all by a consistent walk). not as fools—Greek, "not as unwise, but as wise." 16. Redeeming the time—(Colossians 4. 5). Greek, "Buying up for yourselves the seasonable time" (whenever it occurs) of good to yourselves and to others. Buying off from the vanities of "them that are without" (Colossians 4. 5), and of the "unwise" (here in Ephesians), the opportune time afforded to you for the work of God. In a narrower sense, special favourable seasons for good, occasionally presenting themselves, are referred to, of which believers ought diligently to avail themselves. This constitutes true "wisdom" (v. 15). In a larger sense, the whole season from the time that one is spiritually awakened, is to be "redeemed" from vanity for God (cf. 2 Corinthians 6. 2; 1 Peter 4. 2-4). "Redeem" implies the preciousness of the opportune season, a jewel to be bought at any price. WAHL explains, "Redeeming for yourselves (i. e., availing yourselves of) the opportunity (offered you of acting aright), and commanding the time as a master does his servant." TRITMANN, "Watch the time, and make it your own so as to control it; as merchants look out for opportunities, and accurately choose out the best goods; serve not the time, but command it, and it shall do what you approve." So PINDAR, Pythia, 4. 509, "The time followed him as his servant, and was not as a runaway slave." because the days are evil—The days of life in general are so exposed to evil, as to make it necessary to make the most of the seasonable opportunity so long as it lasts (ch. 6. 13; Genesis 47. 9; Psalm 90. 5; Ecclesiastes 11. 2; 12. 1; John 12. 35). Besides, there are many special evil days (in persecution, sickness, &c.) when the Christian is laid by in silence, therefore he needs the more to improve the seasonable times afforded to him (Amos 5. 13), which St. Paul perhaps alludes to. 17.

Wherefore—Seeing that ye need to walk so circumspectly choosing and using the right opportunity of good, unwise—a different Greek word from that in v. 15. Translate, "foolish," or "senseless." understanding—not merely knowing as a matter of fact (Luke 12. 47), but knowing with understanding. the will of the Lord—as to how each opportunity is to be used. The Lord's will, ultimately, is our "sanctification" (1 Thessalonians 4. 3); and that "in every thing," meantime, we should "give thanks" (1 Thessalonians 5. 18; cf. above, v. 10). 18. excess—worthless, ruinous, reckless prodigality. wherein—not in the wine itself when used aright (1 Timothy 5. 23), but in the "excess" as to it, but be filled with the Spirit—The effect in inspiration was that the person was "filled" with an ecstatic exhilaration, like that caused by wine; hence the two are here connected (cf. Acts 2. 13-18). Hence arose the abstinence from wine of many of the prophets, e. g., John Baptist, viz., in order to keep distinct before the world the ecstasy caused by the Spirit, from that caused by wine. So also in ordinary Christians the Spirit dwells not in the mind that seeks the disturbing influences of excitement, but in the well-balanced prayerful mind. Such a one expresses his joy, not in drunken or worldly songs, but in Christian hymns of thankfulness. 19. (Colossians 3. 16.) to yourselves—"to one another." Hence soon arose the antiphonal or responsive chanting of which PLINY writes to Trajan: "They are wont on a fixed day to meet before daylight [to avoid persecution] and to recite a hymn among themselves by turns, to Christ, as if being God." The Spirit gives true eloquence; wine, a spurious eloquence. psalms—generally accompanied by an instrument. hymns—in direct praise to God (cf. Acts 16. 25; 1 Corinthians 14. 26; James 5. 13). songs—the general term for lyric pieces; "spiritual" is added to mark their being here restricted to sacred subjects, though not merely to direct praises of God, but also containing exhortations, prophecies, &c. Contrast the drunken "songs," Amos 8. 10. making melody—Greek, "Playing and singing with an instrument." in your heart—not merely with the tongue; but the serious feeling of the heart accompanying the singing of the lips (cf. 1 Corinthians 14. 15; Psalm 47. 7). The contrast is between the heathen and the Christian practice, "Let your songs be not the drinking songs of heathen feasts, but psalms and hymns; and their accompaniment, not the music of the lyre, but the melody of the heart." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] to the Lord—See Pliny's letter quoted above: "To Christ as God." 20. thanks . . . for all things—even for adversities; also for blessings, unknown as well as known (Colossians 3. 17; 1 Thessalonians 5. 18). unto God and the Father—the Fountain of every blessing in Creation, Providence, Election, and Redemption. Lord Jesus Christ—by whom all things, even distresses, become ours (Romans 8. 35, 37; 1 Corinthians 3. 20-23). 21. (Philippians 2. 8; 1 Peter 5. 5.) Here he passes from our relations to God, to those which concern our fellow-men. in the fear of God—All the oldest MSS. and authorities read, "in the fear of CHRIST." The believer passes from under the bondage of the law as a letter, to be "the servant of Christ" (1 Corinthians 7. 22), which, through the instinct of love to Him, is really to be "the Lord's freeman;" for he is "under the law to Christ" (1 Corinthians 9. 21; cf. John 8. 38). Christ, not the Father (John 5. 22), is to be our judge. Thus reverential fear of displeasing Him is the motive for discharging our relative duties as Christians (1 Corinthians 10. 22; 2 Corinthians 5. 11; 1 Peter 2. 13). 22. ch. 6. 9. The Church's relation to Christ in His everlasting purpose, is the foundation and archetype of the three greatest of earthly relations, that of husband and wife (v. 22-33), parent and child (ch. 6. 1-4), master and servant (ch. 6. 4-9). The oldest MSS. omit "submit yourselves;" supplying it from v. 21, "Ye wives (submitting yourselves) unto your own husbands." "Your own" is an argument for submissiveness on the part of the wives; it is not a stranger, but your own husbands whom you are called on to submit unto (cf. Genesis 2. 16; 1 Corinthians 7. 2; 14. 34; Colossians 3. 18; Titus 2. 5; 1 Peter 3. 1-7). Those subject ought to submit themselves, as whatever kind their superiors are. "Submit" is the term used of wives—"obey," of children (ch. 6. 1), as there is a greater equality between wives and husbands, than between children and parents. as unto the Lord—Submission is rendered by the wife to the husband under the eye of Christ, and so is rendered to Christ Himself. The husband stands to the wife in the relation that the Lord does to the Church, and this is to be the ground of her submission: though that submission is inferior in kind and degree to that which she owes Christ (v. 24). 23. (1 Corinthians 11. 3.) even as—Greek, "as also," and he is—The oldest MSS. read, "Himself (being) Saviour," &c., omitting "and," and "is." In Christ's case, the Headship is united with, nay gained by, His having SAVED the body in the process of redemption; so that (St. Paul implies) I am not alleging Christ's Headship as one entirely identical with that other, for He has a claim to it, and office in it, peculiar to Himself. [ALFORD.] The husband is not saviour of the wife, in which particular Christ excels; hence, "But" (v. 24) follows. [BENGEL.] 24. Therefore—translate, as Greek, "But," or "Nevertheless," i. e., though there be the difference of headships mentioned in v. 23, nevertheless, thus far they are one, viz., in the subjection or submission (the same Greek stands for "is subject," as for "submit," v. 21, 22) of the Church to Christ, being the prototype of that of the wife to the husband. their own—Not in most of the oldest MSS., and not needed by the argument. in every thing—appertaining to a husband's legitimate authority; "in the Lord" (Colossians 3. 18); every thing not contrary to God. 25. "Thou hast seen the measure of obedience; now hear also the measure of love. Do you wish your wife to obey you, as the Church is to obey Christ? Then have a solicitude for her as Christ had for the Church [v. 23, "Himself the Saviour of the body"]; and if it be necessary to give thy life for her, or to be cut in ten thousand pieces, or to endure any other suffering whatever, do not refuse it; and if you suffer thus, not even so do you do what Christ has done; for you indeed do so being already united to her, but He did so for one that treated Him with aversion and hatred. As, therefore, He brought to His feet one that so treated Him, and that even wantonly spurned Him, by much tenderness of regard, not by threats, insults, and terror: so also do you act towards your wife, and though you see her disdainful and wantonly wayward, you will be able to bring her to your feet by much thoughtfulness for her, by love, by kindness. For no bond is more sovereign in binding than such bonds, especially in the case of husband and wife. For one may constrain a servant by fear, though not even he is so to be bound to you; for he may readily run away. But the companion of your life, the mother of your children, the basis of all your joy, you ought to bind to you, not by fear and threats, but by love and attachment." [CHRYSOSTOM.] gave himself—Greek, "gave Himself up." for it—translate, "for her." The relation of the Church to Christ is the ground of Christianity's having raised woman to her due place in the social scale, from which she was, and is, excluded in heathen lands. 26. sanctify—i. e., consecrate her to God. Cf. John 17. 19, meaning, "I devote myself as a holy sacrifice, that my disciples also may be devoted or consecrated as holy in (through) the truth." [NEANDER] (Hebrews 2. 11; 10. 10, Note; 13. 12). and cleanse—rather, as Greek, "cleansing," without the "and." with the washing of water—rather as Greek, "with," or "by the laver of the water," viz., the baptismal water. So it ought to be translated, Titus 3. 5, the only other passage in the New Testament where it occurs. As the bride passed through a purifying bath before marriage, so the Church (cf. Revelation 21. 2). He speaks of baptism according to its high ideal and design, as if the inward grace accompanied the outward rite; hence he asserts of outward baptism whatever is involved in a believing appropriation of the Divine truths it symbolizes, and says that Christ, by baptism, has purified the Church [NEANDER] (1 Peter 3. 21). by the word—Greek, "in the word." To be joined with "cleansing it," or "her." The "word of faith" (Romans 10. 8, 9, 17), of which confession is made in baptism, and which carries the real cleansing (John 15. 3; 17. 17) and regenerating power (1

Peter 1. 23; 3. 21). [ALFORD.] So AUGUSTINE, Tract 50 in John, "Take away the word, and what is the water save water? Add the word to the element, and it becomes a sacrament, being itself as it were the visible word." The regenerating efficacy of baptism is conveyed in, and by, the Divine word alone. 27. he—The oldest MSS. and authorities read, "That He might Himself present unto Himself the Church glorious," viz., as a bride (2 Corinthians 11. 2). Holiness and glory are inseparable. "Cleansing" is the necessary preliminary to both. Holiness is glory internal; glory is holiness shining forth outwardly. The laver of baptism is the vehicle, but the word is the nobler and true instrument of the cleansing. [BENGEL.] It is Christ that prepares the Church with the necessary ornaments of grace, for presentation to Himself, as the Bridegroom at His coming again (Matthew 25. 1, &c.; Revelation 19. 7; 21. 2). not having spot—(Song of Solomon 4. 7.) The visible Church now contains clean and unclean together, like Noah's ark; like the wedding-room which contained some that had, and others that had not, the wedding garment (Matthew 22. 10-14; cf. 2 Timothy 2. 20); or as the good and bad fish are taken in the same net because it cannot discern the bad from the good, the fishermen being unable to know what kind of fish the nets have taken under the waves. Still the Church is termed "holy" in the creed, in reference to her ideal and ultimate destination. When the Bridegroom comes, the bride shall be presented to Him wholly without spot, the evil being cut off from the body for ever (Matthew 13. 47-50). Not that there are two churches, one with bad and good intermingled, another in which there are good alone; but one and the same Church in relation to different times, now with good and evil together, hereafter with good alone. [PEARSON.] 28. Translate, "So ought husbands also (thus the oldest MSS. read) to love their own (cf. Note, v. 22) wives as their own bodies." "He that loveth his own wife," &c. (v. 31). So there is the same love and the same union of body between Christ and the Church (v. 30, 32). 29. For—Supply, and we all love ourselves: "For no man," &c. his own flesh—(V. 31, end.) nourisheth—Greek, "nourisheth it up," viz., to maturity. "Nourisheth," refers to food and internal sustenance; "cherisheth," to clothing and external fostering. even as—translate, "even as also." the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "Christ." Exodus 21. 10 prescribes three duties to the husband. The two former (food and raiment) are here alluded to in a spiritual sense, by "nourisheth and cherisheth;" the third "duty of marriage" is not added in consonance with the holy propriety of Scripture language: its antitype is, "know the Lord" (Hosea 2. 19, 20). [BENGEL.] 30. For—Greek, "Because" (1 Corinthians 6. 15). Christ nourisheth and cherisheth the Church as being of one flesh with Him. Translate, "Because we are members of His body (His literal body), being of His flesh and of His bones" [ALFORD] (Genesis 2. 23, 24). The Greek expresses, "Being formed out of," or "of the substance of His flesh," &c. Adam's deep sleep, wherein Eve was formed from out of his opened side, is an emblem of Christ's death, which was the birth of the Spouse, the Church. John 12. 24; 19. 34, 35, to which verses 25, 26, 27 allude, as implying atonement by His blood, and sanctification by the "water," answering to that which flowed from His side (cf. also John 7. 38, 39; 1 Corinthians 6. 11). As Adam gave Eve a new name, Hebrew, Isha, "woman," formed from his own rib, Ish, "man," signifying her formation from him, so Christ, Revelation 2. 17; 3. 12, Genesis 2. 21, 23, 24 puts the bones first, because the reference there is to the natural structure. But St. Paul is referring to the flesh of Christ. It is not our bones and flesh, but "we" that are spiritually propagated (in our soul and spirit now, and in the body hereafter, regenerated) from the manhood of Christ which has flesh and bones. We are members of His glorified body (John 6. 58). The two oldest existing MSS., and Coptic or Memphitic version, omit "of His flesh and of His bones;" the words may have crept into the text through the Margin from Genesis 2. 23, LXX. However, IRENÆUS, 204, and the old Latin and Vulgate versions, with some good old

MSS., have them. 31. For this cause—The propagation of the Church from Christ, as that of Eve from Adam, is the foundation of the spiritual marriage. The natural marriage, wherein "a man leaves father and mother (the oldest MSS. omit 'his') and is joined unto his wife," is not the principal thing meant here, but the spiritual marriage represented by it, and on which it rests, whereby Christ left the Father's bosom to woo to Himself the Church out of a lost world: v. 32 proves this: His earthly mother as such, also, He holds in secondary account as compared with His spiritual Bride (Luke 2. 48, 49; 8. 19-21; 11. 27, 28). He shall again leave His Father's abode to consummate the union (Matthew 25. 1-10; Revelation 19. 7). they two shall be one flesh—So the Samaritan Pentateuch, LXX., &c., read (Genesis 2. 24), instead of "they shall be one flesh." So Matthew 19. 5. In natural marriage, husband and wife combine the elements of one perfect human being: the one being incomplete without the other. So Christ, as God-man, is pleased to make the Church, the body, a necessary adjunct to Himself, the Head. He is the archetype of the Church, from whom and according to whom, as the pattern, she is formed. He is her Head, as the husband is of the wife (Romans 6. 5; 1 Corinthians 11. 3; 15. 45). Christ will never allow any power to sever Himself and His bride, indissolubly joined (Matthew 19. 6; John 10. 28, 29; 13. 1). 32. Rather, "This mystery is a great one." This profound truth, beyond man's power of discovering, but now revealed, viz., of the spiritual union of Christ and the Church, represented by the marriage union, is a great one, of deep import. See Note, v. 30. So "mystery" is used of a Divine truth not to be discovered save by revelation of God (Romans 11. 25; 1 Corinthians 15. 51). The Vulgate wrongly translates, "This is a great sacrament," which is made the plea by the Romish Church (in spite of the blunder having been long ago exposed by their own commentators, CAJETAN and ESTIUS) for making marriage a sacrament; it is plain, not marriage in general, but that of Christ and the Church, is what is pronounced to be a "great mystery," as the words following prove, "I (emphatic) say it in regard to Christ and to the Church" (so the Greek is best translated). "I, while I quote these words out of Scripture, use them in a higher sense." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 33. Nevertheless—Not to pursue further the mystical meaning of marriage. Translate as Greek, "Do ye also (as Christ does) severally each one so love," &c. The words, "severally each one," refer to them in their individual capacity, contrasted with the previous collective view of the members of the Church as the bride of Christ.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-24. MUTUAL DUTIES OF PARENTS AND CHILDREN: MASTERS AND SERVANTS: OUR LIFE A WARFARE: THE SPIRITUAL ARMOUR NEEDED AGAINST SPIRITUAL FOES. CONCLUSION. 1. obey—Stronger than the expression as to wives, "submitting," or "being subject" (ch. 5. 21). Obedience is more unreasoning and implicit; submission is the willing subjection of an inferior in point of order to one who has a right to command. In the Lord—Both parents and children being Christians "in the Lord," expresses the element in which the obedience is to take place, and the motive to obedience. In Colossians 3. 20, it is, "Children, obey your parents in all things." This clause, "in the Lord," would suggest the due limitation of the obedience required (Acts 5. 29; cf. on the other hand, the abuse, Mark 7. 11-13). right—Even by natural law we should render obedience to them from whom we have derived life. 2. Here the authority of revealed law is added to that of natural law. which is . . . promise—The "promise" is not made the main motive to obedience, but an incidental one. The main motive is, because it is God's will (Deuteronomy 5. 16, "Honour thy father and mother, as the Lord thy God hath COMMANDED thee"); and that it is so peculiarly, is shown by His accompanying it "with a promise." 3rd—In the decalogue with a special promise. The promise in the second commandment is a general one. Their duty is more expressly prescribed to children than to parents; for love descends rather than ascends. [BEN- GEL.] This verse proves the law in the Old Testament is not abolished. 3. long on the earth—In Exodus 20. 12, "long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," which St. Paul adapts to Gospel times, by taking away the local and limited reference peculiar to the Jews in Canaan. The godly are equally blessed in every land, as the Jews were in the land which God gave them. This promise is always fulfilled, either literally, or by the substitution of a higher blessing, viz., one spiritual and eternal (Job 5. 26; Proverbs 10. 27). The substance and essence of the law are eternally in force: its accidents alone (applying to Israel of old) are abolished (Romans 6. 15). 4. fathers—including mothers; the fathers are specified as being the fountains of domestic authority. Fathers are more prone to passion in relation to their children than mothers, whose fault is rather over-indulgence. provoke not—irritate not, by vexatious commands, unreasonable blame, and uncertain temper. [ALFORD.] Colossians 3. 21, "lest they be discouraged." nurture—Greek, "discipline," viz., training by chastening in act where needed (Job 5. 17; Hebrews 12. 7). admonition—training by words (Deuteronomy 6. 7; Proverbs 22. 6, Margin, "catechise"), whether of encouragement, or remonstrance, or reproof, according as is required. [TRENCH.] Contrast 1 Samuel 3. 13, Margin. of the Lord—such as the Lord approves, and by His Spirit dictates. 5. Servants—lit., "slaves." masters according to the flesh—in contrast to your true and heavenly Master (v. 4). A consolatory hint that the mastership to which they were subject, was but for a time [CHRYSOSTOM]; and that their real liberty was still their own (1 Corinthians 7. 22). fear and trembling—not slavish terror, but (1 Corinthians 2. 3, Note; 2 Corinthians 7. 15) an anxious eagerness to do your duty, and a fear of displeasing, as great as is produced in the ordinary slave by "threatenings" (v. 9). singleness—without double-mindedness, or "eye-service" (v. 6), which seeks to please outwardly, without the sincere desire to make the master's interest at all times the first consideration (1 Chronicles 29. 17; Matthew 6. 22, 23; Luke 11. 34). "Simplicity." 6. (Colossians 3. 22.) Seeking to please their masters only so long as these have their eyes on them: as Gehazi was a very different man in his master's presence from what he was in his absence (2 Kings 5). men-pleasers—not Christ-pleasers (cf. Galatians 1. 10; 1 Thessalonians 2. 4). doing the will of God—the unseen but ever-present Master: the best guarantee for your serving faithfully your earthly master alike when present and when absent. from the heart—lit., soul (Psalm 111. 1; Romans 13. 5). 7. good will—expressing his feeling towards his master; as "doing the will of God from the heart" expresses the source of that feeling (Colossians 3. 23). "Good will" is stated by XENOPHON (Economics) to be the principal virtue of a slave towards his master: a real regard to his master's interest as if his own, a good will which not even a master's severity can extinguish. 8. any man doeth—Greek, "any man shall have done," i. e., shall be found at the Lord's coming to have done. the same—in full payment, in heaven's currency. shall . . . receive—(2 Corinthians 5. 10; Colossians 3. 25; but all of grace, Luke 17. 10.) bond or free—(1 Corinthians 7. 22; 12. 13; Galatians 3. 28; Colossians 3. 11.) Christ does not regard such distinctions in His present dealings of grace, or in His future judgment. The slave that has acted faithfully for the Lord's sake to his master, though the latter may not repay his faithfulness, shall have the Lord for his Paymaster. So the freeman who has done good for the Lord's sake, though man may not pay him, has the Lord for his Debtor (Proverbs 19. 17). 9. the same things—Mutatis mutandis. Show the same regard to God's will, and to your servants' well-being, in your relation to them, as they ought to have in their relation to you. Love regulates the duties both of servants and masters, as one and the same light attempts various colours. Equality of nature and faith is superior to distinctions of rank. [BEN- GEL.] Christianity makes all men brothers; cf. Leviticus 25. 42, 43; Deuteronomy 15. 12; Jeremiah 34. 14 as to how the Hebrews were bound to treat their brethren in service; much more ought Christians to act with love. threatening—Greek, "the threatening" which masters commonly use. "Masters" in the Greek, is not so strong a term as "despots:" it implies authority, but not absolute domination. your Master also—The oldest MSS. read, "the Master both of them and you:" "their Master and yours." This more forcibly brings out the equality of slaves and masters in the sight of God. SENECA Thyestes, 607, says, "Whatever an inferior dreads from you, this a superior Master threatens yourselves with: every authority here is under a higher above." As you treat your servants so will He treat you. neither respect of persons—He will not, in judging, acquit because thou art a master, or condemn him because he is a servant (Acts 10. 34; Romans 2. 11; Galatians 2. 6; Colossians 3. 25; 1 Peter 1. 17). Derived from Deuteronomy 10. 17; 2 Chronicles 19. 7. 10. my brethren—Some of the oldest MSS. omit these words. Some with Vulgate retain them. The phrase occurs nowhere else in the Epistle (see, however, v. 23); if genuine, it is appropriate here in the close of the Epistle, where he is urging his fellow-soldiers to the good fight in the Christian armour. Most of the oldest MSS. for "finally," read, "henceforward," or "from henceforth" (Galatians 6. 17). be strong—Greek, "be strengthened." in the power of his might—Christ's might: as in ch. 1. 19, it is the Father's might. 11. the whole armour—The armour of light (Romans 13. 12); on the right hand and left (2 Corinthians 6. 7). The panoply offensive and defensive. An image readily suggested by the Roman armoury, St. Paul being now in Rome. Repeated emphatically, v. 13. In Romans 13. 14 it is, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ;" in putting on Him, and the new man in Him, we put on "the whole armour of God." No opening at the head, the feet, the heart, the belly, the eye, the ear, or the tongue, is to be given to Satan. Believers have once for all overcome him; but on the ground of this fundamental victory gained over him, they are ever again to fight against and overcome him, even as they who once die with Christ have continually to mortify their members upon earth (Romans 6. 2-14; Colossians 3. 3, 5). of God—furnished by God; not our own, else it would not stand (Psalm 35. 1-3). Spiritual, therefore, and mighty through God, not carnal (2 Corinthians 10. 4). wiles—lit., "schemes sought out" for deceiving (cf. 2 Corinthians 11. 14). the devil—the ruling chief of the foes (v. 12) organized into a kingdom of darkness (Matthew 12. 28), opposed to the kingdom of light. 12. Greek, "For our wrestling ('the wrestling' in which we are engaged) is not against flesh," &c. Flesh and blood foes are Satan's mere tools, the real foe lurking behind them is Satan himself, with whom our conflict is. "Wrestling" implies that it is a hand-to-hand and foot-to-foot struggle for the mastery: to wrestle successfully with Satan, we must wrestle with God in irresistible prayer like Jacob (Genesis 32. 24-29; Hosea 12. 4). Translate, "The principalities . . . the powers" (ch. 1. 21; Note; 3. 10; Colossians 1. 16). The same grades of power are specified in the case of the demons here, as in that of angels there (cf. Romans 8. 38; 1 Corinthians 15. 24; Colossians 2. 15). The Ephesians had practised sorcery (Acts 19. 19), so that he appropriately treats of evil spirits in addressing them. The more clearly any book of Scripture, as this, treats of the economy of the kingdom of light, the more clearly does it set forth the kingdom of darkness. Hence, nowhere does the satanic kingdom come more clearly into view than in the Gospels which treat of Christ, the true Light. rulers of the darkness of this world—Greek, "age" or "course of the world." But the oldest MSS. omit "of world." Translate, "Against the world-rulers of this (present) darkness" (ch. 2. 2; 5. 8; Luke 22. 53; Colossians 1. 13). On Satan and his demons being "world-rulers," cf. John 12. 31; 14. 30; 16. 11; Luke 4. 6; 2 Corinthians 4. 4; 1 John 5. 19, Greek, "He is in the wicked one." Though they be "world-rulers," they are not the ruler of the universe; and their usurped rule of the world is soon to cease, when He shall "come whose right it is" (Ezekiel 21. 27). Two cases prove Satan not to be a mere subjective fancy: (1.) Christ's temptation; (2.) the entrance of demons into the swine (for these are incapable of such fancies). Satan tries to parody, or imitate in a perverted way, God's working (2 Corinthians 11. 13, 14). So when God became incarnate, Satan, by his demons, took forcible possession of human bodies. Thus the demoniacally possessed were not peculiarly wicked, but miserable, and so fit subjects for Jesus' pity. St. Paul makes no mention of demoniacal possession, so that in the time he wrote, it seems to have ceased; it probably was restricted to the period of the Lord's incarnation, and of the foundation of His Church. spiritual wickedness—rather as Greek, "The spiritual hosts of wickedness." As three of the clauses describe the power, so this fourth, the wickedness of our spiritual foes (Matthew 12. 45). in high places—Greek, "heavenly places:" in ch. 2. 2, "the air," where see the Note. The alteration of expression to "in heavenly places," is in order to mark the higher range of their powers than ours, they having been, up to the ascension (Revelation 12. 5, 9, 10), dwellers "in the heavenly places" (Job 1. 7), and being now in the regions of the air which are called the heavens. Moreover, pride and presumption are the sins in heavenly places to which they tempt especially, being those by which they themselves fell from heavenly places (Isaiah 14. 12-15). But believers have naught to fear, being "blessed with all spiritual blessings in the heavenly places" (ch. 1. 3). 13. take . . . of God—not "make," God has done that: you have only to "take up" and put it on. The Ephesians were familiar with the idea of the gods giving armour to mythical heroes: thus St. Paul's allusion would be appropriate. the evil day—the day of Satan's special assaults (v. 12, 16) in life and at the dying hour (cf. Revelation 3. 10). We must have our armour always on, to be ready against the evil day which may come at any moment, the war being perpetual (Psalm 41. 1, Margin). done all—rather, "accomplished all things," viz., necessary to the fight, and becoming a good soldier. stand—The repetition in v. 11, 14, shows that standing, i. e., maintaining our ground, not yielding or fleeing, is the grand aim of the Christian soldier. Translate as Greek, "Having girt about your loins with truth," i. e., with truthfulness, sincerity, a good conscience (2 Corinthians 1. 12; 1 Timothy 1. 5, 18; 3. 9). Truth is the band that girds up and keeps together the flowing robes, so as that the Christian soldier may be unencumbered for action. So the Passover was eaten with the loins girt, and the shoes on the feet (Exodus 12. 11; cf. Isaiah 5. 27; Luke 12. 35). Faithfulness (LXX., "truth") is the girdle of Messiah (Isaiah 11. 5): so truth of His followers. having on—Greek, "having put on." breastplate of righteousness—Isaiah 59. 17, similarly of Messiah. "Righteousness" is here joined with "truth," as in ch. 5. 9: righteousness in works, truth in words [ESTIUS] (1 John 3. 7). Christ's righteousness inwrought in us by the Spirit. "Faith and love," i. e., faith working righteousness by love, are "the breastplate" in 1 Thessalonians 5. 8. 15. Translate, "Having shod your feet" (referring to the sandals, or to the military shoes then used). the preparation—rather, "the preparedness," or "readiness of," i. e., arising from the "Gospel" (Psalm 10. 17). Preparedness to do and suffer all that God wills; readiness for march, as a Christian soldier. Gospel of peace—(cf. Luke 1. 79; Romans 10. 15). The "peace" within forms a beautiful contrast to the raging of the outward conflict (Isaiah 26. 3; Philipplans 4. 7). 16. Above all—rather, "Over all;" so as to cover all that has been put on before. Three integuments are specified, the breastplate, girdle, and shoes; two defences, the helmet and shield; and two offensive weapons, the sword and the spear (prayer). ALFORD translates, "Besides all," as the Greek is translated, Luke 3. 20. But if it meant this, it would have come last in the list (cf. Colossians 3. 14). shield—the large oblong oval door-like shield of the Romans, four feet long by two and a half feet broad; not the small round buckler. ye shall be able—not merely "ye may." The shield of faith will certainly intercept, and so "quench, all the fiery darts" (an image from the ancient fire-darts, formed of cane, with tow and combustibles ignited on the head of the shaft, so as to set fire to wood-work, tents, &c.) of the wicked—rather "of the

PHILIPPIANS.

EVIL ONE. Faith conquers him (1 Peter 5. 9), and his darts of temptation to wrath, inst, revenge, despair, &c. it overcomes the world (1 John 5. 4), and so the prince of the world (1 John 5. 18). 17. take—A different Greek word from that in v. 13, 16; translate, therefore, "Receive," "accept," viz., the helmet offered by the Lord, viz., "salvation" appropriated, as 1 Thessalonians 5. 8, "Helmet, the hope of salvation;" not an uncertain hope, but one that brings with it no shame of disappointment (Romans 5. 5). It is subjoined to the shield of faith, as being its inseparable accompaniment (cf. Romans 5. 1, 5). The head of the soldier was among the principal parts to be defended, as on it the deadliest strokes might fall, and it is the head that commands the whole body. The head is the seat of the mind, which, when it has laid hold of the sure Gospel "hope" of eternal life, will not receive false doctrine, or give way to Satan's temptations to despair. God, by this hope, "lifts up the head" (Psalm 3. 3; Luke 21. 28). sword of the Spirit—i. e., furnished by the Spirit, who inspired the writers of the word of God (2 Peter 1. 21). Again the Trinity is implied: the Spirit here; and Christ in "salvation" and God the Father, v. 13 (cf. Hebrew 4. 12; Revelation 1. 16; 2. 12). The two-edged sword, cutting both ways (Psalm 45. 3, 5), striking some with conviction and conversion, and others with condemnation (Isaiah 49. 2; Revelation 19. 15), is in the mouth of Christ (Isaiah 49. 2), in the hand of His saints (Psalm 149. 6). Christ's use of this sword in the temptation is our pattern as to how we are to wield it against Satan (Matthew 4. 4, 7, 10). There is no armour specified for the back, but only for the front of the body; implying that we must never turn our back to the foe (Luke 9. 62); our only safety is in resisting ceaselessly (Matthew 4. 11; James 4. 7). 18. always—Greek, "in every season;" implying opportunity and exigency (Colossians 4. 2). St. Paul uses the very words of Jesus in Luke 21. 36 (a Gospel which he quotes elsewhere, in undesignated consonance with the fact of St. Luke being his associate in travel, 1 Corinthians 11. 23, &c.; 1 Timothy 5. 18). Cf. Luke 18. 1; Romans 12. 12; 1 Thessalonians 5. 17. with all—i. e., every kind of. prayer—a sacred term for prayer in general. supplication—a common term for a special kind of prayer [HARLESS], an imploring request. "Prayer" for obtaining blessings, "supplication" for averting evils which we fear. [GROTIUS.] in the Spirit—to be joined with "praying." It is he in us, as the Spirit of adoption, who prays, and enables us to pray (Romans 8. 15, 26; Galatians 4. 6; Jude 20). watching—not sleeping (ch. 5. 14; Psalm 88. 13; Matthew 28. 41). So in the temple a perpetual watch was maintained (cf. Anna, Luke 2. 37). thereunto—"watching unto" (with a view to) prayer and supplication. with—Greek, "in." Persevering constancy ("perseverance") and (i. e., exhibited in) supplication are to be the element in which our watchfulness is to be exercised. for all saints—as none is so perfect as not to need the intercessions of his fellow-Christians. 19. for me—A different Greek preposition from that in v. 18; translate, therefore, "on my behalf." that I may open my mouth boldly—rather, "That there may be given to me 'utterance' or 'speech' in the opening of my mouth (when I undertake to speak; a formula used in set and solemn speech, Job 3. 1; Daniel 10. 16), so as with boldness to make known," &c. Bold plainness of speech was the more needed, as the Gospel is a "mystery" undiscoversible by mere reason, and only known by revelation. Paul looked for utterance to be given him; he did not depend on his natural or acquired power. The shortest road to any heart is round by heaven; pray to God to open the door and to open your mouth, so as to avail yourself of every opening (Jeremiah 1. 7, 8; Ezekiel 3. 8, 9, 11; 2 Corinthians 4. 13). 20. For—Greek, as in v. 19, "On behalf of which." an ambassador in bonds—A paradox. Ambassadors were held inviolable by the law of nations, and could not, without outrage to every sacred right, be put in chains. Yet Christ's "ambassador is in a chain." The Greek is singular. The Romans used to bind a prisoner to a soldier by a single chain, in a kind of free custody. So Acts 28. 16, 20, "I am bound with this chain." The term, "bonds" (plural), on the other hand, is used when the prisoner's hands or feet were bound together (Acts 28. 29); cf. Acts 12. 6, where the plural marks the distinction. The singular is only used of the particular kind of custody described above; an undesignated coincidence. [PALEY.] 21. that ye also—as I have been discussing things relating to you, so that ye also may know about me (cf. Colossians 4. 7, 8). NEANDER takes it, "Ye also," as well as the Colossians (Colossians 4. 7). (?) my affairs—Greek, "the things concerning me." how I do—how I fare. Tychicus—an Asiatic, and so a fit messenger bearing the respective Epistles to Ephesus and Colosse (Acts 20. 4; 2 Timothy 4. 12). a—Greek, "the beloved brother," &c.; the same epithet as in Colossians 4. 7. minister—i. e., servant. in the Lord—in the Lord's work. 22. for the same purpose—Greek, "for this very purpose." Colossians 4. 8 is almost word for word the same as this verse. our affairs—Greek, "the things concerning us," viz., concerning myself. "Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner, and Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas" (Colossians 4. 10). 23. love with faith—Faith is presupposed as theirs; he prays that love may accompany it (Galatians 5. 6). 24. Contrast the malediction on all who love Him not (1 Corinthians 16. 22). in sincerity—Greek, "in incorruption," i. e., not as English Version, but "with an immortal (constant) love." [WAHL.] Cf. "that which is not corruptible" (1 Peter 3. 4). Not a fleeting, earthly love, but a spiritual and eternal one. [ALFORD.] Contrast Colossians 2. 22, worldly things "which perish with the using." Cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 25, "corruptible . . . incorruptible crown." "Purely," "holly" [ESTIUS], without the corruption of sin (Note, 1 Corinthians 3. 17; 2 Peter 1. 4; Jude 10). Where the Lord Jesus has a true believer, there I have a brother. [BISHOP M'ILWAINE.] He who is good enough for Christ, is good enough for me. [R. HALL.] The differences of opinion among real Christians are comparatively small, and show that they are not following one another like silly sheep, each trusting the one before him. Their agreement in the main, whilst showing their independence as witnesses by differing in non-essentials, can only be accounted for by their being all in the right direction (Acts 15. 8, 9; 1 Corinthians 1. 2; 12. 3).

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE INTERNAL EVIDENCE for the authenticity of this Epistle is strong. The style, manner of thought, and doctrine, accord with St. Paul's. The incidental allusions also establish his authorship. PALEY (Horæ Paulinæ, ch. 7.) instances the mention of the object of Epaphroditus' journey to Rome, the Philipplan contribution to St. Paul's wants, Epaphroditus' sickness (ch. 1. 7; 2. 25-30; 4. 10-18), the fact that Timothy had been long with St. Paul at Philippi (ch. 1. 1; 2. 19), the reference to his being a prisoner at Rome now for a long time (ch. 1. 12-14; 2. 17-23), his willingness to die (cf. ch. 1. 23, with 2 Corinthians 5. 8), the reference to the Philippians having seen his maltreatment at Philippi (ch. 1. 29, 30; 2. 1, 2).

PHILIPPIANS.

The EXTERNAL EVIDENCE is equally decisive: POLYCARP, ad Philippenses, sec. 8 and 11; IRENEUS, adversus Hæreses, 4. 18, sec. 4; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Pædagogus, l. 1., p. 107; The Epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, in EUSEBIUS' Ecclesiastical History, 5. 2; TERTULLIAN, Resurrectio carnis, c. 23; ORIGEN, Celsus, l. 3., p. 122; CYPRIAN, Testimonies against the Jews, 3. 39.

Philippi was the first (i. e., the farthest from Rome, and first which met Paul in entering Macedonia) Macedonian city of the district, called Macedonia Prima (so called as lying farthest eastward). The Greek (Acts 16. 12) should not be translated "the chief city," as English Version, but as above [ALFORD.] Not it, but Thessalonica, was the chief city of the province, and Amphipolis, of the district called Macedonia Prima. It was a Roman "colony" (Acts 16. 12), made so by Augustus, to commemorate his famous victory over Brutus and Cassius. A colony was in fact a portion of Rome itself transplanted to the provinces, an offshoot from Rome, and as it were a portrait of the mother city on a small scale. [AULIUS GELLIUS, 16. 13.] Its inhabitants were Roman citizens, having the right of voting in the Roman tribes, governed by their own senate and magistrates, and not by the governor of the province, with the Roman law and Latin language.

Paul, with Silas and Timothy, planted the Gospel there (Acts 16. 12, &c.), in his second missionary journey, A. D. 51. Doubtless he visited it again on his journey from Ephesus into Macedonia (Acts 20. 1); and Acts 20. 3, 6, expressly mentions his third visit on his return from Greece (Corinth) to Syria by way of Macedonia. His sufferings at Philippi (Acts 16. 19, &c.) strengthened the Christian bond of union between him and his Philippian converts, who also, like him, were exposed to trials for the Gospel's sake (1 Thessalonians 2. 2). They alone sent supplies for his temporal wants, twice shortly after he had left them (Philippians 4. 15, 16), and again a third time shortly before writing this Epistle (Philippians 4. 10, 18; 2 Corinthians 11. 9). This fervent attachment on their part was, perhaps, also in part due to the fact that few Jews were in Philippi, as in other scenes of his labours, to sow the seeds of distrust and suspicion. There was no synagogue, but merely a Jewish Prosencha, or oratory, by the river side. So that there only do we read of his meeting no opposition from Jews, but only from the masters of the divining damsel, whose gain had been put an end to by her being dispossessed.

Though the Philippian Church was as yet free from Judaizing influence, yet it needed to be forewarned of that danger which might at any time assail it from without (ch. 8. 2); even as such evil influences had crept into the Galatian churches. In ch. 4. 2, 3 we find a trace of the fact recorded in the history (Acts 16. 13, 14), that female converts were among the first to receive the Gospel at Philippi.

As to the state of the Church, we gather from 2 Corinthians 8. 1, 2 that its members were poor, yet most liberal; and from Philippians 1. 23-30, that they were undergoing persecution. The only blemish referred to in their character was, on the part of some members, a tendency to dissension. Hence arise his admonitions against disputings (ch. 1. 27; 2. 1-4, 12, 14; 4. 2).

The OBJECT of the Epistle is general: not only to thank the Philippians for their contribution sent by Epaphroditus, who was now in returning to take back the apostle's letter, but to express his Christian love and sympathy, and to exhort them to a life consonant with that of Christ, and to warn them against existing dissensions, and future possible assaults of Judaizers from without. It is remarkable in this Epistle alone, as compared with the others, that, amidst many commendations, there are no express censures of those to whom it is addressed. No doctrinal error, or schism, has as yet sprung up; the only blemish hinted at is, that some of the Philippian Church were somewhat wanting in lowliness of mind, the result of which was disputation. Two women, Euodias and Syntyche, are mentioned as having erred in this respect. The Epistle may be divided into three parts: I. Affectionate address to the Philippians; reference to his own state as a prisoner at Rome, and to theirs, and to his mission of Epaphroditus to them (ch. 1. and 2). Epaphroditus probably held a leading office in the Philippian Church, perhaps as a presbyter after Tycheus and Onesimus had departed (A. D. 62), carrying the Epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, St. Paul was cheered in his imprisonment by the arrival of Epaphroditus with the Philippian contribution. That faithful "brother, companion in labour, and fellow-soldier" (ch. 2. 25), had brought on himself by the fatigues of the journey a dangerous sickness (ch. 2. 26, 30). But now that he was recovered, he "longed" (ch. 2. 26) to return to his Philippian flock, and in person to relieve their anxiety on his behalf, in respect to his sickness; and the apostle gladly availed himself of the opportunity of writing to them a letter of grateful acknowledgments and Christian exhortations. II. Caution against Judaizing teachers, supported by reference to his own former and present feeling towards Jewish legalism (ch. 3). III. Admonitions to individuals, and to the Church in general, thanks for their seasonable aid, and concluding benedictions and salutations.

This Epistle was written from Rome during the imprisonment, the beginning of which is related in Acts 28. 16, 20, 30, 31. The reference to "Cæsar's household" (ch. 4. 22), and to the "palace" (ch. 1. 13, Greek, Prætorium, probably, the barracks of the Prætorian body-guard, attached to the palace of Nero) confirms this. It must have been during his first imprisonment at Rome, for the mention of the Prætorium agrees with the fact that it was during his first imprisonment he was in the custody of the Prætorian Prefect, and his situation, described in ch. 1. 12-14, agrees with his situation in the first two years of his imprisonment (Acts 28. 30, 31). The following reasons show, moreover, that it was written towards the close of that imprisonment: (1.) He, in it, expresses his expectation of the immediate decision of his cause (ch. 2. 23). (2.) Enough time had elapsed for the Philippians to hear of his imprisonment, to send Epaphroditus to him, to hear of Epaphroditus' arrival and sickness, and send back word to Rome of their distress (ch. 2. 26). (3.) It must have been written after the three other Epistles sent from Rome, viz., Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon; for Luke is no longer with him (ch. 2. 20), otherwise he would have been specified as saluting them, having formerly laboured among them, whereas he is mentioned as with him, Colossians 4. 14; Philemon 24. Again, in Ephesians 6. 19, 20, his freedom to preach is implied: but in ch. 1. 13-18, his bondage is dwelt on, and it is implied that, not himself, but others, preached, and made his imprisonment known. Again, in Philemon 22, he confidently anticipates his release, which contrasts with the more depressed anticipations of this Epistle. (4.) A considerable time had elapsed since the beginning of his imprisonment, for "his bonds" to have become so widely known, and to have produced such good effects for the Gospel (ch. 1. 13). (5.) There is evidently an increase in the rigour of his imprisonment implied now, as compared with the early stage of it, as described in Acts 28.; cf. ch. 1. 29, 30; 2. 27. History furnishes a probable clue to account for this increase of vigour. In the second year of St. Paul's imprisonment (A. D. 62), Burrus, the Prætorian Prefect, to whose custody he had been committed (Acts 28. 16, "the captain of the guard"), died; and Nero the emperor having divorced Octavia, and married Poppæa, a Jewish proselytess (who then caused her rival, Octavia, to be murdered, and gloated over the head of her victim), exalted Tigellinus, the chief promoter of the marriage, a monster of wickedness, to the Prætorian Prefecture. It was then he seems to have been removed from his own house into the Prætorium, or barrack of the Prætorian guards, attached to the palace, for stricter custody; and hence he writes with less hopeful anticipations as to the result of his trial (ch. 2. 17; 3. 11). Some of the Prætorian guards who had the custody of him before, would then naturally make known his "bonds," in accordance with ch. 1. 13; from the smaller Prætorian body-guard at the palace the report would spread to the general permanent Prætorian camp, which Tiberius had established north of the city, outside of the walls. He had arrived in Rome, February, 61; the "two whole years (Acts 20. 30) in his own hired house" ended February, 63, so that the date of this Epistle, written shortly after, evidently whilst the danger was imminent, would be about spring or summer, 63. The providence of God averted the danger. He probably was thought beneath the notice of Tigellinus, who was more intent on court intrigues. The death of Nero's favourite, Pallas, the brother of Feilix, this same year also took out of the way another source of danger.

The STYLE is abrupt and discontinuous, his fervour of affection leading him to pass rapidly from one theme to another (ch. 2. 18, 19-24, 25-30; 3. 1, 2, 3, 4-14, 15). In no Epistle does he use so warm expressions of love. In ch. 4. 1 he seems at a loss for words sufficient to express all the extent and ardour of his affection for the Philippians: "My brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved." The mention of bishops and deacons in ch. 1. 1 is due to the late date of the Epistle, at a time when the Church had begun to assume that order which is laid down in the Pastoral Epistles, and which continued the prevalent one in the first and purest age of the Church.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-30. INSCRIPTION. THANKSGIVING AND PRAYERS FOR THE FLOURISHING SPIRITUAL STATE OF THE PHILIPPIANS. HIS OWN STATE AT ROME, AND THE RESULT OF HIS IMPRISONMENT IN SPREADING THE GOSPEL. EXHORTATION TO CHRISTIAN CONSISTENCY. 1. Timothy—mentioned as being well known to the Philippians (Acts 16. 3, 10-12), and now present with Paul. Not that Timothy had any share in writing the Epistle; for St. Paul presently uses the first person singular, "I," not "we" (v. 3). The mention of his name implies merely that Timothy joined in affectionate remembrances to them. servants of Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read the order, "Christ Jesus." St. Paul does not call himself "an apostle," as in the inscriptions of other Epistles; for the Philippians needed not to be reminded of his apostolic authority. He writes rather in a tone of affectionate familiarity. all—So v. 4, 7, 8, 25; ch. 2. 17, 28. It implies comprehensive affection which desired not to forget any one among them "all." bishops—Synonymous with "presbyters" in the apostolical churches; as appears from the same persons being called "elders of the Church" at Ephesus (Acts 20. 17), and "overseers" (Acts 20. 28), Greek, "bishops." And Titus 1. 5, cf. with v. 7. This is the earliest letter of St. Paul where bishops and deacons are mentioned, and the only one where they are separately addressed in the salutation. This accords with the probable course of events, deduced alike from the letters and history. Whilst the apostles were constantly visiting the churches in person or by messengers, regular pastors would be less needed; but when some were removed by various causes, provision for the permanent order of the churches would be needed. Hence the three pastoral letters, subsequent to this Epistle, give instruction as to the due appointment of bishops and deacons. It agrees with this new want of the Church, when other apostles were dead or far away, and Paul long in prison, that bishops and deacons should be prominent for the first time in the opening salutation. The Spirit thus intimated that the churches were to look up to their own pastors, now that the miraculous gifts were passing into God's ordinary providence, and the presence of the inspired apostles, the dispensers of those gifts, was to be withdrawn. [PALFREY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] "Presbyter," implied the rank; "Bishop," the duties of the office. [NEANDER.] Naturally, when the apostles who had the chief supervision were no more, one among the presbyters presided and received the name "Bishop," in the more restricted and modern sense; just as in the Jewish synagogue one of the elders presided as "ruler of the synagogue." Observe, the apostle addresses the Church (i. e., the congregation) more directly than its presiding ministers (Colossians 4. 17; 1 Thessalonians 5. 12; Hebrews 13. 24; Revelation 1. 4, 11). The bishops more managed the internal, the deacons the external, affairs of the Church. The plural number shows there was more than one

bishop or presbyter, and more than one deacon in the Church at Philippi. 2. Grace . . . peace—The very form of this salutation implies the union of Jew, Greek, and Roman. The Greek salutation was "joy" (chairein), akin to the Greek for "grace" (charis). The Roman was "health," the intermediate term between grace and peace. The Hebrew was "peace," including both temporal and spiritual prosperity. Grace must come first if we are to have true peace. from . . . from—Omit the second "from:" as in the Greek, "God our Father" and "the Lord Jesus Christ," are most closely connected. 3. Translate, "In all my remembrance of you." 4. making request—translate, "making my request." for you all—The frequent repetition in this Epistle of "all" with "you," marks that Paul desires to declare his love for all alike, and will not recognize any divisions among them. with joy—The characteristic feature in this Epistle, as love is in that to the Ephesians (cf. v. 18; ch. 2. 2, 19, 23; 3. 1; 4. 1, 4). Love and joy are the two first-fruits of the Spirit. Joy gives especial animation to prayers. It marked his high opinion of them, that there was almost everything in them to give him joy, and almost nothing to give him pain. 5. Ground of his "thanking God" (v. 3): "For your (continued) fellowship (i. e., real spiritual participation) in (lit., 'in regard to') the Gospel from the first day (of your becoming partakers in it) until now." Believers have the fellowship of the Son of God (1 Corinthians 1. 9) and of the Father (1 John 1. 3) in the Gospel by becoming partakers of "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost" (2 Corinthians 13. 14), and exercise that fellowship by acts of communion, not only the communion of the Lord's Supper, but holy liberality to brethren and ministers (ch. 4. 10, 15, "communicated . . . concerning giving;" 2 Corinthians 9. 13; Galatians 6. 6; Hebrews 13. 16, "To communicate forget not"). 6. confident—This confidence nerves prayers and thanksgivings (v. 3, 4). this very thing—the very thing which he prays for (v. 4) is the matter of his believing confidence (Mark 11. 24; 1 John 5. 14, 15). Hence the result is sure. He which hath begun—God (ch. 2. 13). a good work—Any work that God begins, He will surely finish (1 Samuel 3. 12). Not even men begin a work at random. Much more the fact of His beginning the work is a pledge of its completion (Isaiah 26. 12). So as to the particular work here meant, the perfecting of their fellowship in the Gospel (v. 5; Psalm 37. 24; 89. 33; 138. 8; John 10. 28, 29; Romans 8. 29, 35-39; 11. 1, 2; Hebrews 6. 17-19; James 1. 17; Jude 24). As God cast not off Israel for ever, though chastening them for a time, so He will not cast off the spiritual Israel (Deuteronomy 33. 3; Isaiah 27. 3; 1 Peter 1. 5). perform it until—"perfect it up to." [ALFORD, EARLICOTT, &c.] the day of . . . Christ—(v. 10.) The Lord's coming, designed by God in every age of the Church to be regarded as near, is to be the goal set before believers' minds rather than their own death. 7. meet—Greek, "just." to think this—to have the prayerful confidence I expressed (v. 4-6). of you—lit., "in behalf of you." Paul's confident prayer in their behalf was, that God would bear act his own good work of grace in them. because, &c.—Punctuate and translate, "Because I have you in my heart (so v. 8); otherwise the Greek and the words immediately following in the verse, favour MARGIN, 'Ye have me in your heart . . . being partakers of my grace' (both, in my bonds, and in my defence and confirmation of the Gospel), you (I say) all being fellow-partakers of my grace." This last clause thus assigns the reason why he has them in his heart (i. e., cherished in his love, 2 Corinthians 3. 2; 7. 3), even in his bonds, and in his defence and confirmation of the Gospel (such as he was constantly making in private, Acts 28. 17-23; his self-defence and confirmation of the Gospel being necessarily conjoined, as the Greek implies, cf. v. 17), viz., "inasmuch as ye are fellow-partakers of my grace: inasmuch as ye share with me in 'the fellowship of the Gospel' (v. 5), and have manifested this, both by suffering as I do for the Gospel's sake (v. 28-30), and by imparting to me of your substance (ch. 4. 15). It is natural and right for me thus confidently to pray in your behalf (ELLICOTT, &c., translate, "To be thus minded for you all"), because of my having you in my warmest remembrances even in my bonds, since you are sharers with me in the Gospel grace. Bonds do not bind love. 8. Confirmation of v. 7. record—i. e., witness, in the bowels of Jesus Christ—"Christ Jesus" is the order in the oldest MSS. My yearning love (so the Greek implies) to you is not merely from natural affection, but from devotedness to Christ Jesus. "Not Paul, but Jesus Christ lives in Paul; therefore Paul is not moved in the bowels [i. e., the tender love, Jeremiah 31. 20] of Paul, but of Jesus Christ." [BENGEL.] All real spiritual love is but a portion of Christ's love which yearns in all who are united to Him. [ALFORD.] 9. The subject of his prayer for them (v. 4). your love—to Christ, producing love not only to Paul, Christ's minister, as it did, but also to one another, which it did not altogether as much as it ought (ch. 2. 2; 4. 2). knowledge—of doctrinal and practical truth. judgment—rather, "perception;" "perceptive sense." Spiritual perceptiveness—spiritual sight, spiritual hearing, spiritual feeling, spiritual taste. Christianity is a vigorous plant, not the hotbed growth of enthusiasm. "Knowledge" and "perception" guard love from being ill-judged. 10. Lit., "With a view to your proving (and so approving and embracing) the things that excel" (Romans 2. 18); not merely things not bad, but the things best among those that are good; the things of more advanced excellence. Ask as to things, not merely, is there no harm, but is there any good, and which is the best? sincere—from a Greek root. Examined in the sunlight and found pure. without offence—Not stumbling; running the Christian race without falling through any stumbling-block, i. e., temptation in your way. till—rather, "unto," "against;" so that when the day of Christ comes, ye may be found pure and without offence. 11. The oldest MSS. read the singular, "fruit." So Galatians 5. 22 (see Note); regarding the works of righteousness, however manifold, as one harmonious whole, "the fruit of the Spirit" (Ephesians 5. 9); James 3. 18, "the fruit of righteousness" (Hebrews 12. 11); Romans 6. 22, "fruit unto holiness," which are—"which is by (Greek, through) Jesus Christ." Through His sending to us the Spirit from the Father. "We are wild and useless olive trees till we are grafted into Christ, who, by His living root, makes us fruit-bearing branches." [CALVIN.] 12. understand—Greek, "know." The Philippians probably had feared that his imprisonment would hinder the spread of the Gospel; he therefore removes this fear. the things which happened unto me—Greek, "the things concerning me." rather—so far as my imprisonment from hindering the Gospel. Faith takes in a favourable light even what seems adverse [BENGEL] (v. 19. 28; ch. 2. 17). 13. my bonds in Christ—rather as Greek, "So that my bonds have become manifest in Christ," i. e., known, as evidenced in Christ's cause. palace—lit., "Prætorium," i. e., the barrack of the Prætorian guards attached to the palace of Nero, on the Palatine hill at Rome; not the general Prætorian camp outside of the city; for this was not connected with "Caesar's household," which ch. 4. 22 shows the Prætorium here meant was. The emperor was

"Prætor," or Commander-in-Chief, naturally then the barrack of his body-guard was called the Prætorium. Paul seems now not to have been at large in his own hired house, though chained to a soldier, as in Acts 28. 16, 20, 30, 31, but in strict custody in the Prætorium; a change which probably took place on Tigellinus becoming Prætorian Prefect. See my Introduction, in all other places—So CHRYSOSTOM. Or else, "to all the rest," i. e., "manifest to all the other" Prætorian soldiers stationed elsewhere through the instrumentality of the Prætorian household guards who might for the time be attached to the emperor's palace, and who relieved one another in succession. Paul had been now upwards of two years a prisoner, so that there was time for his cause and the Gospel having become widely known at Rome. 14. Translate as Greek. "And that (v. 13) most of the brethren in the Lord," &c. "In the Lord," distinguishes them from "brethren after the flesh," Jewish fellow-countrymen. ELLICOTT, &c., translate, "Trusting in the Lord," by my bonds—encouraged by my patience in bearing my bonds, much more bold—translate as Greek, "are more abundantly bold." 15. "Some indeed are preaching Christ even for envy, i. e., to carry out the envy which they felt towards Paul, on account of the success of the Gospel in the capital of the world, owing to his steadfastness in his imprisonment; they wished through envy to transfer the credit of its progress from him to themselves. Probably Judaizing teachers (Romans 14.; 1 Corinthians 3. 10-15; 9. 1, &c.; 2 Corinthians 11. 1-4). some also of [rather for] good will—answering to "the brethren" (v. 14); some being well-disposed to him. 16, 17. The oldest MSS. transpose these verses, and read "These (last) indeed out of love (to Christ and me), knowing (the opposite of 'thinking' below) that I am set (i. e., appointed by God, 1 Thessalonians 3. 3) for the defence of the Gospel (v. 7, not on my own account). But the others out of contention (or rather, 'a factious spirit,' 'cabal,' a spirit of intrigue, using unscrupulous means to compass their end; Note, Galatians 5. 20; 'self-seeking' [ALFORD]) proclaim (the Greek is not the same as that for 'preach,' but, 'announce') Christ, not sincerely (answering to 'but of a spirit of intrigue,' or 'self-seeking'). Lit., 'not purely;' not with a pure intention; the Jewish leaders they tried to introduce was in order to glorify themselves (Galatians 6. 12, 13; see, however, Note, v. 18), thinking (but in vain) to raise up (so the oldest MSS. read) tribulation to my bonds." Their thought was, that taking the opportunity of my being laid aside, they would exalt themselves by their Judaizing preaching, and depreciate me and my preaching, and so cause me trouble of spirit in my bonds; they thought that I, like themselves, sought my own glory, and so would be mortified at their success over mine. But they are utterly mistaken; "I rejoice" at it (v. 18), so far am I from being troubled at it. 18. "What then?" what follows from this? Does this trouble me as they thought it would? "Notwithstanding" their unkind thought to me, and self-seeking intention, the cause I have at heart is furthered "every way" of preaching, "whether in pretence (with a by motive, v. 16) or in truth (out of true 'love' to Christ, v. 17), Christ is proclaimed; and therein I do rejoice, yea, and I will rejoice." From this it would seem that these self-seeking teachers in the main "proclaimed Christ," not "another Gospel," such as the Judaizers in Galatia taught (Galatians 1. 6-8); though probably having some of the Jewish leaders (Note, v. 15, 16, 17), their chief error was their self-seeking envious motive, not so much error of doctrine; had there been vital error, Paul would not have rejoiced. The proclamation of CHRIST, however done, roused attention, and so was sure to be of service. Paul could thus rejoice at the good result of their bad intentions (Psalm 76. 10; Isaiah 10. 5, 7). 19. turn to my salvation—"turn out to me for (or unto) salvation." This proclamation of Christ every way will turn out to my spiritual good Christ, whose interests are my interests, being glorified thereby; and so the coming of His kingdom being furthered, which, when it does come, will bring completed "SALVATION" (Hebrews 9. 28) to me and all whom "earnest expectation" (v. 20) is that Christ may be magnified in them. So far is their preaching from causing me.

as they thought, tribulation in my bonds (v. 16). Paul plainly quotes and applies to himself the very words of the LXX. (Job 13, 16), "This shall turn out to my salvation," which belong to all God's people of every age, in their tribulation (cf. Job 13, 15). through your prayer and the supply—The Greek intimately joins the two nouns together, by having but one preposition and one article: "Through your prayer and (the consequent) supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (obtained for me through your prayer). 20. According to my earnest expectation—The Greek expresses, "expectation with uplifted head" (Luke 21, 28) and outstretched neck." Romans 8, 19, the only other place in the New Testament that the word occurs. TRITMANN says, in both places it implies not mere expectation, but the anxious desire of an anticipated prosperous issue in afflictive circumstances. The subject of his earnest expectation which follows, answers to "my salvation" (v. 19). in nothing I shall be ashamed—In nothing have reason to be ashamed of "my work for God, or His work in me." [ALFORD.] Or, "In nothing be disappointed in my hope, but that I may fully obtain it." [ESTIUS.] So "ashamed" is used Romans 9, 33. all boldness—"all" is opposed to "in nothing," as "boldness" is the opposite to "ashamed," so now also—when "my body" is "in bonds" (v. 17). Christ—not Paul, "shall be magnified," life, or by death—Whatever be the issue, I cannot lose, I must be the gainer by the event. Paul was not omniscient; in the issue of things pertaining to themselves, the apostles underwent the same probation of faith and patience as we. 21. For—in either event (v. 20) I must be the gainer, "For to me," &c. to live is Christ—whatever life, time, and strength, I have, is Christ's; Christ is the sole object for which I live (Galatians 2, 20). to die is gain—Not the act of dying, but as the Greek ("to have died") expresses, the state after death. Besides the glorification of Christ by my death, which is my primary object (v. 20), the change of state caused by death, so far from being a matter of shame (v. 20) or loss, as my enemies suppose, will be a positive "gain" to me. 22. Rather as Greek, "But if to live in the flesh (if), this (I say, the continuance in life which I am undervaluing) be the fruit of my labour (i. e., be the condition in which the fruit of my ministerial labour is involved), then what I shall choose I know not" (I cannot determine with myself, if the choice were given me, both alternatives being great goods alike). So ALFORD and ELLIOTT. BENDEL takes it as English Version, which the Greek will bear by supposing an ellipsis, "If to live in the flesh (be my portion), this (continuing to live) is the fruit of my labour," i. e., this continuance in life will be the occasion of my bringing in "the fruit of labour," i. e., will be the occasion of "labours" which are their own "fruit" or reward; or, this my continuing "to live" will have this "fruit," viz., "labours" for Christ. GEORGIUS explains "the fruit of labour" as an idiom for "worth while;" If I live in the flesh, this is worth my while, for thus Christ's interest will be advanced, "For to me to live is Christ" (v. 21; cf. ch. 2, 30; Romans 1, 13). The second alternative, viz., dying, is taken up and handled, ch. 2, 17, "If I be offered." 23. For—The oldest MSS. read, "But." "I know not (v. 22), BUT am in a strait (am perplexed) betwixt the two (viz., 'to live' and 'to die'), having the desire for departing (lit., to loose anchor, 2 Timothy 4, 6) and being with Christ; FOR (so the oldest MSS.) it is by far better;" or as the Greek, more forcibly, "by far the more preferable;" a double comparative. This refutes the notion of the soul being dormant during its separation from the body. It also shows that, whilst he regarded the Lord's advent as at all times near, yet that his death before it was a very possible contingency. The partial life eternal is in the interval between death and Christ's second advent; the perfectional, at that advent. [BISHOP PEARSON.] To depart is better than to remain in the flesh; to be with Christ is far, far better; a New Testament hope (Hebrews 12, 24). [BENDEL.] 24. to abide—to continue somewhat longer. for you—Greek, "on your account;" "for your sake." In order to be of service to you, I am willing to forego my entrance a little sooner into blessedness; heaven will not fail to be mine at last. 25. Translate, "And being confident of this . . . know, &c.—by prophetic intimations of the Spirit. He did not yet know the issue, as far as human appearances were concerned (ch. 2, 23). He doubtless returned from his first captivity to Philippi (Hebrews 13, 19; Philemon 22). joy of faith—Greek, "joy in your faith." 26. Translate, "That your matter of glorying (or rejoicing) may abound in Christ Jesus in me (i. e., in my case; in respect to me, or for me who have been granted to your prayers, v. 19) through my presence again among you. ALFORD makes the "matter of glorying," the possession of the Gospel, received from Paul, which would abound, be assured and increased, by his presence among them; thus, "in me," implies that Paul is the worker of the material of abounding in Christ Jesus. But "my rejoicing over you" (ch. 2, 16), answers plainly to "your rejoicing in respect to me" here. 27. Only—Whatever happens as to my coming to you, or not, make this your one only care. By supposing this or that future contingency, many persuade themselves they will be such as they ought to be, but it is better always without evasion to perform present duties under present circumstances. [BENDEL.] let your conversation be—(Cf. ch. 3, 20.) The Greek implies, "Let your walk as citizens (viz., of the heavenly state; 'the city of the living God,' Hebrew 12, 22, 'the heavenly Jerusalem,' 'fellow-citizens of the saints,' Ephesians 2, 19) be," &c. I . . . see . . . hear—So v. 30. "Hear," in order to include both alternatives, must include the meaning know. your affairs—your state. in one spirit—the fruit of partaking of the Holy Spirit (Ephesians 4, 3, 4). with one mind—rather as Greek, "soul," the sphere of the affections; subordinate to the "Spirit," man's higher and heavenly nature. "There is sometimes natural antipathies among believers; but these are overcome, when there is not only unity of spirit, but also of soul." [BENDEL.] striving together—with united effort. 28. terrified—lit., said of horses or other animals startled or suddenly scared; so of sudden consternation in general. which—your not being terrified. evident token of perdition—if they would only perceive it (2 Thessalonians 1, 5). It attests this, that in contending hopelessly against you, they are only rushing on their own perdition, not shaking your united faith and constancy. to you of salvation—The oldest MSS. read, "Of your salvation;" not merely your temporal safety. 29. For—rather, a proof that this is an evident token from God of your salvation, "Because," &c. it is given—Greek, "It has been granted as a favour," or "gift of grace." Faith is the gift of God (Ephesians 2, 8), not wrought in the soul by the will of man, but by the Holy Ghost (John 1, 12, 13). believe on him—"To believe Him," would merely mean to believe He speaks the truth. "To believe on Him," is to believe in, and trust through, Him to obtain eternal salvation. Suffering for Christ is not only not a mark of God's anger, but a gift of His grace. 30. ye saw in me—(Acts 16, 12, 19, &c.; 1 Thessalonians 2, 2.) I am "in nothing terrified by mine adversaries" (v. 29), so ought not ye. The words here, "ye saw . . . and . . . hear," answer to "I come and see you, or else . . . hear" (v. 27).

CHAPTER XI.

Ver. 1-30. CONTINUED EXHORTATION: TO UNITY; TO HUMILITY AFTER CHRIST'S EXAMPLE, WHOSE GLORY FOLLOWED HIS HUMILIATION: TO EARNESTNESS IN SEEKING PERFECTION, THAT THEY MAY BE HIS JOY IN THE DAY OF CHRIST: HIS JOYFUL READINESS TO BE OFFERED NOW BY DEATH, SO AS TO PROMOTE THEIR FAITH. HIS INTENTION TO SEND TIMOTHY: HIS SENDING EPAPHRODITUS MEANTIME. 1. The "therefore" implies that he is here expanding on the exhortation (ch. 1, 7), "In one Spirit, with one mind" (soul). He urges four influencing motives in this verse, to inculcate the four Christian duties corresponding respectively to them (v. 2), "That ye be like-minded, having the same love, of one accord, of one mind" (1.) "If there be (with you) any consolation in Christ," i. e., any consolation of which Christ is the source leading you to wish to rejoice me in my afflictions" borne

for Christ's sake, ye owe it to me to grant my request 'that ye be like-minded' (CHRYSOSTOM and ESTIUS): (2.) 'If there be any comfort of (i. e., flowing from) love,' the adjunct of "consolation in Christ:" (3.) "If any fellowship of (communion together as Christians, flowing from joint participation in) the Spirit" (2 Corinthians 13. 14). As Pagans meant, illi, those who were of one village, and drank of one fountain, how much greater is the union which conjoins those who drink of the same Spirit! (1 Corinthians 12. 4, 13) (GROTIVS): (4.) "If any bowels (tender emotions) and mercies" (compassions), the adjuncts of "fellowship of the Spirit." The opposites of the two pairs, into which the four fall, are reprobated, v. 3, 4. 2. Fulli—i. e., Make full. I have joy in you, complete it by that which is still wanting, vis., unity (ch. 1. 9). like-minded—illi, "that ye be of the same mind:" more general than the following "of one mind." having the same love—equally disposed to love and be loved, being of one accord—illi, "with united souls." This pairs with the following clause, thus, "With united souls, being of one mind;" as the former two also pair together, "That ye be like-minded, having the same love." 3. Let nothing be done—The italicised words are not in the Greek. Perhaps the ellipsis had better be supplied from the Greek (v. 2), "Thinking nothing in the way of strife" (or rather, "factions intrigue," "self-seeking," note, ch. 1. 16). It is the thought which characterizes the action as good or bad before God. lowliness of mind—The direct relation of this grace is to God alone; it is the sense of dependence of the creature on the Creator as such, and it places all created beings in this respect on a level. The man "lowly of mind" as to his spiritual life is independent of men, and free from all slavish feeling, while sensible of his continual dependence on God. Still it INDIRECTLY affects his behaviour toward his fellow-men; for, conscious of his entire dependence on God for all his abilities, even as they are dependent on God for theirs, he will not pride himself on his abilities, or exalt self in his conduct toward others (Ephesians 4. 3; Colossians 3. 12). [NEANDER.] let each esteem—translate as Greek, "esteeming each other superior to yourselves." Instead of fixing your eyes on those points in which you excel, fix them on those in which your neighbour excels: this is true "humility." 4. The oldest MSS. read, "Not looking each of you (plural, Greek) on his own things (i. e., not having regard solely to them), but each of you on the things of others" also. Cf. v. 21; also Paul's own example (ch. 1. 24). 5. The oldest MSS. read, "Have this mind in you," &c. He does not put forward himself (see note, v. 4, and ch. 1. 24) as an example, but Christ, THE ONE pre-eminently who sought not His own, but "humbled Himself" (v. 8), first in taking on Him our nature, secondly, in humbling Himself further in that nature (Romans 15. 8). 5. Translate, "Who subsisting (or existing, vis., originally: the Greek is not the simple substantive verb, to be) in the form of God (the Divine essence is not meant: but the external self-manifesting characteristics of God, the form shining forth from His glorious essence. The Divine nature had infinite BEAUTY in itself, even without any creature contemplating that beauty: that beauty was 'the form of God:' as 'the form of a servant' (v. 7), which is in contrasted opposition to it, takes for granted the existence of His human nature, so 'the form of God' takes for granted His Divine nature [BENGEL], cf. John 5. 37; 17. 5; Colossians 1. 15, 'Who is the IMAGE of the invisible God' at a time before 'every creature,' 2 Corinthians 4. 4, esteemed (the same Greek verb as in v. 3) His being on an equality with God "no (act of) robbery" or self-arrogation; claiming to one's self what does not belong to him. ELLICOTT, WAHL, &c., have translated, "A thing to be grasped at," which would require the Greek to be harpagma, whereas harpagmos means the act of seizing. So harpagmos means in the only passage where else it occurs, PLUTARCH, De educatione puerorum, 120. The same insuperable objection lies against ALFORD'S translation, "He regarded not as self-enrichment (i. e., an opportunity for self-exaltation) His equality with God." His argument is that the antithesis (v. 7) requires it, 'He used His equality with God as an opportunity, not for self-exaltation, but for self-abasement, or emptying Himself. But the antithesis is not between His being on an equality with God, and His emptying Himself; for He never emptied Himself of the fullness of His Godhead, or His "BEING on an equality with God;" but between His being "in the form (i. e., the outward glorious self-manifestation) of God," and His "taking on Him the form of a servant," whereby He in a great measure emptied Himself of His precedent "form," or outward self-manifesting glory as God. Not "looking on His own things" (v. 4), He, though existing in the form of God, He esteemed it no robbery to be on an equality with God, yet made Himself of no reputation. "Being on an equality with God," is not identical with "subsisting in the form of God;" the latter expresses the external characteristics, majesty, and beauty of the Deity, which "He emptied Himself of," to assume "the form of a servant;" the former, "HIS BEING," or NATURE, His already existing STATE OF EQUALITY with God, both the Father and the Son having the same ESSENCE. A glimpse of Him "in the form of God," previous to His incarnation, was given to Moses (Exodus 24. 10, 11), Aaron, &c. 7. made himself of no reputation, and . . . and—rather as the Greek, "Emptied Himself, taking upon him the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men." The two latter clauses (there being no conjunctions, "and—and," in the Greek) expresses in what Christ's "emptying of Himself" consists, vis., in "taking the form of a servant" (note, Hebrews 10. 5; cf. Exodus 21. 5, 6, and Psalm 40. 6, proving that it was at the time when He assumed a body, He took "the form of a servant"), and in order to explain how He took "the form of a servant," there is added, by "being made in the likeness of men." His subjection to the law (Luke 2. 21; Galatians 4. 4) and to His parents (Luke 2. 51), His low state as a carpenter, and carpenter's reputed son (Matthew 13. 55; Mark 6. 3), His betrayal for the price of a bond-servant (Exodus 21. 32), and slave-like death to relieve us from the slavery of sin and death, finally and chiefly, His servant-like dependence as man on God, whilst His divinity was not outwardly manifested (Isaiah 49. 3, 7), are all marks of His "form as a servant." This proves (1.) He was in the form of a servant as soon as He was made man. (2.) He was "in the form of God" before He was "in the form of a servant." (3.) He did as really subsist in the Divine nature, as in the form of a servant, or in the nature of man. For He was as much "in the form of God" as "in the form of a servant;" and was so in the form of God as "to be on an equality with God:" He therefore could have been none other than God; for God saith, "To whom will ye liken me and make me equal" (Isaiah 46. 5)? [BISHOP PEARSON.] His emptying Himself presupposes His previous plenitude of Godhead (John 1. 14; Colossians 1. 19; 2. 9). He remained full of this; yet He bore Himself as if He were empty. being found in fashion as a man—being already, by His "emptying Himself," in the form of a servant, or likeness of man (Romans 8. 3), "He humbled Himself (still further by) becoming obedient even unto death (not as English Version, 'He humbled Himself and became,' &c.; the Greek has no 'and,' and has the participle, not the verb), and that the death of the cross." "Fashion" expresses that He had the outward guise, speech, and look. In v. 7, in the Greek, the emphasis is on Himself (which stands before the Greek verb), "He emptied Himself," His Divine self, viewed in respect to what He had heretofore been; in v. 8 the emphasis is on "humbled" (which stands before the Greek "Himself"); He not only "emptied Himself" of His previous "form of God," but submitted to positive HUMILIATION. He "became obedient," vis., to God, as His "servant" (Romans 5. 19; Hebrews 5. 8). Therefore "God" is said to "exalt" Him (v. 9), even as it was God to whom He became voluntarily "obedient." "Even unto death" expresses the climax of His obedience (John 10. 18). 9. Wherefore—As the just consequence of His self-humiliation and obedience (Psalm 8. 5, 6; 110. 1, 7; Matthew 28. 18; Luke 24. 26; John 5. 27; 10. 17; Romans 14. 7; Ephesians 1. 20-22; Hebrews 2. 9). An intimation, that if we would hereafter be exalted, we too must, after His example, now humble ourselves (v. 8. 5; ch. 3. 21; 1 Peter 5. 5, 6). Christ emptied Christ; God exalted Christ as man to equality with God. [BENGEL.] highly exalted—Greek, "super-emminently exalted" (Ephesians 4. 10). given him—Greek, "bestowed on Him." a name—along with the corresponding reality, glory and majesty. which—translate, "(viz.) that which is above every name." The name "Jesus" (v. 10), which is even now in glory His name of honour (Acts 9. 5). "Above" not only men, but angels (Ephesians 1. 21). 10. at the name—rather as Greek, "in the name." bow—rather, "bend," in token of worship. Referring to Isaiah 45. 23; quoted also in Romans 14. 11. To worship "in the name of Jesus," is to worship Jesus Himself (cf. v. 11; Proverbs 18. 10), or God in Christ (John 16. 23; Ephesians 3. 14). Cf. "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord (i. e., whosoever shall call on the Lord in His revealed character) shall be saved" (Romans 10. 13; 1 Corinthians 1. 2); "all that call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord" (cf. 2 Timothy 2. 22); "call on the Lord;" Acts 7. 59, "calling upon . . . and saying, Lord Jesus" (Acts 9. 14, 21; 22. 16). of things in heaven—angels. They worship Him not only as God, but as the ascended God-man, "Jesus" (Ephesians 1. 21; Hebrews 1. 6; 1 Peter 3. 22). in earth—men; among whom He tabernacled for a time. under the earth—the dead; among whom He was numbered once (Romans 14. 9, 11; Ephesians 4. 9, 10; Revelation 5. 13). The demons and the lost may be included indirectly, as even they give homage, though one of fear, not love, to Jesus (Mark 8. 11; Luke 8. 31; James 2. 19; see Note, v. 11). 11. every tongue—Cf. "every knee" (v. 10). In every way He shall be acknowledged as Lord (no longer as "servant," v. 7). As none can fully do so "but by the Holy Ghost" (1 Corinthians 12. 3), the spirits of good men who are dead, must be the class directly meant, v. 10, "under the earth." to the glory of God the Father—the grand end of Christ's mediatorial office and kingdom, which shall cease when this end shall have been fully realized (John 5. 19-23, 30; 17. 1, 4-7; 1 Corinthians 15. 24-28). 12. Wherefore—Seeing that we have in Christ such a specimen of glory resulting from "obedience" (v. 8) and humiliation, see that ye also be "obedient," and so "your salvation" shall follow your obedience, as ye have . . . obeyed—"even as ye have been obedient," viz., to God, as Jesus was "obedient" unto God (Note, v. 8). not as, &c.—"not as if" it were a matter to be done "in my presence only, but now (as things are) much more (with more earnestness) (in my absence)" (because my help is withdrawn from you). [ALFORD.] work out—carry out to its full perfection. "Salvation" is "worked in" (v. 13; Ephesians 1. 11) believers by the Spirit, who enables them through faith to be justified once for all; but it needs, as a progressive work, to be "worked out" by obedience, through the help of the same Spirit, unto perfection (2 Peter 1. 5. 3). The sound Christian neither, like the formalist, rests in the means, without looking to the end, and to the Holy Spirit who alone can make the means effectual; nor, like the fanatic, hopes to attain the end without the means. your own—The emphasis is on this. Now that I am not present to further the work of your salvation, "work out your own salvation" yourselves the more carefully. Do not think this work cannot go on because I am absent; "for (v. 13) it is God that worketh in you," &c. In this case adopt a rule different from the former (v. 4), but resting on the same principle of "lowliness of mind" (v. 3), viz., "look each on his own things," instead of "disputings" with others (v. 14). salvation—which is in "Jesus" (v. 10), as His name (meaning God-Saviour) implies. with fear and trembling—the very feeling enjoined on "servants," as to what ought to accompany their "obedience" (Ephesians 6. 5). So here, see that, as "servants" to God, after the example of Christ, ye be so "with the fear and trembling" which becomes servants; not slavish fear, but trembling anxiety not to fall short of the goal (1 Corinthians 9. 26, 27; Hebrews 4. 1, "Let us fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any should come short of it"), resulting from a sense of our human insufficiency, and from the consciousness that all depends on the power of God, "who worketh both to will and to do" (Romans 11. 20). "Paul, though joyous, writes seriously" J. J. WOLF.] 13. For—Encouragement to work: "For it is God who worketh in you," always present with you, though I be absent. It is not said, "Work out your own salvation, though it is God," &c., but, "because it is God who," &c. The will and the power to work, being first instalments of His grace, encourage us to make full proof of, and carry out to the end, the "salvation" which He has first "worked," and is still "working in" us, enabling us to "work it out." "Our will does nothing thereunto without grace—but grace is inactive without our will." [ST. BERNARD.] Man is, in different senses, entirely active, and entirely passive: God producing all, and we acting all. What He produced is our own acts. It is not that God does some, and we the rest. God does all, and we do all. God is the only proper author, we the only proper actors. Thus the same things in Scripture are represented as from God, and from us. God makes a new heart, and we are commanded to make us a new heart; not merely because we must use the means in order to the effect, but the effect itself is our act and our duty (Ezekiel 11. 19; 18. 31; 36. 26). [EDWARDS.] worketh—rather as Greek, "worketh effectually." We cannot of ourselves embrace the Gospel of grace: "the will" (Psalm 110. 3; 2 Corinthians 3. 5) comes solely of God's gift to whom He will (John 6. 44, 65); so also the power "to do" (rather, "to work effectually," as 'he Greek is the same as that for "worketh in"), i. e., effectual perseverance to the end, is wholly of God's gift (ch. 1. 6; Hebrews 13. 21). of his good pleasure—rather as Greek, "for His good pleasure;" in order to carry out His sovereign gracious purpose towards you (Ephesians 1. 5, 9). 14. murmurings—secret murmurings and complaints against your fellow-men arising from selfishness: opposed to the example of Jesus just mentioned (cf. the use of the word, John 7. 12, 13; Acts 6. 1; 1 Peter 4. 9; Jude 16). disputings—The Greek is translated "doubting" in 1 Timothy 2. 8. But here referring to profitless "disputings" with our fellow-men, in relation to whom we are called on to be "blameless and harmless" (v. 15): so the Greek is translated, Mark 9. 33, 34. These disputings flow from "vainglory" reprobated (v. 3); abounded among the Aristotelian philosophers in Macedonia, where Philippi was. 15. blameless and harmless—Without either the repute of mischief, or the inclination to do it. [ALFORD.] sons—rather as Greek, "the children of God" (Romans 8. 14-16). Imitation of our Heavenly Father is the instinctive guide to our duty as His children, more than any external law (Matthew 5. 44, 45, 48). without rebuke—"without (giving handle for) reproach." The whole verse tacitly refers by contrast to Deuteronomy 32. 5, "Their spot . . . not . . . of His children . . . a perverse and crooked generation" (cf. 1 Peter 2. 12). ye shine—lit., "appear." [TRENCH.] "Show yourselves" (cf. Matthew 5. 14-16; Ephesians 5. 8-13). as lights in the world—The Greek expresses "as luminaries in the world," as the sun and moon, "the lights," or "great lights," in the material world or in the firmament. LXX. use the very same Greek word in the passage, Genesis 1. 14, 16; cf. Note, Revelation 21. 11. 16. Holding forth—to them, and so applying it (the common meaning of the Greek; perhaps here including also the other meaning, "holding fast"). The image of light-bearers or luminaries is carried on from v. 13. As the heavenly luminaries' light is closely connected with the life of animals, so ye hold forth the light of Christ's "word" (received from me) which is the "life" of the Gentiles (John 1. 4; 1 John 1. 1, 5-7). Christ is "the Light of the world" (John 8. 12); believers are only "light-bearers" reflecting His light. that I may rejoice in—lit., "with a view to (your being) a subject of rejoicing to me against the day of Christ" (ch. 4. 1; 2 Corinthians 1. 14; 1 Thessalonians 2. 19). that I have not run in vain—that it was not in vain that I laboured for your spiritual good. 17. Yea, and if—rather as Greek, "Yea, if even:" implying that he regarded the contingency as not unlikely. He had assumed the possibility of his being found alive at Christ's coming (for in every age Christ designed Christians to stand in preparedness for His coming as at hand). he here puts a supposition which he regards as now likely, viz., his own death before Christ's coming. I be offered—rather as Greek, "I am poured out." "I am made a libation." Present, not future, as the danger is threatening him now. As in sacrifices libations of wine were "poured upon" the offerings; so he represents his Philippian converts, offered through faith (or else their faith itself), as the sacrifice, and his blood as the libation "poured upon" it (cf. Romans 15. 16; 2 Timothy 4. 6). service—Greek, priest's ministration: "carrying out the image of a sacrifice. I rejoice—for myself (ch. 1. 21, 23). His expectation of release from prison is much fainter, than in the Epistles to Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, written somewhat earlier from Rome. The appointment of Tigellinus to be Prætorian Prefect, was probably the cause of this change. See Introduction. rejoice with you all—ALFORD translates, "I congratulate you all," viz., on the honour occurring to you by my blood being poured out on the sacrifice of your faith. If they rejoiced already (as English Version represents), what need of his urging them, "Do ye also joy," &c. 18. "Do ye also rejoice" at this honour to you, "and congratulate me" on my blessed "gain" (ch. 1. 21). 19. Ver. 22, "Ye know the proof of him . . . that . . . he hath served with me," implies that Timothy had been long with Paul at Philippi. Accordingly, in the history (Acts 18. 1-4; 17. 10, 14), we find them setting out together from Derbe in Lycaonia, and together again at Berea in Macedonia, near the conclusion of St. Paul's missionary journey: an undesigned coincidence between the Epistle and history, a mark of genuineness. [PALEY.] From v. 19-50, it appears Epaphroditus was to set out at once to allay the anxiety of the Philippians on his account, and at the same time bearing the Epistle; Timothy was to follow after the apostle's liberation was decided, when they could arrange their plans more definitely as to where Timothy should, on his return with tidings from Philippi, meet Paul, who was designing by a wider circuit, and slower progress, to reach that city. Paul's reason for sending Timothy so soon after having heard of the Philippians from Epaphroditus was, that they were now suffering persecutions (ch. 1. 28-30); and besides, Epaphroditus' delay through sickness on his journey to Rome from Philippi, made the tidings he brought to be of less recent date than Paul desired. St. Paul himself also hoped to visit them shortly. But I trust—Yet my death is by no means certain; yea, "I hope (Greek) in the Lord" (i. e., by the Lord's help). unto you—lit., "for you," i. e., to your satisfaction, not merely motion, to you. I also—That not only you "may be of good courage" (so Greek) on hearing of me (v. 23), but "I also, when I know your state," 20. His reason for sending Timothy above all others: I have none so "like-minded," lit., "like-souled," with myself as is Timothy. Cf. Deuteronomy 13. 6, "Thy friend which is as thine own soul" (Psalm 53. 14). Paul's second self. naturally—Greek, "genuinely:" "with sincere solicitude." A case wherein the Spirit of God so changed man's nature, that to be natural was with him to be spiritual: the great point to be aimed at. 21. Translate as Greek, "They all" (viz., who are now with me, ch. 1. 14, 17; ch. 4. 21: such Demas, then with him, proved to be, Colossians 4. 14; cf. 2 Timothy 4. 10; Philemon 24). seek their own—Opposed to Paul's precept (v. 4; 1 Corinthians 10. 24, 33; 13. 5). This is spoken, by comparison with Timothy; for ch. 1. 16, 17, implies that some of those with Paul at Rome were genuine Christians, though not so self-sacrificing as Timothy. Few come to the help of the Lord's cause, where ease, fame, and gain, have to be sacrificed. Most help only when Christ's gain is compatible with their own (Judges 5. 17, 23). 22. Rare praise (Nehemiah 7. 2). as a son with the father—translate, "as a child (serveth) a father." served with me—When we might expect the sentence to run thus, "As a child serveth a father, so he served me;" he changes it to "served with me" in modesty; as Christians are not servants to one another, but servants of God with one another (cf. ch. 3. 17). In the Gospel—Greek, "unto," or "for the Gospel." 23. so soon as I shall see—i. e., so soon as I shall have known for certain. 24. also myself—as well as Timothy. 25. I supposed—"I thought it necessary." to send—It was properly a sending Epaphroditus back (ch. 4. 18). But as he had come intending to stay some time with Paul, the latter uses the word "send" (cf. v. 30). fellow-soldier—in the "good fight" of faith (ch. 1. 27, 30; 2 Timothy 2. 8; 4. 7). your messenger—lit., "apostle." The "apostles" or "messengers of the churches" (Romans 16. 7; 2 Corinthians 8. 23), were distinct from the "apostles" specially commissioned by Christ, as the Twelve and Paul, ministered to my wants—by conveying the contributions from Philippi. The Greek leitourgon, lit., implies ministering in the ministerial office. Probaby Epaphroditus was a presbyter or else a deacon. 26. For—Reason for thinking it "necessary to send" Epaphroditus. Translate as Greek, "Inasmuch as he was longing after you all." full of heaviness—The Greek expresses the being worn out and overpowered with heavy grief. because that ye had heard that he had been sick—rather, "that he was sick." He felt how exceedingly saddened you would be in hearing it; and he now is hastening to relieve your minds of the anxiety. 27. Epaphroditus' sickness proves that the apostles had not ordinarily the permanent gift of miracles, any more than of inspiration: both were vouchsafed to them only for each particular occasion, as the Spirit thought fit. lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow—viz., the sorrow of losing him by death, in addition to the sorrow of my imprisonment. Here only occurs anything of a sorrowful tone in this Epistle, which generally is most joyous. 29. Receive him—There seems to be something behind respecting him. If extreme affection had been the sole ground of his "heaviness," no such exhortation would have been needed. [ALFORD.] in reputation—"in honour." 30. for the work of Christ—viz., the bringing of a supply to me, the minister of Christ. He was probably in a delicate state of health in setting out from Philippi; but at all hazards he undertook this service of Christian love, which cost him a serious sickness. not regarding his life—Most of the oldest MSS read, "hazarding," &c. to supply your lack of service—Not that Paul would imply, they lacked the will: what they "lacked" was the "opportunity" by which to send their accustomed bounty (ch. 4. 10). "That which ye would have done if you could [but which you could not through absence], he did for you; therefore receive him with all joy." [ALFORD.]

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-21. WARNING AGAINST JUDAIZERS: HE HAS GREATER CAUSE THAN THEY TO TRUST IN LEGAL RIGHTEOUSNESS, BUT RENOUNCED IT FOR CHRIST'S RIGHTEOUSNESS, IN WHICH HE PRESSES AFTER PERFECTION: WARNING AGAINST CARNAL PERSONS: CONTRAST OF THE BELIEVER'S LIFE AND HOPE. 1. Finally—rather, not with the notion of time, but making a transition to another general subject, "Furthermore" [BENJEL and WAHL] as in 1 Thessalonians 4. 1. Lit., "As to what remains," &c. It is often used at the conclusion of Epistles for "finally" (Ephesians 6. 10; 2 Thessalonians 3. 1). But it is not restricted to this meaning, as ALFORD thinks, supposing that Paul used it here intending to close his Epistle, but was led by the mention of the Judaizers into a more lengthened dissertation. the same things—concerning "rejoicing," the prevailing feature in this Epistle (ch. 1. 18, 25; 2. 17; 4. 4, where, cf. the "again I say," with "the same things" here). "In the Lord," marks the true ground of joy, in contrast with "having confidence in the flesh," or in any outward sensible matter of boasting (v. 3). not grievous—"not irksome." for you it is safe—Spiritual joy is the best safety against error (v. 2; Nehemiah 8. 10, end). 2. Beware—Greek, "Have your eye on" so as to beware of. Contrast "mark," or "observe," viz., so as to follow v. 17. dogs—(Greek, "the dogs," viz., those impure persons "of whom I have told you often" (v. 18, 19); "the abominable" (cf. Revelation 21. 8, with 22. 15; Matthew 7. 6; Titus 1. 15, 16): "Dogs" in filthiness, unchastity, and snarling (Deuteronomy 23. 18, Psalm 59 & 11. 15; 2 Peter 2. 22): especially "enemies of the cross of Christ" (v. 18; Psalm 22. 16, 20). The Jews regarded the

Gentiles as "dogs" (Matthew 15. 26); but by their own unbelief they have ceased to be the true Israel, and are become "dogs" (cf. Isaiah 56. 10, 11). evil workers—2 Corinthians 11. 13, "deceitful workers." Not simply "evildoers" are meant, but men who "worked," indeed, ostensibly for the Gospel, but worked for evil; "serving not our Lord, but their own belly" (v. 19; cf. Romans 16. 18). Translate, "The evil workmen," i. e., bad teachers (cf. 2 Timothy 2. 15). conclusion—Circumcision had now lost its spiritual significance, and was now become to those who rested on it as any ground of justification, a senseless mutilation. Christians have the only true circumcision, viz., that of the heart; legalists have only "conclusion," i. e., the cutting off of the flesh. To make "cuttings in the flesh" was expressly prohibited by the law (Leviticus 21. 5): it was a Gentile-heathenish practice (1 Kings 18. 28); yet this, writes Paul indignantly, is what these legalists are virtually doing in violation of the law. There is a remarkable gradation, says BIRKS (Horæ Apostolicæ) in St. Paul's language as to circumcision. In his first recorded discourse (Acts 13. 39), circumcision is not named, but implied as included in the law of Moses which cannot justify. Six or seven years later, in Epistle to Galatians (3. 3), the first Epistle in which it is named, its spiritual inefficiency is maintained against those Gentiles who, beginning in the Spirit, thought to be perfected in the flesh. Later, in Epistle to Romans (2. 28, 29), he goes farther, and claims the substance of it for every believer, assigning the shadow only of it to the unbelieving Jew. In Epistle to Colossians (2. 11; 3. 11), still later, he expounds more fully the true circumcision as the exclusive privilege of the believer. Last of all here, the very name is denied to the legalist, and a term of reproach is substituted, "conclusion," or flesh-cutting. Once obligatory on all the covenant people, then reduced to a mere national distinction, it was more and more associated in the apostle's experience with the open hostility of the Jews, and the perverse teaching of false brethren. 3. "We are the (real) circumcision" (Romans 2. 28-29; Colossians 2. 11). worship God in the Spirit—The oldest MSS. read, "Worship by the Spirit of God." our religious service is rendered by the Spirit (John 4. 23, 24). Legal worship was outward, and consisted in outward acts, restricted to certain times and places. Christian worship is spiritual, flowing from the inworkings of the Holy Spirit, not relating to certain isolated acts, but embracing the whole life (Romans 12. 1). In the former, men trusted in something human, whether descent from the theocratic nation, or the righteousness of the law, or mortification of "the flesh" ("Having confidence," or "glorying in the flesh") [NEANDER] (Romans 1. 9). rejoice in Jesus Christ—"make our boast in Christ Jesus," not in the law: the ground of their boasting, have no confidence in the flesh—but in the Spirit. 4. "Although I (emphatical) might have confidence even in the flesh." Id., "I having," &c., but not using, "confidence in the flesh." I more—have more "whereof I might have confidence in the flesh." 5. In three particulars he shows how he "might have confidence in the flesh" (v. 4): (1.) His pure Jewish blood. (2.) His legal preciseness and high status as such. (3.) His zeal for the law. The Greek is id., "Being in circumcision an eighth-day person," i. e., not one circumcised in later life as a proselyte, but on the eighth day after birth, as the law directed in the case of Jew-born infants. of the tribe of Benjamin—son of Rachel, not of the maid servant. [BENGEL.] Hebrew of the Hebrews—neither one or other parent being Gentile. The "Hebrew," wherever he dwelt, retained the language of his fathers. Thus Paul, though settled in Tarsus, a Greek city, calls himself a Hebrew. A "Grecian" or Hellenist, on the other hand, in the New Testament, is the term used for a Greek-speaking Jew. [TRENCH.] touching the law—i. e., as to legal status and strictness. a Pharisee—"of the strictest sect" (Acts 23. 5). 6. concerning—translate as before and after, "As touching zeal" (cf. Acts 22. 3; 23. 9). blameless—Greek, "Having become blameless" as to ceremonial righteousness: having attained in the eyes of man blameless legal perfection. As to the holiness before God, which is the inner and truest spirit of the law, and which flows from "the righteousness of God by faith," he on the contrary declares (v. 12-14) that he has not attained perfection. 7. gain—rather as Greek, "gains;" including all possible advantages of outward status, which he had heretofore enjoyed. I counted—Greek, "I have counted for Christ's sake loss." He no longer uses the plural as in "gains;" for he counts them all but one great "loss" (Matthew 16. 26; Luke 9. 25). 8. Yea doubtless—The oldest MSS. omit "doubtless" (Greek, "ge"); translate, "nay more." Not only "have I counted" those things just mentioned "loss for Christ's sake, but, moreover, I even do count ALL things but loss," &c. for the excellency—Greek, "On account of the surpassing excellency (the super-eminence above them all) of the knowledge of Christ Jesus." my Lord—Believing and loving appropriation of Him (Psalm 63. 1; John 20. 28). for whom—"on account of whom." I have suffered the loss—Not merely I "counted" them "loss," but have actually lost them. all things—The Greek has the article, referring to the preceding "all things:" "I have suffered the loss of them all." dung—Greek, "refuse (such as excrements, dregs, dross) cast to the dogs," as the derivation expresses. A "loss" is of something having value; but "refuse" is thrown away as not worthy of being any more touched or looked at. win—translate, to accord with the translation, v. 7, "gain Christ." A man cannot make other things his "gain" or chief confidence, and at the same time "gain Christ." He who loses all things, and even himself, on account of Christ, gains Christ: Christ is His, and He is Christ's (Song of Solomon 2. 16; 6. 3; Luke 9. 23, 24; 1 Corinthians 3. 23). 9. be found in him—"be found" at His coming again, living spiritually "in Him" as the element of my life. Once lost, I have been "found" and I hope to be perfectly "found" by Him (Luke 15. 8). own righteousness . . . of the law—(V. 6; Romans 10. 3, 5.) "Of," i. e., from, righteousness . . . of God by faith—Greek, "which is from God (resting) upon faith." Paul was transported from legal bondage into Christian freedom at once, and without any gradual transition. Hence, the bands of Pharisaism were loosed instantaneously; and opposition to Pharisaic Judaism took the place of opposition to the Gospel. Thus God's providence fitly prepared him for the work of overthrowing all idea of legal justification. "The righteousness of faith," in Paul's sense, is the righteousness or perfect holiness of Christ appropriated by faith, as the objective ground of confidence for the believer, and also as a new subjective principle of life. Hence it includes the essence of a new disposition, and may easily pass into the idea of sanctification, though the two ideas are originally distinct. It is not any arbitrary act of God, as if he treated as sinless a man persisting in sin, simply because he believes in Christ; but the objective on the part of God corresponds to the subjective on the part of man, viz., faith. The realization of the archetype of holiness through Christ, contains the pledge that this shall be realized in all who are one with Him by faith, and are become the organs of His Spirit. Its germ is imparted to them in believing, although the fruit of a life perfectly conformed to the Redeemer, can only be gradually developed in this life. [NEANDER.] 10. That I may know him—experimentally. The aim of the "righteousness" just mentioned. This verse resumes, and more fully explains, "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ" (v. 8). To know HIM is more than merely to know a doctrine about Him. Believers are brought not only to redemption, but to the Redeemer Himself, the power of his resurrection—assuring believers of their justification (Romans 4. 25; 1 Corinthians 15. 17), and raising them up spiritually with Him, by virtue of their identification with Him in this, as in all the acts of His redeeming work for us (Romans 6. 4; Colossians 2. 12; 3. 1). The power of the Divine Spirit which raised Him from literal death, is the same which raises believers from spiritual death now (Ephesians 1. 19, 20), and shall raise their bodies from literal death hereafter (Romans 8. 11). the fellowship of his sufferings—by identification with Him in His sufferings and death, by imputation; also, in actually bearing the cross whatever is laid on us, after His example, and so "filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ" (Colossians 1. 24); and in the will to bear aught for His sake (Matthew 10. 38; 18. 24; 2 Timothy 2. 11). As He bore all our sufferings (Isaiah 53. 4), so we participate in His, made conformable unto his death—"conformed to the likeness of His death," viz., by continued sufferings for His sake and mortifying of the carnal self (Romans 8. 30; 1 Corinthians 15. 31; 2 Corinthians 4. 10-12; Galatians 2. 30). 11. If by any means—Not implying uncertainty of the issue, but the earnestness of the struggle of faith (1 Corinthians 9. 26, 27), and the urgent need of jealous self-watchfulness (1 Corinthians 10. 12). attain unto the resurrection of the dead—The oldest MSS. read, ". . . the resurrection from (out of) the dead," viz., the first resurrection; that of believers at Christ's coming (1 Corinthians 15. 23; 1 Thessalonians 4. 15; Revelation 20. 5, 6). The Greek word occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. "The power of Christ's resurrection" (Romans 1. 4), ensures the believer's attainment of the "resurrection from the (rest of the) dead" (cf. v. 20, 21). Cf. "Accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead" (Luke 20. 35). "The resurrection of the just" (Luke 14. 14). 12. Translate, "Not that I," &c. (I do not wish to be understood as saying that, &c.) attained—"obtained," viz., a perfect knowledge of Christ, and of the power of His death, and fellowship of His sufferings, and a conformity to His death, either were already perfect—"Or am already perfected," i. e., crowned with the garland of victory, my course completed, and perfection absolutely reached. The image is that of a race-course throughout. See 1 Corinthians 9. 24; Hebrews 12. 23. See TRENCH, Synonyms of New Testament. I follow after—"I press on." apprehend . . . apprehend—"If so be that I may lay hold on that (viz., the prize, v. 14) for which also I was laid hold on by Christ" (viz., at my conversion, Song of Solomon 1. 4; 1 Corinthians 13. 12). Jesus—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Paul was close to "apprehending" the prize (2 Timothy 4. 7, 8). Christ the Author, is also the Finisher of His people's "race." 13. I—whatever others count as to themselves. He who counts himself perfect, must deceive himself by calling sin infirmity (1 John 1. 8); at the same time, each must aim at perfection, to be a Christian at all (Matthew 5. 48). forgetting those things . . . behind—Looking back is sure to end in going back (Luke 9. 62): So Lot's wife (Luke 17. 32). If in stemming a current we cease pulling the oar against it, we are carried back. God's word to us is as it was to Israel, "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward" (Exodus 14. 15). The Bible is our landmark to show us whether we are progressing or retrograding. reaching forth—with hand and foot, like a runner in a race, and the body bent forward. The Christian is always humbled by the contrast between what he is and what he desires to be. The eye reaches before and draws on the hand, the hand reaches before and draws on the foot. [BENGEI.] unto—towards (Hebrews 6. 1). 14. high calling—lit., "the calling that is above" (Galatians 4. 26; Colossians 3. 1): "the heavenly calling" (Hebrews 3. 1). "The prize" is "the crown of righteousness" (1 Corinthians 9. 24; 2 Timothy 4. 8). Revelation 2. 10, "crown of life." 1 Peter 5. 4, "A crown of glory that fadeth not away." "The high," or "heavenly calling," is not restricted, as ALFORD thinks, to St. Paul's own calling as an apostle by the summons of God from heaven; but the common calling of all Christians to salvation in Christ, which coming from heaven invites us to heaven, whither accordingly our minds ought to be uplifted. 15. therefore—Resuming v. 3. "As many of us then, as are perfect," i. e., fully grown (no longer "babes") in the Christian life (v. 3, "worshipping God in the Spirit, and having no confidence in the flesh"), 1 Corinthians 2. 6, fully established in things of God. Here, by "perfect," he means one fully fit for running [BENGEI.]; knowing and complying with the laws of the course (2 Timothy 2. 5). Though "perfect" in this sense, he was not yet "made perfect" (Greek) in the sense intended in v. 12, viz., "crowned with complete victory," and having attained absolute perfection.

thus minded—having the mind which he had described v. 7-14. otherwise minded—having too high an opinion of yourselves as to your attainment of Christian perfection. "He who thinks that he has attained everything hath nothing." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Probably, too, he refers to those who were tempted to think to attain to perfection by the law (Galatians 3. 3): who needed the warning (v. 3), "Beware of the concision," though on account of their former piety, Paul hopes confidently (as in Galatians 5. 10) that God will reveal the path of right-mindedness to them. Paul taught externally; God reveals" the truth internally by His Spirit (Matthew 11. 25; 18. 17; 1 Corinthians 3. 6). unto you—who sincerely strive to do God's will (John 7. 17; Ephesians 1. 17). 16. The expectation of a new revelation is not to make you less careful in walking according to whatever degree of knowledge of Divine things and perfection you have already attained. God makes further revelations to those who walk up to the revelations they already have (Hosea 6. 3). rule, let us mind the same thing—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Perhaps partly inserted from Galatians 6. 16, and ch. 2. 2. Translate then, "Whereunto we have attained, let us walk on (a military term, march in order) in the same" (the measure of knowledge already attained). 17. followers—Greek, "imitators together." of me—as I am an imitator of Christ (1 Corinthians 11. 1): Imitate me no farther than as I imitate Christ. Or as BENGEI, "My fellow-imitators of God" or "Christ:" "imitators of Christ together with me" (Note, ch. 2. 22; Ephesians 5. 1). mark—for imitation. which walk so as ye have us for an ensample—In English Version of the former clause, the translation of this clause is, "those who are walking so as ye have an example in us." But in BENGEI'S translation, "Inasmuch as," or "since," instead of "as." 18. many walk—in such a manner. Follow not evil-doers, because they are "many" (Exodus 23. 2). Their numbers are rather a presumption against their being Christ's "little flock" (Luke 12. 32). often—There is need of constant warning. weeping—(Romans 9. 2) A hard tone in speaking of the inconsistencies of professors is the very opposite of Paul's spirit, and David's (Psalm 119. 136), and Jeremiah's (Jeremiah 13. 17). The Lord and His apostles, at the same time, speak more strongly against empty professors (as the Pharisees), than against open scoffers. enemies of the cross of Christ—in their practice, not in doctrine (Galatians 6. 14; Hebrews 6. 6; 10. 29). 19. destruction—everlasting at Christ's coming. Ch. 1. 28, "perdition:" the opposite word is "Saviour" (v. 20). end—fixed doom. whose god is their belly—(Romans 16. 18)—hereafter to be destroyed by God (1 Corinthians 6. 13). In contrast to our "body" (v. 21), which our God, the Lord Jesus, shall "fashion like unto His glorious body." Their belly is now pampered, our body now wasted; then the respective states of both shall be reversed. glory is in their shame—As "glory" is often used in the Old Testament for "God" (Psalm 106. 20), so here it answers to "whose God," in the parallel clause; and "shame" is the Old Testament term contemptuously given to an idol (Judges 6. 32, Margin). Hosea 4. 7 seems to be referred to by St. Paul (cf. Romans 1. 32). There seems no allusion to circumcision, as no longer glorious, but a shame to them (v. 2). The reference of the immediate context is to sensuality, and carnality in general. mind earthly things—(Romans 8. 5). In contrast to v. 20; Colossians 3. 2. 20. our conversation—rather, "our state" or "country:" our citizenship. Our life as citizens. We are but pilgrims on earth; how then should we "mind earthly things" (v. 18 Hebrews 11. 9, 10, 13-16)? Roman citizenship was then highly prized; how much more should the heavenly citizenship (Acts 22. 28; cf. Luke 10. 20)? is—Greek, "has its existence." in heaven—Greek, "in the heavens." look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ—"We wait for (so the same Greek is translated, Romans 8. 19) the Lord Jesus as a (i. e., in the capacity of a) Saviour" (Hebrews 9. 28). That He is "the Lord," now exalted above every name, assures our expectation (ch. 2. 9-11). Our High Priest is gone up into the Holy of Holies not made with hands, there to atone for us; and as the Israelites stood outside the tabernacle, expecting Aaron's return (cf. Luke 1. 21), so must we look unto the heavens expecting Christ thence. 21. Greek, "Who shall transfigure the body of our humiliation (viz., in which our humiliation has place, 1 Corinthians 4. 10; Ephesians 2. 19; 2 Timothy 2. 12), that it may be conformed unto the body of His glory (viz., in which His glory is manifested), according to the effectual working whereby," &c. Not only shall He come as our "Saviour," but also as our Glorifier. even—Not only to make the body like His own, but "to subdue all things," even death itself, as well as Satan and sin. He gave a sample of the coming transfiguration on the mount (Matthew 17. 1, &c.). Not a change of identity, but of fashion or form (Psalm 17. 15; 1 Corinthians 15. 51). Our spiritual resurrection now is the pledge of our bodily resurrection to glory hereafter (v. 20; Romans 8. 11). As Christ's glorified body was essentially identical with His body of humiliation; so our resurrection bodies as believers, since they shall be like His, shall be identical essentially with our present bodies, and yet "spiritual bodies" (1 Corinthians 15. 42-44). Our "hope" is, that Christ, by His rising from the dead, hath obtained the power, and is become the pattern, of our resurrection (Micah 2. 13).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-23. EXHORTATIONS: THANKS FOR THE SUPPLY FROM PHILIPPI: GREETING; AND CLOSING BENEDECTION. 1. "Wherefore;" since we have such a glorious hope (ch. 3. 20, 21). dearly beloved—Repeated again at the close of the verse, implying that his great love to them should be a motive to their obedience. longed for—"yearned after" in your absence (ch. 1. 8). crown—in the day of the Lord (ch. 2. 16; 1 Thessalonians 2. 19). so—as I have admonished you. stand fast—(Ch. 1. 27.) 2. Euodia and Syntyche were two women who seem to have been at variance; probably deaconesses of the Church. He repeats, "I beseech," as if he would admonish each separately, and with the utmost impartiality. In the Lord—the true element of Christian union; for those "in the Lord" by faith to be at variance, is an utter inconsistency. 3. And—Greek, "Yea." true yoke-fellow—yoked with me in the same Gospel yoke (Matthew 11. 29, 30; cf. 1 Timothy 5. 17, 18). Either Timothy, Silas (Acts 15. 40; 16. 19, at Philippi), or the chief bishop of Philippi. Or else the Greek, Synzeugus, or Synzygus, is a proper name: "Who art truly, as thy name means, a yoke-fellow." Certainly not Paul's wife, as 1 Corinthians 9. 5 implies he had none. help those women—rather, as Greek, "help them," viz., Euodia and Syntyche. "Co-operate with them" (BIRKS); or as ALFORD, "Help in the work of their reconciliation," which laboured with me—"inasmuch as they laboured with me." At Philippi, women were the first hearers of the Gospel, and Lydia the first convert. It is a coincidence which marks genuineness, that in this Epistle alone, special instructions are given to women who laboured with Paul in the Gospel. In selecting the first teachers, those first converted would naturally be fixed on. Euodia and Syntyche were doubtless two of "the women who resorted to the river side, where prayer was wont to be made" (Acts 16. 13), and being early converted, would naturally take an active part in teaching other women called at a later period; of course not in public preaching, but in a less prominent sphere (1 Timothy 2. 11, 12). Clement—bishop of Rome shortly after the death of Peter and Paul. His Epistle from the Church of Rome to the Church of Corinth is extant. It makes no mention of the supremacy of the See of Peter. He was the most eminent of the apostolical fathers. ALFORD thinks that the Clement here was a Philippian, and not necessarily Clement, bishop of Rome. But ORIGEN (Comment. John 1. 29) identifies the Clement here with the bishop of Rome. in the book of life—the register-book of those whose "citizenship is in heaven" (Luke 10. 20; Philippians 3. 20). Anciently, free cities had a roll-book containing the names of all those having the right of citizenship (cf. Exodus 31. 32; Psalm 69. 28; Ezekiel 13. 9; Daniel 12. 1; Revelation 20. 12; 21. 27). 4. (Isaiah 61. 10.)

"Always;" even amidst the afflictions now distressing you (ch. 1. 28-30). again—as he had already said, "Rejoice" (ch. 3. 1). Joy is the predominant feature of the Epistle. I say—Greek, rather, "I will say." 5. moderation—From a Greek root, "to yield," whence yieldingness [TRENCH] or from a root, "it is fitting," whence "reasonableness of dealing" [ALFORD], that considerateness for others, not urging one's own rights to the uttermost, but waiving a part, and thereby rectifying the injustices of justice. The archetype of this grace is God, who presses not the strictness of His law against us as we deserve (Psalm 130. 3, 4) though having exacted the fullest payment for us from our Divine Surety. There are included in "moderation," candour and kindness. Joy in the Lord raises us above rigorism towards others (v. 5), and carefulness (v. 6) as to one's own affairs. Sadness produces morose harshness towards others, and a carking spirit in ourselves. Let . . . be known—i. e., in your conduct to others, let nothing inconsistent with "moderation" be seen. Not a precept to make a display of moderation. Let this grace "be known" to men in acts; let "your requests be made to God" in words (v. 6). unto all men—even to the "perverse" (ch. 2. 15), that so ye may win them. Exercise "forbearance" even to your persecutors. None is so ungracious as not to be kindly to some one, from some motive or another, on some occasion; the believer is to be so "unto all men" at all times. The Lord is at hand—The Lord's coming again speedily is the grand motive to every Christian grace (James 5. 8, 9). Harshness to others (the opposite of "moderation") would be taking into our own hands prematurely the prerogatives of judging, which belongs to the Lord alone (1 Corinthians 4. 5); and so provoking God to judge us by the strict letter of the law (James 2. 12, 13). 6. Translate, "Be anxious about nothing." Care and prayer are as mutually opposed as fire and water. [BENGEL] by prayer and supplication—Greek, "by the prayer and the supplication" appropriate to each case. [ALFORD.] Prayer for blessings; and the general term. Supplication, to avert ills; a special term, suppliant entreaty (Note, Ephesians 6. 18). thanksgiving—for every event, prosperity and affliction alike (1 Thessalonians 5. 18; James 5. 18). The Philippians might remember Paul's example at Philippi when in the innermost prison (Acts 16. 25). Thanksgiving gives effect to prayer (2 Chronicles 20. 21), and frees from anxious carefulness by making all God's dealings matter for praise, not merely for resignation, much less murmuring. "Peace" is the companion of "thanksgiving" (v. 7; Colossians 3. 15). let your requests be made known unto God—with generous, full, unreserved confidence; not keeping aught back, as too great, or else too small, to bring before God, though you might feel so as to your fellow-men. So Jacob, when fearing Esau (Genesis 32. 9-12); Hezekiah fearing Sennacherib (2 Kings 19. 14; Psalm 37. 5). 7. And—The inseparable consequence of thus laying everything before God in "prayer with thanksgiving." peace—the dispeller of "anxious care" (v. 6). of God—coming from God, and resting in God (John 14. 27; 16. 33; Colossians 3. 15). passeth—surpasseth, or exceedeth, all man's notional powers of understanding its full blessedness (1 Corinthians 2. 9, 10; Ephesians 3. 20; cf. Proverbs 3. 17). shall keep—rather, "shall guard;" shall keep as a well-garrisoned stronghold (Isaiah 26. 1, 3). The same Greek verb is used, 1 Peter 1. 5. There shall be peace secure within, whatever outward troubles may besiege. hearts and minds—rather, "hearts (the seat of the thoughts) and thoughts" or purposes. through—rather as Greek, "in Christ Jesus." It is in Christ that we are "kept" or "guarded" secure. 8. Summary of all his exhortations as to relative duties, whether as children or parents, husbands or wives, friends, neighbours, men in the intercourse of the world, &c. true—sincere, in words. honest—Old English for "seemly," viz., in action, lit., grave, dignified. just—towards others. pure—"chaste," in relation to ourselves. lovely—lovable (cf. Mark 10. 21; Luke 7. 4, 5) of good report—Referring to the absent (ch. 1. 27); as "lovely" refers to what is lovable face to face. if there be any virtue—"whatever virtue there is." [ALFORD]

'Virtue,' the standing word in heathen ethics, is found once only in St. Paul's Epistles, and once in St. Peter's (2 Peter 1. 5); and this in uses different from those in heathen authors. It is a term rather earthly and human, as compared with the names of the spiritual graces which Christianity imparts; hence the rarity of its occurrence in the New Testament. Piety and true morality are inseparable. Piety is love with its face towards God; morality is love with its face towards man. Despise not anything that is good in itself; only let it keep its due place. praise—whatever is praiseworthy; not that Christians should make man's praise their aim (cf. John 12. 43); but they should live so as to deserve men's praise. think on—have a continual regard to, so as to "do" these things (v. 9) whenever the occasion arises. 9. both—rather, "The things also which ye have learned, &c., &c., these practice;" the things which besides recommending them in words, have been also recommended by my example, carry into practice. heard—though ye have not yet sufficiently "received" them. seen—though ye have not as yet sufficiently "learned" them. [BENGEL.] and—"and then," as the necessary result (v. 7). Not only "the peace of God," but "the God of peace" Himself "shall be with you." 10. But—Transitional conjunction. But "now" to pass to another subject. in the Lord—He views everything with reference to Christ. at the last—"at last;" implying he was expecting their gift, not from a selfish view, but as a "fruit" of their faith, and to "abound" to their account (v. 11, 17). Though long in coming, owing to Epaphroditus' sickness and other delays, he does not imply their gift was too late. your care . . . hath flourished again—Greek, "Ye have flourished again (revived, as trees sprouting forth again in spring) in your care for me." wherein ye were also careful—in respect to which (revival, viz. the sending of a supply to me) "ye were also (all along) careful, but ye lacked opportunity;" whether from want of means or want of a messenger. Your "lack of service" (ch. 2. 30), was owing to your having "lacked opportunity." 11. I have learned—The I in Greek is emphatical. I leave it to others if they will, to be discontented. I, for my part, have learned, by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and the dealings of Providence (Hebrews 5. 8), to be content in every state. content—The Greek, lit., expresses "independent of others, and having sufficiency in one's self." But Christianity has raised the term above the haughty self-sufficiency of the heathen Stoic to the contentment of the Christian, whose sufficiency is not in self, but in God (2 Corinthians 3. 5; 1 Timothy 6. 6, 8; Hebrews 13. 5; cf. Jeremiah 2. 38; 45. 5). 12. abased—in low circumstances (2 Corinthians 4. 8; 6. 9, 10). everywhere—rather [ALFORD], "in each, and in all things." instructed—in the secret. Lit., "initiated" in a secret teaching, which is a mystery unknown to the world. 13. I can do all things—Greek, "I have strength for all things;" not merely "how to be abased and how to abound." After special instances he declares his universal power—how triumphantly, yet how humbly! [MEYER.] through Christ which strengtheneth me—The oldest MSS. omit "Christ;" then translate, "In Him who giveth me power," i. e., by virtue of my living union and identification with Him, who is my strength (Galatians 2. 20). Cf. 1 Timothy 1. 12, whence probably, "Christ" was inserted here by transcribers. 14. He here guards against their thinking from what he has just said, that he makes light of their bounty. ye did communicate with my affliction—i. e., ye made yourselves sharers with me in my present affliction, viz. by sympathy; of which sympathy your contribution is the proof. 15. Now—"Moreover." Arrange as Greek, "Ye also know" (as well as I do myself). in the beginning of the Gospel—dating from the Philippian Christian era: at the first preaching of the Gospel at Philippi. when I departed from Macedonia—(Acts 17. 14.) The Philippians had followed Paul with their bounty when he left Macedonia and came to Corinth. 2 Corinthians 11. 8, 9 thus accords with the passage here, the dates assigned to the donation in both Epistles agreeing, viz., "in the beginning of the Gospel" here, and there, at the time of his first visit to Corinth. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] However, the supply meant here is not that which he received at Corinth, but the supply sent to him when "in Thessalonica, once and again" (v. 16). [ALFORD.] as concerning giving and receiving—In the account between us, "the giving" was all on your part; "the receiving" all on mine. ye only—We are not to wait for others in a good work, saying, "I will do so, when others do it." We must go forward though alone. 16. even in Thessalonica—"even" as early as when I had got no further than Thessalonica, ye sent me supplies for my necessities more than once. 17. a gift—Greek, "the gift." Translate, "It is not that I seek after the gift, but I do seek after the fruit that aboundeth to your account;" what I do seek is your spiritual good, in the abounding of fruits of your faith which shall be put down to your account, against the day of reward (Hebrews 6. 10). 18. But—Though "the gift" is not what I chiefly "seek after" (v. 17), yet I am grateful for the gift, and hereby acknowledge it as ample for all my needs. Translate, "I have all" that I want, "and more than enough," lit., as English Version, "I abound" over and above my needs. I am full—Greek, "I am filled full," the odour of a sweet smell—(Note, Ephesians 5. 2.) The figure is drawn from the sweet-smelling incense which was burnt along with the sacrifices; their gift being in faith was not so much to Paul, as to God (Matthew 25. 40), before whom it "came up for a memorial" (Acts 10. 4), sweet-smelling in God's presence (Genesis 8. 21; Revelation 8. 3, 4). sacrifice acceptable—(Hebrews 13. 16.) 19. my—Paul calls God here "my God," to imply that God would reward their bounty to His servant, by "fully supplying" (translate so, lit., fill to the full) their every "need" (2 Corinthians 9. 8), even as they had "fully" supplied His "need" (v. 16, 18). My Master will fully repay you, I cannot. The Philippians invested their bounty well, since it got them such a glorious return. according to his riches—The measure of His supply to you will be the immeasurable "riches of His grace" (Ephesians 1. 7). in glory—These words belong to the whole sentence. "Glory" is the element in which His rich grace operates; and it will be the element in which He will "supply fully all your need." by Christ Jesus—by virtue of your being "IN" (so Greek, not "by") Christ Jesus, the Giver and Mediator of all spiritual blessings. 20. God and our Father—translate, "Unto our God and Father." be glory—rather as the Greek, "be the glory." Not to us, but to Him be "the glory" alike of your gift, and of His gracious recompense to you. 21. Salute every saint—individually. greet—salute you. The brethren which are with me—Perhaps Jewish believers are meant (Acts 28. 21). I think ch. 2. 20 precludes our thinking of "closer friends," "colleagues in the ministry" [ALFORD]; he had only one close friend with him, viz., Timothy. 22. they that are of Caesar's household—the slaves and dependants of Nero who had been probably converted through Paul's teaching whilst he was a prisoner in the Prætorian barrack attached to the palace. Philippi was a Roman "colony," hence there might arise a tie between the citizens of the mother city and those of the colony; especially between those of both cities who were Christians, converted as many of them were by the same apostle, and under like circumstances, he having been imprisoned at Philippi, as he now is at Rome. 23. (Galatians 6. 18.) be with you all. Amen—The oldest MSS. read "Be with your spirit," and omit "Amen."

COLOSSIANS
 INTRODUCTION.

THE GENUINENESS of this Epistle is attested by JUSTIN MARTYR, Contra Tryphonem, p. 311, b., who quotes "the first-born of every creature," in reference to Christ, from ch. 1. 15. THEOPHILUS OF ANTIOCH, to Autolychnus, 2. p. 100. IRENAEUS, 3. 14, 1, quotes expressly from this "Epistle to the Colossians" (ch. 4. 14). CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata, 1. p. 325, quotes ch. 1. 28; also elsewhere he quotes ch. 1. 9-11, 28; 2. 2, &c.; 2. 8; 3. 12, 14; 4. 2, 3, &c. TERTULLIAN, De Praescriptione haereticorum, ch. 7., quotes ch. 2. 8; and De Resurrectione carnis, ch. 23., he quotes ch. 2. 12, 20, and ch. 3. 1, 2. ORIGEN, Contra Celsum, 5. 8, quotes ch. 2. 18, 19.

Colosse (or, as it is spelt in the best MSS., "Colassæ") was a city of Phrygia, on the river Lycus, a branch of the Meander. The Church there was mainly composed of Gentiles (cf. ch. 2. 13). ALFORD infers from ch. 2. 1 (see note there), that Paul had not seen its members, and therefore could not have been its founder, as THEODORET thought. Ch. 1. 7, 8 suggests the probability that Epaphras was the first founder of the Church there. The date of its foundation must have been subsequent to Paul's visitation, "strengthening in order" all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia (Acts 18. 24); for otherwise he must have visited the Colossians, which ch. 2. 1 implies he had not. Had Paul been their father in the faith, he would doubtless have alluded to the fact, as in 1 Corinthians 3. 6, 10; 4. 15; 1 Thessalonians 1. 5; 2. 1. It is only in the Epistles, Romans and Ephesians, and this Epistle, such allusions are wanting; in that to the Romans, because, as in this Church of Colosse, he had not been the instrument of their conversion; in that to the Ephesians, owing to the general nature of the Epistle. Probably during the "two years" of Paul's stay at Ephesus, when "all which dwell in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 19. 10, 26), Epaphras, Philemon, Archippus, Apphia (Philemon 2. 13, 19) and other natives of Colosse, becoming converted at Ephesus, were subsequently the first sowers of the Gospel seed in their own city. This will account for their personal acquaintance with, and attachment to, Paul and his fellow-ministers, and for his loving language as to them, and their counter salutations to him. So also with respect to "them at Laodicea" (ch. 2. 1).

The OBJECT of the Epistle is to counteract Jewish false teaching, by setting before the Colossians their true standing in Christ alone (exclusive of all other heavenly beings), the majesty of His person, and the completeness of the redemption wrought by Him; hence they ought to be conformed to their risen Lord, and to exhibit that conformity in all the relations of ordinary life. Ch. 2. 16, "new moon, sabbath days," shows that the false teaching opposed in this Epistle is that of Judaizing Christians. These mixed up with pure Christianity Oriental theosophy and angel worship, and the asceticism of certain sections of the Jews, especially the Essenes. Cf. JOSEPHUS, Bell. Jud., 2. 8; 2. 13. These theosophists promised to their followers a deeper insight into the world of spirits, and a nearer approach to heavenly purity and intelligence, than the simple Gospel affords. CONYBEARE and HOWSON think that some Alexandrian Jew had appeared at Colosse, imbued with the Greek philosophy of Philo's school, combining with it the Rabbinical theosophy and angelology which afterwards was embodied in the Cabbala. Cf. JOSEPHUS, Antiquities, 12. 3, 4, from which we know that Alexander the Great had garrisoned the towns of Lydia and Phrygia with 2000 Mesopotamian and Babylonian Jews in the time of a threatened revolt. The Phrygians themselves had a mystic tendency in their worship of Cybele, which inclined them to receive the more readily the incipient Gnosticism of Judaizers, which afterward developed itself into the strangest heresies. In the Pastoral Epistles, the evil is spoken of as having reached a more deadly phase (1 Timothy 4. 1-3; 6. 5), whereas he brings no charge of immorality in this Epistle: a proof of its being much earlier in date.

The PLACE from which it was written seems to have been Rome, during his first imprisonment there (Acts 28). In my introduction to the Epistle to the Ephesians, it was shown that the three Epistles, Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon, were sent at the same time, viz., during the freer portion of his imprisonment, before the death of Burrus. Ch. 1. 3, 4; Ephesians 6. 19, 20, imply greater freedom than he had whilst writing to the Philippian, after the promotion of Tigellinus to be Prætorian Prefect. See Introduction to Philippians.

This Epistle, though carried by the same bearer, Tychicus, who bore that to the Ephesians, was written previously to that Epistle; for many phrases similar in both appear in the more expanded form in the Epistle to the Ephesians (cf. also note, Ephesians 6. 21). The Epistle to the Laodiceans (ch. 4. 16) was written before that to the Colossians, but probably was sent by him to Laodicea at the same time with that to the Church at Colosse.

The STYLE is peculiar: many Greek phrases occur here, found nowhere else. Cf. ch. 2. 8, "spoil you;" "making a show of them openly" (ch. 2. 15); "beguile of your reward," and "intruding" (v. 18); "will-worship;" "satisfying" (v. 23); "filthy communication" (ch. 3. 8); "rule" (ch. 3. 15); "comfort" (ch. 4. 11). The loftiness and artificial elaboration of style correspond to the majestic nature of his theme, the majesty of Christ's person and office, in contrast to the beggarly system of the Judaizers, the discussion of which was forced on him by the controversy. Hence arises his use of unusual phraseology. On the other hand, in the Epistle to the Ephesians, subsequently written, in which he was not so hampered by the exigencies of controversy, he dilates on the same glorious truths, so congenial to him, more at large, freely and uncontroversially, in the fuller outpouring of his spirit, with less of the elaborate and antithetical language of system, such as was needed in cautioning the Colossians against the particular errors threatening them. Hence arises the striking similarity of many of the phrases in the two Epistles written about the same time, and generally in the same vein of spiritual thought; whilst the peculiar phrases of the Epistle to the Colossians are such as are natural, considering the controversial purpose of that Epistle.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-29. ADDRESS: INTRODUCTION: CONFIRMING EPAPHRAS' TEACHING: THE GLORIES OF CHRIST: FRANKGIVING AND PRAYER FOR THE COLOSSIANS: HIS

OWN MINISTRY OF THE MYSTERY. 1. by the will of God—Greek, "through," &c. (cf. note, 1 Corinthians 1. 1). Timothy—(Cf. notes, 2 Corinthians 1. 1; Philippians 1. 1.) He was with Paul at the time of writing in Rome. He had been companion of Paul in his first tour through Phry gia, in which Colosse was. Hence the Colossians seem to have associated him with Paul in their affections, and the apostle joins him with himself in the address. Neither, probably, had seen the Colossian Church (cf. ch. 2. 1); but had seen, during their tour through Phrygia, individual Colossians, as Epaphras, Philemon, Archippus, and Apphia (Philemon 2), who when converted brought the Gospel to their native city. 2. Colosse—Written in the oldest MSS., "Colosse." As "saints" implies union with God, so 'the faithful brethren' union with Christian men. [BENGL.] and the Lord Jesus Christ—Supported by some oldest MSS., omitted by others of equal antiquity. 3. &c.—Thanksgiving for the "faith, hope, and love" of the Colossians. So in the twin Epistle sent at the same time and by the same bearer, Tychicus (Ephesians 1. 15, 16). We—I and Timothy. and the Father—So some of the oldest MSS. read. But others better omit the "and," which probably crept in from Ephesians 1. 3. praying always for you—with thanksgiving (Philippians 4. 6). See next verse. 4. Since we heard—lit., "Having heard," &c. The language implies that he had only heard of, and not seen them (ch. 2. 1). Cf. Romans 1. 8, where like language is used of a Church which he had not at the time visited. love . . . to all—the absent, as well as those present. [BENGL.] 5. For—to be joined with the words immediately preceding: "The love which ye have to all the saints because of (lit., on account of) the hope," &c. The hope of eternal life will never be in us an inactive principle, but will always produce "love." This passage is abused by Romanists, as if the hope of salvation depended upon works. A false argument. It does not follow that our hope is founded on our works because we are strongly stimulated to live well; since nothing is more effectual for this purpose than the sense of God's free grace. [CALVIN.] laid up—a treasure laid up so as to be out of danger of being lost (2 Timothy 4. 8). Faith, love, and hope (v. 4, 5), comprise the sum of Christianity. Cf. v. 23, "the hope of the Gospel." In heaven—Greek, "in the heavens." whereof ye heard before—vis., at the time when it was preached to you. In the word, &c.—That "hope" formed part of "the word of the truth of the Gospel" (cf. Ephesians 1. 13), i. e., part of the Gospel truth preached unto you. 6. Which is come unto you—Greek, "Which is present among you," i. e., which has come to, and remains with, you. He speaks of the word as a living person present among them. as it is in all the world—virtually, as it was by this time preached in the leading parts of the then known world; potentially, as Christ's command was that the Gospel should be preached to all nations, and not be limited, as the law was, to the Jews (Matthew 13. 38; 24. 14; 28. 19). However, the true reading, and that of the oldest MSS., is that which omits the following "and," thus (the "it is" of English Version is not in the original Greek): "As in all the world it is bringing forth fruit and growing (so the oldest MSS. read; English Version omits 'and growing,' without good authority), even as it doth in you also." Then what is asserted is not that the Gospel has been preached in all the world, but that it is bearing fruits of righteousness, and (like a tree growing at the same time that it is bearing fruit) growing in numbers of its converts in, or throughout, all the world. heard of it—rather, "heard it." and knew—rather, "came to know;" became fully experimentally acquainted with. the grace of God in truth—i. e., in its truth, and with true knowledge. [ALFORD.] 7. As ye also learned—"Also" is omitted in the oldest MSS. The insertion implied, that those inserting it thought that Paul had preached the Gospel to the Colossians, as well as Epaphras. Whereas the omission in the oldest MSS. implies that Epaphras alone was the founder of the Church at Colosse. of—"from Epaphras." dear—Greek, "beloved." fellow-servant—vis., of Christ. In Philemon 23 he calls him "my fellow-prisoner." It is possible that Epaphras may have been apprehended for his zealous labours in Asia Minor; but more probable that Paul gave him the title, as his faithful companion in his imprisonment (cf. Note, ch. 4. 10, as to MEYER's conjecture). who is for you, &c.—translate, "who is faithful in your behalf as a minister of Christ;" hinting that he is one not to be set aside for the new and erroneous teachers (ch. 2). Most of the oldest MSS. read, "for (or in behalf of, us." Vulgate, however, with one of the oldest MSS., supports English Version. 8. your love—(v. 4)—"to all the saints." In the Spirit—the sphere or element in which alone true love is found; as distinguished from the state of those "in the flesh" (Romans 8. 9). Yet even they needed to be stirred up to greater love (ch. 3. 12-14). Love is the first and chief fruit of the Spirit (Galatians 5. 22). 9. we also—on our part. heard it—(v. 4). pray—Here he states what in particular he prays for; as in v. 3 he stated generally the fact of his praying for them. to desire—"to make request." might be filled—rather, "may be filled;" a verb often found in this Epistle (ch. 4. 12, 17). knowledge—Greek, "full and accurate knowledge." Akin to the Greek for "knew" (Note, v. 8). of his will—as to how ye ought to walk (Ephesians 5. 17); as well as chiefly that "mystery of His will, according to His good pleasure which He purposed in Himself; that in the fulness of times He might gather together in one all things in Christ" (Ephesians 1. 9, 10); God's "will," whereby He eternally purposed to reconcile to Himself, and save men by Christ, not by angels, as the false teachers in some degree taught (ch. 2. 18). [ESTIUS.] There seems to have been a want of knowledge among the Colossians, notwithstanding their general excellencies; hence he so often dwells on this subject (v. 28; ch. 2. 2, 8; 3. 10, 15; 4. 5, 6). On the contrary he less extols wisdom to the Corinthians, who were puffed up with the conceit of knowledge. wisdom—often mentioned in this Epistle, as opposed to the (false) "philosophy" and "show of wisdom" (ch. 2. 8, 23; cf. Ephesians 1. 8). understanding—sagacity to discern what on each occasion is suited to the place and the time; its seat is "the understanding" or intellect; wisdom is more general, and has its seat in the whole compass of the faculties of the soul. [BENGL.] "Wouldst thou know that the matters in the word of Christ are real things? Then never read them for mere knowledge sake." [Quoted by GAUSSEN.] Knowledge is desirable only when seasoned by "spiritual understanding." 10. Greek, "So as to walk," &c.; so that ye may walk. True knowledge of God's will is inseparable from walking conformably to it. worthy of the Lord—(Ephesians 4. 1.) unto—so as in every way to be well-pleasing to God. pleasing—lit., "desire of pleasing." being fruitful—Greek, "bearing fruit." This is the first manifestation of their "walking worthy of the Lord." The second is, "increasing (growing) in the knowledge of God" (or as the oldest MSS. read, "growing by the full knowledge of God"); thus, as the Gospel word (v. 6) was said to "bring forth fruit," and to "grow" in all the world, even as it did in the Colossians, ever since the day they knew the grace of God, so here it is Paul's prayer that they might continue to "bring forth fruit," and "grow" more and more by the full knowledge of God, the more of that "knowledge" (v. 9) was imparted to them. The full knowledge of God is the real instrument of enlargement in soul and life of the believer. [ALFORD.] The third manifestation of their walk is (v. 11), "Being strengthened with all might," &c. The fourth is (v. 12), "Giving thanks unto the Father," &c. 11. Greek, "Being made mighty with (lit., in) all might." according to his glorious power—rather, "according to the power (the characteristic of 'His glory,' here appropriate to St. Paul's argument, Ephesians 1. 19; 6. 10; as its exuberant 'riches,' in Ephesians 3. 16) of His glory." His power is inseparable from His glory (Romans 6. 4). unto all patience—so as to attain to all patient endurance; persevering, enduring continuance in the faith, in spite of trials of persecutors, and seductions of false teachers. long-suffering—towards those whom one could repel. "Patience," or "endurance," is exercised in respect to those whom one cannot repel. [CHRYSOSTOM.] with joyfulness—joyful endurance (Acts 16. 25; Romans 5. 3, 11). 12. You—giving thanks unto the Father." See Note, v. 10; this clause is connected with "that ye may be filled" (v. 9), and "that ye may walk" (v. 10). The connection is not, "We do not cease to pray for you (v. 9) giving thanks." unto the Father—of Jesus Christ, and so our Father by adoption (Galatians 3. 26; 4. 4, 5, 6). which hath made us meet—Greek, “who made us meet.” Not “is making us meet” by progressive growth in holiness; but once for all made us meet. It is not primarily the Spirit's work that is meant here, as the text is often used; but the Father's work in putting us by adoption, once for all, in a new standing, viz., that of children. The believers meant here were in different stages of progressive sanctification; but in respect to the meetness specified here, they all alike had it from the Father, in Christ His Son, being “complete in Him” (ch. 2. 10). Cf. John 17. 17; Jude 1, “sanctified by God the Father;” 1 Corinthians 1. 30. Still, secondarily, this once-for-all meetness contains in it the germ of sanctification, afterwards developed progressively in the life by the Father's Spirit in the believer. The Christian life of heavenliness is the first stage of heaven itself. There must, and will be a personal meetness for heaven, where there is a judicial meetness. to be partakers, &c.—Greek, “for the (or our) portion of the inheritance (Acts 20. 32; 26. 18; Ephesians 1. 11) of the saluts in light.” “Light” begins in the believer here, descending from “the Father of lights” by Jesus, “the true light,” and is perfected in the kingdom of light, which includes knowledge, purity, love, and joy. It is contrasted here with the “darkness” of the unconverted state (v. 13; cf. 1 Peter 2. 9). 13. from—Greek, “out of the power,” out of the sphere in which his power is exercised. translated—those thus translated as to state, are also transformed as to character. Satan has an organized dominion with various orders of powers of evil (Ephesians 2. 2; 6. 12). But the term “kingdom” is rarely applied to his usurped rule (Matthew 12. 28); it is generally restricted to the kingdom of God. darkness—blindness, hatred, misery. [BENGEL.] his dear Son—rather as Greek, “the Son of His love;” the Son on whom His love rests (John 17. 26; Ephesians 1. 6); contrasted with the “darkness” where all is hatred and hateful. 14. (Ephesians 1. 7.) redemption—rather as Greek, “our redemption.” through his blood—Omitted in the oldest MSS. Probably inserted from Ephesians 1. 7. sins—translate as Greek, “our sins.” The more general term; for which Ephesians 1. 7, Greek, has, “our transgressions,” the more special term. 15. They who have experienced in themselves “redemption” (v. 14), know Christ in the glorious character here described, as above the highest angels to whom the false teachers (ch. 2. 18) taught worship was to be paid. Paul describes Him (1.) in relation to God and creation (v. 15-17); (2.) in relation to the Church (v. 18-20). As the former regards Him as the Creator (v. 15, 16) and the Sustainer (v. 17) of the natural world; so the latter, as the source and stay of the new moral creation. Image—exact likeness and perfect Representative. Adam was made “in the image of God” (Genesis 1. 27). But Christ, the second Adam, perfectly reflected visibly “the invisible God” (1 Timothy 1. 17), whose glories the first Adam only in part represented. “Image” (eicon) involves “likeness” (homoiosis); but “likeness” does not involve “image.” “Image” always supposes a prototype, which it not merely resembles, but from which it is drawn: the exact counterpart, as the reflection of the sun in the water: the child the living image of the parent. “Likeness” implies mere resemblance, not the exact counterpart and derivation as “image” expresses; hence it is nowhere applied to the Son, whilst “image” is here, cf. 1 Corinthians 11. 7. [TRENCH.] (John 1. 18; 14. 9; 2 Corinthians 4. 4; 1 Timothy 3. 16; Hebrews 1. 3.) Even before His incarnation He was the image of the invisible God, as the Word (John 1. 1-3) by whom God created the worlds, and by whom God appeared to the patriarchs. Thus His essential character as always “the image of God,” (1.) before the incarnation, (2.) in the days of His flesh, and (3.) now in His glorified state, is, I think, contemplated here by the verb “is.” first-born of every creature—Hebrews 1. 6, “the first-begotten;” “begotten of His Father before all worlds.” [NICENE Creed.] Priority and superlative dignity is implied (Psalm 89. 27). English Version might seem to favour Arianism, as if Christ were a creature. Translate, “Begotten (lit., born) before every creature,” as the context shows, which gives the reason why He is so designated “For,” &c. (v. 16, 17). [TRENCH.] This expression is understood by ORIGEN (so far is the Greek from favouring Socinian or Arian views) as declaring the Godhead of Christ, and is used by Him as a phrase to mark that Godhead, in contrast with His manhood (B. 2., sec. contra Celsus). The Greek does not strictly admit ALFORD's translation, “the first-born of all creation.” 16. For—Greek, “Because.” This gives the proof that He is not included in the things created, but is the “first-begotten” before “every creature” (v. 15), begotten as “the Son of God's love” (v. 13), antecedently to all other emanations. “for” all these other emanations came from Him, and whatever was created, was created by Him, by him—rather as Greek, “in Him;” as the conditional element, pre-existent and all-including: the creation of all things by Him is expressed afterwards, and is a different fact from the present one, though implied in it. [ALFORD.] God revealed Himself in the Son, the Word of the Father, before all created existence (v. 15). That Divine Word carries in Himself the archetypes of all existences, so that “in Him” all things that are in heaven and earth have been created.” The “in Him” indicates that the Word is the ideal ground of all existence; the “by Him,” below, that He is the instrument of actually realizing the Divine idea. [NEANDER.] His essential nature as the Word of the Father is not a mere appendage of His incarnation, but is the ground of it. The original relation of the Eternal Word to men “made in His image” (Genesis 1. 27), is the source of the new relation to them by redemption, formed in His incarnation, whereby He restores them to His lost image. “In Him” implies something prior to “by” and “for Him” presently after: the three prepositions mark in succession the beginning, the progress, and the end. [BENGEL.] all things—Greek, “the universe of things.” That the new creation is not meant in this verse (as Socinians interpret), is plain; for angels, who are included in the catalogue, were not new created by Christ; and he does not speak of the new creation till v. 18. The creation “of the things that are in the heavens” (so Greek) includes the creation of the heavens themselves: the former are rather named, since the inhabitants are more noble than their dwellings. Heaven and earth and all that is in them (1 Chronicles 29. 11; Nehemiah 9. 6; Revelation 10. 6). invisible—the world of spirits, thrones, or dominions—lordships: the thrones are the greater of the two, principalities, or powers—rather, “rules or authorities;” the former are stronger than the latter (cf. Note, Ephesians 1. 21). The latter pair refer to offices in respect to God's creatures: “thrones and dominions” express exalted relation to God, they being the chariots on which He rides displaying His glory (Psalm 68. 17). The existence of various orders of angels is established by this passage. all things—Greek, “the whole universe of things.” were—rather, to distinguish the Greek aorist, which precedes from the perfect tense here, “have been created.” In the former case the creation was viewed as a past act at a point of time, or as done once for all; here it is viewed, not merely as one historic act of creation in the past, but as the permanent result now and eternally continuing. by him—as the Instrumental Agent (John 1. 8). for him—as the grand End of creation; containing in Himself the reason why creation is at all, and why it is as it is. [ALFORD.] He is the final cause as well as the efficient cause. LACHMANN's punctuation of v. 15-18 is best, whereby “the first-born of every creature” (v. 15) answers to “the first-born from the dead” (v. 18), the whole forming one sentence with the words (“All things were created by Him and for Him, and He is before all things, and by Him all things consist, and He is the Head of the body the Church”) intervening as a parenthesis. Thus Paul puts first, the origination by Him of the natural creation, secondly, of the new creation. The parenthesis falls into four clauses, two and two: the former two support the first assertion, “the first-born of every creature;” the latter two prepare us for “the first-born from the dead;” the former two correspond to the latter two in their form.

"All things by Him . . . and He is," and "By Him all things . . . and He is." 17. (John 8. 58.) Translate as Greek, "And He Himself (the great HE) is (implying Divine essential being) before all things," in time, as well as in dignity. Since He is before all things, He is before even time, i. e., from eternity. Cf. "the first-born of every creature" (v. 15). by him—Greek, "IN Him" (as the conditional element of existence, v. 16). [ALFORD.] consist—"subsist." Not only are called into being from nothing, but are maintained in their present state. The Son of God is the Conservator, as well as the Creator of all things. [PEARSON.] BENDEL less probably explains, "All things in Him come together into one system: the universe found its completion in Him" (Isaiah 41. 4; Revelation 22. 13). Cf. as to God, Romans 11. 36: similar language; therefore Christ must be God. 18. Revelation of Christ to the Church and the new creation, as the Originator of both. he—Emphatical. Not angels in opposition to the false teachers' doctrine concerning angel-worship, and the power of Æons or (imaginary) spirit-emanations from God (ch. 2. 10, 18). head of the body, the Church—The Church is His body by virtue of his entering into communion corporeally with human nature [NEANDER] (Ephesians 1. 22). The same One who is the Head of all things and beings by creation, is also, by virtue of being "the first-born from the dead," and so "the first-fruits" of the new creation among men, the Head of the Church. who is—i. e., in that He is the Beginning. [ALFORD.] Rather, this is the beginning of a new paragraph. As the former paragraph, which related to His originating the physical creation, began with "Who is" (v. 15); so this, which treats of His originating the new creation, begins with "Who is;" a parenthesis preceding, which closes the former paragraph, that parenthesis (see Note, v. 16), including from "all things were created by Him," to "Head of the body, the Church." The head of kings and high priests was anointed, as the seat of the faculties, the fountain of dignity, and original of all the members (according to Hebrew etymology). So Jesus by His nunction was designated as the Head of the body, the Church. the beginning—viz., of the new creation, as of the old (Proverbs 8. 22; John 1. 1; cf. Revelation 1. 8): the beginning of the Church of the first-born (Hebrews 12. 23), as being Himself the "first-born from the dead" (Acts 26. 23; 1 Corinthians 15. 20, 23). Christ's primogeniture is threefold: (1.) From eternity the "first-begotten" of the Father (v. 15); (2.) As the first-born of His mother (Matthew 1. 25); (3.) As the Head of the Church, mystically begotten of the Father, as it were to a new life, on the day of His resurrection, which is His "regeneration," even as His people's coming resurrection will be their "regeneration" (i. e., the resurrection which was begun in the soul, extended to the body and to the whole creation, Romans 8. 21, 22) (Matthew 19. 28; Acts 13. 33; Revelation 1. 5). Sonship and resurrection are similarly connected, Luke 20. 36; Romans 1. 4; 8. 23; 1 John 3. 2. Christ by rising from the dead is the efficient cause (1 Corinthians 15. 22), as having obtained the power, and the exemplary cause, as being the pattern (Micah 2. 13; Romans 6. 5; Philippians 3. 21), of our resurrection: the resurrection of "the Head" involves consequentially that of the members. that in all things—He resumes the "all things" (v. 20). he might have the pre-eminence—Greek, "He HIMSELF may (thus) become the One holding the first place," or, "take the precedency." Both ideas are included, priority in time and priority in dignity: now in the regenerated world, as before in the world of creation (v. 15). "Begotten before every creature, or "first-born of every creature" (Psalm 89. 27; John 3. 13). 19. Greek, "(God) was well pleased," &c. in him—i. e., in the Son (Matthew 3. 17). all fulness—rather as Greek, "all the fulness," viz., of God, whatever Divine excellence is in God the Father (ch. 2. 9; Ephesians 3. 19; cf. John 1. 16; 3. 34). The Gnostics used the term "fulness," for the assemblage of emanations, or angelic powers, coming from God. The Spirit presciently by Paul warns the Church, that the true "fulness" dwells in Christ alone. This assigns the reason why Christ has the precedence of every creature (v. 15). For two rea-

sous Christ is Lord of the Church: (1.) Because the fulness of the Divine attributes (v. 19) dwells in Him, and so He has the power to govern the universe; (2.) Because (v. 20) what He has done for the Church gives Him the right to preside over it. should . . . dwell—as in a temple (John 2. 21). This indwelling of the Godhead in Christ is the foundation of the reconciliation by Him. [BENDEL.] Hence the "and" (v. 20) connects as cause and effect the two things, the Godhead in Christ, and the reconciliation by Christ. 20. The Greek order is, "And through Him (Christ) to reconcile again completely (see Note, Ephesians 2. 16) all things (Greek, 'the whole universe of things') unto Himself (unto God the Father, 2 Corinthians 5. 19), having made peace (God the Father having made peace) through the blood of His (Christ's) cross," i. e., shed by Christ on the cross: the price and pledge of our reconciliation with God. The Scripture phrase, "God reconciles man to Himself," implies that He takes away by the blood of Jesus the barrier which God's justice interposes against man's being in union with God (cf. Note, Romans 5. 10; 2 Corinthians 5. 18). So the LXX., 1 Samuel 23. 4, "Wherewith should He reconcile himself unto his master," i. e., reconcile his master unto him by appeasing his wrath. So Matthew 5. 23, 24. by him—"through Him" (the instrumental agent in the new creation, as in the original creation): emphatically repeated, to bring the person of Christ, as the Head of both creations alike, into prominence. things in earth . . . in heaven—Good angels, in one sense, do not need reconciliation to God; fallen angels are excluded from it (Jude 6). But probably redemption has effects on the world of spirits unknown to us. Of course, His reconciling us, and His reconciling them, must be by a different process, as He took not on Him the nature of angels, so as to offer a propitiation for them. But the effect of redemption on them, as He is their Head as well as ours, is that they are thereby brought nearer God, and so gain an increase of blessedness [ALFORD], and larger views of the love and wisdom of God (Ephesians 3. 10). All creation subsists in Christ, all creation is therefore affected by his propitiation: sinful creation is strictly "reconciled" from its enmity; sinless creation, comparatively distant from His unapproachable purity (Job 4. 18; 15. 15; 25. 5), is lifted into nearer participation of Him, and in this wider sense is reconciled. Doubtless, too, man's fall, following on Satan's fall, is a segment of a larger circle of evil, so that the remedy of the former affects the standing of angels, from among whom Satan and his host fell. Angels thereby having seen the magnitude of sin, and the infinite cost of redemption, and the exclusion of the fallen angels from it, and the inability of any creature to stand morally in his own strength, are now put beyond the reach of falling. Thus BACON'S definition of Christ's Headship holds good: "The Head of redemption to man; the Head of preservation to angels." Some conjecture that Satan, when unfallen, ruled this earth and the pre-Adamic animal kingdom: hence his malice against man who succeeded to the lordship of this earth and its animals, and hence, too, his assumption of the form of a serpent, the subtlest of the animal tribes. Luke 19. 38 states expressly "peace in heaven" as the result of finished redemption, as "peace on earth" was the result of its beginning at Jesus' birth (Luke 2. 14). BENDEL explains the reconciliation to be that of not only God, but also angels, estranged from men because of man's enmity against God. Ephesians 1. 10 accords with this: This is true, but only part of the truth: so ALFORD'S view also is but part of the truth. An actual reconciliation or restoration of peace in heaven, as well as on earth, is expressed by Paul. As long as that blood of reconciliation was not actually shed, which is opposed (Zechariah 3. 8, 9) to the accusations of Satan, but was only in promise, Satan could plead his right against men before God day and night (Job 1. 6; Revelation 12. 10); hence he was in heaven till the ban on man was broken (cf. Luke 10. 18). So here; the world of earth and heaven owe to Christ alone the restoration of harmony after the conflict and the subjugation of all things under one Head (cf. Hebrews 11. 23). Sin introduced discord not only on earth, but also in heaven, by the fall of demons; it brought into the abodes of holy angels, though not positive, yet privative loss, a retardation of their highest and most perfect development, harmonious gradation, and perfect consummation. Angels were no more able than men by themselves to overcome the peace-disturbers, and cast out the devils; it is only "by," or "through Him," and "the blood of His cross," that peace was restored even in heaven; it is only after Christ has obtained the victory fully and legally, that Michael (Revelation 12. 7-10) and his angels can cast out of heaven Satan and his demons (cf. ch. 2. 15). Thus the point of Paul's argument against angel-worship is, that angels themselves, like men, wholly depend on Christ, the sole and true object of worship. [AUBERLEN.] 21. The Colossians are included in this general reconciliation (cf. Ephesians 2. 1, 12). sometime—"once." alienated—from God and salvation: objectively banished from God, through the barrier which God's justice interposed against your sin: subjectively estranged through the alienation of your own wills from God. The former is the prominent thought (cf. Romans 5. 10), as the second follows, "enemies in your mind." "Actual alienation makes habitual 'enemies.'" [BENGEL.] in your mind—Greek, "in your understanding" or "thought" (Ephesians 2. 3; 4. 18). by wicked works—rather as Greek, "in your wicked works" (wicked works were the element in which your enmity subsisted). yet now—Notwithstanding the former alienation, now that Christ has come, God hath completely reconciled, or restored to His friendship again (so the Greek, cf. Note, v. 20). 22. In the body of his flesh—the element in which His reconciling sufferings had place. Cf. v. 24, "afflictions of Christ in my flesh" (1 Peter 2. 24). Angels who have not a "body of flesh" are not in any way our reconciling mediators, as your false teachers assert, but He, the Lord of angels, who has taken our flesh, that in it He might atone for our fallen manhood. through death—rather as Greek, "through His death" (which could only take place in a body like ours, of flesh, Hebrews 2. 14). This implies He took on Him our true and entire manhood. Flesh is the sphere in which His human sufferings could have place (cf. v. 24; Ephesians 2. 15). to present you—(Ephesians 5. 27). The end of His reconciling atonement by death. holy—positively; and in relation to God. unblamable . . . unprovable—negatively. "Without blemish" (as the former Greek word is translated as to Jesus, our Head, 1 Peter 1. 19) in one's self. Irreproachable (the Greek for the second word, one who gives no occasion for his being brought to a law court) is in relation to the world without. Sanctification, as the fruit, is here treated of; justification, by Christ's reconciliation, as the tree, having preceded (Ephesians 1. 4; 5. 26, 27; Titus 2. 14). At the same time, our sanctification is regarded here as perfect in Christ, into whom we are grafted at regeneration or conversion, and who is "made of God unto us (perfect) sanctification" (1 Corinthians 1. 30; 1 Peter 1. 2; Jude 1); not merely progressive sanctification, which is the gradual development of the sanctification which Christ is made to the believer from the first. in his sight—in God's sight, at Christ's appearing. 23. If—"Assuming that," &c.: not otherwise shall ye be so presented at His appearing (v. 22). grounded—Greek, "founded," "fixed on the foundation" (cf. Note, Ephesians 3. 17; Luke 6. 48, 49). settled—"steadfast." "Grounded" respects the foundation on which believers rest; "settled," their own steadfastness (1 Peter 5. 10). 1 Corinthians 15. 58 has the same Greek. not moved away—by the false teachers. the hope of the gospel—(Ephesians 1. 18.) which ye have heard . . . which was preached to every creature . . . whereof I . . . am . . . a minister—Three arguments against their being "moved away from the Gospel:" (1.) Their having heard it; (2.) the universality of the preaching of it; (3.) Paul's ministry in it. For "to (Greek, 'in') every creature," the oldest MSS. read, "in all creation." Cf. "in all the world," v. 6; "all things . . . in earth," v. 20 (Mark 16. 15): thus he implies that the Gospel from which he urges them not to be moved, has this mark of truth, viz., the universality of its announcement, which accords with the command and prophecy of Christ Himself (Matthew 24. 14). By "was preached," he means not merely "is being preached," but has been actually, as an accomplished fact, preached. PLINY, not many years subsequently, in his famous letter to the Emperor Trajan (B. X., Ep. 97), writes, "Many of every age, rank, and sex, are being brought to trial. For the contagion of that superstition (Christianity) has spread over not only cities, but villages and the country." whereof I Paul am—rather as Greek, "was made a minister." Respect for me, the minister of this world-wide Gospel, should lead you not to be moved from it. Moreover (he implies), the Gospel which ye heard from Epaphras, your "minister" (v. 7), is the same of which "I was made a minister" (v. 25; Ephesians 3. 7): if you be moved from it, ye will desert the teaching of the recognized ministers of the Gospel for unauthorized false teachers. 24. Who—the oldest MSS. omit "who:" then translate, "Now I rejoice." Some very old MSS., and the best of the Latin versions, and Vulgate, read as English Version. To enhance the glory of Christ as paramount to all, he mentions his own sufferings for the Church of Christ. "Now" stands in contrast to "I was made," in the past time (v. 23). for you—"on your behalf," that ye may be confirmed in resting solely on Christ (to the exclusion of angel-worship) by the glorification of Christ in my sufferings (Ephesians 3. 1). fill up that which is behind—U. "the deficiencies"—all that are lacking of the afflictions of Christ (cf. Note, 2 Corinthians 1. 5). Christ is "afflicted in all His people's afflictions" (Isaiah 63. 9). "The Church is His body in which He is, dwells, lives, and therefore also suffers." [VITRINGA.] Christ was destined to endure certain afflictions in this figurative body, as well as in His literal; these were "that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ," which Paul "filled up." His own meritorious sufferings in expiation for sin were once for all completely filled up on the cross. But His Church (His second Self) has her whole measure of afflictions fixed. The more St. Paul, a member, endured, the less remain for the rest of the Church to endure; the communion of saints thus giving them an interest in his sufferings. It is in reference to the Church's afflictions, which are "Christ's afflictions," that Paul here saith, "I fill up the deficiencies," or "what remain behind of the afflictions of Christ." She is afflicted to promote her growth in holiness, and her completeness in Christ. Not one suffering is lost (Psalm 56. 8). All her members have thus a mutual interest in one another's sufferings (1 Corinthians 12. 26). But Rome's inference hence, is utterly false that the Church has a stock treasury of the merits and satisfactions of Christ and His apostles, out of which she may dispense indulgences; the context has no reference to sufferings in expiation of sin and productive of merit. Believers should regard their sufferings less in relation to themselves as individuals, and more as parts of a grand whole, carrying out God's perfect plan. 25. am—Greek, "I was made a minister:" resuming v. 23, "whereof I Paul was made a minister." dispensation—the stewardship committed to me to dispense in the house of God, the Church, to the whole family of believers, the goods of my Master (Luke 12. 42; 1 Corinthians 4. 1, 2; 9. 17; Ephesians 3. 2). which is given—Greek, "which was given." for you—with a view to you, Gentiles (v. 27; Romans 15. 16). to fulfil—to bring it fully to all: the end of his stewardship: "fully preached" (Romans 15. 19). "The fulness of Christ (v. 19), and of the times (Ephesians 1. 10) required him so to do." [BENGEL.] 26. the mystery—(Notes, Ephesians 1. 9, 10; 3. 5-9.) The mystery, once hidden, now revealed, is redemption for the whole Gentile world, as well as for the Jews, "Christ in you (Gentiles) the hope of glory" (v. 27). from ages—"from," according to ALFORD, refers to time, not "hidden from:" from the time of the ages; still what is meant is, that the mystery was hidden from the beings living in those "ages." The "ages" are the vast successive periods marked by successive orders of beings and stages of creation. Greek, "Æons," a word used by the Gnostics for angelic beings emanating from God. The Spirit by Paul presciently, in opposition to Gnostic error already beginning (ch. 2. 18), teaches, that the mystery of redemp-

man was hidden in God's purposes in Christ, alike from the angelic beings (cf. Ephesians 3. 10) of the pre-Adamic "ages," and from the subsequent human "generations." Translate as Greek, "the ages . . . the generations." made manifest to his saints—to His apostles and prophets primarily (Ephesians 3. 5), and through them to all His saints. 27. would—rather as Greek, "willed," or "was pleased to make known." He resolves all into God's good pleasure and will, that man should not glory save in God's grace. what—How full and inexhaustible! the riches of the glory of this mystery—He accumulates phrase on phrase to enhance the greatness of the blessing in Christ bestowed by God on the Gentiles. Cf. ch. 2. 8, "all the treasures" of wisdom. Ephesians 3. 8, "the unsearchable riches of Christ;" Ephesians 1. 7, "riches of His grace." "The glory of this mystery" must be the glory which this once hidden, and now revealed, truth makes you Gentiles partakers of, partly now, but mainly when Christ shall come (ch. 3. 4; Romans 5. 2; 8. 17, 18; Ephesians 1. 18). This sense is proved by the following: "Christ in you the hope of the (so Greek) glory." The lower was the degradation of you Gentiles, the higher is the richness of the glory to which the mystery revealed now raises you. You were "without Christ, and having no hope" (Ephesians 2. 12). Now you have "Christ in you the hope of the glory" just mentioned. ALFORD translates, "Christ among you," to answer to "this mystery among the Gentiles." But the whole clause, "Christ in you (Ephesians 3. 17) the hope of glory," answers to "this mystery," and not to the whole sentence, "this mystery among the Gentiles." What is made known "among you Gentiles" is, "Christ in you (now by faith as your Nidden life, ch. 3. 3; Galatians 2. 20) the hope of glory" (your manifested life). The contrast (antithesis) between "CHRIST IN YOU" now as your hidden life, and "the hope of glory" hereafter to be manifested, requires this translation. 28. preach—rather as Greek, "announce" or "proclaim." warning . . . teaching—"Warning" is connected with repentance, refers to one's conduct, and is addressed primarily to the heart. "Teaching" is connected with faith, refers to doctrines, and is addressed primarily to the intellect. These are the two heads of evangelical teaching. every . . . every man—without distinction of Jew or Gentile, great or small (Romans 10. 12, 13). in all wisdom—with all the wisdom in our method of teaching that we possess; so ALFORD. But v. 9, and ch. 3. 16, favour ESTIUS' view, which refers it to the wisdom communicated to those being taught: keeping back nothing, but instructing all in the perfect knowledge of the mysteries of faith which is the true wisdom (cf. 1 Corinthians 2. 6, 7; 12. 8; Ephesians 1. 17). present—(Note, v. 22)—at Christ's coming. every man—Paul is zealous lest the false teachers should seduce one single soul of Christ's people at Colosse. So each individual among them should be zealous for himself and his neighbour. Even one soul is of incalculable value. perfect in Christ—who is the element in living union with whom alone each believer can find perfection: perfectly instructed (Ephesians 4. 13) in doctrine, and full grown or matured in faith and practice. "Jesus" is omitted in all the oldest MSS. 29. Whereunto—viz., "to present every man perfect in Christ." I also labour—rather, "I labour also." I not only "proclaim" (English Version, "preach") Christ, but I labour also. striving—in "conflict" (ch. 2. 1) of spirit (cf. Romans 8. 26). The same Greek word is used of Epaphras (ch. 4. 12), "labouring fervently for you in prayers;" lit., "agonizing," "striving as in the agony of a contest." So Jesus in Gethsemane when praying (Luke 22. 44); so "strive" (the same Greek word, "agonize"), Luke 13. 24. So Jacob "wrestled" in prayer (Genesis 32. 24-29). Cf. "contention," Greek, "agony," or "striving earnestness," 1 Thessalonians 2. 2. according to his working—Paul avows that he has power to "strive" in spirit for his converts, so far only as Christ works in him and by him (Ephesians 3. 20; Philippians 4. 13). mightily—lit., "in power"

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-23. HIS STRIVINGS IN PRAYER FOR THEIR STEAD-

FASTNESS IN CHRIST; FROM WHOM HE WARNS THEM NOT TO BE LED AWAY BY FALSE WISDOM. 1. For—He explains in what respect he "laboured striving" (ch. 1. 29). Translate as Greek, "I wish you to know how great a conflict (the same Greek word as in ch. 1. 29, "agony of a conflict" of fervent, anxious prayer; not conflict with the false teachers, which would have been impossible for him now in prison; I have for you." them at Laodicea—exposed to the same danger from false teachers as the Colossians (cf. ch. 4. 16). This danger was probably the cause of his writing to Laodicea, as well as to Colosse. not seen my face in the flesh—including those in Hierapolis (ch. 4. 13). Paul considered himself a "debtor" to all the Gentiles (Romans 1. 14). "His face" and presence would have been a "comfort" (v. 2; Acts 20. 38). Cf. ch. 1. 4, 7, 8, in proof that he had not seen, but only heard of the Colossians. Hence he strives by earnest conflict with God in anxious prayer for them, to make up for the loss of his bodily presence among them. Though "absent in the flesh, I am with you in the Spirit" (v. 5). 2. Translate, "That their hearts may be comforted." The "their," compared with "you" (v. 4), proves that in v. 1 the words, "have not seen my face in the flesh," is a general designation of those for whom Paul declares he has "conflict," including the particular species, "you (Colossians) and them at Laodicea." For it is plain, the prayer "that their hearts may be comforted," must include in it the Colossians for whom he expressly says, "I have conflict." Thus it is an abbreviated mode of expression for, "That your and their hearts may be comforted." ALFORD translates, "confirmed," or allows "comforted" in its original radical sense strengthened. But the Greek supports English Version: the sense, too, is clear: comforted with the consolation of those whom Paul had not seen, and for whom, in consequence, he strove in prayerful conflict the more fervently; inasmuch as we are more anxious in behalf of absent, than present, friends. [DAVENANT.] Their hearts would be comforted by "knowing what conflict he had for" them, and how much he is interested for their welfare; and also by being released from doubts on learning from the apostle, that the doctrine which they had heard from Epaphras was true and certain. In writing to churches which he had instructed face to face, he enters into particular details concerning them, as a father directing his children. But to those among whom he had not been in person, he treats of the more general truths of salvation being—translate as Greek in oldest MSS., "They being knit together." in love—the bond and element of perfect knitting together; the antidote to the dividing schismatical effect of false doctrine. Love to God and to one another in Christ. unto—the object and end of their being "knit together." all riches—Greek, "all the riches of the full assurance (1 Thessalonians 1. 5; Hebrews 6. 11; 10. 22) of the (Christian) understanding." The accumulation of phrases, not only "understanding," but "the full assurance of understanding;" not only this, but "the riches of," &c.; not only this, but "all the riches of," &c., implies how he desires to impress them with the momentous importance of the subject in hand. to—transl., "unto." acknowledgment—The Greek implies, "full and accurate knowledge." It is a distinct Greek word from "knowledge," v. 3. ALFORD translates, "thorough . . . knowledge." Acknowledgment hardly is strong enough; they did in a measure acknowledge the truth; what they wanted was the full and accurate knowledge of it (cf. Notes, ch. 1. 9, 10; Philippians 1. 9). of God, and of the Father, and of Christ—The oldest MSS. omit "and of the Father, and of;" then translate, "Of God (viz.) Christ." Two very old MSS. and Vulgate read, "Of God the Father of Christ." 3. Translate in the Greek order, "In whom (not as ALFORD, 'in which' mystery; Christ is Himself the 'mystery' (v. 2; 1 Timothy 3. 16), and to Christ the relative refers) are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden." The "all" here, answers to "all" in v. 2; as "treasures" answer to the "riches;" it is from the treasures that the riches (v. 2) are derived. "Are" is the predicate of the sentence; all the treasures ARE in Him; hidden is predicated of the state or manner in which they are in Him. Like a mine of "

KNOWN and inexhaustible wealth, the treasures of wisdom are all in Him hidden, but not in order to remain so; they only need to be explored for you to attain "unto the riches" in them (v. 2); but until you, Colossians, press after attaining the full knowledge (see Note, v. 2) of them, they remain "hidden." Cf. the parable, Matthew 13. 44, "treasure hid." This sense suits the scope of the apostle, and sets aside ALFORD's objection that "the treasures are not hidden, but revealed." "Hidden" plainly answers to "mystery" (v. 2), which is designed by God, if we be faithful to our privileges, not to remain hidden, but to be revealed (cf. 1 Corinthians 2. 7, 8). Still as the mine is unfathomable, there will, through eternity, be always fresh treasures in Him to be drawn forth from their hidden state. wisdom—general, and as to experimental and practical truth; whence comes "understanding" (v. 2). knowledge—special and intellectual, in regard to doctrinal truth; whence comes "the full knowledge" (v. 2). 4. And—"Now." Cf. with "lest any man," &c., v. 8, 16, 18. He refers to the blending of Judaism with Oriental philosophy, and the combination of this mixture with Christianity. enticing words—plausible as wearing the guise of wisdom and humility (v. 18, 23). 5. For—Argument against their suffering themselves to be beguiled, drawn from a regard to his personal authority as though he were present. joying and beholding—beholding with joy. order—your good order; answering to "knit together" (v. 2) as a well organized body; the same Greek as that for "knit together," is used of "the body" of the Church "compacted," in Ephesians 4. 16. Cf. 1 Corinthians 14. 33, 40. steadfastness—Greek, "the firm (or solid) foundation." As "order" expresses the outward aspect of the Church; so "steadfastness" expresses the inner basis on which their Church rested. The Greek lit. implies not an abstract quality, but the thing in the concrete; thus their "faith" here is the solid thing which constituted the basis of their Church. 6. "As therefore ye received (once for all; the aorist tense; from Epaphras) Jesus the Christ as your Lord (cf. 1 Corinthians 12. 8; 2 Corinthians 4. 5; Philipplans 3. 8), so walk in Him." He says not merely, "Ye received" the doctrine of Christ, but "Jesus" Himself; this is the essence of faith (John 14. 21, 23; Galatians 1. 16). Ye have received once for all the Spirit of life in Christ; carry into practice that life in your walk (Galatians 5. 25). This is the main scope of the Epistle. 7. Rooted—(Ephesians 3. 17.) built up—Greek, "being bulded up." As "rooted" implies their vitality; so "bulded up," massive solidity. As in the Song of Solomon, when one image is not sufficient to express the varied aspects of Divine truth, another is employed to supply the idea required. Thus "walking," a third image (v. 6), expresses the thought which "rooted" and "built," though each suggesting a thought peculiar to itself, could not express, viz., onward motion. "Rooted" is in the past tense, implying their first conversion and vital grafting "in Him." Bulded up is present (in the Greek), implying their progressive increase in religion by union with Him. Ephesians 2. 20 refers to the Church; but the passage here to their individual progress in edification (Acts 20. 32). stablished—confirmed. as—"even as." abounding therein with thanksgiving—advancing to fuller maturity (cf. v. 2) in the faith, "with thanksgiving" to God as the gracious Author of this whole blessing. 8. Translate, "Beware (lit., 'Look' well) lest there shall be (as I fear there is: the Greek indicative expresses this) any man (pointing to some known emissary of evil, Galatians 1. 7) leading you away as his spoil (not merely gaining spoil out of you, but making yourselves his spoil) through (by means of) his philosophy," &c. The apostle does not condemn all philosophy, but "the philosophy" (so Greek) of the Judaic-oriental heretics at Colosse, which afterwards was developed into Gnosticism. You who may have "the riches of full assurance" and "the treasures of wisdom," should not suffer yourselves to be led away as a spoil by empty, deceitful philosophy; "riches" are contrasted with spoil; "full" with "vain," or empty (v. 2, 3, 9). after—"according to." tradition of men—opposed to "the fulness of the Godhead." Applied to Rabbinical traditions, Mark 7. 8. When men could not make revelation even seem to tell about deep mysteries which they were curious to pry into they brought in human philosophy and pretended traditions to help it, as if one should bring a lamp to the sundial to find the hour. [Cautions for times, p. 85.] The false teachers boasted of a higher wisdom in theory, transmitted by tradition among the initiated; in practice they enjoined asceticism, as though matter and the body were the sources of evil. Phrygia (in which was Colosse) had a propensity for the mystical and magical, which appeared in their worship of Cybele and subsequent Montanism. [NEANDER.] rudiments of the world—(Note, Galatians 4. 3.) "The rudiments" or elementary lessons "of the (outward) world," such as legal ordinances; our Judaic childhood's lessons (v. 11, 16, 20; Galatians 4. 1-3). But NEANDER, "the elements of the world," in the sense, what is earthly, carnal and outward, not "the rudiments of religion," in Judaism and heathenism. not after Christ—Their boasted higher "philosophy" is but human tradition, and a cleaving to the carnal and worldly, and not to Christ. Though acknowledging Christ nominally, in spirit they by their doctrine deny him. 9. For—"Because." Their "philosophy" (v. 8) is not "after Christ," as all true philosophy is, every thing which comes not from, and tends not to, Him, being a delusion; "For in Him (alone) dwelleth" as in a temple, &c. the fulness—(ch. 1. 19; John 14. 10.) of the Godhead—The Greek (Theotes) means the ESSENCE and NATURE of the Godhead, not merely the divine perfections and attributes of Divinity (Greek, "theiotes"). He, as man, was not merely God-like, but in the fullest sense, GOD. bodily—not merely as before His incarnation, but now "bodily in Him" as the incarnate word (John 1. 14, 18). Believers by union with Him, partake of His fulness of the Divine nature (John 1. 16; Note, Ephesians 3. 19; 2 Peter 1. 4). 10. And—And therefore; and so. Translate in the Greek order, "Ye are in Him (by virtue of union with Him) filled full" of all that you need (John 1. 16). Believers receive of the Divine unction which flows down from their Divine Head and High Priest (Psalm 133. 2). He is full of the "fulness" itself; we, filled from Him. Par. implies, Therefore ye Colossians need no supplementary sources of grace, such as the false teachers dream of. Christ is "the Head of all rule and authority" (so the Greek), Ephesians 1. 10; He, therefore, alone, not these subject "authorities" also, is to be adored (v. 18). 11. Implying that they did not need, as the Judaizers taught, the outward rite of circumcision, since they had already the inward spiritual reality of it. are—rather, as the Greek, "Ye were (once for all) circumcised (spiritually, at your conversion and baptism, Romans 2. 28, 29; Philipplans 3. 3) with a (so the Greek) circumcision made without hands;" opposed to "the circumcision in the flesh made by hands" (Ephesians 2. 11). Christ's own body, by which the believer is sanctified, is said to be "not made with hands" (Mark 14. 58; Hebrews 9. 11; cf. Daniel 2. 45). in putting off—rather as Greek, "in your putting off;" as an old garment (Ephesians 4. 22); alluding to the putting off the foreskin in circumcision. the body of the sins of the flesh—The oldest MSS. read, "the body of the flesh," omitting "of the sins," i. e., "the body," of which the prominent feature is fleshiness (cf. Romans 8. 13, where "flesh" and "the body" mutually correspond). This fleshy body, in its sinful aspect, is put off in baptism (where baptism answers its ideal) as the seal of regeneration where received in repentance and faith. In circumcision the foreskin only was put off; in Christian regeneration "the body of the flesh" is spiritually put off, at least it is so in its ideal conception, however imperfectly believers realize that ideal. by—Greek, "in." This spiritual circumcision is realized in, or by, union with Christ, whose "circumcision," whereby He became responsible for us to keep the whole law, is imputed to believers for justification; and union with whom, in all His vicarious obedience, including HIS CIRCUMCISION, is the source of our sanctification. ALFORD makes it explanatory of the previous, "a circumcision made without hands," viz., "the circumcision brought about by your union with Christ." The former view seems to me better to accord with v. 12

an. 3. 1, 3, 4, which similarly makes the believer, by spiritual union with Christ, to have personal fellowship in the several states of Christ, viz., His death, resurrection, and appearing in glory. Nothing was done or suffered by our Mediator as such, but may be acted in our souls and represented in our spirits. PEARSON'S view, however, is that of ALFORD. JOSHUA, the type (not Moses in the wilderness), circumcised the Israelites in Canaan (Joshua 5. 2-9) the second time; the people that came out of Egypt having been circumcised, and afterwards having died in the wilderness; but those born after the Exodus not having been so. Jesus, the Antitype, is the author of the true circumcision, which is therefore called "the circumcision of Christ" (Romans 2. 29). As Joshua was "Moses' minister," so Jesus, "minister" of the circumcision for the truth of God" unto the Gentiles (Romans 15. 8). 12. Translate, "Having been buried with Him in your baptism." The past participle is here coincident in time with the preceding verb, "ye were (Greek) circumcised." Baptism is regarded as the burial of the old carnal life, to which the act of immersion symbolically corresponds; and in warm climates where immersion is safe, it is the mode most accordant with the significance of the ordinance; but the spirit of the ordinance is kept by affusion, where immersion would be inconvenient or dangerous; to insist on literal immersion in all cases would be mere legal ceremonialism (Romans 6. 3, 4). are risen—rather as Greek, "were raised with Him." through the faith of, &c.—by means of your faith in the operation of God; so "faith of," for "faith in" (Ephesians 3. 12; Philippians 3. 9). Faith in God's mighty operation in raising again Jesus, is saving faith (Romans 4. 24; 10. 9); and it is wrought in the soul by His same "mighty working" whereby He "raised Jesus from the dead" (Ephesians 1. 19, 20). BENDEL seems to me (not as ALFORD understands him) to express the latter sense, viz., "Through the faith which is a work of the operation of God who," &c. Ephesians 1. 19, 20 accords with this; the same mighty power of God is exercised in raising one spiritually dead to the life of faith, as was "wrought in Christ when God raised Him literally from the dead." However, "faith of" usually is faith in (Romans 3. 22); but there is no grammatical impropriety in understanding it "the faith which is the effect of the operation of God" (Ephesians 2. 8; 1 Thessalonians 2. 13). As His literal resurrection is the ground of the power put forth in our spiritual resurrection now, so it is a pledge of our literal resurrection hereafter (Romans 8. 11.) 13. you, being dead—formerly (Ephesians 2. 1, 2); even as Christ was among the dead, before that God raised Him "from the dead" (v. 12). sins—rather as Greek is translated at end of this verse, "trespasses," lit., "fallings aside" from God's ways; actual transgressions, as that of Adam. uncircumcision of your flesh—your not having put off the old fleshly nature, the carnal foreskin, or original sin, which now by spiritual circumcision, i. e., conversion and baptism, you have put off. he quickened—God "quickened together with Him" (CHRIST). Just as Christ's resurrection proved that He was delivered from the sin laid on Him, so our spiritual quickening proves that we have been forgiven our sins (1 Peter 3. 22; 4. 1, 2). forgiven you—So Vulgate and HILARY. But the oldest MSS. read, "us," passing from the particular persons, the Colossians, to the general Church (ch. 1. 14; Ephesians 1. 7). all trespasses—Greek, "all our trespasses." 14. Blotting out—Greek, "Having wiped out;" coincident in time with "having forgiven you" (v. 13); hereby having cancelled the law's indictment against you. The law (including especially the moral law, wherein lay the chief difficulty in obeying) is abrogated to the believer, as far as it was a compulsory, accusing rōde, and as far as "righteousness" (justification) and "life" were sought for by it. It can only produce outward works, not inward obedience of the will, which in the believer flows from the Holy Spirit in Him (Romans 3. 21; 7. 4; Galatians 2. 19). the handwriting of ordinances—rather, "IN ordinances" (Note, Ephesians 2. 15); "the law of commandments contained in ordinances." "The handwriting" (alluding to the Decalogue the representative of the law, written by the hand of God) is the whole the obligatory bond, under which all lay; the Jews primarily were under the bond, but they in this respect were the representative people of the world (Romans 2. 19); and in their inability to keep the law was involved the inability of the Gentiles also, in whose hearts "the work of the law was written" (Romans 2. 15); and as they did not keep this, they were condemned by it. that was against us . . . contrary to us—Greek, "adversary to us;" so it is translated, Hebrews 10. 27. "Not only was the law against us by its demands, but also an adversary to us by its accusations." [BENDEL.] TITTMANN explains the Greek, "having a latent contrariety to us;" not open designed hostility, but virtual unintentional opposition through our frailty; not through any opposition in the law itself to our good (Romans 7. 7-12, 14; 1 Corinthians 15. 56, Galatians 3. 21; Hebrews 10. 3). The "WRITING" is part of "that which was contrary to us;" for "the letter killeth" (Note, 2 Corinthians 3. 6). and took it—Greek, "and hath taken it out of the way" (so as to be no longer a hindrance to us), by "nailing it to the cross." Christ, by bearing the curse of the broken law, has redeemed us from its curse (Galatians 3. 13). In His person nailed to the cross, the law itself was nailed to it. One ancient mode of cancelling bonds, was by striking a nail through the writing: this seems at that time to have existed in Asia. [GROTIUS.] The bond cancelled in the present case was the obligation lying against the Jews as representatives of the world, and attested by their amen, to keep the whole law under penalty of the curse (Deuteronomy 27. 26; Nehemiah 10. 29). 15. ALFORD, ELLICOTT, &c., translate the Greek to accord with the translation of the same Greek, ch. 3. 9, "Stripping off from Himself the principalities and the powers:" God put off from Himself the angels, i. e., their ministry, not employing them to be promulgators of the Gospel in the way that He had given the law by their "disposition" or ministry (Acts 7. 53; Galatians 3. 19; Hebrews 2. 2, 5): God manifested Himself without a veil in Jesus. "THE principalities and THE powers" refers back to v. 10, Jesus, "the Head of all principality and power," and ch. 1. 16. In the sacrifice of Jesus on the cross, God subjected all the principalities, &c., to Jesus, declaring them to be powerless as to His work and His people (Ephesians 1. 21). Thus Paul's argument against those grafting on Christianity Jewish observances, along with angel-worship, is, whatever part angels may be supposed to have had under the law, now at an end, God having put the legal dispensation itself away. But the objection is, that the context seems to refer to a triumph over bad angels: in 2 Corinthians 2. 14, however Christ's triumph over those subjected to Him, is not a triumph for destruction, but for their salvation, so that good angels may be referred to (ch. 1. 20). But the Greek middle is susceptible of English Version, "Having spoiled," or lit. [TITTMANN], "having completely stripped," or "despoiled" for Himself (cf. Romans 8. 38; 1 Corinthians 15. 24; Ephesians 6. 12). English Version accords with Matthew 12. 29; Luke 11. 22; Hebrews 2. 14. Translate as the Greek, "The rules and authorities." made a show of them openly—at His ascension (Notes, Ephesians 4. 8; confirming English Version of this verse). openly—John 7. 4; 11. 54, supports English Version against ALFORD'S translation, "in openness of speech." in it—viz., His cross, or crucifixion: so the Greek fathers translate. Many of the Latins, "In Himself," or "in Him." Ephesians 2. 10 favours English Version, "Reconcile . . . by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby." If "in Him." i. e., Christ, be read, still the cross will be the place and means of God's triumph in Christ over the principalities (Ephesians 1. 20; 2. 5). Demons, like other angels, were in heaven up to Christ's ascension, and influenced earth from their heavenly abodes. As heaven was not yet opened to man before Christ (John 3. 13), so it was not yet shut against demons (Job 1. 6; 2. 1). But at the ascension Satan and his demons were "judged" and "cast out" by Christ's obedience unto death (John 12. 31; 16. 11; Hebrews 2. 14; Revelation 12. 5-10), and the Son of man was raised to the throne of God; thus His resurrection and ascension are public solemn triumph over the principalities and powers of death. It is striking, that the heathen oracles were silenced soon after Christ's ascension. 16. therefore—Because ye are complete in Christ, and God in Him has dispensed with all subordinate means as essential to acceptance with Him. meat . . . drink—Greek, "eating . . . drinking" (Romans 14. 1-17). Pay no regard to any one who sits in judgment on you as to legal observances in respect to foods. holyday—a feast yearly. Cf. the three, 1 Chronicles 23. 31. new moon—monthly. the sabbath—Omit "THE," which is not in the Greek (cf. Note, Galatians 4. 10). "SABBATHS" (not "the sabbaths") of the day of atonement and feast of tabernacles have come to an end with the Jewish services to which they belonged (Leviticus 23. 32, 37-39). The weekly sabbath rests on a more permanent foundation, having been instituted in Paradise to commemorate the completion of creation in six days. Leviticus 23. 38 expressly distinguishes "the sabbath of the Lord" from the other sabbaths. A positive precept is right because it is commanded, and ceases to be obligatory when abrogated; a moral precept is commanded eternally, because it is eternally right. If we could keep a perpetual sabbath, as we shall hereafter, the positive precept of the sabbath, one in each week, would be not needed. Hebrews 4. 9, "rests," Greek, "keeping of sabbath" (Isaiah 66. 23). But we cannot, since even Adam, in innocence, needed one amidst his earthly employments; therefore the sabbath is still needed, and is therefore still linked with the other nine commandments, as obligatory in the spirit, though the letter of the law has been superseded by that higher spirit of love which is the essence of law and Gospel alike (Romans 13. 8-10). 17. things to come—the blessings of the Christian covenant, the substance of which Jewish ordinances were but the type. Cf. "ages to come," i. e., the Gospel dispensation (Ephesians 2. 7). Hebrews 2. 5, "the world to come." the body is of Christ—The real substance (of the blessings typified by the law) belongs to Christ (Hebrews 8. 5; 10. 1). 18. beguile—translate, "Defraud you of your prize," lit., "to adjudge a prize out of hostility away from him who deserves it." [TRENCH.] "To be nripire in a contest to the detriment of one." This defrauding of their prize the Colossians would suffer, by letting any self-constituted arbitrator or judge (i. e., false teacher) draw them away from Christ, "the righteous Judge" and Awarder of the prize (2 Timothy 4. 8; James 1. 12; 1 Peter 5. 4), to angel-worship. in a voluntary humility—So "will-worship" (v. 23). lit., "Delighting [WAHL] in humility:" loving (so the Greek is translated, Mark 12. 33, "love to go in long clothing") to indulge himself in a humility of his own imposing; a volunteer in humility. [DAL-LEUS.] Not as ALFORD, "Let no one of purpose defraud you," &c. Not as GROTIUS, "If he ever so much wish" (to defraud you). For the participle "wishing" or "delighting," is one of the series, and stands in the same category as "intruding," "puffed up," "not holding;" and the self-pleasing implied in it stands in happy contrast to the (mock) humility with which it seems to me, therefore, to be connected. His "humility," so-called, is a pleasing of self: thus it stands in parallelism to "his fleshly mind" (its real name, though he styles it "humility"), as "wishing" or "delighting" does to "puffed up." The Greek for "humility" is lit., "lowliness of mind," which forms a clearer parallel to "puffed up by his fleshly mind." Under pretext of humility, as if they durst not come directly to God and Christ (like the modern Church of Rome), they invoked angels: as Judalzers, they justified this on the ground that the law was given by angels. This error continued long in Phrygia (where Colosse and Laodicea were), so that the Council of Laodicea (A. D. 360) expressly framed its 35th canon against the "Angelici" (as AUGUSTINE, Hereses, 39, calls them) or "invokers of angels." Even as late as THEODORET'S time there were oratories to Michael the archangel. The modern Greeks have a legend that Michael opened a chasm to draw off an inundation threatening the Colossian Christians. Once men admit the inferior powers to share invocation with the Supreme, the former gradually engrosses all our serious worship, almost to the exclusion of the latter; thus the heathen, beginning with adding the worst of other deities to that of the Supreme, ended with ceasing to worship Him at all. Nor does it signify much, whether we regard such as directly controlling us (the Pagan view), or as only influencing the Supreme in our behalf (the Church of Rome's view); because he from whom I expect happiness or misery, becomes the uppermost object in my mind, whether he give, or only procure it. [Objections for Times.] Scripture opposes the idea of "patrons" or "intercessors" (1 Timothy 2. 5, 6). True Christian humility joins consciousness of utter personal demerit, with a sense of participation in the Divine life through Christ, and in the dignity of our adoption by God. Without the latter being realized, a false self-humiliation results, which displays itself in ceremonies and ascetic self-abasement (v. 23), which after all is but spiritual pride under the mock guise of humility. Contrast "glorying in the Lord" (1 Corinthians 1. 31). intruding into . . . things which he hath not seen—So very old MSS. and Vulgate and ORIGEN read. But the oldest MSS. and LUCIFER omit "not;" then translate, "Haughtily treading on ('standing on' [ALFORD]) the things which he hath seen." TREGELLES refers this to sanctified visions of angels. But if St. Paul had meant a sanctified seeing, he would have used some qualifying word, as, "which he seemed to see," not "which he hath seen." Plainly the things were actually seen by him, whether of demoniacal origination (1 Samuel 28. 11-20), or phenomena resulting from natural causation, mistaken by him as if supernatural. Paul not stopping to discuss the nature of the things so seen, fixes on the radical error, the tendency of such a one in all this to walk by SENSE (viz., what he haughtily prides himself on having seen), rather than by FAITH in the UNSEEN "Head" (v. 19; cf. John 20. 29; 2 Corinthians 5. 7; Hebrews 11. 1). Thus in the parallelism, "vainly puffed up" answers to "haughtily treading on," or "setting his foot on;" "his fleshly mind" answers to "the things which he hath seen," since his fleshliness betrays itself in priding himself on what he hath seen, rather than on the unseen objects of faith. That the things seen may have been of demoniacal origination, appears from 1 Timothy 4. 1, "Some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils" (Greek, "demons") A warning to modern spiritualists. puffed up—Implying that the previous so called "humility" (Greek, "lowliness of mind") was really a "puffing up." fleshly mind—Greek, "By the mind of his own flesh." The flesh, or sensuous principle, is the fountain head whence his mind draws its craving after religious objects of sight, instead of, in true humility as a member, "holding fast the (unseen) Head." 19. Translate, "Not holding fast the Head." He who does not hold Christ solely and supremely above all others, does not hold Him at all. [BENGEL.] The want of firm holding of Christ has set him loose to (pry into, and so) "tread haughtily on (pride himself on) things which he hath seen." Each must hold fast the Head for himself, not merely be attached to the other members, however high in the body. [ALFORD.] from which—rather, "from whom." all the body—i. e., all the members of the body (Ephesians 4. 16). Joints—the points of union where the supply of nourishment passes to the different members, furnishing the body with the materials of growth. bands—the sinews and nerves which bind together limb and limb. Faith, love, and peace, are the spiritual bands. Cf. "knit together in love" (v. 2; ch. 3. 14; Ephesians 4. 3). having nourishment ministered—i. e., supplied to it continually. "Receiving ministrations." knit together—The Greek is translated "compacted," Ephesians 4. 16: implying firm consolidation. with the increase of God—(Ephesians 4. 16)—i. e., wrought by God, the Author and Sustainer of the believer's spiritual life, in union with Christ, the Head (1 Corinthians 3. 6); and tending to the honour of God, being worthy of Him, its Author. 20. Wherefore—The oldest MSS. omit "Wherefore." if ye be dead—Greek, "if ye died (so as to be freed) from," &c. (cf. Romans 6. 2; 7. 2, 3; Galatians 2. 19). rudiments of the world—(a. 2)

CHAPTER III.

Carnal, outward, worldly, legal ordinances. as though living—as though you were not dead to the world like your crucified Lord, into whose death ye were buried (Galatians 6. 14; 1 Peter 4. 1, 2). are ye subject to ordinances—why do ye submit to be made subject to ordinances? Referring to v. 14: you are again being made subject to “ordinances,” the “handwriting” of which had been “blotted out” (v. 14). 21. Cf. v. 16, “meat . . . drink” He gives instances of the “ordinances” (v. 20) in the words of their imposers. There is an ascending climax of superstitious prohibitions. The first Greek word (hapse) is distinguished from the third (thiges), in that the former means close contact and retention; the latter, momentary contact (cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 1; Jobn 20. 17, Greek, “Hold me not;” “cling not to me”). Translate, “Handle not, neither taste, nor even touch.” The three refer to meats. “Handle not” (a stronger term than “nor even touch”), “nor taste” with the lingue, “nor even touch,” however slight the contact. 22. Which—things, viz., the three things handled, touched, and tasted, are to perish—lit., “are constituted by their very nature” for perishing (or destruction by corruption) in (or with) their using up” (consumption). Therefore they cannot really and lastingly defile a man (Matthew 15. 17; 1 Corinthians 6. 13). after—according to. Referring to v. 20, 21. All these “ordinances” are according to human, not Divine, injunction. doctrines—Greek, “teachings.” ALFORD translates, (doctrinal) “systems.” 23. have—Greek, “are having;” implying the permanent characteristic which these ordinances are supposed to have. show of wisdom—rather, “a reputation of wisdom.” [ALFORD.] will-worship—arbitrarily-invented worship: would-be-worship, devised by man's own will, not God's. So jealous is God of human will-worship, that He struck Nadab and Abihu dead for burning strange incense (Leviticus 10. 1-3). So Uzziah was stricken with leprosy for usurping the office of priest (2 Chronicles 26. 16-21). Cf. the will-worship of Saul (1 Samuel 13. 8-14) for which he was doomed to lose his throne. This “voluntary worship” is the counterpart to their “voluntary humility” (v. 18): both specious in appearance, the former seeming in religion to do even more than God requires (as in the dogmas of the Roman and Greek churches), but really setting aside God's will for man's own; the latter seemingly self-abasing, but really proud of man's self-willed “humility” (Greek, “lowliness of mind”), whilst virtually rejecting the dignity of direct communion with Christ, the Head, by worshipping of angels. neglecting of the body—Greek, “not sparing of the body.” This asceticism seems to have rested on the Oriental theory that matter is the source of evil. This also looked plausible (cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 27). set in any honour—of the body. As “neglecting of the body” describes asceticism positively; so this clause, negatively. Not paying any of that “honour” which is due to the body as redeemed by such a price as the blood of Christ. We should not degrade, but have a just estimation of ourselves, not in ourselves, but in Christ (Acts 13. 46; 1 Corinthians 3. 21; 6. 15; 7. 23; 12. 23, 24; 1 Thessalonians 4. 4). True self-denial regards the spirit, and not the forms of ascetical self-mortification in “meats which profit not those occupied therein” (Hebrews 13. 9), and is consistent with Christian self-respect, the “honour” which belongs to the believer as dedicated to the Lord. Cf. “vainly,” v. 18. to the satisfying of the flesh—This expresses the real tendency of their human ordinances of bodily asceticism, voluntary humility, and will-worship of angels. Whilst seeming to deny self and the body, they really are pampering the flesh. Thus “satisfying of the flesh” answers to “puffed up by his fleshy mind” (v. 18) so that “flesh” is used in its ethical sense, “the carnal nature” as opposed to the spiritual; not in the sense, “body.” The Greek for “satisfying,” implies satiating to repletion, or to excess. “A surfeit of the carnal sense is human tradition.” [HILARY THE DEACON, in BENGEL.] Tradition puffs up; it clogs the heavenly perceptions. They pat away true “honour” that they may “satisfiate to the full THE FLESH.” Self-imposed ordinances gratify the flesh (viz. self-righteousness) though seeming to mortify it.

Ver. 1-25. EXHORTATIONS TO HEAVENLY AIMS, AS OPPOSED TO EARTHLY, ON THE GROUND OF UNION TO THE RISEN SAVIOUR; TO MORTIFY AND PUT OFF THE OLD MAN, AND TO PUT ON THE NEW; IN CHARITY, HUMILITY, WORDS OF EDIFICATION, THANKFULNESS; RELATIVE DUTIES. 1. If . . . then—The connection with ch. 2. 18, 23, is, he had condemned the “fleshy mind” and the “satiating to the full the flesh;” in contrast to this he now says, “If then ye have been once for all raised up (Greek, aorist) together with Christ” (viz., at your conversion and baptism, Romans 6. 4). seek those things . . . above—(Matthew 6. 33; Philippians 3. 20.) sitteth—rather, as Greek, “Where Christ is, sitting on the right of God” (Ephesians 1. 20). The Head being quickened, the members are also quickened with Him. Where the Head is, there the members must be. The contrast is between the believer's former state, alive to the world but dead to God, and his present state, dead to the world but alive to God; and between the earthly abode of the unbeliever and the heavenly abode of the believer (1 Corinthians 15. 47, 48). We are already seated there in Him as our Head; and hereafter shall be seated by Him, as the Bestower of our bliss. As Elisha (2 Kings 2. 2) said to Elijah when about to ascend, “As the Lord liveth . . . I will not leave thee;” so we must follow the ascended Saviour with the wings of our meditations and the chariots of our affections. We should trample upon and subdue our lusts, that our conversation may correspond to our Saviour's condition; that where the eyes of apostles were forced to leave Him, thither our thoughts may follow Him (Matthew 6. 21; John 12. 32). [PEARSON.] Of ourselves we can no more ascend than a bar of iron lift itself up from the earth. But the love of Christ is a powerful magnet to draw us up (Ephesians 2. 5, 6). The design of the Gospel is not merely to give rules, but mainly to supply motives to holiness. 2. Translate, “Set your mind on the things above, not on the things,” &c. (ch. 2. 20). Contrast “who mind earthly things” (Philippians 3. 19). Whatever we make an idol of, will either be a cross to us if we be believers, or a curse to us if unbelievers. 3. The Greek aorist implies, “For ye have died once for all” (ch. 2. 12; Romans 6. 4-7). It is not said, Ye must die practically to the world in order to become dead with Christ; but the latter is assumed as once for all having taken place in the regeneration; what believers are told is, Develop this spiritual life in practice. “No one longs for eternal, incorruptible, and immortal life, unless he be wearied of this temporal, corruptible, and mortal life.” [AUGUSTINE.] your life . . . hid—Psalm 83. 3—like a seed buried in the earth; of “planted,” Romans 6. 5. Cf. Matthew 13. 31 and 33, “like . . . leaven . . . hid.” As the glory of Christ now is hid from the world, so also the glory of believers' inner life, proceeding from communion with him, is still hidden with Christ in God; but (v. 4) when Christ, the Source of this life, shall manifest Himself in glory, then shall their hidden glory be manifest, and correspond in appearance to its original. [NEANDER.] The Christian's secret communion with God will now at times make itself seen without his intending it (Matthew 5. 14, 16); but his full manifestation is at Christ's manifestation (Matthew 13. 43; Romans 8. 19-23). “It doth not yet appear (Greek, ‘is not yet manifested’) what we shall be” (1 John 3. 2; 1 Peter 1. 7). As yet Christians do not always recognize the “life” of one another, so hidden is it, and even at times doubt as to their own life, so weak is it, and so harassed with temptations (Psalm 51.; Romans 7). in God—to whom Christ has ascended. Our “life” is “laid up for” us in God (ch. 1. 5), and is secured by the decree of Him who is invisible to the world (2 Timothy 4. 8). 4. Translate, “When Christ shall be manifested who is our life (John 11. 25; 14. 6, 19), then shall ye also with Him be manifested in glory” (1 Peter 4. 13). The spiritual life our souls have now in Him shall be extended to our bodies (Romans 8. 11). them—and not till then. Those err who think to find a perfect Church before then. The true Church is now militant. Rome errs in trying to set up a Church now regnant and

triumphant. The true Church shall be visible as a perfect and reigning Church, when Christ shall be visibly manifested as her reigning Head. Rome having ceased to look for Him in patient faith, has set up a visible mock-head, a false anticipation of the millennial kingdom. The Papacy took to itself by robbery that glory which is an object of hope, and can only be reached by bearing the cross now. When the Church became a harlot, she ceased to be a bride who goes to meet her Bridegroom. Hence the millennial kingdom ceased to be looked for. [AUBERLEN.] 5. Mortify—Greek, "Make a corpse of;" "make dead;" "put to death," therefore—(Note, v. 3.) Follow out to its necessary consequence the fact of your having once for all died with Christ spiritually at your regeneration, by daily "deadening your members," of which united "the body of the sins of the flesh" consists (ch. 2. 11). "The members" to be mortified are the fleshly instruments of lust, in so far as the members of the body are abused to such purposes. Habitually repress and do violence to corrupt desires of which the members are the instruments (cf. Romans 6. 19; 8. 18; Galatians 5. 24, 25). upon the earth—where they find their support [BENGEL] (cf. v. 2, "things on earth"). See Ephesians 5. 3, 4. Inordinate affection—"lustful passion," evil concupiscence—more general than the last [ALFORD], the disorder of the external senses; "lustful passion," lust within. [BENGEL.] enviousness—marked off by the Greek article as forming a whole genus by itself, distinct from the genus containing the various species just enumerated. It implies a self-idolizing, grasping spirit; far worse than another Greek term translated "the love of money" (1 Timothy 6. 10), which is—i. e., inasmuch as it is "idolatry." Cf. Note, Ephesians 4. 19, on its connection with sins of impurity. Self and mammon are deified in the heart instead of God (Matthew 6. 24; Note, Ephesians 5. 5). 6. (Note, Ephesians 5. 6.) 7. sometime—"once," walked . . . when ye lived in them—These sins were the very element in which ye "lived" (before ye became once for all dead with Christ to them); no wonder, then, that ye "walked" in them. Cf. on the opposite side, "living in the Spirit," having as its legitimate consequence, "walking in the Spirit" (Galatians 5. 25). The living comes first in both cases, the walking follows. 8. But now—that ye are no longer living in them. ye also—like other believers; answering to "ye also" (v. 7) like other unbelievers formerly. put off—"Do ye also put away all these," viz., those just enumerated, and those which follow. [ALFORD.] anger, wrath—(Note, Ephesians 4. 31.) blasphemy—rather, "reviling," "evil-speaking," as it is translated Ephesians 4. 31. Filthy communication—The context favours the translation, "abusive language," rather than impure conversation. "Foul language" best retains the ambiguity of the original. 9. (Ephesians 4. 22, 25.) put off—Greek, "wholly put off;" utterly renounced. [TRITMANN.] the old man—the unregenerate nature which ye had before conversion. his deeds—habits of acting. 10. the new man—(Note, Ephesians 4. 23.) Here (neon) the Greek, means "the recently-put-on nature;" that lately received at regeneration (see Note, Ephesians 4. 23, 24). which is renewed—Greek, "which is being renewed" (anakainoumenon); viz., its development into a perfectly renewed nature is continually progressing to completion. in knowledge—rather as the Greek, "unto perfect knowledge" (Notes, ch. 1. 8, 9, 10). Perfect knowledge of God excludes all sin (John 17. 3). after the image of him that created him—viz., of God that created the new man (Ephesians 2. 10; 4. 24). The new creation is analogous to the first creation (2 Corinthians 4. 6). As man was then made in the image of God naturally, so now spiritually. But the image of God formed in us by the Spirit of God, is as much more glorious than that borne by Adam, as the Second Man, the Lord from heaven, is more glorious than the first man. Genesis 1. 26, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness." The "image" is claimed for man, 1 Corinthians 11. 7; the "likeness," James 3. 9. ORIGEN (Principia l. 6) taught, the image was something in which all were created, and which continued to man after the fall (Genesis 1. 26). The likeness was something towards which man was created, that he might strive after it and attain it. TRENCH thinks God in the double statement (Genesis 1. 26), contemplates both man's first creation and his being "renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created Him." 11. Where—translate, "Wherein," viz., in the sphere of the renewed man. neither . . . nor . . . nor . . . nor—translate as Greek, "There is no such thing as Greek and Jew (the difference of privilege between those born of the natural seed of Abraham, and those not is abolished), circumcision and uncircumcision (the difference of legal standing between the circumcised and uncircumcised is done away, Galatians 6. 15)—bondman, freeman." The present Church is one called out of the flesh, and the present world-course (Ephesians 2. 2), wherein such distinctions exist, to life in the Spirit, and to the future first resurrection; and this because Satan has such power now over the flesh and the world. At Christ's coming, when Satan shall no longer rule the flesh and the world, the nations in the flesh, and the word in millennial felicity, shall be the willing subjects of Christ and His glorified saints (Daniel 7. 14, 22, 27; Luke 19. 17, 19; Revelation 20. 1-6; 3. 21). Israel in Canaan was a type of that future state when the Jews, so miraculously preserved distinct now in their dispersion, shall be the central Church of the Christianized world. As expressly as Scripture abolishes the distinction of Jew and Greek now as to religious privileges, so does it expressly foretell that in the coming new order of things, Israel shall be first of the Christian nations, not for her own selfish aggrandizement, but for their good, as the medium of blessing to them. Finally, after the millennium, the life that is in Christ becomes the power which transfigures nature, in the time of the new heaven and the new earth; as, before, it first transfigured the spiritual, then the political and social world. Scythian—heretofore regarded as more barbarian than the barbarians. Though the relation of bond and free actually existed, yet in relation to Christ, all alike were free in one aspect, and servants of Christ in another (1 Corinthians 7. 22; Galatians 3. 28). Christ is all—Christ absorbs in Himself all distinctions, being to all alike, everything that they need for justification, sanctification, and glorification (1 Corinthians 1. 30; 2. 21-23; Galatians 2. 20). in all—who believe and are renewed, without distinction of person; the sole distinction now is, how much each draws from Christ. The unity of the Divine life shared in by all believers, counterbalances all differences, even as great as that between the polished "Greek" and the rude "Scythian." Christianity imparts to the most uncivilized the only spring of sound, social and moral culture. 12. the elect of God—There is no "the" in the Greek, "God's elect" (cf. Romans 8. 3; 1 Thessalonians 1. 4). The order of the words "elect, holy, beloved," answers to the order of the things. Electio from eternity precedes sanctification in time; the sanctified, feeling God's love, imitate it. [BENGEL.] bowels of mercies—Some of the oldest MSS. read singular, "mercy." Bowels express the yearning compassion, which has its seat in the heart, and which we feel to act on our inward parts (Genesis 43. 30; Jeremiah 31. 20; Luke 1. 78, Margin). humbleness of mind—True "lowliness of mind;" not the mock "humility" of the false teachers (ch. 2. 23; Ephesians 4. 2, 32). 13. Forbearing—as to present offences. forgiving—as to past offences. quarrel—rather as Greek, "cause of blame," "cause of complaint." Christ—who had so infinitely greater cause of complaint against us. The oldest MSS. and Vulgate read "the Lord." English Version is supported by one very old MS. and old versions. It seems to have crept in from Ephesians 4. 32. 14. above—rather "over," as in Ephesians 6. 16. Charity, which is the crowning grace, covering the multitude of others' sins (1 Peter 4. 8), must overlie all the other graces enumerated. which is—i. e., for it is; lit., "which thing is." bond of perfectness—An upper garment which completes and keeps together the rest, which without it, would be loose and disconnected. Seemingly graces, where love is wanting, are mere hypocrisy. Justification by faith, is assumed as already having taken place in those whom Paul addresses, v. 12, "elect of God.

only . . . beloved," and ch. 2. 12; so that there is no plea here for Rome's view of justification by works. Love and its works "perfect," i. e., manifest the full maturity of faith developed (Matthew 5. 44, 48). Love . . . be ye perfect, &c. (James 2. 21, 22; 1 John 2. 5). "If we love one another, God's love is perfected in us" (Romans 13. 8; 1 Corinthians 13.; 1 Timothy 1. 5; 1 John 4. 12). As to "bond," cf. ch. 2. 2, "knit together in love" (Ephesians 4. 3), "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." 15. peace of God—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "The peace of CHRIST" (cf. Philippians 4. 7). "The peace of God." Therefore Christ is God. Peace was His legacy to His disciples before He left them (John 14. 27), "My peace I give unto you." Peace is peculiarly His to give. Peace follows love (v. 14; Ephesians 4. 2, 3). rule—lit., "sit as umpire;" the same Greek verb simple, as appears compounded (ch. 2. 18). The false teacher, as a self-constituted umpire, defrauds you of your prize; but if the peace of Christ be your umpire ruling in your hearts, your reward is sure. "Let the peace of Christ act as umpire when anger, envy, and such passions arise, and restrain them." Let not those passions give the award, so that you should be swayed by them, but let Christ's peace be the decider of every thing. in your hearts—Many wear a peaceful countenance and speak peace with the mouth, whilst war is in their hearts (Psalm 28. 3; 55. 21). to the which—i. e., with a view to which state of Christian peace (Isaiah 26. 8); 1 Corinthians 7. 15, "God hath called us to peace." ye are called—Greek, "ye were also called." The "also" implies that besides Paul's exhortation, they have also as a motive to "peace," their having been once for all called. in one body—(Ephesians 4. 4)—The unity of the body is a strong argument for "peace" among the members. be ye thankful—for your "calling." Not to have "peace ruling in your hearts" would be inconsistent with the "calling in one body," and would be practical unthankfulness to God who called us (Ephesians 5. 4, 19, 20). 16. The form which "thankfulness" (v. 15) ought to take. Let the word of Christ—The Gospel word by which ye have been called. richly—(ch. 2. 2; Romans 15. 14)—in all wisdom—ALFORD joins this clause with "teaching," &c., not with "dwell in you," as English Version, for so we read in ch. 1. 28, "teaching in all wisdom," and the two clauses will thus correspond, "In all wisdom teaching," and "in grace singing in your hearts" (so the Greek order). and . . . and—The oldest MSS. read "psalms, hymns, spiritual songs" (Note, Ephesians 5. 19). At the Agapæ or Love-feasts, and in their family circles, they were to be so full of the Word of Christ in the heart, that the mouth should give utterance in hymns of instruction, admonition, and praise (cf. Deuteronomy 6. 7). TERTULLIAN, Apology, 39, records that at the Love-feasts, after the water had been furnished for the hands and the lights had been lit, according as any had the power, whether by his remembrance of Scripture, or by his powers of composition, he used to be invited to sing praises to God for the common good. Paul contrasts (as in Ephesians 5. 18, 19) the songs of Christians at their social meetings, with the bacchanalian and licentious songs of heathen feasts. Singing usually formed part of the entertainment at Greek banquets (cf. James 5. 13). with grace—Greek, "in grace," the element in which your singing is to be: "the grace" of the indwelling Holy Spirit. This clause expresses the seat and source of true psalmody, whether in private or public, viz., the heart as well as the voice; singing (cf. v. 15, "peace . . . rule in your hearts"), the psalm of love and praise being in the heart before it finds vent by the lips, and even when it is not actually expressed by the voice, as in closet-worship. The Greek order forbids English Version, "with grace in your hearts;" rather, "singing in your hearts." to the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "to God." 17. Lit., "And everything whatsoever ye do . . . do all," &c. this includes words as well as deeds. in the name of the Lord Jesus—as disciples called by His name as His, seeking His guidance and help, and desiring to act so as to gain His approval (Romans 14. 8; 1 Corinthians 10. 21. 2 Corinthians 5. 15; 1 Peter 4. 11). Cf. "in the Lord,"

v. 18, and v. 11, "Christ is all" God and the Father—The oldest MSS. omit "and," which seems to have crept in from Ephesians 5. 20. by him—Greek, "through Him" as the channel of His grace to us, and of our thanksgiving to Him (John 14. 6, end). 18. to your own husbands—The oldest MSS. omit "own," which crept in from Ephesians 5. 22. as it is fit in the Lord—Greek, "was fit," implying that there was at Colosse some degree of failure in fulfilling this duty, "as it was your duty to have done as disciples of the Lord." 19. (Ephesians 5. 22-33.) be not bitter—ill-tempered, and provoking. Many who are polite abroad, are rude and bitter at home because they are not afraid to be so there. 20. (Ephesians 6. 1.) unto the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, "in the Lord," i. e., this is acceptable to God when it is done in the Lord, viz., from the principle of faith, and as disciples in union with the Lord. 21. (Ephesians 6. 4.) It is a different Greek verb, therefore translate here, "Irritate not." By perpetual fault-finding "children" are "discouraged" or "disheartened." A broken-down spirit is fatal to youth. [BENGEL.] 22. (Ephesians 6. 5, 6.) This is to fear God, when, though none sees us, we do no evil: but if we do evil, it is not God, but men, whom we fear. singleness—"simplicity of heart." fearing God—The oldest MSS. read, "the Lord." 23. And—Omitted in the oldest MSS (cf. Ephesians 6. 7, 8). Cf. the same principle in the case of all men, Hezekiah (2 Chronicles 31. 21; Romans 12. 11). do, do it—Two distinct Greek verbs, "Whatsoever ye do, work at it" (or labour at it). heartily—not from servile constraint, but with hearty good will. 24. the reward of the inheritance—"Knowing that it is from the Lord (the ultimate source of reward), ye shall receive the compensation (or recompense, which will make ample amends for your having no earthly possession, as slaves now) consisting of the inheritance" (a term excluding the notion of meriting it by works: it is all of grace, Romans 4. 14; Galatians 3. 18). for ye serve—The oldest MSS. omit "for," then translate as Vulgate, "Serve ye the Lord Christ;" cf. v. 23, "To the Lord and not unto men" (1 Corinthians 7. 22, 23). 25. But—The oldest MSS. read, "for," which accords with "serve ye," &c. (v. 24), the oldest reading: the for here gives a motive for obeying the precept. He addresses the slaves: Serve ye the Lord Christ, and leave your wrongs in His hands to put to rights; (translate) "For he that doeth wrong shall receive back the wrong which he hath done (by just retribution in kind), and there is no respect of persons" with the Great Judge in the day of the Lord. He favours the master no more than the slave (Revelation 6. 15).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-18. EXHORTATIONS CONTINUED. TO PRAYER. WISDOM IN RELATION TO THE UNCONVERTED. AS TO THE BEARERS OF THE EPISTLE, TYCHICUS AND ONESIMUS; CLOSING SALUTATIONS. 1. give—Greek, "render;" lit., "afford." equal—i. e., as the slaves owe their duties to you, so you equally owe to them your duties as masters. Cf. "ye masters do the same things" (Note, Ephesians 6. 9). ALFORD translates, "fairness," "equity," which gives a large and liberal interpretation of justice in common matters (Philemon 16). knowing—(Ch. 3. 24.) ye also—viz., well as they. 2. Continue—Greek, "Continue perseveringly," "persevere" (Ephesians 6. 18), "watching thereunto;" here, "watch in the same," or "in it," i. e., in prayer: watching against the indolence as to prayer, and in prayer, of our corrupt wills. with thanksgiving—for everything, whether joyful, or sorrowful, mercies temporal and spiritual, national, family, and individual (1 Corinthians 14. 17; Philippians 4. 6; 1 Thessalonians 5. 18). 3. for us—myself and Timothy (ch. 1. 1). a door of utterance—translate, "a door for the word." Not as in Ephesians 6. 19, where power of "utterance" is his petition. Here it is an opportunity for preaching the word, which would be best afforded by his release from prison (1 Corinthians 16. 9; 2 Corinthians 2. 12; Philemon 22; Revelation 3. 8). to speak—so that we may speak. the mystery of Christ—(Ch. 1. 27.) for which . . . also—or

account of which I am (not only "an ambassador," Ephesians 6. 20, but) ALSO in bonds. 4. ALFORD thinks that Paul asks their prayers for his release as if it were the only way by which he could "make it (the Gospel) manifest" as he ought. But whilst this is included in their subject of prayer, Philippians 1. 12, 13, written somewhat later in his imprisonment, clearly shows that "a door for the word" could be opened, and was opened, for its manifestation, even whilst he remained imprisoned (cf. 2 Timothy 2. 9). 5. (Notes, Ephesians 5. 15, 16.) in wisdom—Practical Christian prudence. them . . . without—Those not in the Christian brotherhood (1 Corinthians 5. 12; 1 Thessalonians 4. 12). The brethren, through love, will make allowances for an indiscreet act or word of a brother; the world will make none. Therefore be the more on your guard in your intercourse with the latter, lest you be a stumbling-block to their conversion. redeeming the time—The Greek expresses, buying up for yourselves, and buying off from worldly vanities the opportunity, whenever it is afforded you, of good to yourselves and others. "Fore-stall the opportunity, i. e., to buy up an article out of the market, so as to make the largest profit from it." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 6. with grace—Greek, "IN grace" as its element (ch. 3. 16; Ephesians 4. 29). Contrast the case of those "of the world" who "therefore speak of the world" (1 John 4. 5). Even the smallest leaf of the believer should be full of the sap of the Holy Spirit (Jeremiah 17. 7, 8). His conversation should be cheerful without levity, serious without gloom. Cf. Luke 4. 22; John 7. 46, as to Jesus' speech. seasoned with salt—i. e., the savour of fresh and lively spiritual wisdom and earnestness, excluding all "corrupt communication," and also tasteless insipidity (Matthew 5. 13; Mark 9. 50; Ephesians 4. 29). Cf. all the sacrifices seasoned with salt (Leviticus 2. 13). Not far from Colosse, in Phrygia, there was a salt lake, which gives to the image here the more appropriateness. how ye ought to answer every man—(1 Peter 3. 15.) 7. Tychicus—(Note, Ephesians 6. 2.) who is a beloved brother—rather, "the beloved brother;" the article "the" marks him as well known to them. 8. for the same purpose—Greek, "for this very purpose," that he might know your estate—translate, "that he may know your state;" answering to v. 7. So one very old MS. and Vulgate read. But the oldest MSS. and the old Latin versions, "that YE may know OUR state." However, the latter reading seems likely to have crept in from Ephesians 6. 22. Paul was the more anxious to know the state of the Colossians, on account of the seductions to which they were exposed from false teachers; owing to which he had "great conflict for" them (ch. 2. 1). comfort your hearts—distressed as ye are by my imprisonment, as well as by your own trials. Onesimus—the slave mentioned in the Epistle to Philemon 10. 16, "a brother beloved." a faithful . . . brother—rather, "the faithful brother," he being known to the Colossians as the slave of Philemon, their fellow-townsmen and fellow-Christian. one of you—belonging to your city. they shall make known unto you all things—Greek, "all the things here." This substantial repetition of "all my state shall Tychicus declare unto you," strongly favours the reading of English Version in v. 8, "that he might (may) know your state," as it is unlikely the same thing should be stated thrice. 10. Aristarchus—A Macedonian of Thessalonica (Acts 27. 2), who was dragged into the theatre at Ephesus, during the tumult with Gaius, they being "Paul's companions in travel." He accompanied Paul to Asia (Acts 20. 4), and subsequently (Acts 27. 2) to Rome. He was now at Rome with Paul (cf. Philemon 23, 24). As he is here spoken of as Paul's "fellow-prisoner," but in Philemon 24 as Paul's "fellow-labourer;" and vice versa, Epaphras in Philemon 23, as his "fellow-prisoner," but here (ch. 1. 7) "fellow-servant," MEYER in ALFORD, conjectures that Paul's friends voluntarily shared his imprisonment by turns, Aristarchus being his fellow-prisoner when he wrote to the Colossians, Epaphras when he wrote to Philemon. The Greek "or "fellow-prisoner" is lit., fellow-captive, an image from prisoners taken in warfare, Christians being "fellow-soldiers" (Philippians 2. 25; Philemon 2), whose warfare is "the good fight of faith." Mark—John Mark (Acts 12. 12, 25); the Evangelist according to tradition. sister's son—rather, "cousin," or "kinsman to Barnabas;" the latter being the better known is introduced to designate Mark. The relationship naturally accounts for Barnabas' selection of Mark as his companion when otherwise qualified; and also for Mark's mother's house at Jerusalem being the place of resort of Christians there (Acts 12. 12). The family belonged to Cyprus (Acts 4. 86); this accounts for Barnabas' choice of Cyprus as the first station on their journey (Acts 13. 4), and for Mark's accompanying them readily so far, it being the country of his family; and for Paul's rejecting him at the second journey for not having gone further than Perga, in Pamphylia, but having gone thence home to his mother at Jerusalem (Matthew 10. 37) on the first journey (Acts 13. 13). touching whom—viz., Mark. ye received commandments—possibly before the writing of this Epistle; or the "commandments" were verbal by Tychicus, and accompanying this letter, since the past tense was used by the ancients (where we use the present) in relation to the time which it would be when the letter was read by the Colossians. Thus (Philemon 19). "I have written," for "I write." The substance of them was, "If he come unto you, receive him." St. Paul's rejection of him on his second missionary journey, because he had turned back at Perga on the first journey (Acts 13. 13; 15. 37-39), had caused an alienation between himself and Barnabas. Christian love soon healed the breach; for here he implies his restored confidence in Mark, makes honourable allusion to Barnabas, and desires that those at Colosse who had regarded Mark in consequence of that past error with suspicion, should now "receive" him with kindness. Colosse is only about 110 miles from Perga, and less than 20 from the confines of Pisidia, through which province Paul and Barnabas preached on their return during the same journey. Hence, though Paul had not personally visited the Colossian Church, they knew of the past unfaithfulness of Mark; and needed this recommendation of him, after the temporary cloud on him, so as to receive him, now that he was about to visit them as an evangelist. Again, in Paul's last imprisonment, he, for the last time, speaks of Mark (2 Timothy 4. 11). 11. Justus—i. e., righteous; a common name among the Jews; Hebrew, tsadik (Acts 1. 23). of the circumcision—This implies that Epaphras, Luke, and Demas (v. 12, 14) were not of the circumcision. This agrees with Luke's Gentile name (the same as Lucanus), and the Gentile aspect of his Gospel. These only, &c.—viz., of the Jews. For the Jewish teachers were generally opposed to the apostle of the Gentiles (Philippians 1. 15). Epaphras, &c., were also fellow-labourers, but Gentiles. unto—i. e., in promoting the Gospel kingdom. which have been—Greek, "which have been made," or "have become," i. e., inasmuch as they have become a comfort to me. The Greek implies comfort in forensic dangers; a different Greek word expresses comfort in domestic affliction. [BENJEL.] 12. Christ—The oldest MSS. add "Jesus." labouring fervently—As the Greek is the same, translate, "striving earnestly" (note, ch. 1. 29; 2. 1), lit., striving as in the agony of a contest. in prayers—translate as Greek, "in his prayers." complete—The oldest MSS. read "fully assured." It is translated "fully persuaded," Romans 4. 21; 14. 5. In the expression "perfect," he refers to what he has already said, ch. 1. 28; 2. 2; 3. 14. "Perfect" implies the attainment of the full maturity of a Christian. BENJEL joins "in all the will of God" with "stand." 13. a great zeal—The oldest MSS. and Vulgate have "much labour." for you—lest you should be seduced (ch. 2. 4); a motive why you should be anxious for yourselves. them that are in Laodicea . . . Hierapolis—churches probably founded by Epaphras, as the Church in Colosse was. Laodicea, called from Laodice, queen of Antiochus II., on the river Lycus, was, according to the subscription to 1 Timothy, "the chiefest city of Phrygia Pacatiana." All the three cities were destroyed by an earthquake in A. D. 62 [TACITUS, Annals, 14. 27.] Hierapolis was six Roman miles north of Laodicea. 14. It is conjectured that Luke

"the beloved physician" (the same as the Evangelist), may have first become connected with Paul in professionally attending on him in the sickness under which he laboured in Phrygia and Galatia (in which latter place he was detained by sickness), in the early part of that journey wherein Luke first is found in his company (Acts 16. 10; cf. note, Galatians 4. 13). Thus the allusion to his medical profession is appropriate in writing to men of Phrygia. Luke ministered to Paul in his last imprisonment (2 Timothy 4. 11). Demas—included among his "fellow-labourers" (Philemon 24), but afterwards a deserter from him through love of this world (2 Timothy 4. 10.) He alone has here no honourable or descriptive epithet attached to his name. Perhaps, already, his real character was betraying itself. 15. Nymphas—of Laodicea. church . . . in his house—So old MSS. and Vulgate read. The oldest read, "THEIR house;" and one MS., "HIS house," which makes Nymphas a woman. 16. the Epistle from Laodicea—viz., the Epistle which I wrote to the Laodiceans, and which you will get from them on applying to them. Not the Epistle to the Ephesians. See INTRODUCTIONS to the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians. The Epistles from the apostles were publicly read in the church assemblies. IGNATIUS, ad Ephesum 12; POLYCARP, ad Philippenses, 3. 11, 12; CLEMENT, ad Corinthios 1. 47; 1 Thessalonians 5. 27; Revelation 1. 3, "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear." Thus, they and the gospels were put on a level with the Old Testament, which was similarly read (Deuteronomy 31. 11). The Holy Spirit inspired St. Paul to write, besides those extant, other Epistles which He saw necessary for that day, and for particular churches; and which were not so for the Church of all ages and places. It is possible that as the Epistle to the Colossians was to be read for the edification of other churches besides that of Colosse; so the Epistle to the Ephesians was to be read in various churches besides Ephesus, and that Laodicea was the last of such churches before Colosse, whence he might designate the Epistle to the Ephesians here as "the Epistle from Laodicea." But it is equally possible that the Epistle meant was one to the Laodiceans themselves. 17. say to Archippus—the Colossians (not merely the clergy, but the laymen) are directed, "Speak ye to Archippus." This proves that Scripture belongs to the laity as well as the clergy; and that laymen may profitably admonish the clergy in particular cases when they do so in meekness. BENGEL suggests, that Archippus was perhaps prevented from going to the Church assembly by weak health or age. The word "fulfil," accords with his ministry being near its close (ch. 1. 25; cf. Philemon 2). However, "fulfil" may mean, as in 2 Timothy 4. 5, "make full proof of thy ministry." "Give all diligence to follow it out fully;" a monition perhaps needed by Archippus. in the Lord—The element in which every work of the Christian, and especially the Christian minister, is to be done (v. 7; 1 Corinthians 7. 39; Philippians 4. 2). 18. St. Paul's autograph salutation (so 1 Corinthians 16. 21; 2 Thessalonians 3. 17), attesting that the preceding letter, though written by an amanuensis, is from himself. Remember my bonds—Already in this chapter he had mentioned his "bonds" (v. 3), and again v. 10, an incentive why they should love and pray (v. 3) for him; and still more, that they should, in reverential obedience to his monitions in this Epistle, shrink from the false teaching herein stigmatized, remembering what a conflict (ch. 2. 1) he had in their behalf amidst his bonds. "When we read of his chains, we should not forget that they moved over the paper as he wrote; his [right] hand was chained to the [left hand of the] soldier who kept him." [ALFORD.] Grace be with you—Greek, "THE grace" which every Christian enjoys in some degree, and which flows from God in Christ by the Holy Ghost (Titus 3. 15; Hebrews 13. 25).

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE AUTHENTICITY of this Epistle is attested by IRENÆUS, Adversus Hæreses, 5. 6, 1, quoting ch. 5. 23; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Pædagogus, 1. 85, quoting ch. 2. 7; TERTULLIAN, De Resurrectione carnis, sec. 24, quoting ch. 5. 1; CAIUS or EUSEBIUS' Ecclesiastical History, 6. 20; ORIGEN, Contra Celsus, 8.

The OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE.—Thessalonica was at this time capital of the Roman second district of Macedonia (LIVY, 45. 20). It lay on the bay of Therme, and has always been, and still is, under its modern name Saloniki, a place of considerable commerce. After his imprisonment and scourging at Philippi, St. Paul (ch. 2. 2) passed on to Thessalonica; and in company with Silas (Acts 17. 1-9) and Timothy (Acts 16. 3; 17. 14, cf. with ch. 1. 1; 3. 1-6; 2 Thessalonians 1. 1) founded the Church there. The Jews, as a body, rejected the Gospel when preached for three successive sabbaths (Acts 17. 2); but some few "believed and consorted with Paul and Silas, and of the devout (i. e., proselytes to Judaism) Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few." The believers received the word joyfully, notwithstanding trials and persecutions (ch. 1. 6; 2. 13) from their own countrymen and from the Jews (ch. 2. 14-16). His stay at Thessalonica was doubtless not limited to the three weeks in which were the three sabbaths specified in Acts 17. 2; for his labouring there with his hands for his support (ch. 2. 9; 2 Thessalonians 3. 8), his receiving supplies there more than once from Philippi (Philippians 4. 16), his making many converts from the Gentiles (ch. 1. 9; and as two oldest MSS. read, Acts 17. 4, "of the devout and of the Greeks a great multitude," Acts 17. 4), and his appointing ministers,—all imply a longer residence. Probably as at Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13. 46), at Corinth (Acts 18. 6, 7), and at Ephesus (Acts 19. 8, 9), having preached the Gospel to the Jews, when they rejected it, he turned to the Gentiles. He probably thenceforth held the Christian meetings in the house of Jason (Acts 17. 5), perhaps "the kinsman" of Paul mentioned in Romans 16. 21. His great subject of teaching to them seems to have been the coming and kingdom of Christ, as we may infer from ch. 1. 10; 2. 12, 19; 3. 13; 4. 13-18; 5. 1-11, 23, 24; and that they should walk worthy of it (ch. 2. 12; 4. 1). And it is an undesigned coincidence between the two Epistles and Acts 17. 5, 9, that the very charge which the assalants of Jason's house brought against him and other brethren was, "These do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus." As in the case of the Lord Jesus Himself (John 18. 33-37; 19. 12; cf. Matthew 26. 64), they perverted the doctrine of the coming kingdom of Christ into a ground for the charge of treason against Cæsar. The result was, Paul and Silas were obliged to flee under the cover of night to Berea; Timothy had probably preceded him (Acts 17. 10, 14). But the Church had been planted, and ministers appointed; nay, more, they virtually became missionaries themselves, for which they possessed facilities in the extensive commerce of their city, and both by word and example were extending the Gospel in Macedonia, Achaia, and elsewhere (ch. 1. 7, 8). From Berea, also

Paul, after having planted a Scripture-loving Church, was obliged to flee by the Thessalonian Jews who followed him thither. Timothy (who seems to have come to Berea separately from Paul and Silas, cf. Acts 17. 10, with 14) and Silas remained there still, when Paul proceeded by sea to Athens. Whilst there he more than once longed to visit the Thessalonians again, and see personally their spiritual state, and "perfect that which was lacking in their faith" (ch. 3. 10); but "Satan (probably using the Thessalonian Jews as his instruments, John 13. 27) hindered" him (ch. 2. 18; cf. Acts 17. 13). He therefore sent Timotheus, who seems to have followed him to Athens from Berea (Acts 17. 15), immediately on his arrival to Thessalonica (ch. 3. 1); glad as he would have been of Timothy's help in the midst of the cavils of Athenian opponents, he felt he must forego that help for the sake of the Thessalonian Church. Silas does not seem to have come to Paul at Athens at all, though Paul had desired him and Timothy to "come to him with all speed" (Acts 17. 15); but seems with Timothy (who from Thessalonica called for him at Berea) to have joined Paul at Corinth first; cf. Acts 18. 1, 5, "When Silas and Timothy were come from Macedonia." The Epistle makes no mention of Silas at Athens, as it does of Timothy (ch. 3. 1).

Timothy's account of the Thessalonian Church was highly favourable. They abounded in faith and charity, and reciprocated his desire to see them (ch. 3. 6-10). Still, as nothing human on earth is perfect, there were some defects. Some had too exclusively dwelt on the doctrine of Christ's coming kingdom, so as to neglect the sober-minded discharge of present duties (ch. 4. 11, 12). Some who had lost relatives by death, needed comfort and instruction in their doubts as to whether they who died before Christ's coming would have a share with those found alive in His kingdom then to be revealed. Moreover, also, there had been committed among them sins against chastity and sobriety (ch. 5. 5-7), as also against charity (ch. 4. 3-10; 5. 13, 15). There were, too, symptoms in some of want of respectful love and subordination to their ministers; others treated slightly the manifestations of the Spirit in those possessing His gifts (ch. 5. 19). To give spiritual admonition on these subjects, and at the same time commend what deserved commendation, and to testify his love to them, was the object of the Epistle.

THE PLACE OF WRITING IT WAS doubtless Corinth, where Timothy and Silas rejoined him (Acts 18. 5) soon after he arrived there (cf. ch. 2. 17) in the autumn of 52 A. D.

THE TIME OF WRITING was evidently immediately after having received from Timothy the tidings of their state (ch. 3. 6) in the winter of 52 A. D., or early in 53. For it was written not long after the conversion of the Thessalonians (ch. 1. 8, 9), while St. Paul could speak of himself as only taken from them for a short season (ch. 2. 17). Thus this Epistle was first in date of all St. Paul's extant Epistles. The Epistle is written in the joint names of Paul, Silas, and Timothy, the three founders of the Thessalonian Church. The plural first person "we," is used everywhere, except in ch. 2. 18; 3. 5; 5. 27. "We" is the true reading, ch. 4. 13. The English Version, "I," in ch. 4. 9; 5. 1, 23, is not supported by the original. [EDMUNDS.]

THE STYLE is calm and equable, in accordance with the subject-matter, which deals only with Christian duties in general, taking for granted the great doctrinal truths which were not as yet disputed. There was no deadly error as yet to call forth his more vehement bursts of feeling and impassioned argument. The earlier Epistles, as we should expect, are moral and practical. It was not until Judaistic and legalizing errors arose at a later period that he wrote those Epistles (e. g., Romans and Galatians) which unfold the cardinal doctrines of grace and justification by faith. Still later, the Epistles from his Roman prison confirm the same truths. And last of all, the Pastoral Epistles are suited to the more developed ecclesiastical constitution of the Church, and give directions as to bishops and deacons, and correct abuses and errors of later growth.

The prevalence of the Gentile element in this Church is shown by the fact that these two Epistles are among the very few of St. Paul's writings in which no quotation occurs from the Old Testament.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-10. ADDRESS: SALUTATION: HIS PRAYERFUL THANKSGIVING FOR THEIR FAITH, HOPE, AND LOVE. THEIR FIRST RECEPTION OF THE GOSPEL, AND THEIR GOOD INFLUENCE ON ALL AROUND. 1. Paul—He does not add "an apostle," &c., because in their case, as in that of the Philippians (Note, Philippians 1. 1), his apostolic authority needs not any substantiation. He writes familiarly as to faithful friends, not but that his apostleship was recognized among them (ch. 2. 6). On the other hand, in writing to the Galatians, among whom some had called in question his apostleship, he strongly asserts it in the superscription. An undesigned propriety in the Epistles, evincing genuineness. Silvanus—a "chief man among the brethren" (Acts 15. 22), and a "prophet" (v. 32), and one of the deputies who carried the decree of the Jerusalem council to Antioch. His age and position cause him to be placed before "Timothy," then a youth (Acts 16. 1; 1 Timothy 4. 12). Silvanus (the Gentile expanded form of "Silas") is called in 1 Peter 5. 12, "a faithful brother" (cf. 2 Corinthians 1. 19). They both aided in planting the Thessalonian Church, and are therefore included in the address. This, the first of St. Paul's Epistles, as being written before various evils crept into the churches, is without the censures found in other Epistles. So realizing was their Christian faith, that they were able hourly to look for the Lord Jesus. unto the Church—Not merely as in the Epistles to Romans, Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, "to the saints," or "the faithful at Thessalonica." Though as yet they do not seem to have had the final Church organization under permanent

"bishops" and deacons, which appears in the later Epistles (Note, Philippians 1. 1; 1 and 2 Timothy). Yet he designates them by the honourable term "Church," implying their status as not merely isolated believers, but a corporate body with spiritual rulers (ch. 5. 12; 2 Corinthians 1. 1; Galatians 1. 2). in—Implying vital union. God the Father—This marks that they were no longer heathen. the Lord Jesus—This marks that they were not Jews, but Christians. Grace be unto you, and peace—that ye may have in God that favour and peace which men withhold. [ANSELM.] This is the salutation in all the Epistles of Paul, except the three pastoral ones, which have "grace, mercy, and peace." Some of the oldest MSS. support, others omit the clause following, "from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." It may have crept in from 1 Corinthians 1. 3; 2 Corinthians 1. 2. 2. (Romans 1. 9; 2 Timothy 1. 3.) The structure of the sentences in this and the following verses, each successive sentence repeating with greater fulness the preceding, characteristically marks Paul's abounding love and thankfulness in respect to his converts, as if he were seeking by words heaped on words to convey some idea of his exuberant feelings towards them. We—I, Silvanus, and Timotheus. Romans 1. 9 supports ALFORD in translating, "Making mention of you in our prayers without ceasing" (v. 3). Thus, "without ceasing," in the second clause, answers in parallelism to "always," in the first. 3. work of faith—the working reality of your faith, its alacrity in receiving the truth, and in evincing itself by its fruits. Not an otiose assent; but a realizing, working faith; not "in word only," but in one continuous chain of "work" (singular, not plural works), v. 5-10;

I THESSALONIANS II.

JAMES 2. 22. So "the work of faith" in 1 Thessalonians 1. 11 implies its perfect development (cf. James 1. 4). The other governing substantives similarly mark respectively the characteristic manifestation of the grace which follows each in the genitive. Faith, love, and hope, are the three great Christian graces (ch. 5. 8; 1 Corinthians 13. 13). labour of love—The Greek implies toil, or troublesome labour, which we are stimulated by love to bear (ch. 2. 9; Revelation 2. 2). For instances of self-denying labours of love, see Acts 20. 35; Romans 16. 12. Not here ministerial labours. Those who shun trouble for others, love little (cf. Hebrews 6. 10). patience—translate, "endurance of hope:" the persevering endurance of trials which flows from "hope." Romans 15. 4 shows that "patience" also nourishes "hope." hope in our Lord Jesus—lit., "hope of our Lord Jesus," viz., of His coming (v. 10): a hope that looked forward beyond all present things for the manifestation of Christ. in the sight of God—Your "faith, hope, and love" were not merely such as would pass for genuine before men, but "in the sight of God," the Searcher of hearts. [GOMARUS.] Things are really what they are before God. BENJEL takes this clause with "remembering." Whenever we pray we remember before God your faith, hope, and love. But its separation from "remembering" in the order, and its connection with "your . . . faith," &c., make me to prefer the former view. and—The Greek implies, "In the sight of Him who is (at once) God and our Father." 4. Knowing—Forasmuch as we know. your election of God—The Greek is, "beloved by God:" so Romans 1. 7; 2 Thessalonians 2. 13. "Your election" means that God has elected you as individual believers to eternal life (Romans 11. 5, 7; Colossians 3. 12; 2 Thessalonians 2. 13). 5. our gospel—viz., the Gospel which we preached. came—Greek, "was made," viz., by God, its Author and Sender. God's having made our preaching among you to be attended with such "power," is the proof that you are "elect of God" (v. 4). in power—in the efficacy of the Holy Spirit clothing us with power (see end of verse; Acts 1. 8; 4. 33; 6. 5, 8) in preaching the Gospel, and making it in you the power of God unto salvation (Romans 1. 16). As "power" produces faith; so "the Holy Ghost," love; and "much assurance" (Colossians 2. 2, full persuasion), hope (Hebrews 6. 11), resting on faith (Hebrews 10. 22). So faith, love, and hope (v. 3). as ye know—Answering to the "knowing," i. e., as we know (v. 4) your character as the elect of God, so ye know ours as preachers. for your sake—The purpose herein indicated is not so much that of the apostles, as that of God. "You know what God enabled us to be . . . how mighty in preaching the word . . . for your sakes . . . thereby proving that He had chosen (v. 4) you for His own." [ALFORD.] I think, from ch. 2. 10-12, that, in "what manner of men we were among you," besides the power in preaching, there is included also Paul's and his fellow-missionaries' whole conduct which confirmed their preaching; and in this sense, the "for your sake" will mean "in order to win you." This, though not the sole, yet would be a strong, motive to holy circumspection, viz., so as to win those without (Colossians 4. 5; cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 19-23). 6. and ye—Answering to "For our Gospel," v. 5. followers—Greek, "imitators." The Thessalonians in their turn became "ensamples" (v. 7) for others to imitate. of the Lord—who was the apostle of the Father, and taught the word, which He brought from heaven, under adversities. [BENJEL.] This was the point in which they imitated Him and His apostles, joyful witness for the word in much affliction: the second proof of their election of God (v. 4); v. 5 is the first (see Note, v. 5). received the word in much affliction—(Ch. 2. 14; 3. 2-5; Acts 17. 5-10.) joy of—i. e., wrought by "the Holy Ghost." "The oil of gladness" wherewith the Son of God was "anointed above His fellows" (Psalm 45. 7), is the same oil with which He, by the Spirit, anoints His fellows too (Isaiah 61. 1. 3; Romans 4. 17; 1 John 2. 20, 27). 7. ensamples—So some of the oldest MSS. read. Others, "ensample" (singular), the whole Church being regarded as one. The Macedonian Church of Philippi was the only one in Europe converted before the Thessalonians. Therefore he means their past conduct is an ensample to all believers now; of whom he specifies those "in Macedonia," because he had been there since the conversion of the Thessalonians, and had left Titus and Timotheus there; and those in "Achaia," because he was now at Corinth in Achaia. 8. from you sounded . . . the word of the Lord—Not that they actually became missionaries: but they, by the report which spread abroad of their "faith" (cf. Romans 1. 8), and by Christian merchants of Thessalonica who travelled in various directions, bearing "the word of the Lord" with them, were virtually missionaries, recommending the Gospel to all within reach of their influence by word and by example (v. 7). In "sounded," the image is that of a trumpet filling with its clear sounding echo all the surrounding places. to God-ward—no longer directed to idols, so that we need not to speak any thing—to them in praise of your faith; "for (v. 9) they themselves" (the people in Macedonia, Achaia, and in every place) know it already. 9. Strictly there should follow, "For they themselves show of you," &c.; but, instead, he substitutes that which was the instrumental cause of the Thessalonians' conversion and faith, "for they themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had unto you;" cf. v. 5, which corresponds to this former clause, as v. 6 corresponds to the latter clause, "And how ye turned from idols to serve the living . . . God," &c. Instead of our having "to speak any thing" to them (in Macedonia and Achaia) in your praise (v. 8), "they themselves (have the start of us in speaking of you, and) announce concerning (so the Greek of 'show of' means) us, what manner of (how effectual an) entrance we had unto you" (v. 5; ch. 2. 1). the living and true God—as opposed to the dead and false gods from which they had "turned." In the English Version reading, Acts 17. 4, "Of the devout Greeks a great multitude," no mention is made, as here, of the conversion of idolatrous Gentiles at Thessalonica; but the reading of some of the oldest MSS. and Vulgate singularly coincides with the statement here: "Of the devout AND of Greeks (viz., idolaters) a great multitude:" so in v. 17, "the devout persons," i. e., Gentile proselytes to Judaism, form a separate class. PALEY and LACHMANN, by distinct lines of argument, support the "AND." 10. This verse distinguishes them from the Jews, as v. 9 from the idolatrous Gentiles. To wait for the Lord's coming is a sure characteristic of a true believer, and was prominent amidst the graces of the Thessalonians (1 Corinthians 1. 7, 8). His coming is seldom called his return (John 14. 3); because the two advents are regarded as different phases of the same coming; and the second coming shall have features altogether new connected with it, so that it will not be a mere repetition of the first, or a mere coming back again. his Son . . . raised from the dead—the grand proof of His Divine Sonship (Romans 1. 4). delivered—rather as Greek, "Who delivereth us." Christ hath once for all redeemed us; He is our Deliverer ALWAYS. wrath to come—(ch. 5. 9; Colossians 3. 6).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-20. HIS MANNER OF PREACHING, AND THEIRS OF RECEIVING, THE GOSPEL; HIS DESIRE TO HAVE REVISITED THEM FRUSTRATED BY SATAN. 1. For—confirming ch. 1. 9. He discusses the manner of his fellow-missionaries' preaching among them (ch. 1. 5, and former part of v. 9) from v. 1 to 12; and the Thessalonians' reception of the word (cf. ch. 1. 6, 7, and latter part of v. 9) from v. 13 to 16. yourselves—Not only do strangers report it, but you know it to be true [ALFORD] "yourselves." not in vain—Greek, "not vain," i. e., it was full of "power" (ch. 1. 5). The Greek for "was," expresses rather "hath been and is," implying the permanent and continuing character of his preaching. 2. even after that we had suffered before—at Philippi (Acts 16.); a circumstance which would have deterred mere natural, unspiritual men from further preaching. shamefully entreated—ignominiously scourged (Acts 16. 22, 23). bold—(Acts 4. 2; Ephesians 6. 20.) in our God—The ground of our boldness in speaking was the realization of God as "OUR God." with much contention—i. e., as of competitors

in a contest: striving earnestness (Colossians 1. 29; 2. 1). But here outward conflict with persecutors, rather than inward and mental, was what the missionaries had to endure (Acts 17. 5, 6; Philipplians 1. 30). 3. For—The ground of his "boldness" (v. 2), his freedom from all "deceit, uncleanness, and guile;" guile, before God, deceit (Greek, "imposture"), towards men (cf. 2 Corinthians 1. 12; 2. 17; Ephesians 4. 14); uncleanness, in relation to one's self (impure motives of carnal self-gratification in gain, v. 5), or lust; such as actuated false teachers of the Gentiles (Philipplians 1. 16; 2 Peter 2. 10, 14; Jude 8; Revelation 2. 14, 15). So Simon Magus and Cerinthus taught. [ESTRUS.] exhortation—The Greek means "consolation" as well as "exhortation." The same Gospel which exhorts comforts. Its first lesson to each is that of peace in believing amidst outward and inward sorrows. It comforts them that mourn (cf. v. 11; Isaiah 61. 2, 3; 2 Corinthians 1. 3, 4). of—springing from—having its source in—deceit, &c. 4. as—according as; even as. allowed—Greek, "We have been approved on trial," "deemed fit." This word corresponds to "God which trieth our hearts" below. This approval as to sincerity depends solely on the grace and mercy of God (Acts 9. 15; 1 Corinthians 7. 25; 2 Corinthians 3. 5; 1 Timothy 1. 11, 12). not as pleasing—not as persons who seek to please men; characteristic of false teachers (Galatians 1. 10). 5. used we flattering words—lit., "become (i. e., have we been found) in (the use of) language of flattery;" the resource of those who try to "please men." as ye know—"Ye know" as to whether I flattered you; as to "covetousness," God, the Judge of the heart, alone can be "my witness." cloak of—i. e., any specious guise under which I might cloak "covetousness." 6. *lit., "Nor of men (have we been found, v. 5) seeking glory." The "of" here represents a different Greek word from "of" in the clause "of you . . . of others." ALFORD makes the former (Greek ex) express the abstract ground of the glory; the latter (apo) the concrete object from which it was to come. The former means originating from; the latter means "on the part of." Many teach heretical novelties, though not for gain, yet for "glory." Paul and his associates were free even from this motive [GROTIUS] (John 5. 44). *we might have been burdensome—i. e., by claiming maintenance (v. 9; 2 Corinthians 11. 9; 12. 16; 2 Thessalonians 3. 8). As, however, "glory" precedes, as well as "covetousness," the reference cannot be restricted to the latter, though I think it is not excluded. Translate, "When we might have borne heavily upon you," by pressing you with the weight of self-glorifying authority, and with the burden of our sustenance. Thus the antithesis is appropriate in the words following, "But we were gentle (the opposite of pressing weightily) among you" (v. 7). On weight being connected with authority, cf. Note, 2 Corinthians 10. 10, "His letters are weighty" (1 Corinthians 4. 21). ALFORD'S translation, which excludes reference to his right of claiming maintenance ("when we might have stood on our dignity"), seems to me disproved by v. 9, which uses the same Greek word unequivocally for "chargeable." Twice he received supplies from Philippi whilst at Thessalonica (Philipplians 4. 16). as the apostles—i. e., as being apostles. 7. *we were—Greek, "we were made" by God's grace. gentle—Greek, "mild in bearing with the faults of others" [TITTMANN]; one, too, who is gentle (though firm) in reproving the erroneous opinions of others (2 Timothy 2. 24). Some of the oldest MSS. read, "we became little children" (cf. Matthew 18. 3, 4). Others support the English Version reading, which forms a better antithesis to v. 6, 7, and harmonizes better with what follows; for he would hardly, in the same sentence, compare himself both to the "infants" or "little children," and to "a nurse," or rather, "suckling mother." Gentleness is the fitting characteristic of a nurse. among you—Greek, "In the midst of you," i. e., in our intercourse with you being as one of yourselves. nurse—a suckling mother. her—Greek, "her own children" (cf. v. 11). So Galatians 4. 19. 8. So—to be joined to "we were willing"; "As a nurse cherisheth, &c., so we were willing," &c. [ALFORD.] But BENGEL, "So," i. e., seeing that we have such affection for you. being affectionately desirous—

The oldest reading in the Greek implies, *lit., to connect one's self with another; to be closely attached to another. willing—The Greek is stronger, "We were well content; " "we would gladly have imparted," &c., "even our own lives" (so the Greek for "souls" ought to be translated); as we showed in the sufferings we endured in giving you the Gospel (Acts 17). As a nursing mother is ready to impart not only her milk to them, but her life for them, so we not only imparted gladly the spiritual milk of the word to you, but risked our own lives for your spiritual nourishment, imitating Him who laid down His life for His friends, the greatest proof of love (John 15. 13). ye were—Greek, "ye were become," as having become our spiritual children. dear—Greek, "dearly beloved." 9. labour and travail—The Greek for "labour" means hardship in bearing; that for "travail," hardship in doing; the former, toil with the utmost solicitude; the latter, the being wearied with fatigue. [GROTIUS.] ZANCHIUS refers the former to spiritual (see ch. 3. 5), the latter to manual labour. I would translate, "weariness (so the Greek is translated, 2 Corinthians 11. 27) and travail" (hard labour, toil). *for—Omitted in the oldest MSS. night and day—the Jews reckoned the day from sunset to sunset, so that night is put before day (cf. Acts 20. 31). Their labours with their hands for a scanty livelihood had to be engaged in not only by day, but by night also, in the intervals between spiritual labours. labouring—Greek, "working," viz., at tent-making (Acts 18. 3). because we would not be chargeable—Greek, "with a view to not burdening any of you" (2 Corinthians 11. 9, 10). preached unto you—Greek, "unto and among you." Though but "three Sabbaths" are mentioned, Acts 17. 2, these refer merely to the time of his preaching to the Jews in the synagogue. When rejected by them as a body, after having converted a few Jews, he turned to the Gentiles; of these (whom he preached to in a place distinct from the synagogue) "a great multitude believed" (Acts 17. 4, where the oldest MSS. read, "of the devout [proselytes] AND Greeks a great multitude"); then after he had, by labours continued among the Gentiles for some time, gathered in many converts, the Jews, provoked by his success, assaulted Jason's house, and drove him away. His receiving "once and again" supplies from Philippi, implies a longer stay at Thessalonica than three weeks (Philipplians 4. 16). 10. Ye are witnesses—as to our outward conduct. God—as to our inner motives. holily—towards God. justly—towards men. unblamably—in relation to ourselves. behaved ourselves—Greek, "were made to be," viz., by God. among you that believe—rather, "before (i. e., in the eyes of) you that believe;" whatever we may have seemed in the eyes of the unbelieving. As v. 9 refers to their outward occupation in the world; so v. 10, to their character among believers. 11. every one of you—in private (Acts 20. 20), as well as publicly. The minister, if he would be useful must not deal merely in generalities, but must individualize and particularize. as a father—with mild gravity. The Greek is, "His own children." exhorted and comforted—Exhortation leads one to do a thing willingly; consolation, to do it joyfully [BENGEL] (ch. 5. 14). Even in the former term, "exhortation," the Greek includes the additional idea of comforting and advocating one's cause: "encouragingly exhorted." Appropriate in this case, as the Thessalonians were in sorrow, both through persecutions, and also through deaths of friends (ch. 4. 13). charged—"conjured solemnly," lit., "testifying;" appealing solemnly to you before God. 12. worthy of God—"worthy of the Lord" (Colossians 1. 10); "worthily of the saints" (Romans 16. 2, Greek); ". . . of the Gospel" (Philipplians 1. 27); ". . . of the vocation wherewith ye are called" (Ephesians 4. 1). Inconsistency would cause God's name to be "blasphemed among the Gentiles" (Romans 2. 24). The Greek article is emphatical, "Worthy of THE God who is calling you." hath called—so one of the oldest MSS. and Vulgate. Other oldest MSS., "Who calleth us." his kingdom—to be set up at the Lord's coming. glory—that ye may share His glory (John 17. 22; Colossians 3. 4). 13. For this cause—Seeing ye have had such teachers (v. 11, 12)

Bengel, "we also (as well as 'all that believe' in Macedonia and Achaia) thank God without ceasing ('always' . . . 'in our prayers,' ch. 1. 2), that when ye received the word of God which ye heard from us (lit., 'God's word of hearing from us,' Romans 10. 16, 17), ye accepted it not as the word of men, but, even as it is truly, the word of God." Alford omits the "as" of English Version. But "as" is required by the clause, "even as it is truly." "Ye accepted it, not (as) the word of men (which it might have been supposed to be), but (as) the word of God, even as it really is." The Greek for the first "received," implies simply the hearing of it; the Greek of the second is "accepted," or "welcomed" it. The proper object of faith, it hence appears, is the word of God, at first oral, then for security against error, written (John 20. 30, 31; Romans 15. 4; Galatians 4. 30). Also, that faith is the work of Divine grace, is implied by St. Paul's thanksgiving. effectually worketh also in you that believe—"Also," besides your accepting it with your hearts, it evidences itself in your lives. It shows its energy in its practical effects on you; for instance, working in you patient endurance in trial (v. 14; cf. Galatians 3. 5; 5. 6). 14. followers—Greek, "imitators." Divine working is most of all seen and felt in affliction. in Judea—The churches of Judea were naturally the patterns to other churches, as having been the first founded, and that on the very scene of Christ's own ministry. Reference to them is specially appropriate here, as the Thessalonians, with Paul and Silas, had experienced from Jews in their city persecutions (Acts 17. 5-9) similar to those which "the churches in Judea" experienced from Jews in that country. in Christ Jesus—not merely "in God;" for the synagogues of the Jews (one of which the Thessalonians were familiar with, Acts 17. 1) were also in God. But the Christian churches alone were not only in God, as the Jews in contrast to the Thessalonian idolaters were, but also in Christ, which the Jews were not. of your own countrymen—including primarily the Jews settled at Thessalonica, from whom the persecution originated, and also the Gentiles there, instigated by the Jews; thus, "fellow-countrymen" (the Greek term, according to Herodian, implies, not the enduring relation of fellow-citizenship, but sameness of country for the time being), including naturalized Jews and native Thessalonians, stand in contrast to the pure "Jews" in Judea (Matthew 10. 36). It is an undesigned coincidence, that Paul at this time was suffering persecutions of the Jews at Corinth, whence he writes (Acts 18. 5, 6, 12); naturally his letter would the more vividly dwell on Jewish bitterness against Christians. even as they—(Hebrews 10. 32-34.) There was a likeness in respect to the nation from which both suffered, viz., Jews, and those their own countrymen; in the cause for which, and in the evils which, they suffered, and also in the steadfast manner in which they suffered them. Such sameness of fruits, afflictions, and experimental characteristics of believers, in all places and at all times, are a subsidiary evidence of the truth of the Gospel. 15. the Lord Jesus—rather as Greek, "Jesus the Lord." This enhances the glaring enormity of their sin, that in killing Jesus they killed the Lord (cf. Acts 3. 14, 15). their own—Omitted in the oldest MSS. persecuted us—rather as Greek (see Margin), "By persecution drove us out" (Luke 11. 49). please not God—i. e., they do not make it their aim to please God. He implies that with all their boast of being God's peculiar people, they all the while are "no pleasers of God," as certainly as, by the universal voice of the world, which even themselves cannot contradict, they are declared to be perversely "contrary to all men." Josephus, Aption, 2. 14, represents one calling them "Atheists and Misanthropes, the dullest of barbarians;" and Tacitus, Histories, 5. 5, "They have a hostile hatred of all other men." However, the contrariety to all men here meant is, in that they "forbid us to speak to the Gentiles that they may be saved" (v. 16). 16. Forbidding—Greek, "Hindering us from speaking," &c. to fill up their sins alway—Tending thus "to the filling up the full measure of, Genesis 15. 16; Daniel 8. 23; Matthew 23. 33) their sins at all times." i. e., now as at all former times. Their hindrance of the Gospel-preaching to the Gentiles was the last measure added to their continually accumulating iniquity, which made them fully ripe for vengeance. for—Greek, "but." "But," they shall proceed no further, for (2 Timothy 3. 8) "the" Divine wrath has (so the Greek) come upon (overtaken unexpectedly; the past tense expressing the speedy certainty of the divinely destined stroke) them to the uttermost;" not merely partial wrath, but wrath to its full extent, "even to the finishing stroke." [Edmunds.] The past tense implies that the fullest visitation of wrath was already begun. Already in A. D. 48, a tumult had occurred at the Passover in Jerusalem, when about 30,000 (according to some) were slain; a foretaste of the whole vengeance which speedily followed (Luke 19. 43, 44; 21. 24). 17. But we—Resumed from v. 13; in contrast to the Jews, v. 15, 16. taken—rather as Greek, "severed (violently, Acts 17. 7-10) from you," as parents bereft of their children. So "I will not leave you comfortless," Greek, "orphanized" (John 14. 18). for a short time—lit., "for the space of an hour." "When we had been severed from you but a very short time (perhaps alluding to the suddenness of his unexpected departure), we the more abundantly (the shorter was our separation; for the desire of meeting again is the more vivid, the more recent has been the parting) endeavoured," &c. (cf. 2 Timothy 1. 4.) He does not hereby, as many explain, anticipate a short separation from them, which would be a false anticipation; for he did not soon revisit them. The Greek past participle also forbids their view. 18. Wherefore—The oldest MSS. read, "Because," or "inasmuch as." we would—Greek, "we wished to come;" we intended to come. even I Paul—My fellow-missionaries as well as myself wished to come; I can answer for myself that I intended it more than once. His slightly distinguishing himself here from his fellow-missionaries, whom throughout this Epistle he associates with himself in the plural, accords with the fact, that Silvanus and Timothy stayed at Berea, when Paul went on to Athens; where subsequently Timothy joined him, and was thence sent by Paul alone to Thessalonica (ch. 3. 1). Satan hindered us—On a different occasion "the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Jesus" (so the oldest MSS. read, Acts 16. 6, 7, forbade or hindered them in a missionary design; here it is Satan, acting perhaps by wicked men, some of whom had already driven him out of Thessalonica (Acts 17. 13, 14; cf. John 13. 27), or else by some more direct "messenger of Satan—a thorn in the flesh" (2 Corinthians 12. 7; cf. 11. 14). In any event, the Holy Ghost and the providence of God overruled Satan's opposition to further His own purpose. We cannot, in each case, define whence hindrances in good undertakings arise; Paul in this case, by inspiration, was enabled to say, the hindrance was from Satan. Grotius thinks Satan's mode of hindering Paul's journey to Thessalonica was by instigating the Stoic and Epicurean philosophers to cavil, which entailed on Paul the necessity of replying, and so detained him; but he seems to have left Athens leisurely (Acts 17. 33, 34; 18. 1). The Greek for "hindered" is lit., "to cut a trench between one's self and an advancing foe, to prevent his progress;" so Satan opposing the progress of the missionaries. 19. For—Giving the reason for his earnest desire to see them. Are not even ye in the presence of . . . Christ—"Christ" is omitted in the oldest MSS. Are not even ye (viz., among others; the "even" or "also," implies that not they alone will be his crown) our hope, joy, and crown of rejoicing before Jesus, when He shall come (2 Corinthians 1. 14; Philippians 2. 16; 4. 1)? The "hope" here meant is his hope (in a lower sense), that these his converts might be found in Christ at His advent (ch. 3. 18). Paul's chief "hope" was Jesus Christ (1 Timothy 1. 1). 20. Emphatical repetition with increased force. Who but ye and our other converts are our hope, &c., hereafter, at Christ's coming? For it is ye who are now our glory and joy.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. PROOF OF HIS DESIRE AFTER THEM IN HIM HAVING SENT TIMOTHY: HIS JOY AT THE TIMING

BROUGHT BACK CONCERNING THEIR FAITH AND CHARITY: PRAYERS FOR THEM. 1. Wherefore—because of our earnest love to you (ch. 2. 17-20). forbear—"endure" the suspense. The Greek is lit. applied to a watertight vessel. When we could no longer contain ourselves in our yearning desire for you. left at Athens alone—See my Introduction. This implies that he sent Timothy from Athens, whither the latter had followed him. However, the "we" favours ALFORD'S view that the determination to send Timothy was formed during the hasty consultation of Paul, Silas, and Timothy, previous to his departure from Berea, and that then he with them "resolved" to be "left alone" at Athens, when he should arrive there: Timothy and Silas not accompanying him, but remaining at Berea. Thus the "I," v. 5, will express that the act of sending Timothy, when he arrived at Athens, was Paul's, whilst the determination that Paul should be left alone at Athens, was that of the brethren as well as himself, at Berea, whence he uses, v. 1, "we." The non-mention of Silas at Athens implies, that he did not follow Paul to Athens as was at first intended; but Timothy did. Thus the history, Acts 17. 14, 15, accords with the Epistle. The word "left behind" (Greek) implies, that Timothy had been with him at Athens. It was an act of self-denial for their sakes that Paul deprived himself of the presence of Timothy at Athens, which would have been so cheering to him in the midst of philosophic cavillers; but from love to the Thessalonians, he is well content to be left all 'alone' in the great city. 2. minister of God and our fellow-labourer—Some oldest MSS. read, "fellow-workman with God;" others, "minister of God." The former is probably genuine, as copyists probably altered it to the latter to avoid the bold phrase, which, however, is sanctioned by 1 Corinthians 3. 9; 2 Corinthians 6. 1. English Version reading is not well supported, and is plainly compounded out of the two other readings. Paul calls Timothy "our brother" here; but in 1 Corinthians 4. 17, "my son." He speaks thus highly of one so lately ordained, both to impress the Thessalonians with a high respect for the delegate sent to them, and to encourage Timothy, who seems to have been of a timid character (1 Timothy 4. 12; 5. 23). "Gospel ministers do the work of God with Him, for Him, and under Him." [EDMUNDS.] establish—Greek, "confirm." In 2 Thessalonians 3. 3, GOD is said to "establish:" He is the true establisher: ministers are His "instruments." concerning—Greek, "in behalf of," i. e., for the furtherance of your faith. The Greek for "comfort" includes also the idea "exhort." The Thessalonians in their trials needed both (v. 3; cf. Acts 14. 22). 3. moved—"shaken," "disturbed." The Greek is lit. said of dogs wagging the tail in fawning on one. Therefore TITTMANN explains it, "That no man should, amidst his calamities, be allured by the flattering hope of a more pleasant life to abandon his duty." So ELSNER and BENDEL, "cajoled out of his faith." In afflictions, relatives and opponents combine with the ease-loving heart itself in flatteries, which it needs strong faith to overcome. yourselves know—we always candidly told you so (v. 4; Acts 14. 22). None but a religion from God would have held out such a trying prospect to those who should embrace it, and yet succeed in winning converts. we—Christians. appointed thereunto—by God's counsel (ch. 5. 9). 4. that we should suffer—Greek, "that we are about (we are sure) to suffer" according to the appointment of God (v. 3). even as—"even (exactly) as it both came to pass and ye know:" ye know both that it came to pass, and that we foretold it (cf. John 13. 19). The correspondence of the event to the prediction powerfully confirms faith: "Forewarned, forearmed." [EDMUNDS.] The repetition of "ye know," so frequently, is designed as an argument, that being forewarned of coming affliction, they should be less readily "moved" by it. 5. For this cause—Because I know of your "tribulation" having actually begun (v. 4). when I—Greek, "when I also (as well as Timothy, who, Paul delicately implies, was equally anxious respecting them, cf. "we," v. 1) could no longer contain myself" (endure the suspense). I sent—Paul was the actual sender; hence the "I" here: Paul, Silas, and Timothy himself had agreed on the mission already, before Paul went to Athens hence the "we," v. 1 (Note). to know—to learn the state of your faith, whether it stood the trial (Colossians 4. 8). lest . . . have tempted . . . and . . . be—The indicative is used in the former sentence, the subjunctive in the latter. Translate therefore, "To know . . . whether haply the tempter have tempted you (the indicative implying that he supposed such was the case), and lest (in that case) our labour may prove to be in vain" (cf. Galatians 4. 11). Our labour in preaching would in that case be vain, so far as ye are concerned, but not as concerns us so far as we have sincerely laboured (Isaiah 49. 4; 1 Corinthians 3. 8). 6. John "now" with "come:" "But Timotheus having just now come from you unto us." [ALFORD.] Thus it appears (cf. Acts 18. 5) Paul is writing from Corinth. your faith and charity—(ch. 1. 3; cf. 2 Thessalonians 1. 3, whence it seems their faith subsequently increased still more.) Faith was the solid foundation: charity the cement which held together the superstructure of their practice on that foundation. In that charity was included their "good (kindly) remembrance" of their teachers. desiring greatly—Greek, "having a yearning desire for." we also—The desires of loving friends for one another's presence are reciprocal. 7. over you—in respect to you. in—in the midst of: notwithstanding "all our distress (Greek, 'necessity') and affliction," viz., external trials at Corinth, whence Paul writes (cf. v. 6, with Acts 18. 5-10). 8. now—as the case is; seeing ye stand fast. We live—we flourish. It revives us in our affliction to hear of your steadfastness (Psalm 22. 26; 3 John 3. 4) if—implying that the vivid joy which the missionaries "now" feel, will continue if the Thessalonians continue steadfast. They still needed exhortation, v. 10; therefore he subjoins the conditional clause, "if ye," &c. (Philippians 4. 1). 9. what—what sufficient thanks? render . . . again—in return for His goodness (Psalm 116. 12). for you—"concerning you," for all the joy—on account of all the joy. It was "comfort," v. 7, now it is more, viz., joy. for your sakes—on your account. before our God—It is a joy which will bear God's searching eye: a joy as in the presence of God, not self-seeking, but disinterested, sincere, and spiritual (cf. ch. 2. 20; John 15. 11). 10. Night and day—(Note, ch. 2. 9.) Night is the season for the saint's holiest meditations and prayers (2 Timothy 1. 3). praying—connected with, "we joy:" We joy whilst we pray; or else as ALFORD, What thanks can we render to God whilst we pray? The Greek implies a beseeching request. exceedingly—lit., "more than exceeding abundantly" (cf. Ephesians 3. 20). that which is lacking—Even the Thessalonians had points in which they needed improvement. [BENDEL.] (Luke 17. 5.) Their doctrinal views as to the nearness of Christ's coming, and as to the state of those who had fallen asleep, and their practice in some points, needed correction (ch. 4. 1-9). Paul's method was to begin by commending what was praiseworthy, and then to correct what was amiss; a good pattern to all admonishers of others. 11. Translate, "May God Himself, even our Father (there being but one article in the Greek, requires this translation, 'He who is at once God and our Father'), direct," &c. The "Himself" stands in contrast with "we" (ch. 2. 18); we desired to come, but could not through Satan's hindrance; but if God Himself direct our way (as we pray), none can hinder Him (2 Thessalonians 2. 16, 17). It is a remarkable proof of the unity of the Father and Son, that in the Greek here, and in 2 Thessalonians 2. 16, 17, the verb is singular, implying that the subject, the Father and Son, are but one in essential Being, not in mere unity of will. Almost all the chapters in both Epistles to the Thessalonians are sealed, each with its own prayer (ch. 5. 23; 2 Thessalonians 1. 11; 2. 16; 3. 5, 16). [BENDEL.] St. Paul does not think the prosperous issue of a journey an unfit subject for prayer (Romans 1. 10; 15. 32). [EDMUNDS.] His prayer, though the answer was deferred, in about five years afterwards was fulfilled in his return to Macedonia. 12. The "you" in the Greek is emphatically put first; "But" (so the Greek for "and") what concerns "YOU," whether we come or not, "may the Lord make you to increase and abound in love," &c. The Greek for "increase" has a more [] force, that for "abound" a more comparative force, "Make you full (supplying "that which is lacking," v. 10) and even abound." "The Lord" may here be the Holy Spirit; so the Three Persons of the Trinity will be appealed to (cf. v. 15), as in 2 Thessalonians 3. 5. So the Holy Ghost is called "the Lord" (2 Corinthians 3. 17). "Love" is the fruit of the Spirit (Galatians 5. 22), and His office is "to stablish in holiness" (v. 13; 1 Peter 1. 2). 13. your hearts—which are naturally the spring and seat of unholiness. before God, even our Father—rather, "before Him who is at once God and our Father." Before not merely men, but Him who will not be deceived by the mere show of holiness, i. e., may your holiness be such as will stand His searching scrutiny. coming—Greek, "presence," or "arrival." with all his saints—including both the holy angels and the holy elect of men (ch. 4. 14; Daniel 7. 10; Zechariah 14. 5; Matthew 25. 31; 2 Thessalonians 1. 7). The saints are "His" (Acts 9. 13). We must have "holiness" if we are to be numbered with His holy ones or "saints." On "unblamable," cf. Revelation 14. 5. This verse (cf. v. 12) shows that "love" is the spring of true "holiness" (Matthew 5. 44-48; Romans 13. 10; Colossians 3. 14). God is He who really "stablishes;" Timothy and other ministers are but instruments (v. 2) in "stablishing."

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-13. EXHORTATIONS TO CHASTITY; BROTHERLY LOVE; QUIET INDUSTRY; ABSTINENCE FROM UNDUE SORROW FOR DEPARTED FRIENDS, FOR AT CHRIST'S COMING ALL HIS SAINTS SHALL BE GLORIFIED. 1. Furthermore—Greek, "As to what remains." Generally used towards the close of his Epistles (Ephesians 6. 10; Philippians 4. 8), then—with a view to the love and holiness (ch. 3. 12, 13) which we have just prayed for in your behalf, we now give you exhortation. beseech—"ask" as if it were a personal favour. by—rather as Greek, "in the Lord Jesus;" in communion with the Lord Jesus, as Christian ministers dealing with Christian people. [EDMUNDS.] as ye . . . received—when we were with you (ch. 2. 13). how—Greek, the "how," i. e., the manner. walk and . . . please God—i. e., "and so please God," viz., by your walk; in contrast to the Jews who "please not God" (ch. 2. 15). The oldest MSS. add a clause here, "even as also ye do walk" (cf. ch. 4. 10; 5. 11). These words, which he was able to say of them with truth, conciliate a favourable hearing for the precepts which follow. Also the expression, "abound more and more," implies that there had gone before a recognition of their already in some measure walking so. 2. by the Lord Jesus—by His authority and direction, not by our own. He uses the strong term "commandments," in writing to this Church not long founded, knowing that they would take it in a right spirit, and feeling it desirable that they should understand he spake with Divine authority. He seldom uses the term in writing subsequently, when his authority was established, to other churches. 1 Corinthians 7. 10; 11. 17; and 1 Timothy 1. 5 (v. 13, where the subject accounts for the strong expression) are the exceptions. "The Lord" marks His paramount authority, requiring implicit obedience. 3. For—Enforcing the assertion that his "commandments" were "by (the authority of) the Lord Jesus" (v. 2). Since "this is the will of God," let it be your will also. fornication—not regarded as a sin at all among the heathen, and so needing the more to be denounced (Acts 15. 20). 4. know—by moral self-control. how to possess his vessel—rather as Greek, "how to acquire (get for himself) his own vessel," i. e., that each should have his own wife so as to avoid fornication (v. 3; 1 Corinthians 7. 2). The emphatical position of "his own" in the Greek, and the use of "vessel" for wife, in 1 Peter 3. 7, and in common Jewish phraseology, and the correct translation "acquire," all justify this rendering. in sanctification—(Romans 6. 19; 1 Corinthians 1. 15, 18.) Thus, "his own" stands in opposition to dishonouring his brother by lusting after his wife (v. 6). honour—(Hebrews 13. 4) contrasted with "dishonour their own bodies" (Romans 1. 24). 5. in the lust—Greek, "passion" which implies that such a one is unconsciously the

passive slave of lust, which know not God—and so know no better. Ignorance of true religion is the parent of unchastity (Ephesians 4. 18, 19). A people's morals are like the objects of their worship (Deuteronomy 7. 26; Psalm 115. 8; Romans 1. 23, 24). 6. go beyond—transgress the bounds of rectitude in respect to his brother. defraud—"overreach" [ALFORD]; "take advantage of." [EDMUNDS.] in any matter—rather as Greek, "in the matter;" a decorous expression for the matter now in question; the conjugal honour of his neighbour as a husband, v. 4; v. 7 also confirms this view; the word "brother" enhances the enormity of the crime. It is your brother whom you wrong (cf. Proverbs 6. 27-33). the Lord—the coming Judge (2 Thessalonians 1. 7, 8). avenger—the Righter, of all such—Greek, "concerning all these things;" in all such cases of wrongs against a neighbour's conjugal honour. testified—Greek, "constantly testified." [ALFORD.] 7. unto—Greek, "for the purpose of." unto—rather as Greek, "in;" marking that "holiness" is the element in which our calling has place; in a sphere of holiness. Saint is another name for Christian. 8. despiseth—Greek, "setteth at naught" such engagements imposed on him in his calling, v. 7; in relation to his "brother," v. 6. He who doth so, "sets at naught not man (as for instance his brother), but God" (Psalm 51. 4). Or, as the Greek verb (Luke 10. 16; John 12. 48) is used of despising or rejecting God's minister, it may mean here, "He who despiseth" or "rejecteth" these our ministerial precepts. who hath also given unto us—So some oldest MSS. read, but most oldest MSS. read, "Who (without 'also') giveth (present) unto you" (not "us"). his Spirit—Greek, "His own Spirit, the Holy (One);" thus emphatically marking "holiness" (v. 7) as the end for which the Holy (One) is being given. "Unto you" in the Greek, implies that the Spirit is being given unto, into (put into your hearts), and among you (cf. ch. 2. 9; Ephesians 4. 30). Giveth implies that sanctification is not merely a work once for all accomplished in the past, but a present progressive work. So the Church of England Catechism, "sanctifieth (present) all the elect people of God." "His own" implies that as He gives you that which is essentially identical with Himself, He expects you should become like Himself (1 Peter 1. 16; 2 Peter 1. 4). 9. brotherly love—referring here to acts of brotherly kindness in relieving distressed brethren. Some oldest MSS. support English Version reading, "ye have;" others, and those the weightiest, read, "we have." We need not write, as ye yourselves are taught, and that by God; viz., in the heart by the Holy Spirit (John 6. 45; Hebrews 8. 11; 1 John 2. 20, 27). to love—Greek, "with a view to," or "to the end of your loving one another." Divine teachings have their confluence in love. [BENGEL.] 10. And indeed—Greek, "For even." 11. study to be quiet—Greek, "make it your ambition to be quiet, and to do your own business." In direct contrast to the world's ambition, which is, "to make a great stir," and "to be busybodies" (2 Thessalonians 3. 11, 12). work with your own hands—The Thessalonian converts were, it thus seems, chiefly of the working classes. Their expectation of the immediate coming of Christ led some enthusiasts among them to neglect their daily work, and be dependent on the bounty of others. See end of v. 12. The expectation was right in so far as that the Church should be always looking for Him; but they were wrong in making it a ground for neglecting their daily work. The evil, as it subsequently became worse, is more strongly reprov'd (2 Thessalonians 3. 6-12). 12. honestly—In the Old English sense, "becomingly," as becomes your Christian profession; not bringing discredit on it in the eyes of the outer world, as if Christianity led to sloth and poverty (Romans 13. 13; 1 Peter 2. 12). them . . . without—outside the Christian Church (Mark 4. 11) have lack of nothing—not have to beg from others for the supply of your wants (cf. Ephesians 4. 28). So far from needing to beg from others, we ought to work and get the means of supplying the need of others. Freedom from pecuniary embarrassment is to be desired by the Christian on account of the liberty which it bestows. 13. The leading topic of Paul's preaching at Thessalonica having been the coming kingdom (Acts 17. 7), some pe-

verted it into a cause for fear in respect to friends lately deceased, as if these would be excluded from the glory which those found alive alone should share. This error St. Paul here corrects (cf. ch. 5. 10). I would not—All the oldest MSS. and versions have "we would not." My fellow-labourers (Silas and Timothy) and myself, desire that ye should not be ignorant. them which are asleep—The oldest MSS. read (present), "them which are sleeping:" the same as "the dead in Christ" (v. 16), to whose bodies (Daniel 12. 2, not their souls; Ecclesiastes 12. 7; 2 Corinthians 5. 8) death is a calm and holy sleep, from which the resurrection shall awake them to glory. The word "cemetery" means a sleeping-place. Observe, the glory and chief hope of the Church are not to be realized at death, but at the Lord's coming; one is not to anticipate the other, but all are to be glorified together at Christ's coming (Colossians 3. 4; Hebrews 11. 40). Death affects the mere individual; but the coming of Jesus the whole Church; at death our souls are invisibly and individually with the Lord; at Christ's coming the whole Church, with all its members, in body and soul, shall be visibly and collectively with Him. As this is offered as a consolation to mourning relatives, the mutual recognition of the saints at Christ's coming is hereby implied. that ye sorrow not, even as others—Greek, "the rest;" all the rest of the world besides Christians. Not all natural mourning for dead friends is forbidden: for the Lord Jesus and Paul sinlessly gave way to it (John 11. 31, 33, 35; Philippians 2. 27). But sorrow as though there were "no hope," which ludeed the heathen had not (Ephesians 2. 12); the Christian hope here meant is that of the resurrection. Cf. Psalm 16. 9, 11; 17. 15; 73. 24; Proverbs 14. 32, show that the Old Testament Church, though not having the hope so bright (Isaiah 38. 18, 19), yet had this hope. Contrast CARULLUS, 5. 4, "When once our brief day has set, we must sleep one everlasting night." The sepulchral inscriptions of heathen Thessalonica express the hopeless view taken as to those once dead: as ÆSCHYLUS writes, "Of one once dead there is no resurrection." Whatever glimpses some heathen philosophers had of the existence of the soul after death, they had none whatever of the body (Acts 17. 18, 20, 32). 14. For if—Confirmation of his statement, v. 13, that the removal of ignorance as to the sleeping believers would remove and grief respecting them. See v. 13. "hope." Hence it appears our hope rests on our faith ("if we believe"). "As surely as we all believe that Christ died and rose again (the very doctrine specified as taught at Thessalonica, Acts 17. 3), so also will God bring those laid to sleep by Jesus with Him" (Jesus. So the order and balance of the members of the Greek sentence require us to translate). Believers are laid in sleep by Jesus, and so will be brought back from sleep with Jesus in His train when He comes. The disembodied souls are not here spoken of; the reference is to the sleeping bodies. The facts of Christ's experience are repeated in the believer's. He died and then rose: so believers shall die and then rise with Him. But in His case death is the term used, 1 Corinthians 15. 3, 6, &c.; in theirs, sleep; because His death has taken for them the sting from death. The same Hand that shall raise them is that which laid them to sleep. "Laid to sleep by Jesus," answers to "dead in Christ" (v. 16). 15. by the word of the Lord—Greek, "in," i. e., in virtue of a direct revelation from the Lord to me. So 1 Kings 20. 35. This is the "mystery," a truth once hidden, now revealed, which Paul shows (1 Corinthians 15. 51, 52). prevent—i. e., anticipate. So far were the early Christians from regarding their departed brethren as anticipating them in entering glory, that they needed to be assured that those who remain to the coming of the Lord "will not anticipate them that are asleep." The "we" means whichever of us are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord. The Spirit designed that believers in each successive age should live in continued expectation of the Lord's coming, not knowing but that they should be among those found alive at His coming (Matthew 24. 42). It is a sad fall from this blessed hope, that death is looked for by most men, rather than the coming of our Lord. Each successive generation in its time and place represents the generation which shall actually survive till His coming (Matthew 25. 13; Romans 13. 11; 1 Corinthians 15. 51; James 5. 9; 1 Peter 4. 5, 6). The Spirit subsequently revealed by Paul that which is not inconsistent with the expectation here taught of the Lord's coming at any time, viz., that His coming would not be until there should be a "falling away first" (2 Thessalonians 2. 2, 3); but as symptoms of this soon appeared, none could say but that still this precursory event might be realized, and so the Lord come in his day. Each successive revelation fills in the details of the general outline first given. So Paul subsequently, whilst still looking mainly for the Lord's coming to clothe him with his body from heaven, looks for going to be with Christ in the meanwhile (2 Corinthians 5. 1-10; Philippians 1. 6, 23; 3. 20, 21; 4. 5). EDMUNDS well says, The "we" is an affectionate identifying of ourselves with our fellows of all ages, as members of the same body, under the same Head, Christ Jesus. So Hosea 12. 4, "God spake with us in Bethel," i. e., with Israel. "We did rejoice," i. e., Israel at the Red Sea (Psalm 66. 6). Though neither Hosea, nor David, was alive at the times referred to, yet each identifies himself with those that were present. 16. himself—in all the Majesty of His presence in person, not by deputy. descend—even as He ascended (Acts 1. 11). with—Greek, "in," implying one concomitant circumstance attending His appearing. shout—Greek, "signal-shout," "war-shout." Jesus is represented as a victorious King, giving the word of command to the hosts of heaven in His train for the last onslaught, at His final triumph over sin, death, and Satan (Revelation 19. 11-21). the voice of . . . archangel—distinct from the "signal-shout." Michael is perhaps meant (Jude 9; Revelation 12. 7), to whom especially is committed the guardianship of the people of God (Daniel 10. 13). trump of God—the trumpet blast which usually accompanies God's manifestation in glory (Exodus 19. 16; Psalm 47. 5); here the last of the three accompaniments of His appearing: as the trumpet was used to convene God's people to their solemn convocations (Numbers 10. 2, 10; 31. 6), so here to summon God's elect together, preparatory to their glorification with Christ (Psalm 50. 1-5; Matthew 24. 31; 1 Corinthians 15. 52). shall rise first—previously to the living being "caught up." The "first" here has no reference to the first resurrection, as contrasted with that of "the rest of the dead." That reference occurs elsewhere (Matthew 13. 41, 42, 50; John 5. 29; 1 Corinthians 15. 23, 24; Revelation 20. 5, 6), it simply stands in opposition to "then," v. 17. FIRST, "the dead in Christ" shall rise, THEN the living shall be caught up. The Lord's people alone are spoken of here. 17. we which are alive . . . shall be caught up—after having been "changed in a moment" (1 Corinthians 15. 51, 52). Again he says, "we," recommending thus the expression to Christians of all ages, each generation bequeathing to the succeeding one a continually increasing obligation to look for the coming of the Lord. [EDMUNDS.] together with them—all together: the raised dead, and changed living, forming one joint body. in the clouds—Greek, "in clouds." The same honour is conferred on them as on their Lord. As He was taken in a cloud at His ascension (Acts 1. 9), so at His return with clouds (Revelation 1. 7), they shall be caught up in clouds. The clouds are His and their triumphal chariot (Psalm 104. 3; Daniel 7. 13). ELLICOTT explains the Greek, "robed round by upbearing clouds" (Aids to Faith). in the air—rather, "into the air;" caught up into the region just above the earth, where the meeting (cf. Matthew 25. 1, 6) shall take place between them ascending, and their Lord descending towards the earth. Not that the air is to be the place of their lasting abode with Him. and so shall we ever be with the Lord—no more parting, and no more going out (Revelation 3. 12). His point being established, that the dead in Christ shall be on terms of equal advantage with those found alive at Christ's coming, he leaves undefined here the other events foretold elsewhere (as not being necessary to his discussion), Christ's reign on earth with His saints (1 Corinthians 6. 2, 3), the final judgment and glorification of His saints in the new heaven and earth. 18. comfort one another—in your mourning for the dead (v. 13).

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-28. THE SUDDENNESS OF CHRIST'S COMING A MOTIVE FOR WATCHFULNESS; VARIOUS PRECEPTS: PRAYER FOR THEIR BEING FOUND BLAMELESS, BODY, SOUL, AND SPIRIT, AT CHRIST'S COMING: CONCLUSION. 1. times—the general and indefinite term for chronological periods. seasons—the opportune times (Daniel 7. 12; Acts 1. 7). Time denotes quantity; season, quality. Seasons are parts of times. ye have no need—those who watch do not need to be told when the hour will come, for they are always ready. [BENGEL.] 2. as a thief in the night—The apostles in this image follow the parable of their Lord, expressing how the Lord's coming shall take men by surprise (Matthew 24. 43; 2 Peter 3. 10). "The night is wherever there is quiet unconcern." [BENGEL.] "At midnight" (perhaps figurative: to some parts of the earth it will be literal night), Matthew 25. 6. The thief not only gives no notice of his approach, but takes all precaution to prevent the household knowing of it. So the Lord (Revelation 16. 15). Signs will precede the coming, to confirm the patient hope of the watchful believer; but the coming itself shall be sudden at last (Matthew 24. 32-36; Luke 21. 25-32, 35). cometh—present: expressing its speedy and awful certainty. 3. they—the men of the world. Verses 5, 6; ch. 4. 13, "others," all the rest of the world save Christians. Peace—(Judges 18. 7, 9, 27, 28; Jeremiah 6. 14; Ezekiel 13. 10.) then—at that very moment when they least expect it. Cf. the case of Belshazzar, Daniel 5. 1-5, 6, 9, 28-28; Herod, Acts 12. 21-23. sudden—"unawares" (Luke 21. 34). as travail—"As the labour pang" comes in an instant on the woman when otherwise engaged (Psalm 48. 6; Isaiah 43. 8). shall not escape—Greek, "shall not at all escape." Another awful feature of their ruin: there shall be then no possibility of shunning it however they desire it (Amos 2. 2, 3; Revelation 6. 15, 16). 4. not in darkness—not in darkness of understanding (i. e., spiritual ignorance) or of the moral nature (i. e., a state of sin), Ephesians 4. 18. that—Greek, "in order that:" with God results are all purposed. that day—Greek, "THE day:" the day of the Lord (Hebrews 10. 25, "the day"), in contrast to "darkness." overtake—unexpectedly (cf. John 12. 35). as a thief—The two oldest MSS. read, "as (the daylight overtakes) thieves" (Job 24. 17). Old MSS. and Vulgate read as English Version. 5. The oldest MSS. read, "For ye are all," &c. Ye have no reason for fear, or for being taken by surprise, by the coming of the day of the Lord: "For ye are all sons (so the Greek) of light and sons of day:" a Hebrew idiom, implying that as sons resemble their fathers, so you are in character light (intellectually and morally illuminated in a spiritual point of view), Luke 16. 8; John 12. 36. are not of—i. e., belong not to night nor darkness. The change of person from "ye" to "we" implies this: Ye are sons of light because ye are Christians; and we, Christians, are not of night nor darkness. 6. others—Greek, "the rest" of the world: the unconverted (ch. 4. 13). "Sleep" here is worldly apathy to spiritual things (Romans 13. 11; Ephesians 5. 14); in v. 7, ordinary sleep; in v. 10, death. watch—for Christ's coming, lit., "be wakeful." The same Greek occurs 1 Corinthians 15. 34; 2 Timothy 2. 26. be sober—refraining from carnal indulgence, mental or sensual (1 Peter 5. 8). 7. This verse is to be taken in the literal sense. Night is the time when sleepers sleep, and drinking men are drunk. To sleep by day would imply great indolence; to be drunken by day, great shamelessness. Now, in a spiritual sense, "we Christians profess to be day people, not night people; therefore our work ought to be day work, not night work; our conduct such as will bear the eye of day, and such has no need of the veil of night" [EDMUNDS] v. 8). 8. Faith, hope, and love, are the three pre-eminent graces (ch. 1. 3; 1 Corinthians 13. 13). We must not only be awake and sober, but also armed; not only watchful, but also guarded. The armour here is only defensive; in Ephesians 6. 13-17, also offensive. Here, therefore, the reference is to the Christian means of being guarded against being surprised by the day of the Lord as a thief in the night. The helmet and breastplate defend the two vital parts, the head and the heart respectively. "With head and heart right, the whole man is right." [EDMUNDS.] The head needs to be kept from error, the heart from sin. For "the breastplate of righteousness," Ephesians 6. 14, we have here "the breastplate of faith and love:" for the righteousness which is imputed to man for justification, is "faith working by love" (Romans 4. 3, 22-24; Galatians 5. 6). Faith, as the motive within, and love, exhibited in outward acts, constitute the perfection of righteousness. In Ephesians 6. 17 the helmet is "salvation;" here, "the hope of salvation." In one aspect "salvation" is a present possession (John 3. 36; 5. 24; 1 John 5. 13); in another, it is a matter of hope (Romans 8. 24, 25). Our Head primarily wore the "breastplate of righteousness" and "helmet of salvation," that we might, by union with Him, receive both. 9. For—Assigning the ground of our "hopes" (v. 8). appointed us—translate, "set" (Acts 13. 47), in His everlasting purpose of love (ch. 3. 3; 2 Timothy 1. 9). Contrast Romans 9. 22; Jude 4. to—i. e., unto wrath. to obtain—Greek, "to the acquisition of salvation:" said, according to BENGEL, of one saved out of a general wreck, when all things else have been lost: so of the elect saved out of the multitude of the lost (2 Thessalonians 2. 13, 14). The fact of God's "appointment" of His grace "through Jesus Christ" (Ephesians 1. 5), takes away the notion of our being able to "acquire" salvation of ourselves. Christ "acquired (so the Greek for 'purchased') the Church (and its salvation) with his own blood" (Acts 20. 28); each member is said to be appointed by God to the "acquiring of salvation." In the primary sense, God does the work; in the secondary sense, man does it. 10. did for us—Greek, "in our behalf," whether we wake or sleep—whether we be found at Christ's coming awake, i. e., alive, or asleep, i. e., in our graves. together—all of us together; the living not preceding the dead in their glorification "with Him" at His coming (ch. 4. 13). 11. comfort yourselves—Greek, "one another." Here he reverts to the same consolatory strain as in ch. 4. 18. one another—rather as Greek, "Edify (ye) the one the other:" "Edify," lit., "build up," viz., in faith, hope, and love, by discoursing together on such edifying topics as the Lord's coming, and the glory of the saints (Malachi 3. 16). 12. beseech—"Exhort" is the expression in v. 14; here, "we beseech you," as if it were a personal favour (Paul making the cause of the Thessalonian presbyters, as it were, his own). know—to have a regard and respect for. Recognize their office, and treat them accordingly (cf. 1 Corinthians 16. 18) with reverence and with liberality in supplying their needs (1 Timothy 5. 17). The Thessalonian Church having been newly planted, the ministers were necessarily novices (1 Timothy 3. 6), which may have been in part the cause of the people's treating them with less respect. Paul's practice seems to have been to ordain elders in every Church soon after its establishment (Acts 14. 23). them which labour . . . are over . . . admonish you—Not three classes of ministers, but one, as there is but one article common to the three in the Greek. "Labour" expresses their laborious life; "are over you," their pre-eminence as presidents or superintendents ("bishops," i. e., overseers Philippians 1. 1, "them that have rule over you," lit., leaders, Hebrews 13. 17; "pastors," lit., shepherds, Ephesians 4. 11); "admonish you," one of their leading functions; the Greek is "put in mind," implying not arbitrary authority, but gentle, though faithful, admonition (2 Timothy 2. 14, 24, 25; 1 Peter 5. 3). in the Lord—Their presidency over you is in Divine things; not in worldly affairs, but in things appertaining to the Lord. 13. very highly—Greek, "exceeding abundantly." for their work's sake—the high nature of their work alone, the furtherance of your salvation and of the kingdom of Christ, should be a sufficient motive to claim your reverential love. At the same time, the words "work," teaches ministers that, whilst claiming the reverence due to their office, it is not a sinecure, but a "work:" of "labour" (even to weariness: so the Greek)

v. 12. be at peace among yourselves—The “and” is not in the original. Let there not only be peace between ministers and their flocks, but also no party rivalries among yourselves, one contending in behalf of some one favourite minister, another in behalf of another (Mark 9. 50; 1 Corinthians 1. 12; 4. 6). 14. brethren—This exhortation to “warn (Greek, ‘admonish,’ as in v. 12) the unruly (those ‘disorderly’ persons, 2 Thessalonians 3. 6, 11, who would not work, and yet expected to be maintained, lit., said of soldiers who will not remain in their ranks, cf. ch. 4. 11; also those insubordinate as to Church discipline, in relation to those ‘over’ the Church, v. 12), comfort the feeble-minded” (the saint-hearted, who are ready to sink “without hope” in afflictions, ch. 4. 13, and temptations), &c., applies to all clergy and laity alike, though primarily the duty of the clergy (who are meant in v. 12). support—lit., lay fast hold on so as to support. the weak—spiritually. St. Paul practiced what he preached (1 Corinthians 9. 22). be patient toward all men—There is no believer who needs not the exercise of patience “toward” him; there is none to whom a believer ought not to show it; many show it more to strangers than to their own families, more to the great than to the humble; but we ought to show it “toward all men.” [BENGEL.] Cf. “the long-suffering of our Lord” (2 Corinthians 10. 1; 2 Peter 3. 15). 15. (Romans 12. 17; 1 Peter 3. 9.) unto any man—whether unto a Christian, or a heathen, however great the provocation. follow—as a matter of earnest pursuit. 16, 17. In order to “rejoice evermore,” we must “pray without ceasing.” He who is wont to thank God for all things as happening for the best, will have continuous joy. [THEOPHYLACT.] Ephesians 6. 18; Philippians 4. 4, 6, “Rejoice in the Lord . . . by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving;” Romans 14. 17, “in the Holy Ghost;” Romans 12. 12, “in hope;” Acts 5. 41, “in being counted worthy to suffer shame for Christ’s name;” James 1. 2, in falling “into divers temptations.” The Greek is, “Pray without intermission:” without allowing prayerless gaps to intervene between the times of prayer. 18. In every thing—even what seems adverse: for nothing is really so (cf. Romans 8. 28; Ephesians 5. 20). See Christ’s example (Matthew 15. 36; 26. 27; Luke 10. 21; John 11. 41). this—That ye should “rejoice evermore, pray without ceasing, (and) in every thing give thanks,” “is the will of God in Christ Jesus (as the Mediator and Revealer of that will, observed by those who are in Christ by faith, cf. Philippians 3. 14) concerning you.” God’s will is the believer’s law. LACHMANN rightly reads commas at the end of the three precepts (v. 16, 17, 18), making “this” refer to all three. 19. Quench not—The Spirit being a holy fire: “where the Spirit is, He burns” [BENGEL] (Matthew 3. 11; Acts 2. 3; 7. 51). Do not throw cold water on those who, under extraordinary inspiration of the Spirit, stand up to speak with tongues, or reveal mysteries, or pray in the congregation. The enthusiastic exhibitions of some (perhaps as to the nearness of Christ’s coming, exaggerating Paul’s statement, 2 Thessalonians 2. 2, By spirit), led others (probably the presiding ministers, who had not always been treated with due respect by enthusiastic novices, v. 12), from dread of enthusiasm, to discourage the free utterances of those really inspired, in the Church assembly. On the other hand, the caution (v. 21) was needed, not to receive “all” pretended revelations as Divine, without “proving” them. 20. prophesyings—whether exercised in inspired teaching, or in predicting the future. “Despised” by some as beneath “tongues,” which seemed most miraculous; therefore declared by Paul to be a greater gift than tongues, though the latter were more showy (1 Corinthians 14. 5). 21, 22. Some of the oldest MSS. insert “But.” You ought indeed not to “quench” the manifestations of “the Spirit,” nor “despise prophesyings;” “but,” at the same time, do not take “all” as genuine which professes to be so; “prove (test) all” such manifestations. The means of testing them existed in the Church, in those who had the “discerning of spirits” (1 Corinthians 12. 10; 14. 29; 1 John 4. 1). Another sure test, which we also have, is, to try the professed revelation whether it accords with Scripture, as the noble Bereans did (Acts 17. 11; Galatians 1. 8, 9). This precept negatives the Romish priest’s assumption of infallibly laying down the law, without the laity having the right, in the exercise of private judgment, to test it by Scripture. LOCKYER says, Those who are for laying aside reason in matters of revelation, resemble one who should put out his eyes in order to use a telescope. hold fast that which is good—Join this clause with the next clause (v. 22), not merely with the sentence preceding. As the result of your “proving all things,” and especially all prophesyings, “hold fast (Luke 8. 15; 1 Corinthians 11. 2; Hebrews 2. 1) the good, and hold yourselves aloof from every appearance of evil” (“every evil species.” [BENGEL and WAHL]). Do not accept even a professedly spirit-inspired communication, if it be at variance with the truth taught you (2 Thessalonians 2. 2). TITTMANN supports English Version, “from every evil appearance” or “semblance.” The context, however, does not refer to evil appearances in ourselves which we ought to abstain from, but to holding ourselves aloof from every evil appearance in others; as for instance, in the pretenders to spirit-inspired prophesyings. In many cases the Christian should not abstain from what has the semblance (“appearance”) of evil, though really good. Jesus healed on the sabbath, and ate with publicans and sinners, acts which wore the appearance of evil, but which were not to be abstained from on that account, being really good. I agree with TITTMANN rather than with BENGEL, whom ALFORD follows. The context favours this sense: However specious be the form or outward appearance of such would-be prophets and their prophesyings, hold yourselves aloof from every such form when it is evil, lit., “Hold yourselves aloof from every evil appearance” or “form.” 23. the very God—rather as the Greek, “the God of peace Himself;” who can do for you by His own power what I cannot do by all my monitions, nor you by all your efforts (Romans 16. 20; Hebrews 13. 20) viz., keep you from all evil, and give you all that is good. sanctify you—for holiness is the necessary condition of “peace” (Philippians 4. 6–9). wholly—Greek, (so that you should be) “perfect in every respect.” [TITTMANN.] and—i. e., “and so (omit I pray God; not in the Greek) may your . . . spirit and soul and body be preserved,” &c. whole—A different Greek word from “wholly.” Translate, “Entire;” with none of the integral parts wanting. [TITTMANN.] It refers to man in his normal integrity, as originally designed; an ideal which shall be attained by the glorified believer. All three, spirit, soul, and body, each in its due place, constitute man “entire.” The “spirit” links man with the higher intelligences of heaven, and is that highest part of man which is receptive of the quickening Holy Spirit (1 Corinthians 15. 47). In the unspiritual, the spirit is so sunk under the lower animal soul (which it ought to keep under), that such are termed “animal” (English Version, sensual, having merely the body of organized matter, and the soul the immaterial animating essence), having not the Spirit (cf. 1 Corinthians 2. 14; Notes, 15. 44, 46–48; John 3. 6). The unbeliever shall rise with an animal (soul-animated) body, but not like the believer with a spiritual (spirit-endued) body like Christ’s (Romans 8. 11). blameless unto—rather as Greek, “blamelessly (so as to be in a blameless state) at the coming of Christ.” In Hebrew, “peace” and “wholly” (perfect in every respect) are kindred terms; so that the prayer shows what the title “God of peace” implies. BENGEL takes “wholly” as collectively, all the Thessalonians without exception, so that no one should fall. And “whole” (entire), individually, each one of them entire, with “spirit, soul, and body.” The mention of the preservation of the body accords with the subject (ch. 4. 16). TRENCH better regards “wholly” as meaning “Having perfectly attained the moral end,” viz., to be a full-grown man in Christ “Whole,” complete, with no grace which ought to be in a Christian wanting. 24. Faithful—to His covenant promises (John 10. 27–29; 1 Corinthians 1. 9; 10. 23; Philippians 1. 6). he that calleth you—God, the caller of His people will cause His calling not to fall short of its designed end. do it—preserve and present you blameless at the coming in Christ (v. 23; Romans 8. 30; 1 Peter 5. 10). You must not look at the foes before and behind, on the right hand and on the left, but to God's faithfulness to His promises, God's zeal for His honour, and God's love for those whom He callieth. 25. Some oldest MSS. read, "Pray ye also for (i. e., concerning) us;" make us and our work the subject of your prayers, even as we have been just praying for you (v. 23). Others omit the "also." The clergy need much the prayers of their flocks. Paul makes the same request in the Epistles to Romans, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and 2 Corinthians; not so in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, whose intercessions, as his spiritual sons, he was already sure of; nor in the Epistles to 1 Corinthians and Galatians, as these Epistles abound in rebuke. 26. Hence, it appears this Epistle was first handed to the elders, who communicated it to "the brethren." holy kiss—pure and chaste. "A kiss of charity" (1 Peter 5. 14). A token of Christian fellowship in those days (cf. Luke 7. 45; Acts 20. 37), as it is a common mode of salutation in many countries. The custom hence arose in the early Church of passing the kiss through the congregation at the holy communion (JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology, i. 65; Apostolic Constitutions, 2. 57), the men kissing the men, and the women the women, in the Lord. So in the Syrian Church each takes his neighbour's right hand, and gives the salutation, "Peace." 27. I charge—Greek, "I adjure you." read unto all—viz., publicly in the congregation at a particular time. The Greek aorist implies a single act done at a particular time. The earnestness of his adjuration implies how solemnly-important he felt this divinely-inspired message to be. Also, as this was the FIRST of the Epistles of the New Testament, he makes this the occasion of a solemn charge, that so its being publicly read should be a sample of what should be done in the case of the others, just as the Pentateuch and the Prophets were publicly read under the Old Testament, and are still read in the synagogue. Cf. the same injunction as to the public reading of the Apocalypse, the LAST of the New Testament canon (Revelation 1. 3). The "all" includes women and children, and especially those who could not read it themselves (Deuteronomy 31. 12; Joshua 8. 33-35). What Paul commands with an adjuration, Rome forbids under a curse. [BENGL.] Though these Epistles had difficulties, the laity were all to hear them read (1 Peter 4. 11; 1 Peter 3. 10; even the very young, 2 Timothy 1. 5; 3. 15). "Holy" is omitted before "brethren" in most of the oldest MSS., though some of them support it. 28. (Note, 1 Corinthians 13. 14.) Paul ends as he began (cf. 1. 1), with "grace." The oldest MSS. omit "Amen," which probably was the response of the Church after the public reading of the Epistle.

The subscription is a comparatively modern addition. The Epistle was not, as it states, written from Athens, but from Corinth; for it is written in the names of Silas and Timothy (besides Paul), who did not join the apostle before he reached the latter city (Acts 18. 5).

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

ITS GENUINENESS is attested by POLYCARP (Epistola ad Philippenses, sec. 11), who alludes to ch. 3. 15. JUSTIN MARTYR, Dialogue with Tryphonen (p. 193. 32), alludes to ch. 2. 3. IRENÆUS (3. ch. 7., sec. 2) quotes ch. 2. 8. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA quotes ch. 3. 2, as Paul's words (Stromata, i. 5., p. 551; Pædagogus, 1. 17). TERTULLIAN (De Resurrectione carnis, ch. 24) quotes ch. 2. 1, 2, as part of Paul's Epistle.

DESIGN.—The accounts from Thessalonica, after the sending of the first Epistle, represented the faith and love of the Christians there as on the increase; and their constancy amidst persecutions unshaken. One error of doctrine, however, resulting in practical evil, had sprung up among them. The apostle's description of Christ's sudden second coming (1 Thessalonians 4. 13, &c., and 5. 2), and the possibility of its being at any time, led them to believe it was actually at hand. Some professed to know by "the Spirit" (ch. 2. 2) that it was so; and others alleged that Paul had said so when with them. A letter, too, purporting to be from the apostle to that effect, seems to have been circulated among them. (That ch. 2. 2 refers to such a spurious letter, rather than to St. Paul's first Epistle, appears likely from the statement, ch. 3. 17, as to his autograph salutation being the mark whereby his genuine letters might be known.) Hence some neglected their daily business and threw themselves on the charity of others, as if their sole duty was to wait for the coming of the Lord. This error, therefore, needed rectifying, and forms a leading topic of the second Epistle. He in it tells them (ch. 2), that before the Lord shall come, there must first be a great apostasy, and the Man of Sin must be revealed; and that the Lord's sudden coming is no ground for neglecting daily business; that to do so would only bring scandal on the Church, and was contrary to his own practice among them (ch. 3. 7-9), and that the faithful must withdraw themselves from such disorderly professors (ch. 3. 6, 10-15). Thus, there are three divisions of the Epistle: (1.) Ch. 1. 1-12. Commendations of the Thessalonians' faith, love, and patience, amidst persecutions. (2., Ch. 2. 1-17. The error as to the immediate coming of Christ corrected, and the previous rise and downfall of the Man of Sin foretold. (3.) Ch. 3. 1-16. Exhortations to orderly conduct in their whole walk, with prayers for them to the God of peace, followed by his autograph salutation and benediction.

DATE OF WRITING.—As the Epistle is written in the joint names of Timothy and Silas, as well as his own, and as these were with him whilst at Corinth, and not with him for a long time subsequently to his having left that city (cf. Acts 18. 18, with 19. 22; indeed, as to Silas, it is doubtful whether he was ever subsequently with Paul), it follows, the place of writing must have been Corinth, and the date, during the one "year and six months" of his stay there, Acts 18. 11 (viz., beginning with the autumn of A. D. 52, and ending with the spring of A. D. 54), say about six months after his first Epistle, early in A. D. 53.

STYLE.—The style is not different from that of most of Paul's other writings, except in the prophetic portion of it (ch. 2. 1-12), which is distinguished from them in subject-matter. As is usual in his more solemn passages (for instance, in the denunciatory and prophetic portions of his Epistles, e. g., cf. Colossians 2. 3, 16, with v. 3; 1 Corinthians 15. 24-28, with v. 8, 9; Romans 1. 18, with v. 8, 10), his diction here is more lofty, abrupt, and elliptical. As the former Epistle dwells mostly on the second Advent in its aspect of glory to the sleeping and the living saints (1 Thessalonians 4. and 5.) so this Epistle dwells mostly on it in its aspect of everlasting destruction to the wicked and him who shall be the final consummation of wickedness, the Man of Sin. So far was Paul from labouring under an erroneous impression as to Christ's speedy coming, when he wrote his first Epistle (which rationalists impute to him), that he had distinctly told them, when he was with them, the same truths as to the apostasy being about first to arise, which he now insists upon in this second Epistle (ch. 2. 5). Several points of coincidence occur between the two Epistles, confirming the genuineness of the latter. Thus, cf. ch. 3. 2, with 1 Thessalonians 2. 15, 16; again, ch. 2. 9, the Man of Sin "coming after the working of Satan," with 1 Thessalonians 2. 18; 3. 5, where Satan's incipient work as the hinderer of the Gospel, and the tempter, appears; again, mild warning is enjoined, 1 Thessalonians 5. 14; but, in this second Epistle, when the evil had grown worse, stricter discipline (ch. 3. 6, 14): "withdraw from" the "company" of such.

Paul probably visited Thessalonica on his way to Asia subsequently (Acts 20. 4), and took with him thence Aristarchus and Secundus, Thessalonians: the former became his "companion in travel," and shared with him his perils at Ephesus, also those of his shipwreck, and was his "fellow prisoner" at Rome (Acts 27. 2; Colossians 4. 10; Philemon 4). According to tradition he became bishop of Apamea.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-12. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION: INTRODUCTION: THANKSGIVING FOR THEIR GROWTH IN FAITH AND LOVE, AND FOR THEIR PATIENCE IN PERSECUTIONS, WHICH ARE A TOKEN FOR GOOD EVERLASTING TO THEM, AND FOR PERDITION TO THEIR ADVERSARIES AT CHRIST'S COMING: PRAYER FOR THEIR PERFECTION. 1. In God our Father—Still more endearing than the address, 1 Thessalonians 1. 1, "in God THE Father." 2. from God our Father—So some oldest MSS. read. Others omit "our." 3. we are bound—Greek, "We owe it as a debt" (ch. 2. 13). They had prayed for the Thessalonians (1 Thessalonians 3. 12) that they might "increase and abound in love;" their prayer having been heard, it is a small but a bounden return for them to make, to thank God for it. Thus, Paul and his fellow-missionaries practise what they preach (1 Thessalonians 5. 18). In 1 Thessalonians 1. 3, their thanksgiving was for the Thessalonians' "faith, love, and patience;" here, for their exceeding growth in faith, and for their charity abounding. meet—right. "We are bound," expresses the duty of thanksgiving from its subjective side as an inward conviction. "As it is meet," from the objective side as something answering to the state of circumstances. [ALFORD.] Observe the exact correspondence of the prayer (1 Thessalonians 3. 12, "The Lord make you to abound in love") and the answer, "The love of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth" (cf. 1 Thessalonians 4. 10). 4. glory in you—make our boast of you, lit., "in your case." "Ourselves" implies that not merely did they hear others speaking of the Thessalonians' faith, but they, the missionaries themselves, boasted of it. Cf. 1 Thessalonians 1. 8, wherein the apostle said, their faith was so well known in various places, that he and his fellow-missionaries had no need to speak of it; but here he says, so abounding is their love, combined with faith and patience, that he and his fellow-missionaries themselves, make it a matter of glorying in the various churches elsewhere (he was now at Corinth in Achaia, and boasted there of the faith of the Macedonian churches, 2 Corinthians 10. 15-17; 8. 1, at the same time giving the glory to the Lord), not only looking forward to glorying thereat at Christ's coming (1 Thessalonians 2. 19), but doing so even now. patience—In 1 Thessalonians 1. 3, "patience of hope." Here hope is tacitly implied as the ground of their patience; v. 5, 7 state the object of their hope, viz., the kingdom for which they suffer. tribulations—lit., pressures. The Jews were the instigators of the populace and of the magistrates against Christians (Acts 17. 6, 8). which ye endure—Greek, "are (now) enduring." 5. Which—Your enduring these tribulations is a "token of the righteous judgment of God," manifested in your being enabled to endure them, and in your adversaries thereby filling up the measure of their guilt. The judgment is even now begun, but its consummation will be at the Lord's coming. David (Psalm 73. 1-14) and Jeremiah (12. 1-4) were perplexed at the wicked prospering and the godly suffering. But Paul, by the light of the New Testament, makes this fact a matter of consolation. It is a proof (so the Greek) of the future judgment, which will set to rights the anomalies of the present state, by rewarding the now suffering saint, and by punishing the persecutor. And even now "the Judge of all the earth does right" (Genesis 18. 25); for the godly are in themselves sinful and need chastisement to amend them. What they suffer unjustly at the hands of

crnel men they suffer justly at the hands of God; and they have their evil things here, that they may escape condemnation with the world and have their good things hereafter (Luke 16. 25; 1 Corinthians 11. 32). [EDMUNDS.] that ye may be counted worthy—expressing the purpose of God's "righteous judgment" as regards you. for which—Greek, "in behalf of which ye are also suffering" (cf. Acts 5. 41; 9. 16; Philippians 1. 29). "Worthy" implies that, though men are justified by faith, they shall be judged "according to their works" (Revelation 20. 12; cf. 1 Thessalonians 2. 12; 1 Peter 1. 6, 7; Revelation 20. 4). The "also" implies the connection between the suffering for the kingdom and being counted worthy of it. Cf. Romans 8. 17, 18. 6. seeing (that) it is a righteous thing—This justifies the assertion above of there being a "righteous judgment" (v. 5), viz., "seeing that it is (lit., 'if at least,' 'if at all events it is') a righteous thing with (i. e., in the estimation of) God" (which, as we all feel, it certainly is). Our own innate feeling of what is just, in this confirms what is revealed. recompense—requite in kind, viz., tribulation to them that trouble you (affliction to those that afflict you); and to you who are troubled, rest from trouble. 7. rest—governed by "to recompense" (v. 6). The Greek is lit. relaxation; loosening of the tension which had preceded; relaxing of the strings of endurance now so tightly drawn. The Greek word for "rest," Matthew 11. 28, is distinct, viz., cessation from labour. Also, Hebrews 4. 9, "A keeping of sabbath." with us—viz., Paul, Silas, and Timothy, the writers, who are troubled like yourselves. when—at the time when, &c., not sooner, not later. with his mighty angels—rather as the Greek, "with the angels of His might," or "power," i. e., the angels who are the ministers by whom He makes His might to be recognized (Matthew 13. 41, 42). It is not their might, but His might, which is the prominent thought. 8. In flaming fire—Greek, "In flame of fire;" or, as other oldest MSS. read, in fire of flame. This flame of fire accompanied His manifestation in the hush (Exodus 3. 2); also His giving of the law at Sinai (Exodus 19. 18); also it shall accompany His revelation at His advent (Daniel 7. 8, 10), symbolizing His own bright glory and His consuming vengeance against His foes (Hebrews 10. 27; 12. 28; 2 Peter 3. 7, 10). taking—lit., "giving" them, as their portion, "vengeance." know not God—The Gentiles primarily (Psalm 79. 6; Galatians 4. 8; 1 Thessalonians 4. 5); not of course those involuntarily not knowing God, but those wilfully not knowing Him, as Pharaoh, who might have known God if he would, but who boasted "I know not the Lord" (Exodus 5. 2); and as the heathen persecutors who might have known God by the preaching of those whom they persecuted. Secondly, all who "profess to know God but in works deny Him" (Titus 1. 16). obey not the Gospel—Primarily the unbelieving Jews (Romans 10. 3, 16). Secondly, all who obey not the truth (Romans 2. 8). Christ—Omitted by some of the oldest MSS., and retained by others. 9. Who—Greek, "Persons who," &c. destruction from the presence of the Lord—driven far from His presence. [ALFORD.] The sentence emanating from Him in person, sitting as Judge [BENGE], and driving them far from Him (Matthew 25. 41; Revelation 6. 16; 12. 14; cf. 1 Peter 3. 12; Isaiah 2. 10, 19); "The presence of the Lord" is the source whence the sentence goes forth; "the glory of His power" is the instrument whereby the sentence is carried into execution. [EDMUNDS.] But ALFORD better interprets the latter clause (see v. 10), driven "from the manifestation of His power in the glorification of His saints." Cast out from the presence of the Lord is the idea at the root of eternal death; the law of evil left to its unrestricted working, without one counteracting influence of the presence of God, who is the source of all light and holiness (Isaiah 66. 24; Mark 9. 44). 10. "When he shall have come," glorified in his saints—as the clement and mirror in which His glory shall shine brightly (John 17. 10). admired in all them that believe—Greek, "them that believed." Once they believed, now they see: they had taken His word on trust. Now His word is made good and they need faith no longer. With wonder all celestial intelligences (Ephesians 3. 10) shall see and admire the Redeemer on account of the excellencies which He has wrought in them. because, &c.—Supply for the sense, among whom (viz., those who shall be found to have believed) you, too, shall be; "because our testimony unto (so the Greek for 'among') you was believed" (and was not rejected as by those "who obey not the Gospel," v. 8). The early preaching of the Gospel was not abstract discussions, but a testimony to facts and truths experimentally known (Luke 24. 48; Acts 1. 8). Faith is defined by Bishop PEARSON as "an assent unto truths, credible upon the testimony of God, delivered unto us by the apostles and prophets" (originally delivering their testimony orally, but now in their writings). "Glorified in His saints" reminds us that holiness is glory in the end; glory is holiness manifested. 11. Wherefore—Greek, "With a view to which," viz., His glorification in you as His saints. also—We not only anticipate the coming glorification of our Lord in His saints, but we also pray concerning (so the Greek) you. our God—whom we serve. count you worthy—The prominent position of the "you" in the Greek makes it the emphatic word of the sentence. May you be found among the saints whom God shall count worthy of their calling (Ephesians 4. 1)! There is no dignity in us independent of God's calling of us (2 Timothy 1. 9). The calling here is not merely the first actual call, but the whole of God's electing act, originating in His "purpose of grace given us in Christ before the world began" and having its consummation in glory. the good pleasure of, &c.—on the part of God. [BENGE.] faith—on your part. ALFORD refers the former clause, "good pleasure," &c., also to man, arguing that the Greek for goodness is never applied to God, and translates, "All [i. e., every possible] right purpose of goodness." WAHL, "All sweetness of goodness," i. e., impart in full to you all the refreshing delights of goodness. I think that, as in the previous and parallel clause, "calling" refers to God's purpose; and as the Greek for "good pleasure" mostly is used of God, we ought to translate, "fulfil (His) every gracious purpose of goodness" (on your part), i. e., fully perfect in you all goodness according to His gracious purpose. Thus, "the grace of our God," v. 12, corresponds to God's "good pleasure" here, which confirms the English Version, just as "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ" is parallel to "work of faith," as Christ especially is the object of faith. "The work of faith;" Greek, "(no article; supply from the previous clause all) work of faith;" faith manifested by work, which is its perfected development (James 1. 4; cf. Note, 1 Thessalonians 1. 3). Working reality of faith. with power—Greek, "IN POWER," i. e., "powerfully joyful in you" (Colossians 1. 11). 12. the name of our Lord Jesus—Our Lord Jesus in His manifested personality as the God-man. in you, and ye in him—reciprocal glorification; cf. Isaiah 28. 5, "The Lord of hosts shall be . . . a crown of glory and . . . a diadem of beauty unto . . . His people," with Isaiah 62. 3, "Thou (Zion) shall be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem," &c. (John 21. 10; Galatians 1. 24; 1 Peter 4. 14). The believer's graces redound to Christ's glory, and His glory, as their Head, reflects glory on them as the members. the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ—There is but one Greek article to both, implying the inseparable unity of God and the Lord Jesus.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-17. CORRECTION OF THEIR ERROR AS TO CHRIST'S IMMEDIATE COMING. THE APOSTASY THAT MUST PRECEDE

IT. EXHORTATION TO STEADFASTNESS, INTRODUCED WITH THANKSGIVING FOR THEIR ELECTION BY GOD. 1. Now—rather, "But;" marking the transition from his prayers for them to entreaties to them. we beseech you—or "entreat you." He uses affectionate entreaty to win them over to the right view, rather than stern reproof. by—rather, "with respect to;" as the Greek for "of" (2 Corinthians 1. 8). our gathering together unto him—the consummating or final gathering together of the saints to Him at His coming, as announced, Matthew 24. 31; 1 Thessalonians 4. 17. The Greek noun is nowhere else found except Hebrews 10. 25, said of the assembling together of believers for congregational worship. Our instinctive fears of the judgment are dispelled by the thought of being gathered together unto Him ("even as the hen gathereth her chickens under her wings"), which ensures our safety. 2. soon—on trifling grounds, without due consideration. shaken—lit., tossed as ships tossed by an agitated sea. Cf. for the same image, Ephesians 4. 14. in mind—rather as the Greek, "from your mind," i. e., from your mental steadfastness on the subject. troubled—This verb applies to emotional agitation; as "shaken" to intellectual. by spirit—by a person professing to have the spirit of prophecy (1 Corinthians 12. 8-10; 1 John 4. 1-5). The Thessalonians had been warned (1 Thessalonians 5. 20, 21) to "prove" such professed prophecies, and to "hold fast (only) that which is good," by word—of mouth (cf. v. 5, 15); some word or saying alleged to be that of St. Paul, orally communicated. If oral tradition was liable to such perversion in the apostolic age (cf. a similar instance, John 21. 23), how much more in our age! by letter as from us—purporting to be from us, whereas it is a forgery. Hence he gives a test by which to know his genuine letters (ch. 3. 17). day of Christ—The oldest MSS. read, "day of the Lord." is at hand—rather, "is immediately imminent," lit., "is present;" "is instantly coming." Christ and His apostles always taught that the day of the Lord's coming is at hand; and it is not likely that Paul would imply anything contrary here; what he denies is, that it is so immediately imminent, instant, or present, as to justify the neglect of every-day worldly duties. CHRYSOSTOM, and after him ALFORD, translates, "Is [already] present" (cf. 2 Timothy 2. 18), is a kindred error. But in 2 Timothy 3. 1, the same Greek verb is translated "come." WAHL supports this view. The Greek is usually used of actual presence; but is quite susceptible of the translation, "is all but present." 3. by any means—Greek, "in any manner." Christ, in Matthew 24. 4, gives the same warning in connection with the same event. He had indicated three ways (v. 2) in which they might be deceived (cf. other ways, v. 9, and Matthew 24. 5, 24). a falling away—rather as the Greek, "the falling away," or "apostasy," viz., the one of which "I told you" before (v. 5), "when I was yet with you," and of which the Lord gave some intimation (Matthew 24. 10-12; John 5. 43). that man of sin be revealed—the Greek order is, "And there have been revealed the man of sin." As Christ was first in mystery, and afterwards revealed (1 Timothy 3. 16), so Antichrist (the term used 1 John 2. 18; 4. 3) is first in mystery, and afterwards shall be developed and revealed (v. 7-9). As righteousness found its embodiment in Christ, "the Lord our righteousness," so "sin" shall have its embodiment in "the man of sin." The hindering power meanwhile restrains its manifestation; when that shall be removed, then this manifestation shall take place. The articles, "the apostasy," and "the man of sin," may also refer to their being well known as foretold by Daniel 7. 8, 25, "the little horn speaking great words against the Most High, and thinking to change times and laws;" and 11. 36, the wilful king who "shall exalt and magnify himself above every God, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods; neither shall he regard any God." the son of perdition—a title applied besides to Judas (the traitor, John 17. 12), and to none else. Antichrist (the second "beast" coming up out of the earth) therefore shall at first be "like a lamb, whilst he speaks as a dragon" (Revelation 13. 11); "coming in peaceably and by flatteries," "working deceitfully," but "his heart shall be against the holy covenant" (Daniel 11. 21, 23, 28, 30). Seeds of "the falling away" soon appear (1 Timothy 4. 1-3), but the full development and concentration of these anti-Christian elements in one person are still to appear. Contrast the King of Zion's coming as JESUS: (1.) Righteous or just; (2.) having salvation; (3.) lowly; whereas Antichrist is (1.) "The man of (the embodiment of) sin"; (2.) the son of perdition; (3.) exalting himself above all that is worshipped. He is the son of perdition, as consigning many to it, and finally doomed to it himself (Revelation 17. 8, 11). "He whose essence and inheritance is perdition." [ALFORD.] As "the kingdom of heaven" is first brought before us in the abstract, then in the concrete, the King, the Lord Jesus; so here, first we have (v. 7) the mystery of iniquity," then "the iniquitous one" (v. 8). Doubtless "the apostasy" of Romanism (the abstract) is one of the greatest instances of the working of the mystery of iniquity, and its blasphemous claims for the Pope (the concrete) are forerunners of the final concentration of blasphemy in the man of sin, who shall not merely, as the Pope, usurp God's honour as vicegerent of God, but oppose God openly at last. 4. Daniel 11. 36, 37 is here referred to. The words used there as to Antiochus Epiphanes, St. Paul implies, shall even be more applicable to the man of sin, who is the New Testament actual Antichrist, as Antiochus was the Old Testament typical Antichrist. The previous world-kingsdoms had each one extraordinary person as its representative head and embodiment (thus Babylon had Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel 2. 38, end; Medo-Persia had Cyrus; Greece had Alexander, and Antiochus Epiphanes, the forerunner of Antichrist); so the fourth and last world-kingdom, under which we now live, shall have one final head, the concentrated embodiment of all the sin and lawless iniquity which have been in Pagan and Papal Rome. Rome's final phase will probably be an unholy alliance between idolatrous superstition and godless infidelity. Who opposeth and exalteth himself—There is but one Greek article to both participles, implying that the reason why he opposeth himself is in order that he may exalt himself above, &c. ALFORD takes the former clause absolutely, "He that withstands (CHRIST)," i. e., Antichrist (1 John 2. 18). As at the conclusion of the Old Testament period, Israel apostate allied itself with the heathen world-power against Jesus and His apostles (Luke 23. 12; and at Thessalonica, Acts 17. 5-9), and was in righteous retribution punished by the instrumentality of the world-power itself (Jerusalem being destroyed by Rome), Daniel 9. 26, 27; so the degenerate Church (become an "harlot"), allying itself with the godless world-power (the "beast" of Revelation) against vital religion (i. e., the harlot sitting on the beast), shall be judged by that world-power which shall be finally embodied in Antichrist (Zechariah 13. 8, 9; 14. 2; Revelation 17. 16, 17). In this early Epistle, the apostate Jewish Church as the harlot, and Pagan Rome as the beast, form the historical background on which Paul draws his prophetic sketch of the apostasy. In the Pastoral Epistles, which were later, this prophecy appears in connection with Gnosticism, which had at that time infected the Church. The harlot (the apostate Church) is first to be judged by the beast (the world-power) and its kings (Revelation 17. 16); and afterwards the beasts and their allies (with the personal Antichrist at their head, who seems to rise after the judgment on the harlot, or apostate Church) shall be judged by the coming of Jesus Himself (Revelation 19. 20). Anti-Christian tendencies produce different Antichrists; these separate Antichrists shall hereafter find their consummation in an individual exceeding them all in the intensity of his evil character. [AUBERLEN.] But judgment soon overtakes him. He is necessarily a child of death, immediately after his ascent as the beast out of the bottomless pit going into perdition (Revelation 17. 8, 11). Idolatry of self, spiritual pride, and rebellion against God, are his characteristics; as Christ-worship, humility, and dependence on God, characterize Christianity. He not merely assumes Christ's character (as the "false Christ," Matthew 24. 24), but "opposes" Christ. The Greek implies one situated on an opposite side (cf. 1 John 2. 22; 2

John 7). One who, on the destruction of every religion shall seek to establish his own throne, and for God's great truth, "God is man," to substitute his own lie, "Man is God." [TRENCH.] above all that is called God—(1 Corinthians 8. 5.) The Pope (for instance, Clement VI) has even commanded the angels to admit into Paradise, without the alleged pains of purgatory, certain souls. But still this is only a foreshadowing of the Antichrist, who will not, as the Pope, act in God's name, but against God. or that is worshipped—Rome here again gives a presage of Antichrist. The Greek is Sebasma; and Sebastus is the Greek for Augustus, who was worshipped as the secular ruler and divine vicegerent. The Papacy has risen on the overthrow of Cæsar's power. Antichrist shall exalt himself above every object of worship, whether on earth as the Cæsar, or in heaven as God. The various prefigurations of Antichrist, Mohammed, Rome, Napoleon, and modern infidel secularism, contain only some, not all, his characteristics. It is the union of all in some one person that shall form the full Antichrist, as the union in one Person, Jesus, of all the types and prophecies constituted the full Christ. [OLSHAUSEN.] in the temple of God . . . that he is God—"He will reign a time, times, and half a time" (Daniel 7. 25), i. e., three and a half years, and will sit in the temple at Jerusalem; then the Lord shall come from heaven and cast him into the lake of fire, and shall bring to the saints the times of their reigning, the seventh day of hallowed rest, and give to Abraham the promised inheritance." [IRENÆUS, Adversus Hæreses, 30. 4.] showing himself—with blasphemous and arrogant DISPLAY (cf. a type, Acts 12. 21-23). The earliest Fathers unanimously looked for a personal Antichrist. Two objections exist to Romanism being regarded the Antichrist, though probably Romanism will leave its culmination in him: (1.) So far is Romanism from opposing all that is called God, that adoration of gods and lords many (the Virgin Mary and saints) is a leading feature in it; (2.) the Papacy has existed for more than twelve centuries, and yet Christ is not come, whereas the prophecy regards the final Antichrist as short-lived, and soon going to perdition through the coming of Christ (Revelation 17. 8, 11). Gregory the Great declared against the patriarch of Constantinople, that whosoever should assume the title of "universal bishop" would be "the forerunner of Antichrist." The Papacy fulfilled this his undesigned prophecy. The Pope has been called by his followers, "Our Lord God the Pope;" and at his inauguration in St. Peter's, seated in his chair upon the high altar, which is treated as his footstool, he has vividly foreshadowed him who "exalteth himself above all that is called God." An objection fatal to interpreting the temple of God here as the Church (1 Corinthians 3. 16, 17; 6. 19) is, the apostle would never designate the apostate anti-Christian Church "the temple of God." It is likely that, as Messiah was revealed among the Jews at Jerusalem, so Antimesiah shall appear among them when restored to their own land, and after they have rebuilt their temple at Jerusalem. Thus Daniel 11. 41, 45 (see my notes there), corresponds, "He shall enter the glorious land (Judea), and he shall plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain;" and then (Daniel 12. 1) "Michael, the great prince, shall stand up" to deliver God's people. Cf. Note, Daniel 9. 26, 27. Also the king of Assyria, type of Antichrist (Isaiah 14. 12-14). "Lucifer" (a title of Messiah, assumed by Antichrist, Revelation 22. 16); "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God." "I will sit upon the mount of the congregation (i. e., God's place of meeting His people of old, the temple), in the sides of the north (Psalm 48. 2); I will be like the Most High." Revelation 11. 1, 2, "The temple of God . . . the holy city" (viz., Jerusalem, Matthew 4. 5), cf. Psalm 68. 18, 29, referring to a period since Christ's ascension, therefore not yet fulfilled (Isaiah 2. 1-3; Ezekiel, chs. 40-44.; Zechariah 14. 16-20; Malachi 3. 1). "In the temple of God," implies that it is an internal, not an external, enemy which shall assail the Church. Antichrist shall, the first three and a half years of the prophetic week, keep the covenant, then break it and usurp Divine honours in the midst of the week. Some think Antichrist will be a Jew-

At all events he will, "by flatteries, bring many, not only of the Gentiles, but also of "the tribes" of Israel (so the Greek for "kindreds," Revelation 11. 8, 9), to own him as their long-looked-for Messiah, in the same "city where our Lord was crucified." "Sitteth" here implies his occupying the place of power and majesty in opposition to Him who "sitteth on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Hebrews 1. 3), and who shall come to "sit" there where the usurper had sat (Matthew 26. 64). Note, Daniel 9. 27; Revelation 11. 2, 3, 9, 11. Cf. Ezekiel 28. 2, 3, 6, 9, 10, 13, 14, 16, as to Tyre, the type of Antichrist, characterized by similar blasphemous arrogance. 5. Remember, &c.—Confuting those who represent Paul as having laboured under error as to Christ's immediate coming when writing his first Epistle, and as now correcting that error. I told you—more than once, lit., "I was telling," or "used to tell." 6. now ye know—by my having told you. The power must have been one "known" to the Thessalonians. what withholdeth—that which holds him back; "keeps him in check:" the power that has restrained the man of sin from his full and final development, is the moral and conservative influence of political states [OLSHAUSEN]: the fabric of human polity as a coercive power; as "he who now letteth" refers to those who rule that polity by which the great upbursting of godlessness is kept down. [ALFORD.] The "what withholdeth" refers to the general hindrance; "he who now letteth," to the person in whom that hindrance is summed up. Romanism, as a forerunner of Antichrist, was thus kept in check by the Roman emperor (the then representative of the coercive power) until Constantine, having removed the seat of empire to Constantinople, the Roman bishop by degrees first raised himself to precedency, then to primacy, and then to sole empire above the secular power. The historical fact from which Paul starts in his prediction, was probably the emperor Claudius' expulsion of the Jews, the representative of the anti-Christian adversary in Paul's day, from Rome, thus "withholding" them in some degree in their attacks on Christianity; this suggested the principle holding good to the end of time, and about to find its final fulfilment in the removal of the withholding person or authority, whereupon Antichrist in his worst shape shall start up. that he might be—Greek, "in order that:" ye know that which keeps him back, in God's purposes, from being sooner manifested, "in order that he may be revealed in his own time" (i. e., the time appointed by God to him as his proper time for being manifested), not sooner (cf. Daniel 11. 35). The removal of the withholding power will be when the civil polity, derived from the Roman empire, which is to be, in its last form, divided into ten kingdoms (Revelation 17. 3, 11-13), shall, with its leading representative head for the time being ("he who now letteth," Greek, "withholdeth," as in v. 6), yield to the prevalent godless "lawlessness" with "the lawless one" as its embodiment. The elect Church and the Spirit cannot well be, as DE BURGH suggests, the withholding power meant; for both shall never be wholly "taken out of the way" (Matthew 28. 20). However, the testimony of the elect Church, and the Spirit in her, are the great hindrance to the rise of the apostasy; and it is possible that, though the Lord shall have a faithful few even then, yet the full energy of the Spirit in the visible Church, counteracting the energy or "working" of "the mystery of lawlessness" by the testimony of the elect, shall have been so far "taken out of the way," or set aside, as to admit the manifestation of "the lawless one;" and so DE BURGH's view may be right (Luke 18. 8; Revelation 11. 3-12). This was a power of which the Thessalonians might easily "know" through Paul's instruction. 7. the mystery of iniquity—the counterwork to "the mystery of godliness" (1 Timothy 3. 16). Anti-Christianity latently working, as distinguished from its final open manifestation. "Mystery" in Scripture means, not what remains always a secret, but that which is for a while hidden, but in due time manifested (cf. Ephesians 3. 4, 5). Satan will resort to a mode of opposition more conformed to the then imminent "appearing" and "presence" of the Saviour, and will anticipate Him with a last effort to maintain the dominion of the world [DE BURGH], just as at His first advent he rushed into open opposition, by taking possession of the bodies of men. "Iniquity," Greek, lawlessness; defiant rejection of God's law (cf. Noir, Zechariah 5. 9, 10). "Wickedness" (translated by the LXX. by the same Greek, meaning "lawlessness," which St. Paul employs here), embodied there as a woman, answers to "the mystery of iniquity," here embodied finally in "the man of sin;" as the former was ultimately banished for ever from the Holy Land to her own congenial soil, Babylon, so iniquity and the man of sin shall fall before Michael and the Lord Himself, who shall appear as the Deliverer of His people (Daniel 12. 1-3; Zechariah 14. 3-9). Cf. Matthew 12. 43. The Jewish nation dispossessed of the evil spirit, the demon of idolatry being cast out through the Babylonian captivity, receives ultimately a worse form of the evil spirit, Christ-opposing self-righteousness. Also, the Christian Church in course of time taken possession of by the demon of Romish idolatry, then dispossessed of it by the Reformation, then its house "garnished" by hypocrisy, secularity, and rationalism, but "swept empty" of living faith, then finally apostatizing and repossessed by "the man of sin," and outwardly destroyed for a brief time (though even then Christ shall have witnesses for him among both the Jews, Zechariah 13. 9, and Gentiles, Matthew 28. 20), when Christ shall suddenly come (Daniel 11. 32-45; Luke 18. 7, 8). already—(3 John 9. 10; Colossians 2. 18-23; 1 Timothy 4. 1)—cf. "even now already" (1 John 2. 18; 4. 3) as distinguished from "in his own time" of being revealed hereafter. Antiquity, it appears from hence, is not a justification for unscriptural usages or dogmas, since these were "already," even in Paul's time, beginning to spring up: the written word is the only sure test. "Judaism infecting Christianity is the fuel; the mystery of iniquity is the spark." "It is one and the same impurity diffusing itself over many ages." [BENDEL.] only he who now letteth will let—The italicized words are not in the Greek. Therefore, translate rather, "Only (i. e., the continuance of the MYSTERY of iniquity-working will be only) until he who now withholdeth (the same Greek as in v. 6) be taken out of the way." "Only (waiting, Hebrews 10. 13) until he," &c. Then it will work no longer in mystery, but in open manifestation. 8. Translate, "The lawless one;" the embodiment of all the godless "lawlessness" which has been working in "mystery" for ages (v. 7): "the man of sin" (v. 8). whom the Lord—Some of the oldest MSS. read, "the Lord Jesus." How awful that He whose very name means God-Saviour, should appear as the Destroyer; but the salvation of the Church requires the destruction of her foe. As the reign of Israel in Canaan was ushered in by judgments on the nations for apostasy (for the Canaanites were originally worshippers of the true God: thus Melchisedek, king of Salem, was the "priest of the most high God," Genesis 14. 18; Ammon and Moab came from righteous Lot), so the Son of David's reign in Zion and over the whole earth, is to be ushered in by judgments on the apostate Christian world. consume . . . and . . . destroy—So Daniel 7. 26, "consume and destroy;" Daniel 11. 45. He shall "consume" him by His mere breath (Isaiah 11. 4; 90. 33): the sentence of judgment being the sharp sword that goeth out of His mouth (Revelation 19. 15, 21). Antichrist's manifestation and destruction are declared in the same breath; at his greatest height he is nearest his fall, like Herod his type (Isaiah 1. 24-27; Acts 12. 20-23). As the advancing fire, whilst still at a distance consumes little insects [CHRYSOSTOM] by its mere heat, so Christ's mere approach is enough to consume Antichrist. The mere "appearance of the coming" of the Lord of glory is sufficient to show to Antichrist his perfect nothingness. He is seized and "cast alive into the lake of fire" (Revelation 19. 20). So the world-kingsdoms, and the kingdom of the beast, give place to that of the Son of man and His saints. The Greek for "destroy" means "ABOLISH" (the same Greek is so translated, 2 Timothy 1. 10); i. e., cause every vestige of him to disappear. Cf. as to Gog attacking Israel and destroyed by Jehovah (Ezekiel 38. and 39.), so as not to leave a vestige of him with the brightness of his coming.

Greek, "the manifestation (or appearance) of His presence." the first outburst of His advent—the first gleam of His presence—is enough to abolish utterly all traces of Antichrist, as darkness disappears before the dawning day. Next, his adherents are "slain with the sword out of His mouth" (Revelation 19. 21). BENGEL'S distinction between "the appearance of His coming" and the "coming" itself is not justified by 1 Timothy 6. 14; 2 Timothy 1. 10; 4. 1, 3; Titus 2. 13, where the same Greek for appearing (English Version, here "the brightness") plainly refers to the coming itself. The expression, "manifestation (appearing) of His presence," is used in awful contrast to the revelation of the wicked one in the beginning of the verse. 9. whose coming—The same Greek as was used for the Lord's coming (v. 8) or personal "presence." is—in its essential character, after—according to the working ("energy") of Satan, as opposed to the energy or working of the Holy Spirit in the Church (Note, Ephesians 1. 19). As Christ is related to God, so is Antichrist to Satan, his visible embodiment and manifestation: Satan works through him. Revelation 13. 2, "The dragon gave him (the beast) his power . . . seat . . . great authority." Working wonders—lit., "wonders" or "prodigies of falsehood." His "power, signs, and wonders," all have falsehood for their base, essence, and aim (John 8. 44). [ALFORD.] In Matthew 24. 24 Jesus implies that the miracles shall be real, though demonic, such mysterious effects of the powers of darkness as we read of in the case of the Egyptian sorcerers, not such as Jesus performed in their character, power, or aim; for they are against the revealed Word, and therefore not to be accepted as evidences of truth; nay, on the authority of that sure Word of prophecy (here, and Matthew 24. 24), to be known and rejected as wrought in support of falsehood (Deuteronomy 18. 1-3, 5; Galatians 1. 8, 9; Revelation 13. 11-15; 19. 20). The same three Greek words occur for miracles of Jesus (Acts 2. 22, and Hebrews 2. 4); showing that as the Egyptian magicians imitated Moses (2 Timothy 3. 1-8), so Antichrist tries to imitate Christ's works as a "sign," or proof of divinity. 10. deceitfulness—rather as Greek, "deceit of (to promote) unrighteousness" (v. 12). in—The oldest MSS. and versions omit "in." Translate, "Unto them that are perishing" (2 Corinthians 2. 15, 16; 4. 3): the victims of him whose very name describes his perishing nature, "the son of perdition;" in contrast to you whom (v. 13) "God hath from the beginning chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth." because—lit., "in requital for;" in just retribution for their having no love for the truth which was within their reach (on account of its putting a check on their bad passions), and for their having "pleasure in unrighteousness" (v. 12; Romans 1. 18); they are lost because they loved not, but rejected, the truth which would have saved them. received not—Greek, "welcomed not;" admitted it not cordially. love of the truth—not merely love of truth, but love of the truth (and of Jesus who is the Truth, in opposition to Satan's "lie," v. 9, 11; John 8. 42-44), can save (Ephesians 4. 21). We are required not merely to assent to, but to love the truth (Psalm 119. 97). The Jews rejected Him who came in His Divine Father's name; they will receive Antichrist coming in his own name (John 5. 43). Their pleasant sin shall prove their terrible scourge. 11. for this cause—Because "they received not the love of the truth." The best safeguard against error is "the love of the truth." shall send—Greek, "sends," or "is sending;" the "delusion" is already beginning. God judicially sends hardness of heart on those who have rejected the truth, and gives them up in righteous judgment to Satan's delusions (Isaiah 6. 9, 10; Romans 1. 24-26, 28). They first cast off the love of the truth, then God gives them up to Satan's delusions, then they settle down into "believing the lie." an awful climax (1 Kings 22. 22, 23; Ezekiel 14. 9; Job 12. 16; Matthew 24. 5, 11; 1 Timothy 4. 1). strong delusion—Greek, "the powerful working of error," answering to the energizing "working of Satan" (v. 9); the same expression as is applied to the Holy Ghost's operation in believers: "powerful" or "effectual (energizing) working" (Ephesians 1. 19). believe a lie—rather "the lie"

which Antichrist tells them, appealing to his miracles as proofs of it (v. 9). 12. they all . . . damned—rather as Greek, "that all," &c. He here states the general proposition which applies specially to Antichrist's adherents. Not all in the Church of Rome, or other anti-Christian systems, shall be damned, but only "all who believed not the truth" when offered to them, "but had pleasure in unrighteousness" (Romans 1. 32; 2. 8). Love of unrighteousness being the great obstacle to believing the truth. 13. But—In delightful contrast to the damnation of the lost (v. 12) stands the "salvation" of Paul's converts, are bound—in duty (ch. 1. 3). thanks to God—not to ourselves, your ministers, nor to you, our converts. loved of the Lord—Jesus (Romans 8. 37; Galatians 2. 20; Ephesians 5. 2, 25). Elsewhere God the Father is said to love us (v. 16; John 3. 16; Ephesians 2. 4; Colossians 3. 12). Therefore Jesus and the Father are one. from the beginning—"before the foundation of the world" (Ephesians 1. 4; cf. 1 Corinthians 2. 7; 2 Timothy 1. 9); in contrast to those that shall "worship the beast, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Revelation 13. 8). Some of the oldest MSS. read as English Version, but other oldest MSS. and Vulgate read, "as first-fruits." The Thessalonians were among the first converts in Europe (cf. Romans 16. 5; 1 Corinthians 16. 15). In a more general sense, it occurs in James 1. 18; Revelation 14. 4; so I understand it here including the more restricted sense. chosen you—The Greek is not the ordinary word for "elected," implying His eternal selection; but taken for Himself, implying His having adopted them in His eternal purpose. It is found in the LXX. (Deuteronomy 7. 7; 10. 15). through—rather as Greek, "in sanctification" as the element in which the choice to salvation had place (cf. 1 Peter 1. 2), standing in contrast to the "unrighteousness," the element in which Antichrist's followers are given over by God to damnation (v. 12). of the Spirit—wrought by the Spirit who sanctifies all the elect people of God, first by eternally consecrating them to perfect holiness in Christ once for all, next by progressively imparting it. belief of the truth—contrasted with "believed not the truth" (v. 12). 14. you—The oldest MSS. read, "us." by our Gospel—"through" the Gospel which we preach. to . . . glory—in v. 13 it was "salvation," i. e., deliverance from all evil, of body and soul (1 Thessalonians 5. 9); here it is positive good, even "glory," and that "the glory of our Lord Jesus" Himself, which believers are privileged to share with Him (John 17. 22, 24; Romans 8. 17, 29; 2 Timothy 2. 10). 15. Therefore—God's sovereign choice of believers, so far from being a ground for inaction on their part, is the strongest incentive to action and perseverance in it. Cf. the argument, Philippians 2. 12, 13, "Work out your own salvation, for it is God which worketh in you," &c. We cannot fully explain this in theory; but to the sincere and humble, the practical acting on the principle is plain. "Privilege first, duty afterwards." [EDWARDS.] stand fast—so as not to be "shaken or troubled" (v. 2). hold—so as not to let go. Adding nothing, subtracting nothing. [BENGEL.] The Thessalonians had not held fast his oral instructions, but had suffered themselves to be imposed upon by pretended spirit-revelations, and words and letters pretending to be from Paul (v. 2), to the effect that "the day of the Lord was instantly imminent." traditions—truths delivered and transmitted orally, or in writing (ch. 3. 6; 1 Corinthians 11. 2; Greek, "traditions"). The Greek verb from which the noun comes, is used by Paul, 1 Corinthians 11. 23; 15. 3. From the three passages in which "tradition" is used in a good sense, Rome has argued for her accumulation of uninspired traditions, virtually overriding God's word, whilst put forward as of co-ordinate authority with it. She forgets the ten passages (Matthew 15. 2, 3, 6; Mark 7. 3, 8, 9, 13; Galatians 1. 14; Colossians 2. 8) stigmatizing man's uninspired traditions. Not even the apostles' sayings were all inspired (e. g., Peter's dissimulation, Galatians 2. 11-14) but only when they claimed to be so, as in their words afterwards embodied in their canonical writings. Or inspiration was necessary in their case, until the canon of the written Word should be complete; they proved their possession of inspiration by miracles wrought in support of the new revelation, which revelation, moreover, accorded with the existing Old Testament revelation; an additional test needed besides miracles (cf. Deuteronomy 18. 1-6; Acts 17. 11). When the canon was complete, the infallibility of the living men was transferred to the written Word, now the sole unerring guide, interpreted by the Holy Spirit. Little else has come down to us by the most ancient and universal tradition save this, the all-sufficiency of Scripture for salvation. Therefore, by tradition, we are constrained to cast off all tradition not contained in, or not provable by, Scripture. The Fathers are valuable witnesses to historical facts, which give force to the intimations of Scripture: such as the Christian Lord's day, the baptism of infants, and the genuineness of the canon of Scripture. Tradition (in the sense human testimony) cannot establish a doctrine, but can authenticate a fact, such as the facts just mentioned. Inspired tradition, in St. Paul's sense, is not a supplementary oral tradition completing our written Word, but it is identical with the written Word now complete; then the latter not being complete, the tradition was necessarily in part oral, in part written, and continued so until, the latter being complete before the death of St. John, the last apostle, the former was no longer needed. Scripture is, according to Paul, the complete and sufficient rule in all that appertains to making "the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Timothy 3. 16, 17). It is by leaving St. Paul's God-inspired tradition for human traditions that Rome has become the forerunner and parent of the Antichrist. It is striking that, from this very chapter denouncing Antichrist, she should draw an argument for her "traditions" by which she fosters anti-Christianity. Because the apostles' oral word was as trustworthy as their written word, it by no means follows that the oral word of those not apostles is as trustworthy as the written word of those who were apostles or inspired evangelists. No tradition of the apostles except their written word, can be proved genuine on satisfactory evidence. We are no more bound to accept implicitly the Fathers' interpretations of Scripture, because we accept the Scripture canon on their testimony, than we are bound to accept the Jews' interpretation of the Old Testament, because we accept the Old Testament canon on their testimony. our Epistle—as distinguished from a "letter as from us," v. 2, viz., that purports to be from us, but is not. He refers to his first Epistle to the Thessalonians. 16, 17. himself—by His own might, as contrasted with our feebleness; ensuring the efficacy of our prayer. Here our Lord Jesus stands first; in 1 Thessalonians 3. 11, "God our Father," which . . . loved us—in the work of our redemption. Referring both to our Lord Jesus (Romans 8. 37; Galatians 2. 20) and God our Father (John 3. 16), everlasting consolation—Not transitory, as worldly consolations in trials (Romans 8. 38, 39). This for all time present, and then "good hope" for the future. [ALFORD.] through grace—rather as Greek, "in grace;" to be joined to "hath given." Grace is the element in which the gift was made. comfort your hearts—unsettled as you have been through those who announced the immediate coming of the Lord. good word and work—The oldest MSS. invert the order, "work and word." Establishment in these were what the young converts at Thessalonica needed, not fanatical teaching (cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 58).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-18. HE ASKS THEIR PRAYERS: HIS CONFIDENCE IN THEM: PRAYER FOR THEM: CHARGES AGAINST DISORDERLY IDLE CONDUCT; HIS OWN EXAMPLE: CONCLUDING PRAYER AND SALUTATION. 1. Finally—lit., "As to what remains." may have free course—lit., "may run;" spread rapidly without a drag on the wheels of its course. That the new-creating word may "run" as "swiftly" as the creative word at the first (Psalm 147. 15). The opposite to the word of God being "bound" (2 Timothy 2. 9). glori-

fed—by sinners accepting it (Acts 18. 48; Galatians 1. 20-24). Contrast "evil spoken of" (1 Peter 4. 14). as it is with you—(1 Thessalonians 1. 6; 4. 10; 5. 11.) 2. that we . . . be delivered from unreasonable . . . men—lit., men out of place, inept, unseemly: out of the way bad: more than ordinarily bad. An undesigned coincidence with Acts 18. 5-9. Paul was now at Corinth, where THE JEWS "opposed themselves" to his preaching: in answer to his prayers and those of his converts at Thessalonica and elsewhere, "the Lord, in vision," assured him of exemption from "the hurt," and of success in bringing in "much people." On the unreasonable, out-of-the-way perversity of the Jews, as known to the Thessalonians, see 1 Thessalonians 2. 15, 16. have not faith—or as Greek, "the faith" of the Christian: the only antidote to what is "unreasonable and wicked." The Thessalonians, from their ready acceptance of the Gospel (1 Thessalonians 1. 5, 6), might think "all" would similarly receive it; but the Jews were far from having such a readiness to believe the truth. 3. faithful—alluding to "faith" (v. 2); though many will not believe, the Lord (other very old MSS. read "God") is still to be believed in as faithful to His promises (1 Thessalonians 5. 24; 2 Timothy 2. 13). Faith on the part of man, answers to faithfulness on the part of God. establish you—as he had prayed (ch. 2. 17). Though it was on himself that wicked men were making their onset, he turns away from asking the Thessalonians' prayers for his deliverance (v. 2: so unselfish was he, even in religion), to express his assurance of THEIR establishment in the faith, and preservation from evil. This assurance thus exactly answers to his prayer for them, ch. 2. 17, "Our Lord . . . establish you in every good word and work." He has before his mind the Lord's Prayer, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil:" where, as here, the translation may be, "from the evil one:" the great hinderer of "every good word and work." Cf. Matthew 18. 19, "the wicked one." 4. we have confidence in the Lord—as "faithful" (v. 3). Have confidence in no man when left to himself. [BENGEL.] that ye both do—Some of the oldest MSS. insert a clause, "That ye both have done" before, "and are doing, and will do." He means the majority by "ye," not all of them (cf. v. 11; ch. 1. 8; 1 Thessalonians 3. 6). 5. If "the Lord" be here the Holy Ghost (2 Corinthians 8. 17), the three Persons of the Trinity will occur in this verse. love of God—love to God. patient waiting for Christ—rather as Greek, "the patience (endurance) of Christ," viz., which Christ showed [ALFORD] (ch. 2. 4; 1 Thessalonians 1. 8). ESTIUS, however, supports English Version (cf. Revelation 1. 9; 3. 10). At all events, this grace, "patience," or persevering endurance, is connected with the "hope" (1 Thessalonians 1. 3, 10) of Christ's coming. In ALFORD'S translation we may compare Hebrews 12. 1, 2, "Run with patience (endurance) . . . looking to JESUS . . . who, for the joy that was before Him, endured the cross:" so we are to endure, as looking for the hope to be realized at His coming (Hebrews 10. 38, 37). 6. we command you—Hereby he puts to a particular test their obedience in general to his commands, which obedience he had recognized in v. 4. withdraw—lit., to furl the sails: as we say, to steer clear of (cf. v. 14). Some had given up labour as though the Lord's day was immediately coming. He had enjoined mild censure of such in 1 Thessalonians 5. 14, "Warn . . . the unruly;" but now that the mischief had become more confirmed, he enjoins stricter discipline, viz., withdrawal from their company (cf. 1 Corinthians 5. 11; 2 John 10. 11): not a formal sentence of excommunication, such as was subsequently passed on more heinous offenders, as in 1 Corinthians 5. 5; 1 Timothy 1. 20). He says "brother," i. e., professing Christian; for in the case of unprofessing heathen, believers needed not be so strict (1 Corinthians 5. 10-13). disorderly—St. Paul plainly would not have sanctioned the order of Mendicant Friars, who reduce such a "disorderly" and lazy life to a system. Call it not an order, but a burden to the community (BENGEL, alluding to the Greek, v. 8, for "be chargeable," lit., be a burden). the tradition—the oral instruction which he had given to them when present (v. 10), and subsequently committed to writing (1 Thessalonians 4. 11

12). which he received of us—Some oldest MSS. read, "Ye received;" others, "they received." The English Version reading has no very old authority. 7. how ye ought to follow us—how ye ought to live so as to "imitate" (so the Greek for "follow") us (cf. Note, 1 Corinthians 11. 1; 1 Thessalonians 1. 8). 8. eat any man's bread—(Greek, "eat bread from any man," i. e., live at any one's expense. Contrast v. 12, "Eat THEIR OWN bread." wrought—(Acts 20. 24.) In both Epistles they state they maintained themselves by labour; but in this second Epistle they do so in order to offer themselves herein as an example to the idle; whereas, in the first, their object in doing so is to vindicate themselves from all imputation of mercenary motives in preaching the Gospel (1 Thessalonians 2. 5, 9). [EDMUNDS.] They preached gratuitously, though they might have claimed maintenance from their converts. labour and travail—"toil and hardship" (Note, 1 Thessalonians 2. 9). night and day—Scarcely allowing time for repose. chargeable—Greek, "a burden," or "burdensome." The Philippians did not regard it as a burden to contribute to his support (Philippians 4. 15, 16), sending to him whilst he was in this very Thessalonica (Acts 16. 15, 34, 40). Many Thessalonians, doubtless, would have felt it a privilege to contribute, but as he saw some idlers among them who would have made a pretext of his example to justify themselves, he waived his right. His reason for the same course at Corinth was to mark how different were his aims from those of the false teachers who sought their own lucre (2 Corinthians 11. 9, 12, 13). It is at the very time and place of writing these Epistles that Paul is expressly said to have wrought at tent-making with Aquila (Acts 18. 3); an undesigned coincidence. 9. (1 Corinthians 9. 4-6, &c.; Galatians 6. 6.) 10. For even—translate, "For also." We not only set you the example, but gave a positive "command." commanded—Greek imperfect, "We were commanding;" we kept charge of you. would not work—Greek, "is unwilling to work." BENGEL makes this to be the argument: not that such a one is to have his food withdrawn from him by others; but he proves from the necessity of eating the necessity of working; using this pleasantry, Let him who will not work show himself an angel, i. e., do without food as the angels do (but since he cannot do without food, then he ought to be not unwilling to work). It seems to me simpler to take it as a punishment of the idle. Paul often quotes good adages current among the people, stamping them with inspired approval. In the Hebrew, Bereshith Rabba, the same saying is found; and in the book Zeror, "He who will not work before the sabbath, must not eat on the sabbath." 11. busybodies—In the Greek the similarity of sound marks the antithesis, "Doing none of their own business, yet overdoing in the business of others." Busy about every one's business but their own. "Nature abhors a vacuum;" so if not doing one's own business, one is apt to meddle with his neighbour's business. Idleness is the parent of busybodies (1 Timothy 5. 13). Contrast 1 Thessalonians 4. 11. 12. by—The oldest MSS. read, "IN the Lord Jesus." So the Greek, 1 Thessalonians

4. 1, implying the sphere wherein such conduct is appropriate and consistent. "We exhort you thus, as ministers IN Christ, exhorting our people IN Christ." with quietness—quiet industry; laying aside restless, bustling, intermeddling officiousness (v. 11). their own—Bread earned by themselves, not another's bread (v. 8). 13. be not weary—The oldest MSS. read, "Be not cowardly in;" do not be wanting in strenuousness in doing well. EDMUNDS explains it, Do not culpably neglect to do well, viz., with patient industry to do your duty in your several callings. In contrast to the "disorderly, not-working busybodies" (v. 11; cf. Galatians 6. 9). 14. note that man—mark him in your own mind as one to be avoided (v. 6). that he may be ashamed—Greek, "made to turn and look into himself, and so be put to shame." Feeling himself shunned by godly brethren, he may become ashamed of his course. 15. admonish him as a brother—not yet excommunicated (cf. Leviticus 19. 17). Do not shun him in contemptuous silence, but tell him why he is so avoided (Matthew 18. 15; 1 Thessalonians 5. 14). 16. Lord of peace—Jesus Christ. The same title is given to Him as to the Father, "the God of peace" (Romans 15. 33; 16. 20; 2 Corinthians 13. 11). An appropriate title in the prayer here, where the harmony of the Christian community was liable to interruption from the "disorderly." The Greek article requires the translation, "Give you the peace" which it is "His to give." "Peace" outward and inward, here and hereafter (Romans 14. 17). always—unbroken, not changing with outward circumstances. by all means—Greek, "in every way." Most of the oldest MSS. read, "In every place;" thus he prays for their peace in all times ("always") and places. Lord be with you all—May He bless you not only with peace, but also with His presence (Matthew 28. 20). Even the disorderly brethren (cf. v. 15, "a brother") are included in this prayer. 17. The Epistle was written by an amanuensis (perhaps Silas or Timothy), and only the closing salutation written by Paul's "own hand" (cf. Romans 16. 22; 1 Corinthians 16. 21; Colossians 4. 18). Wherever Paul does not subjoin this autograph salutation, we may presume he wrote the whole Epistle himself (Galatians 6. 11). which—which autograph salutation. the token—to distinguish genuine Epistles from spurious ones put forth in my name (ch. 2. 2). in every Epistle—Some think he signed his name to every Epistle with his own hand; but as there is no trace of this in any MSS. of all the Epistles, it is more likely that he alludes to his writing with his own hand in closing every Epistle, even in those Epistles (Romans, 2 Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians) wherein he does not specify his having done so. so I write—so I sign my name: this is a specimen of my handwriting, by which to distinguish my genuine letters from forgeries. 18. He closes every Epistle by praying for GRACE to those whom he addresses. Amen—Omitted in the oldest MSS. It was doubtless the response of the congregation after hearing the Epistle read publicly; hence it crept into copies. The Subscription is spurious, as the Epistle was written not "from Athens," but from Corinth.

THE PASTORAL EPISTLES OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY AND TITUS.

INTRODUCTION.

GENUINENESS.—The ancient Church never doubted of their being canonical and written by St. Paul. They are in the Peshito-Syriac version of the second century. MURATORI'S Fragment on the Canon of Scripture, at the close of the second century, acknowledges them as such. IRENÆUS, Adversus Hæreses, 1. and 3. 3. 3; 4. 16. 3; 2. 14. 8; 8. 11. 1; 1. 13. 3, quotes 1 Timothy 1. 4, 9; 6. 20; 2 Timothy 4. 9-11; Titus 3. 10. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata, 2. 457; 3. 534 535; 1. 350, quotes 1 Timothy 4. 1, 20; 2 Timothy, as to deaconesses. Titus, 1. 12. TERTULLIAN, De præscriptione Hæreticorum, 23, and 6, quotes 1 Timothy 6. 20; 2 Timothy 1. 14; 1 Timothy 1. 18; 6. 13, &c.; 2 Timothy 2. 2; Titus 3. 10, 11 and Adversus Marcion. EUSEBIUS includes the three in the "universally acknowledged" Scriptures. Also THROPT

I TIMOTHY.

ILUS OF ANTIOCH (ad Antiochens, 3, 14), quotes 1 Timothy 2, 1, 2; Titus 3, 1, and CAIUS (in EUSEBIUS, Eccelesiastical History, 6, 20) recognizes their authenticity. CLEMENT OF ROME, in the end of the first century, in his first Epistle to Corinthians, ch. 29., quotes 1 Timothy 2, 8. IGNATIUS, in the beginning of the second century, in Epistle to Polycarp, sec. 6, alludes to 2 Timothy 2, 4. POLYCARP, in the beginning of the second century (Epistle to Philipppians, ch. 4.), alludes to 2 Timothy 2, 4; and in ch. 9. to 2 Timothy 4, 10. HEGESIPPUS, in the end of the second century, in EUSEBIUS, Eccelesiastical History, 3, 32, alludes to 1 Timothy 6, 3, 20. ATHENAGORAS, in the end of the second century, alludes to 1 Timothy 6, 16. JUSTIN MARTYR, in the middle of the second century (Dialogue contra Tryphonen, 47), alludes to Titus 3, 4. The Gnostic MARCION alone rejected these Epistles.

THE HERESIES OPPOSED in them form the transition stage from Judaism, in its ascetic form, to Gnosticism, as subsequently developed. The references to Judaism and legalism are clear (1 Timothy 1, 7; 4, 3; Titus 1, 10, 14; 3, 9). Traces of beginning Gnosticism are also unequivocal (1 Timothy 1, 4). The Gnostic theory of a twofold principle from the beginning, evil as well as good, appears in germ in 1 Timothy 4, 3, &c. In 1 Timothy 6, 20 the term Gnosis ("science") itself occurs. Another Gnostic error, viz., that "the resurrection is past," is alluded to in 2 Timothy 2, 17, 18. The Judaism herein opposed is not that of the earlier Epistles, which upheld the law and tried to join it with faith in Christ for justification. It first passed into that phase of it which appears in the Epistle to the Colossians, whereby will-worship and angel-worship were superadded to Judaizing opinions. Then a further stage of the same evil appears in the Epistle to the Philipppians 3, 2, 18, 19, whereby immoral practice accompanied false doctrine as to the resurrection (cf. 2 Timothy 2, 18, with 1 Corinthians 15, 12, 32, 33). This descent from legality to superstition, and from superstition to godlessness, appears more matured in the references to it in these Pastoral Epistles. The false teachers now know not the true use of the law (1 Timothy 1, 7, 8), and further, have put away good conscience as well as the faith (1 Timothy 1, 19; 4, 2); speak lies in hypocrisy, are corrupt in mind, and regard godliness as a means of earthly gain (1 Timothy 6, 5; Titus 1, 11); overthrow the faith by heresies eating as a canker, saying the resurrection is past (2 Timothy 2, 17, 18), leading captive silly women, ever learning yet never knowing the truth, reprobate as Jannes and Jambres (2 Timothy 3, 6, 8), defiled, unbelieving, professing to know God, but in works denying Him, abominable, disobedient, reprobate (Titus 1, 15, 16). This description accords with that in the Catholic Epistles of St. John and St. Peter, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews. This fact proves the later date of these Pastoral Epistles as compared with Paul's earlier Epistles. The Judaism reprobated herein is not that of an earlier date, so scrupulous as to the law; it was now tending to immorality of practice. On the other hand, the Gnosticism opposed in these Epistles is not the anti-Judaic Gnosticism of a later date, which arose as a consequence of the overthrow of Judaism by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, but it was the intermediate phase between Judaism and Gnosticism, in which the Oriental and Greek elements of the latter were in a kind of amalgam with Judaism, just prior to the overthrow of Jerusalem.

THE DIRECTIONS AS TO CHURCH GOVERNORS and ministers, "bishop-elders, and deacons," are such as were natural for the apostle, in prospect of his own approaching removal, to give to Timothy, the president of the Church at Ephesus, and to Titus, holding the same office in Crete, for securing the due administration of the Church when he should be no more, and at a time when heresies were rapidly springing up. Cf. his similar anxiety in his address to the Ephesian elders (Acts 20, 21-30). The Presbyterate (elders; priest is a contraction from presbyter) and Diaconate had existed from the earliest times in the Church (Acts 6, 3; 11, 30; 14, 23). Timothy and Titus, as superintendents or overseers (so bishop subsequently meant), were to exercise the same power in ordaining elders at Ephesus which the apostle had exercised in his general supervision of all the Gentile churches.

THE PECULIARITIES OF MODES OF THOUGHT AND EXPRESSION, are such as the difference of subject and circumstances of those addressed and those spoken of in these Epistles, as compared with the other Epistles, would lead us to expect. Some of these peculiar phrases occur also in Galatians, in which, as in the Pastoral Epistles, he, with his characteristic fervour, attacks the false teachers. Cf. 1 Timothy 2, 6; Titus 2, 14, "Gave Himself for us," with Galatians 1, 4; 1 Timothy 1, 17; 2 Timothy 4, 18, "For ever and ever," with Galatians 1, 5: "Before God," 1 Timothy 5, 21; 6, 13; 2 Timothy 2, 14; 4, 1, with Galatians 1, 20: "A pillar," 1 Timothy 3, 15, with Galatians 2, 9: "Mediator," 1 Timothy 2, 5, with Galatians 3, 20: "In due season," Galatians 6, 9, with 1 Timothy 2, 6; 6, 15; Titus 1, 3.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—The First Epistle to Timothy was written not long after Paul had left Ephesus for Macedonia (ch. 1, 3). Now, as Timothy was in Macedonia with Paul (2 Corinthians 1, 1) on the occasion of Paul's having passed from Ephesus into that country, as recorded Acts 19, 22; 20, 1, whereas the First Epistle to Timothy contemplates a longer stay of Timothy in Ephesus, MOSHEIM supposes that Paul was nine months of the "three years" stay mostly at Ephesus (Acts 20, 31) in Macedonia, and elsewhere [perhaps Crete], (the mention of only "three months" and "two years," Acts 19, 8, 10, favours this, the remaining nine months being spent elsewhere); and that during these nine months Timothy, in Paul's absence, superintended the Church of Ephesus. It is not likely that Ephesus and the neighbouring churches should have been left long without church officers and church organization, rules respecting which are given in this Epistle. Moreover, Timothy was still "a youth" (1 Timothy 4, 12), which he could hardly be called after Paul's first imprisonment, when he must have been at least thirty-four years of age. Lastly, in Acts 20, 25, St. Paul asserts his knowledge that the Ephesians should not all see his face again, so that 1 Timothy 1, 3 will thus refer to his sojourn at Ephesus, recorded in Acts 19, 10, whence he passed into Macedonia. But the difficulty is to account for the false teachers having sprung up almost immediately (according to this theory) after the foundation of the Church. However, his visit recorded Acts 19, was not his first visit. The beginning of the Church at Ephesus was probably made at his visit a year before (Acts 18, 19-21). Apollos, Aquila and Priscilla, carried on the work (Acts 18, 24-26). Thus, as to the sudden growth of false teachers, there was time enough for their springing up, especially considering that the first converts at Ephesus were under Apollos' imperfect Christian teachings at first, imbued as he was likely to be with the tenets of Philo of Alexandria, Apollos' native town, combined with John the Baptist's Old Testament teachings (Acts 18, 24-26). Besides Ephesus, from its position in Asia, its notorious voluptuousness and sorcery (Acts 19, 18, 19), and its lewd worship of Diana (answering to the Phœnician Ashtoreth), was likely from the first to tinge Christianity in some of its converts with Oriental speculations and Asiatic licentiousness of practices. Thus the phenomenon of the phase of error presented in this Epistle, being intermediate between Judaism and later Gnosticism (see above), would be such as might occur at an early period in the Ephesian Church, as well as later when we know it had open "apostles" of error (Revelation 2, 2, 6), and Nicolaitans infamous in practice. As to the close connection between this First Epistle and the Second Epistle (which must have been written at the close of Paul's life), on which ALFORD relies for his theory of making the First Epistle also written at the close of St. Paul's life, the similarity of circumstances, the person addressed being one and the same, and either in Ephesus at the time

er at least connected with Ephesus as its church-overseer, and having heretics to contend with of the same stamp as in the First Epistle, would account for the connection. There is not so great identity of tone as to compel us to adopt the theory that some years could not have elapsed between the two Epistles.

However, all these arguments against the later date may be answered. This First Epistle may refer not to the first organization of the Church under its bishops, or elders and deacons, but to the moral qualifications laid down at a later period for those officers when scandals rendered such directions needful. Indeed, the object for which he left Timothy at Ephesus he states (1 Timothy 1. 3) to be, not to organize the Church for the first time, but to restrain the false teachers. The directions as to the choice of fit elders and deacons refers to the filling up of vacancies, not to their first appointment. The fact of there existing an institution for Church widows implies an established organization. As to Timothy's "youth," it may be spoken of comparatively young compared with Paul, now "the aged" (Philemon 9), and with some of the Ephesian elders, senior to Timothy their overseer. As to Acts 20. 25, we know not but that "all" of the elders of Ephesus called to Miletus "never saw Paul's face" afterwards, as he "knew" (doubtless by inspiration) would be the case, which obviates the need of ALFORD'S lax view, that Paul was wrong in this his positive inspired anticipation (for such it was, not a mere boding surmise as to the future). Thus he probably visited Ephesus again (1 Timothy 1. 3; 2 Timothy 1. 18; 4. 20, he would hardly have been at Miletum, so near Ephesus, without visiting Ephesus) after his first imprisonment in Rome, though all the Ephesian elders whom he had addressed formerly at Miletus did not again see him. The general similarity of subject and style, and of the state of the Church between the two Epistles, favours the view that they were near one another in date. Also, against the theory of the early date is the difficulty of defining, when, during Paul's two or three years' stay at Ephesus, we can insert an absence of Paul from Ephesus long enough for the requirements of the case, which imply a lengthened stay and superintendence of Timothy at Ephesus (see, however, 1 Timothy 3. 14, on the other side) after having been "left" by Paul there. Timothy did not stay there when Paul left Ephesus (Acts 19. 22; 20. 1; 2 Corinthians 1. 1). (In 1 Timothy 3. 14, Paul says, "I write, hoping to come unto thee shortly;" but on the earlier occasion of his passing from Ephesus to Macedon he had no such expectation, but had planned to spend the summer in Macedon, and the winter in Corinth, 1 Corinthians 16. 6. The expression "THU I come," &c., 1 Timothy 4. 13, implies that Timothy was not to leave his post till Paul should arrive; this and the former objection, however, do not hold good against MOSHEIM'S theory.) Moreover, Paul in his farewell address to the Ephesian elders prophetically anticipates the rise of false teachers hereafter of their own selves; therefore this First Epistle, which speaks of their actual presence at Ephesus, would naturally seem to be not prior, but subsequent, to the address, i. e., will belong to the later date assigned. In the Epistle to the Ephesians no notice is taken of the Judæo-Gnostic errors, which would have been noticed had they been really in existence; however, they are alluded to in the contemporaneous sister Epistle to Colossians (Colossians 2).

Whatever doubt must always remain as to the date of the First Epistle, there can be hardly any as to that of the Second Epistle. In 2 Timothy 4. 13, Paul directs Timothy to bring the books and cloak which the apostle had left at Troas. Assuming that the visit to Troas referred to is the one mentioned in Acts 20. 5-7, it will follow that the cloak and parchments lay for about seven years at Troas, that being the time that elapsed between the visit and Paul's first imprisonment at Rome: a very unlikely supposition, that he should have left either unused for so long. Again, when, during his first Roman imprisonment, he wrote to the Colossians (Colossians 4. 14) and Philemon (Philemon 24), Demas was with him; but when he was writing 2 Timothy 4. 10, Demas had forsaken him from love of this world and gone to Thessalonica. Again, when he wrote to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon, he had good hopes of a speedy liberation; but here in 2 Timothy 4. 6-8, he anticipates immediate death, having been at least once already tried (2 Timothy 4. 16). Again, he is in this Epistle represented as in closer confinement than he was when writing those former Epistles in his first imprisonment (even in the Philippians, which represent him in greater uncertainty as to his life, he cherished the hope of soon being delivered, Philippians 2. 24; 2 Timothy 1. 16-18; 2. 9; 4. 6-8, 16). Again (2 Timothy 4. 20), he speaks of having left Trophimus sick at Miletum. This could not have been on the occasion, Acts 20. 15. For Trophimus was with Paul at Jerusalem shortly afterwards (Acts 21. 29). Besides, he would thus be made to speak of an event six or seven years after its occurrence, as a recent event: moreover, Timothy was, on that occasion of the apostle being at Miletum, with Paul, and therefore needed not to be informed of Trophimus' sickness there (Acts 20. 4-17). Also, the statement (ch. 4. 20), "Erastus abode at Corinth," implies that St. Paul had shortly before been at Corinth, and left Erastus there; but Paul had not been at Corinth for several years before his first imprisonment, and in the interval Timothy had been with him, so that he did not need to write subsequently about that visit. He must therefore have been liberated after his first imprisonment (indeed, Hebrews 13. 23, 24, expressly proves that the writer was in Italy and at liberty), and resumed his apostolic journeyings, and been imprisoned at Rome again, whence shortly before his death he wrote Second Timothy.

EUSEBIUS, Chronicles, anno 2083 (beginning October, A. D. 67), says, "Nero, to his other crimes, added the persecution of Christians: under him the apostles Peter and Paul consummated their martyrdom at Rome." So JEROME, Catalogus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, "In the fourteenth year of Nero, Paul was beheaded at Rome for Christ's sake, on the same day as Peter, and was buried on the Ostian Road, in the thirty-seventh year after the death of our Lord." ALFORD reasonably conjectures the Pastoral Epistles were written near this date. The interval was possibly filled up (so CLEMENT OF ROME states that Paul preached as far as "to the extremity of the west") by a journey to Spain (Romans 15. 24, 28), according to his own original intention. MURATORI'S Fragment on the Canon (about 170 A. D.) also alleges Paul's journey into Spain. So EUSEBIUS, CHRYSOSTOM, and JEROME. Be that as it may, he seems shortly before his second imprisonment to have visited Ephesus, where a new body of elders governed the Church (Acts 20. 25), say in the latter end of 66 A. D., or beginning of 67. Supposing him thirty at his conversion, he would now be upwards of sixty, and older in constitution than in years, through continual hardship. Even four years before he called himself "Paul the aged" (Philemon 9).

From Ephesus he went into Macedonia (1 Timothy 1. 3). He may have written the First Epistle to Timothy from that country. But his use of "went," not "came," in 1 Timothy 1. 3, "When I went into Macedonia," implies he was not there when writing. Wherever he was, he writes uncertain how long he may be detained from coming to Timothy (1 Timothy 3. 14, 15). BRKS shows the probability that he wrote from Corinth, between which city and Ephesus the communication was rapid and easy. His course, as on both former occasions, was from Macedon to Corinth. He finds a coincidence between 1 Timothy 2. 11-14, and 1 Corinthians 14. 34, as to women being silent in Church: and 1 Timothy 5. 17, 18, and 1 Corinthians 9. 8-10, as to the maintenance of ministers, on the same principle as the Mosaic law, that the ox should not be muzzled that treadeth out the corn; and 1 Timothy 5. 19, 20, and 2 Corinthians 13. 1-4, as to charges.

against elders. It would be natural for the apostle in the very place where these directions had been enforced, to reproduce them in his letter.

The date of the Epistle to Titus must depend on that assigned to First Timothy, with which it is connected in subject, phraseology and tone. There is no difficulty in the Epistle to Titus, viewed by itself, in assigning it to the earlier date, viz., before Paul's first imprisonment. In Acts 18, 18, 19, Paul, in journeying from Coriuth to Palestine, for some cause or other landed at Ephesus. Now we find (Titus 2, 13) that Apollos in going from Ephesus to Corinth was to touch at Orete (which seems to coincide with Apollos' journey from Ephesus to Corinth, recorded Acts 18, 24, 27; 19, 1); therefore it is not unlikely that Paul may have taken Crete similarly on his way between Corinth and Ephesus; or, perhaps been driven out of his course to it in one of his three shipwrecks spoken of in 2 Coriuthians 11, 25, 26; this will account for his taking Ephesus on his way from Corinth to Palestine, though out of his regular course. At Ephesus Paul may have written the Epistle to Titus [HUG]; there he probably met Apollos, and gave the Epistle to Titus to his charge, before his departure for Coriuth by way of Crete, and before the apostle's departure for Jerusalem (Acts 18, 19-21, 24). Moreover, on Paul's way back from Jerusalem and Antioch, he travelled some time in Upper Asia (Acts 19, 1), and it was then, probably, that his intention to "winter at Nicopolis" was realized, there being a town of that name between Antioch and Tarsus, lying on Paul's route to Galatia (Titus 2, 12). Thus, First Timothy will, in this theory, be placed two and a half years later (Acts 20, 1; cf. 1 Timothy 1, 3).

ALFORD's argument for classing the Epistle to Titus with First Timothy, as written after Paul's first Roman imprisonment, stands or falls with his argument for assigning First Timothy to that date. Indeed, HUG's unobjectionable argument for the earlier date of the Epistle to Titus, favours the early date assigned to First Timothy, which is so much akin to it, if other arguments be not thought to counterbalance this. The Church of Crete had been just founded (Titus 1, 5), and yet the same heresies are censured in it as in Ephesus, which shows that no argument, such as ALFORD alleges against the earlier date of First Timothy, can be drawn from them (Titus 1, 10, 11, 15, 16; 3, 9, 11). But vice versa, if, as seems likely from the arguments adduced, the First Epistle to Timothy be assigned to the later date, the Epistle to Titus must, from similarity of style, belong to the same period. ALFORD traces Paul's last journey before his second imprisonment thus: To Crete (Titus 1, 5), Miletus (2 Timothy 4, 20), Colosse (fulfilling his intention, Philemon 22), Ephesus (1 Timothy 1, 3; 2 Timothy 1, 18), from which neighbourhood he wrote the Epistle to Titus; Troas, Macedonia, Corinth (2 Timothy 4, 20), Nicopolis (Titus 2, 12) in Epirus, where he had intended to winter; a place in which, as being a Roman colony, he would be free from tumultuary violence, and yet would be more open to a direct attack from foes in the metropolis, Rome. Being known in Rome as the leader of the Christians, he was probably [ALFORD] arrested as implicated in causing the fire in 64 A. D., attributed by Nero to the Christians, and was sent to Rome by the Duumvirs of Nicopolis. There he was imprisoned as a common malefactor (2 Timothy 2, 9); his Asiatic friends deserted him, except Onesiphorus (2 Timothy 1, 16). Demas, Cresceus, and Titus, left him. Tychicus he had sent to Ephesus. Luke alone remained with him (2 Timothy 4, 10-12). Under these circumstances he writes the Second Epistle to Timothy, most likely whilst Timothy was at Ephesus (2 Timothy 2, 17; cf. 1 Timothy 1, 20; 2 Timothy 4, 13), begging him to come to him before winter (2 Timothy 4, 21), and anticipating his own execution soon (2 Timothy 4, 6). Tychicus was perhaps the bearer of the Second Epistle (2 Timothy 4, 12). His defence was not made before the emperor, for the latter was then in Greece (2 Timothy 4, 16, 17). Tradition represents that he died by the sword, which accords with the fact that his Roman citizenship would exempt him from torture; probably late in 67 A. D., or 68 A. D., the last year of Nero.

Timothy is first mentioned, Acts 16, 1, as dwelling in Lystra (not Derbe, cf. Acts 20, 4). His mother was a Jewess named Eunice (2 Timothy 1, 5); his father, "a Greek" (i. e., a Gentile). As Timothy is mentioned as "a disciple" in Acts 16, 1, he must have been converted before, and this by St. Paul (1 Timothy 1, 2), probably at his former visit to Lystra (Acts 14, 6); at the same time, probably, that his Scripture-loving mother, Eunice, and grandmother, Lois, were converted to Christ from Judaism (2 Timothy 3, 14, 15). Not only the good report given as to him by the brethren of Lystra, but also his origin, partly Jewish, partly Gentile, adapted him specially for being St. Paul's assistant in missionary work, labouring as the apostle did in each place, firstly among the Jews, and then among the Gentiles. In order to obviate Jewish prejudices, he first circumcised him. He seems to have accompanied Paul in his tour through Macedonia; but when the apostle went forward to Athens, Timothy and Silas remained in Berea. Having been sent back by Paul to visit the Thessalonian Church (1 Thessalonians 3, 2), he brought his report of it to the apostle at Corinth (1 Thessalonians 3, 6). Hence we find his name joined with St. Paul's in the addresses of both the Epistles to Thessalonians, which were written at Coriuth. We again find him "ministering to" St. Paul during the lengthened stay at Ephesus (Acts 19, 22). Thence he was sent before Paul into Macedonia and to Corinth (1 Corinthians 4, 17; 16, 10). He was with Paul when he wrote the Second Epistle to Coriuthians (2 Corinthians 1, 1); and the following winter in Corinth, when Paul sent from thence his Epistle to Romans (Romans 16, 21). On Paul's return to Asia through Macedonia, he went forward and waited for the apostle at Troas (Acts 20, 3-5). Next we find him with Paul during his imprisonment at Rome, when the apostle wrote the Epistles to Colossians (Colossians 1, 1), Philemon (Philemon 1), and Philippians (Philippians 1, 1). He was imprisoned and set at liberty about the same time as the writer of the Hebrews (Hebrews 13, 23). In the Pastoral Epistles, we find him mentioned as left by the apostle at Ephesus to superintend the Church there (1 Timothy 1, 3). The last notice of him is in the request which Paul makes to him (2 Timothy 4, 21) to "come before winter," i. e., about 67 A. D. [ALFORD.] EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3, 42, reports that he was first bishop of Ephesus; and NICOPHORUS, Ecclesiastical History, 8, 11, represents that he died by martyrdom. If then, St. John, as tradition represents, resided and died in that city, it must have been at a later period. Paul himself ordained or consecrated him with laying on of his own hands, and those of the presbytery, in accordance with prophetic intimations given respecting him by those possessing the prophetic gift (1 Timothy 1, 18; 4, 14; 2 Timothy 1, 6). His self-denying character is shown by his leaving home at once to accompany the apostle, and submitting to circumcision for the gospel's sake; and also by his abstemiousness (noticed 1 Timothy 5, 23) notwithstanding his bodily infirmities, which would have warranted a more generous diet. Timidity and a want of self-confidence and boldness in dealing with the difficulties of his position, seem to have been a defect in his otherwise beautiful character as a Christian minister (1 Corinthians 16, 10; 1 Timothy 4, 12; 2 Timothy 1, 7).

THE DESIGN of the First Epistle was (1.) to direct Timothy to charge the false teachers against continuing to teach other doctrine than that of the Gospel (1 Timothy 1, 3-20; cf. Revelation 2, 1-6); (2.) to give him instructions as to the orderly conducting of worship, the qualifications of bishops and deacons, and the selection of widows who should, in return for Church charity, do appointed service (1 Timothy 2, to 6, 2); (3.) to warn against covetousness, a sin prevalent at Ephesus, and to urge to good works (1 Timothy 6, 3-19).

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-23. ADDRESS: PAUL'S DESIGN IN HAVING LEFT TIMOTHY AT EPHESUS, VIZ., TO CHECK FALSE TEACHERS; TRUE USE OF THE LAW; HARMONIZING WITH THE GOSPEL GOD'S GRACE IN CALLING PAUL, ONCE A BLASPHEMER, TO EXPERIENCE AND TO PREACH IT; CHARGES TO TIMOTHY. 1. by the commandment of God—The authoritative injunction, as well as the commission, of God. In the earlier Epistles the phrase is, "By the will of God." Here it is expressed in a manner implying that a necessity was laid on him to act as an apostle, not that it was merely at his option. The same expression occurs in the doxology, probably written long after the Epistle itself. [ALFORD.] (Romans 16. 26.) God our Saviour—The Father (ch. 2. 3; 4. 10; Luke 1. 47; 2 Timothy 1. 9; Titus 1. 3; 2. 10; 3. 4; Jude 25). It was a Jewish expression in devotion, drawn from the Old Testament (cf. Psalm 106. 21). our hope—(Colossians 1. 27; Titus 1. 2; 2. 13.) 2. my own son—lit., "a genuine son" (cf. Acts 16. 1; 1 Corinthians 4. 14-17). See Introduction. mercy—Added here, in addressing Timothy, to the ordinary salutation, "Grace unto you (Romans 1. 7; 1 Corinthians 1. 3, &c.), and peace." In Galatians 6. 16, "peace and mercy" occur. There are many similarities of style between the Epistle to the Galatians and the Pastoral Epistles (see Introduction); perhaps owing to his there, as here, having, as a leading object in writing, the correction of false teachers, especially as to the right and wrong use of the law (v. 9). If the earlier date be assigned to 1 Timothy, it will fall not long after, or before (according as the Epistle to the Galatians was written at Ephesus or at Corinth) the writing of the Epistle to the Galatians, which also would account for some similarity of style. "Mercy" is grace of a more tender kind, exercised towards the miserable, the experience of which in one's own case especially fits for the Gospel MINISTRY. Cf. as to Paul himself (v. 14, 16; 1 Corinthians 7. 25; 2 Corinthians 4. 1; Hebrews 2. 17). [BENGEL.] He did not use "mercy" as to the churches, because "mercy" in all its fullness already existed towards them; but in the case of an individual minister, fresh measures of it were continually needed. "Grace" has reference to the sins of men; "mercy" to their misery. God extends His grace to men as they are guilty; His mercy to them as they are miserable. [TRENCH.] Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read the order, "Christ Jesus." In the Pastoral Epistles "Christ" is often put before "Jesus," to give prominence to the fact that the Messianic promises of the Old Testament, well known to Timothy (2 Timothy 3. 15), were fulfilled in Jesus. 3. Timothy's superintendence of the Church at Ephesus was as locum tenens for the apostle, and so was temporary. Thus, the office of superintending overseer, needed for a time at Ephesus or Crete, in the absence of the presiding apostle, subsequently became a permanent institution on the removal, by death, of the apostles who heretofore superintended the churches. The first title of these overseers seems to have been "angels" (Revelation 1. 20). 3. As I besought thee to remain—He meant to have added, "So I still beseech thee," but does not complete the sentence until he does so virtually, not formally, at v. 18. at Ephesus—Paul, in Acts 20. 25, declared to the Ephesian elders, "I know that ye all shall see my face no more." If, then, as the balance of arguments seems to favour (see Introduction), this Epistle was written subsequently to Paul's first imprisonment, the apparent discrepancy between his prophecy and the event may be reconciled by considering that the terms of the former were not that he should never visit Ephesus again (which this verse implies he did), but that they all should "see his face no more." I cannot think with BIRKS, that this verse is compatible with his theory, that Paul did not actually visit Ephesus, though in its immediate neighbourhood (cf. ch. 3. 14; 4. 13). The corresponding conjunction to "as" is not given, the sentence not being completed till it is virtually so at v. 18. I besought—A mild word, instead of authoritative command, to Timothy, as a fellow-helper. some—The indefinite pronoun is slightly contemptuous as to them (Galatians 2. 12; Jude 4). [ELLICOTT.] teach no other doctrine—than what

I have taught (Galatians 1. 6-9). His prophetic bodily some years before (Acts 20. 29, 30) were now being realized (cf. ch. 6. 3). 4. fables—Legends about the origin and propagation of angels, such as the false teachers taught at Colosse (Colossians 2. 18-23). "Jewish fables" (Titus 1. 11). "Profane, and old wives' fables" (ch. 4. 7; 2 Timothy 4. 4). genealogies—Not merely such civil genealogies as were common among the Jews, whereby they traced their descent from the patriarchs, to which Paul would not object, and which he would not as here class with "fables," but Gnostic genealogies of spirits and æons, as they called them, "Lists of Gnostic emanations." [ALFORD.] So TERTULLIAN, Adversus Valentinos, c. 3, and IRENÆUS, Profes The Judaizers here alluded to, whilst maintaining the perpetual obligation of the Mosaic law, joined with it a theosophic ascetic tendency, pretending to see in it mysteries deeper than others could see. The seeds, not the full-grown Gnosticism of the post-apostolic age, then existed. This formed the transition stage between Judaism and Gnosticism. "Endless" refers to the tedious unprofitableness of their lengthy genealogies (cf. Titus 3. 9). Paul opposes to their "æons," the "King of the æons (so the Greeks, v. 17), to whom be glory throughout the æons of æons." The word "æon" was probably not used in the technical sense of the latter Gnostics as yet; but "the only wise God" (v. 17), by anticipation, confutes the subsequently adopted notions in the Gnostics' own phraseology. questions—of mere speculation (Acts 25. 20), not practical; generating merely curious discussions. "Questions and strifes of words" (ch. 6. 4); "to no profit" (2 Timothy 2. 14); "gendering strifes" (2 Timothy 2. 23). "Vain jangling" (v. 6, 7) of would-be "teachers of the law." godly edifying—The oldest MSS. read, "the dispensation of God," the Gospel dispensation of God towards man (1 Corinthians 9. 17), "which is (has its element) in faith." CONYBEARE translates, "The exercising of the stewardship of God" (1 Corinthians 9. 17). He infers that the false teachers in Ephesus were presbyters, which accords with the prophecy, Acts 20. 30. However, the oldest Latin versions, and IRENÆUS and HILARY, support English Version reading. Cf. v. 5, "faith unfeigned." 5. But—In contrast to the doctrine of the false teachers. the end—the aim. the commandment—Greek, "of the charge" which you ought to urge on your flock. Referring to the same Greek word as Lu v. 3, 18; here, however, in a larger sense, as including the Gospel "dispensation of God" (Note, v. 4 and 11), which was the sum and substance of the "charge" committed to Timothy wherewith he should "charge" his flock. charity—LOVE; the sum and end of the law and of the Gospel alike, and that wherein the Gospel is the fulfilment of the spirit of the law in its every essential jot and tittle (Romans 13. 10). The foundation is faith (v. 4), the "end" is love (v. 14; Titus 3. 15). out of—springing as from a fountain. pure heart—a heart purified by faith (Acts 15. 9; 2 Timothy 2. 22; Titus 1. 15). good conscience—A conscience cleared from guilt by the effect of sound faith in Christ (v. 19; ch. 3. 9; 2 Timothy 1. 3; 1 Peter 3. 21). Contrast 1 Timothy 4. 2; Titus 1. 15; cf. Acts 23. 1. St. John uses "heart," where Paul would use "conscience." In Paul the understanding is the seat of conscience; the heart is the seat of love. [BENGEL.] A good conscience is joined with sound faith; a bad conscience with unsoundness in the faith (cf. Hebrews 9. 14). faith unfeigned—Not a hypocritical, dead, and unfruitful faith, but faith working by love (Galatians 5. 6). The false teachers drew men off from such a loving, working, real faith, to profitless, speculative "questions" (v. 4) and jangling (v. 6). 6. From which—viz., from a pure heart, good conscience, and faith unfeigned, the well-spring of love. having swerved—lit., "having missed the mark (the 'end') to be aimed at." It is translated "erred," ch. 6. 21; 2 Timothy 2. 18. Instead of aiming at and attaining the graces above named, they "have turned aside (ch. 5. 15; 2 Timothy 4. 4; Hebrews 12. 13) unto vain jangling:" lit., "vain talk," about the law and genealogies of angels (v. 7; Titus 3. 9; 1. 10); 1 Timothy 6. 20, "vain babblings and oppositions," &c. It is the greatest vanity when Divine things are not truthfully discussed (Romans 1. 21). [BENGEL.] 7. Sample of their vain talk" (v. 8). Desiring—They are would-be teachers, not really so. the law—the Jewish law (Titus 1. 14; 3. 9). The Judaizers here meant seem to be distinct from those impugned in the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans, who made the works of the law necessary to justification in opposition to Gospel grace. The Judaizers here meant corrupted the law with "fables," which they pretended to found on it, subversive of morals as well as of truth. Their error was not in maintaining the obligation of the law, but in abusing it by fabulous and immoral interpretations of, and additions to it. neither what they say, nor whereof—neither understanding their own assertions, nor the object itself about which they make them. They understand as little about the one as the other. [ALFORD.] 8. But—"Now we know" (Romans 3. 19; 7. 14). law is good—in full agreement with God's holiness and goodness. if a man—Primarily, a teacher; then, every Christian. use it lawfully—in its lawful place in the Gospel economy, viz., not as a means of a "righteous man" attaining higher perfection than could be attained by the Gospel alone (ch. 4. 8; Titus 1. 14), which was the perverted use to which the false teachers put it, but as a means of awakening the sense of sin in the ungodly (v. 9, 10; cf. Romans 7. 7-12; Galatians 3. 21). 9. law is not made for a righteous man—Not for one standing by faith in the righteousness of Christ put on him for justification, and imparted inwardly by the Spirit for sanctification. "One not forensically amenable to the law." [ALFORD.] For sanctification, the law gives no inward power to fulfil it; but ALFORD goes too far in speaking of the righteous man as "not morally needing the law." Doubtless, in proportion as he is inwardly led by the Spirit, the justified man needs not the law, which is only an outward rule (Romans 6. 14; Galatians 5. 18, 23). But as the justified man often does not give himself up wholly to the inward leading of the Spirit, he morally needs the outward law to show him his sin and God's requirements. The reason why the ten commandments have no power to condemn the Christian, is not that they have no authority over him, but because Christ has fulfilled them as our surety (Romans 10. 4). disobedient—Greek, "not subject;" insubordinate; it is translated "unruly," Titus 1. 8, 10; "lawless and disobedient" refer to opposers of the law, for whom it is "enacted" (so the Greek, for "is made"); "ungodly and sinners" (Greek, he who does not reverence God, and he who openly sins against Him), the opposers of God, from whom the law comes; "unholy and profane" (those inwardly impure, and those deserving exclusion from the outward participation in services of the sanctuary), sinners against the third and fourth commandments; "murderers (or as the Greek may mean, 'smilers') of fathers and . . . mothers," sinners against the fifth commandment; "manslayers," sinners against the sixth commandment. 10. whoremongers, &c.—sinners against the seventh commandment. men-stealers—i. e., slave-dealers. The most heinous offence against the eighth commandment. No stealing of a man's goods can equal in atrocity the stealing of a man's liberty. Slavery is not directly assailed in the New Testament; to have done so would have been to revolutionize violently the existing order of things. But Christianity teaches principles sure to undermine, and at last overthrow it, wherever Christianity has had its natural development (Matthew 7. 12). liars . . . perjured—offenders against the ninth commandment. if there be any other thing, &c.—Answering to the tenth commandment in its widest aspect. He does not particularly specify it, because his object is to bring out the grosser forms of transgression; whereas the tenth is deeply spiritual, so much so indeed, that it was by it that the sense of sin, in its subtlest form of "lust," Paul tells us (Romans 7. 7), was brought home to his own conscience. Thus, Paul argues, these would-be teachers of the law, whilst boasting of a higher perfection through it, really bring themselves down from the Gospel elevation to the level of the grossly "lawless," for whom, not for Gospel believers, the law was designed. And in actual practice the greatest sticklers for the law as the means of moral perfection, as in this case, are those ultimately liable to fall utterly from the morality of the law. Gospel grace is the only true means of sanctification as well as of justification. sound—healthy, spiritually wholesome (ch. 6. 3; 2 Timothy 1. 13; Titus 1. 13; 2. 2), as opposed to sickly, morbid (as the Greek of "doting" means, ch. 6. 4), and "canker" (2 Timothy 2. 17). "The doctrine," or "teaching, which is according to godliness" (ch. 6. 3). 11. According to the glorious Gospel—The Christian's freedom from the law as a sanctifier, as well as a justifier, implied in the previous v. 9, 10, is what this v. 11 is connected with. This exemption of the righteous from the law, and assignment of it to the lawless as its true object, is "according to the Gospel of the glory (so the Greek, cf. Note, 2 Corinthians 4. 4) of the blessed God." The Gospel manifests God's glory (Ephesians 1. 17; 3. 18) in accounting "righteous" the believer, through the righteousness of Christ, without "the law" (v. 9); and in imparting that righteousness whereby he loathes all those sins against which (v. 9, 10) the law is directed. The term "blessed," indicates at once immortality and supreme happiness. The supremely blessed One is He from whom all blessedness flows. This term, as applied to God, occurs only here and ch. 6. 15; appropriate in speaking here of the Gospel blessedness, in contrast to the curse on those under the law (v. 9; Galatians 3. 10). committed to my trust—translate as in the Greek order, which brings into prominent emphasis Paul, "committed in trust to me;" in contrast to the kind of law-teaching which they (who had no Gospel-commission), the false teachers, assumed to themselves (v. 8; Titus 1. 3). 12. The honor done him in having the Gospel ministry committed to him suggests the digression to what he once was, no better (v. 13) than those lawless ones described above (v. 9, 10), when the grace of our Lord (v. 14) visited him. and—Omitted in most (not all) of the oldest MSS. I thank—Greek, "I have (i. e., feel) gratitude." enabled me—The same Greek verb as in Acts 9. 22, "Saul increased the more in strength." An undesigned coincidence between Paul and Luke, his companion. Enabled me, viz., for the ministry. "It is not in my own strength that I bring this doctrine to men, but as strengthened and nerved by Him who saved me." [THEODORET.] Man is by nature "without strength" (Romans 5. 6). True conversion and calling confer power. [BENGEL.] for that—the main ground of his "thanking Christ." he counted me faithful—He foreordered and foresaw that I would be faithful to the trust committed to me. Paul's thanking God for this shows that the merit of his faithfulness was due solely to God's grace, not to his own natural strength (1 Corinthians 7. 25). Faithfulness is the quality required in a steward (1 Corinthians 4. 2). putting me into—rather as in 1 Thessalonians 5. 9, "Appointing me (in His sovereign purposes of grace) unto the ministry" (Acts 20. 24). 13. Who was before—Greek, "Formerly being a blasphemer." "Notwithstanding that I was before a blasphemer," &c. (Acts 26. 9, 11). persecutor—(Galatians 1. 13.) injurious—Greek, "insulter;" one who acts injuriously from arrogant contempt of others. Translate Romans 1. 30, "despiteful." One who added insult to injury. BENGEL translates, "a despiser." I prefer the idea, contumelious to others. [WAHL.] Still I agree with BENGEL that "blasphemer" is against God, "persecutor," against holy men, and "insolently-injurious" includes, with the idea of injuring others, that of insolent "uppishness" [DONALDSON] in relation to one's self. This threefold relation to God, to one's neighbour, and to one's self, occurs often in this Epistle (v. 5, 9, 14; Titus 2. 12). I obtained mercy—God's mercy, and Paul's want of it, stand in sharp contrast [ELLICOTT], Greek, "I was made the object of mercy." The sense of mercy was perpetual in the mind of the apostle (cf. Note, v. 2). Those who have felt mercy can best have mercy on those out of the way (Hebrews 5. 2, 3). because I did it ignorantly—Ignorance does not in itself deserve pardon; but it is a less culpable cause of unbelief than pride and wilful hardening of one's self against the truth (John 9. 41; Acts 26. 9). Hence it is Christ's plea of intercession for his murderers (Luke 23. 34); and is made by the apostles a mitigating circumstance in the Jews' sin, and one giving a hope of a door of re-penance (Acts 8. 17; Romans 10. 2). The "because," &c., does not imply that ignorance was a sufficient reason for mercy being bestowed; but shows how it was possible that such a sinner could obtain mercy. The positive ground of mercy being shown to him, lies solely in the compassion of God (Titus 8. 5). The ground of the ignorance lies in the unbelief, which implies that this ignorance is not unaccompanied with guilt. But there is a great difference between his honest zeal for the law, and a wilful striving against the Spirit of God (Matthew 12. 24-32; Luke 11. 52). [WIESINGER.] 14. And—Greek, "But." Not only so (was mercy shown me), but, &c. the grace—by which "I obtained mercy" (v. 13). was exceeding abundant—Greek, "superabounded." Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound (Romans 5. 20). with faith—accompanied with faith, the opposite of "unbelief" (v. 13). love—in contrast to "a blasphemer, persecutor, and injurious," which is in Christ—as its element and home [ALFORD]: here as its source whence it flows to us. 15. faithful—worthy of credit, because "God" who says it "is faithful" to his word (1 Corinthians 1. 9; 1 Thessalonians 5. 24; 2 Thessalonians 3. 3; Revelation 21. 5; 22. 6). This seems to have become an axiomatic saying among Christians; the phrase faithful saying, is peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles (ch. 2. 11; 4. 9; Titus 3. 8). Translate as Greek, "Faithful is the saying." all—all possible; full; to be received by all, and with all the faculties of the soul, mind, and heart. Paul, unlike the false teachers (v. 7), understands what he is saying, and whereof he affirms; and by his simplicity of style and subject, setting forth the grand fundamental truth of salvation through Christ, confutes the false teachers' abstruse and unpractical speculations (1 Corinthians 1. 18-23; Titus 2. 1). acceptation—reception (as of a boon) into the heart, as well as the understanding, with all gladness; this is faith acting on the Gospel offer, and welcoming and appropriating it (Acts 2. 41). Christ—as promised. Jesus—as manifested. [BENGEL.] came into the world—which was full of sin (John 1. 29; Romans 5. 12; 1 John 2. 2). This implies His pre-existence. John 1. 9, Greek, "The true Light that, coming into the world, lighteth every man." to save sinners—even notable sinners like Saul of Tarsus. His instance was without a rival since the ascension, in point of the greatness of the sin and the greatness of the mercy; that the consentor to Stephen, the proto-martyr's death, should be the successor of the same! I am—not merely, "I was chief" (1 Corinthians 15. 9; Ephesians 3. 8; cf. Luke 18. 13). To each believer his own sins must always appear, as long as he lives, greater than those of others, which he never can know as he can know his own. chief—The same Greek as in v. 16, "first," which alludes to this 15th v. Translate in both verses, "foremost." Well might he infer where there was mercy for him, there is mercy for all who will come to Christ (Matthew 18. 11; Luke 19. 10). 16. Howbeit—Greek, "But;" contrasting his own conscious sinfulness with God's gracious visitation of him in mercy. for this cause—for this very purpose. that in me—in my case. first—"foremost." As I was "foremost" (Greek for chief, v. 15) in sin, so God has made me the "foremost" sample of mercy. show—to His own glory (the middle Greek voice), Ephesians 2. 7. all long-suffering—Greek, "the whole (of His) long-suffering," viz., in bearing so long with me whilst I was a persecutor. a pattern—a sample (1 Corinthians 10. 6, 11) to assure the greatest sinners of the certainty that they shall not be rejected in coming to Christ, since even Saul found mercy. So David made his own case of pardon, notwithstanding the greatness of his sin, a sample to encourage other sinners to seek pardon (Psalm 32. 5, 6). The Greek for "pattern" is sometimes used for "a sketch" or outline—the filling up to take place in each man's own case. believe on him—belief rests on Him as the only foundation on which faith relies. to life everlasting—the ultimate aim which faith always keeps in view (Titus 1. 2). 17. A suitable conclusion to the beautifully-simple enunciation of the Gospel, of which his own history is a living sample or pattern. It is from the experimental sense of grace that the doxology flows. [BENGEL.] the King eternal—lit., "King of the (eternal) ages." The LXX. translate Exodus 12. 15, "The Lord shall reign for ages and beyond them." Psalm 145. 13, Margin, "Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom," lit., "a kingdom of all ages." The "life-everlasting" (v. 16) suggested here "the King eternal," or everlasting. It answers also to "for ever and ever" at the close, lit., "to the ages of the ages" (the countless succession of ages made up of ages). immortal—The oldest MSS. read, "incorruptible." Vulgate, however, and one very old MS. read as English Version (Romans 1. 23). invisible—(Ch. 6. 16; Exodus 33. 20; John 1. 18; Colossians 1. 15; Hebrews 11. 27.) the only wise God—The oldest MSS. omit: wise, which probably crept in from Romans 16. 27, where it is more appropriate to the context than here (cf. Jude 25). "The only Potentate" (ch. 6. 15; Psalm 86. 10; John 6. 44). for ever, &c.—See Note, above. The thought of eternity (terrible as it is to unbelievers) is delightful to those assured of grace (v. 16). [BENGEL.] 18. He resumes the subject begun at v. 8. The conclusion (apodosis) to the foregoing, "as I besought thee . . . charge" (v. 8), is here given, if not formally, at least substantially. This charge—viz., "That thou in them (so the Greek) mightest war," &c., i. e., fulfil thy high calling, not only as a Christian, but as a minister officially, one function of which is, to "charge some that they teach no other doctrine" (v. 8). I commit—as a sacred deposit (ch. 6. 20; 2 Timothy 2. 2) to be laid before thy hearers. according to—in pursuance of; in consonance with. the prophecies which went before on thee—the intimations given by prophets respecting thee at thy ordination, ch. 4. 14 (as, probably, by Silas, a companion of Paul, and "a prophet," Acts 15. 32). Such prophetic intimation, as well as the good report given of Timothy by the brethren (Acts 16. 2), may have induced Paul to take him as his companion. Cf. similar prophecies as to others, Acts 13. 1-3, in connection with laying on of hands; 11. 28; 21. 10, 11; cf. 1 Corinthians 12. 10; 14. 1; Ephesians 4. 11. In Acts 20. 23, it is expressly said that "the Holy Ghost had made them (the Ephesian presbyters) overseers." CLEMENT OF ROME, Epistola ad Corinthios, states it was the custom of the apostles "to make trial by the Spirit," i. e., by the "power of discerning," in order to determine who were to be overseers and deacons in the several churches planted. So CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA says as to the churches near Ephesus, that the overseers were marked out for ordination by a revelation of the Holy Ghost to St. John by them—Greek, "in them;" arrayed as it were in them; armed with them. warfare—not the mere "fight" (ch. 6. 12; 2 Timothy 4. 7), but the whole campaign; the military service. Translate as Greek, not a, but "the, good warfare." 19. Holding—Keeping hold of "faith" and "good conscience" (v. 5); not "putting the latter away" as "some." Faith is like a very precious liquor; a good conscience is the clean, pure glass that contains it. [BENGEL.] The loss of good conscience entails the shipwreck of faith. Consciousness of sin [unrepented of and forgiven] kills the germ of faith in man. [WIESINGER.] which—Greek singular, viz., "good conscience," not "faith" also; however, the result of putting away good conscience is, one loses faith also. put away—a wilful act. They thrust it from them as a troublesome monitor. It reluctantly withdraws, extruded by force, when its owner is tired of its importunity, and is resolved to retain his sin at the cost of losing it. One cannot be on friendly terms with it and with sin at one and the same time. made shipwreck—"with respect to THE faith." Faith is the vessel in which they had professedly embarked, of which "good conscience" is the anchor. The ancient Church often used this image, comparing the course of faith to navigation. The Greek does not imply that one having once had faith makes shipwreck of it, but that they who put away good conscience "make shipwreck with respect to THE faith." 20. Hymeneus—there is no difficulty in supposing him to be the Hymeneus of 2 Timothy 2. 17. Though "delivered over to Satan" (the lord of all outside the Church, Acts 26. 18, and the executor of wrath, when judicially allowed by God, on the disobedient, 1 Corinthians 5. 5; 2 Corinthians 12. 7), he probably was restored to the Church subsequently, and again troubled it. Paul, as an apostle, though distant at Rome, pronounced the sentence to be executed at Ephesus, involving, probably, the excommunication of the offenders (Matthew 18. 17, 18). The sentence operated not only spiritually, but also physically, sickness, or some such visitation of God, falling on the person excommunicated, in order to bring him to repentance and salvation. Alexander here is probably "the coppersmith" who did St. Paul "much evil" when the latter visited Ephesus. The "delivering him to Satan" was probably the consequence of his withstanding the apostle (2 Timothy 4. 14, 15); as the same sentence on Hymeneus was the consequence of his "saying that the resurrection is past already" (2 Timothy 2. 18; his putting away good conscience, naturally producing shipwreck concerning FAITH, v. 19. If one's religion better not his morals, his moral deficiencies will corrupt his religion. The rain which falls pure from heaven will not continue pure if it be received in an unclean vessel. [ARCHBISHOP WHATELY.]) It is possible that he is the Alexander, then a Jew, put forward by the Jews, doubtless against Paul, at the riot in Ephesus (Acts 19. 33). that they may—not "might;" implying that the effect still continues—the sentence is as yet unremoved. learn—Greek, "be disciplined," viz., by chastisement and suffering. blaspheme—the name of God and Christ, by doings and teachings unworthy of their Christian profession (Romans 2. 23, 24; James 2. 7). Though the apostles, who were infallible, had the power of excommunication, accompanied with bodily inflictions, miraculously sent (2 Corinthians 10. 8), it does not follow that fallible ministers now have any power, save that of excluding from church-fellowship notorious bad livers.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-15. PUBLIC WORSHIP. DIRECTIONS AS TO INTERCESSIONS FOR ALL MEN, SINCE CHRIST IS A RANSOM FOR ALL. THE DUTIES OF MEN AND WOMEN RESPECTIVELY IN RESPECT TO PUBLIC PRAYER. WOMAN'S SUBJECTION; HER SPHERE OF DUTY. 1. therefore—Taking up again the general subject of the Epistle in continuation (2 Timothy 2. 1). "What I have therefore to say to thee by way of a charge (ch. 1. 8, 18), is," &c. that first of all . . . be made—ALFORD takes it, "I exhort first of all to make." "First of all," doubtless, is to be connected with "I exhort;" what I begin with (for special reasons), is, &c. As the destruction of Jerusalem drew near, the Jews (including those at Ephesus) were seized with the dream of freedom from every yoke; and so virtually "blasphemed" (cf. ab. 1. 20) God's name by "speaking evil of dignities" (ch. 8. 1; 2 Peter 2. 10; Jude 8). Hence Paul, in opposition, gives prominence to the injunction that prayer be made for all men, especially for magistrates and kings (Titus 3. 1-3). [OLSHAUSEN.] Some professing Christians looked down on all not Christians, as doomed to perdition; but Paul says all men are to be prayed for, as Christ died for all (v. 4-6). supplication—a term implying the suppliant's sense of need, and of his own insufficiency. prayers—implying devotion. intercessions—properly the coming near to God with child-like confidence, generally in behalf of another. The accumulation of terms implies prayer in its every form and aspect, according to all the relations implied in it. 2. For kings—An effectual confutation of the adversaries who accused the Christians of disaffection to the ruling powers (Acts 17. 7; Romans 13. 1-7). all . . . in authority—viz., ". . . in eminence;" in stations of eminence. The "quiet" of Christians was often more dependent on subordinate rulers, than on the supreme king; hence, "all . . . in authority" are to be prayed for. that we may lead—that we may be blessed with such good government as to lead, &c.; or rather, as Greek, "to pass" or "spend." The prayers of Christians for the government bring down from heaven peace and order in a state. quiet—not troubled from without. peaceable—"tranquil;" not troubled from within. [OLSHAUSEN.] "He is peaceable (Greek) who makes no disturbance; he is quiet (Greek) who is himself free from disturbance." [TITMANN.] in all—"in all (possible . . . requisite) piety."

[ALFORD.] A distinct Greek word, v. 10, expresses "goodness." honesty—Greek, "gravity" (Titus 2. 2, 7), "decorum," or propriety of conduct. As "piety" is in relation to God, "gravity" is propriety of behaviour among men. In the Old Testament the Jews were commanded to pray for their heathen rulers (Ezra 6. 10; Jeremiah 29. 7). The Jews, by Angustins' order, offered a lamb daily for the Roman emperor, till near the destruction of Jerusalem. The Jewish Zealots, instigated by Eleazar, caused this custom to cease [JOSEPHUS, B. J., 2. 17], whence the war originated according to JOSEPHUS. 3. this—praying for all men. in the sight of God—not merely before men, as if it were their favour that we sought (2 Corinthians 8. 21). our Saviour—a title appropriate to the matter in hand. He who is "our Saviour" is willing that all should be saved (v. 4; Romans 5. 18); therefore we should meet the will of God in behalf of others, by praying for the salvation of all men. More would be converted, if we would pray more. He has actually saved us who believe, being "our Saviour." He is willing that all should be saved, even those who do not as yet believe, if they will believe (cf. ch. 4. 10; Titus 2. 11). 4. "Imitate God." Since He wishes that all should be saved, do you also wish it; and if you wish it, pray for it. For prayer is the instrument of effecting such things. [CHRYSOSTOM.] St. Paul does not say, "He wishes to save all," for then he would have saved all in matter of fact; but "will have all men to be saved," implies the possibility of man's accepting it (through God's preventent grace) or rejecting it (through man's own perversity). Our prayers ought to include all, as God's grace included all. to come—They are not forced. unto the knowledge—Greek, "the full knowledge" or "recognition" (Note, 1 Corinthians 13. 12; Philippians 1. 9). the truth—the saving truth as it is in, and by, Jesus (John 17. 3, 17). 5. For there is one God—God's unity in essence and purpose is a proof of His comprehending all His human children alike (created in His image) in His offer of grace (cf. the same argument from His unity, Romans 3. 30; Galatians 3. 20); therefore all are to be prayed for. Verse 4. is proved from v. 5; v. 1, from v. 4. The One God is common to all (Isaiah 45. 22; Acts 17. 28). The one Mediator is mediator between God and all men potentially (Romans 3. 29; Ephesians 4. 5, 6; Hebrews 8. 6; 9. 15; 12. 24). They who have not this one God by one Mediator, have none: viz., a go-between. The Greek order is not "and one mediator," but "one mediator also between," &c. Whilst God will have all men to be saved by knowing God and the Mediator, there is a legitimate, holy order in the exercise of that will wherewith men ought to receive it. All mankind constitute, as it were, ONE MAN before God. [BENGE.] the man—rather "man," absolutely and generically: not a mere individual man: the Second Head of humanity, representing and embodying in Himself the whole human race and nature. There is no "the" in the Greek. This epithet is thus the strongest corroboration of his argument, viz., that Christ's mediation affects the whole race, since there is but the one Mediator, designed as the Representative Man for all men alike (cf. Romans 5. 15; 1 Corinthians 8. 6; 2 Corinthians 5. 19; Colossians 2. 14). His being "man" was necessary to His being a Mediator, sympathizing with us through experimental knowledge of our nature (Isaiah 50. 4; Hebrews 2. 14; 4. 15). Even in nature, almost all blessings are conveyed to us from God, not immediately, but through the mediation of various agents. The effectual intercession of Moses for Israel (Numbers 14., and Deuteronomy 9.); of Abraham for Abimelech (Genesis 20. 7); of Job for his friends (Job 42. 10), the mediation being PRESCRIBED by God whilst declaring His purposes of forgiveness: all prefigure the grand mediation for all by the One Mediator. On the other hand, ch. 3. 16 asserts that He was also God. 6. gave himself—(Titus 2. 14.) Not only the Father gave Him for us (John 3. 16); but the Son gave Himself (Philippians 2. 5-8). ransom—properly of a captive slave. Man was the captive slave of Satan, sold under sin. He was unable to ransom himself, because absolute obedience is due to God, and therefore no act of ours can satisfy for the least offence. Leviticus 25. 48 allowed one sold car-was to be redeemed by one of his brethren. The Son of God, therefore, became man in order that, being made like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, as our elder brother He should redeem us (Matthew 20. 28; Ephesians 1. 7; 1 Peter 1. 18, 19). The Greek implies not merely ransom, but a substituted or equivalent ransom: the Greek preposition "anti," implying reciprocity and vicarious substitution. for all—Greek, "in behalf of all;" not merely for a privileged few; cf. v. 1: the argument for praying in behalf of all is given here. to be testified—Greek, "the testimony (that which was to be testified of, 1 John 5. 8-11) in its own due times," or seasons, i. e., in the times appointed by God for its being testified of (ch. 6. 15; Titus 1. 3). The oneness of the Mediator, involving the universality of redemption [which faith, however, alone appropriates], was the great subject of Christian testimony [ALFORD] (1 Corinthians 1. 6; 2. 1; 2 Thessalonians 1. 10). 7. Whereunto—For the giving of which testimony. I am ordained—lit., "I was set;" the same Greek as "putting me," &c. (ch. 1. 12). preacher—lit., "herald" (1 Corinthians 1. 21; 9. 27; 15. 11; 2 Timothy 1. 11; Titus 1. 3). He recurs to himself, as in ch. 1. 16, in himself a living pattern or announcement of the Gospel, so here "a herald and teacher of (it to) the Gentiles" (Galatians 2. 9; Ephesians 3. 1-12; Colossians 1. 23). The universality of his commission is an appropriate assertion here, where he is arguing to prove that prayers are to be made "for all men" (v. 1). I speak the truth . . . and lie not—a strong asseveration of his universal commission, characteristic of the ardour of the apostle, exposed to frequent conflict (Romans 11. 1; 2 Corinthians 11. 31). in faith and verity—rather, "in the faith and the truth." The sphere in which his ministry was appointed to be exercised was the faith and the truth (v. 4): the Gospel truth, the subject-matter of the faith. [WIESINGER.] 8. I will—The active wish, or desire, is meant, that men—rather as Greek, "that the men," as distinguished from "the women," to whom he has something different to say from what he said to the men (v. 9-12; 1 Corinthians 11. 14, 15; 14. 34, 35). The emphasis, however, is not on this, but on the precept of praying, resumed from v. 1. everywhere—Greek, "in every place," viz., of public prayer. Fulfilling Malachi 1. 11, "In every place . . . from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same . . . incense shall be offered unto my name;" and Jesus' words, Matthew 18. 20; John 4. 21, 23. lifting up holy hands—The early Christians turned up their palms towards heaven, as those craving help do. So also Solomon (1 Kings 8. 22; Psalm 141. 2). The Jews washed their hands before prayer (Psalm 26. 6). St. Paul figuratively (cf. Job 17. 9; James 4. 8) uses language alluding to this custom here: so Isaiah 1. 15, 16. The Greek for "holy" means hands which have committed no impiety, and observed every sacred duty. This (or at least the contrite desire to be so) is a useful qualification for effectual prayer (Psalm 24. 3, 4). without wrath—putting it away (Matthew 5. 23, 24; 6. 15). doubting—rather, "disputing," as the Greek is translated Philippians 2. 14. Such things hinder prayer (Luke 9. 46; Romans 14. 1; 1 Peter 3. 7). BENGEL supports English Version (cf. an instance, 2 Kings 7. 2; Matthew 14. 31; Mark 11. 22-24; James 1. 6). 9, 10. The context requires that we understand these directions as to women, in relation to their deportment in public worship, though the rules will hold good on other occasions also. in modest apparel—"in seemly guise." [ELLICOTT.] The adjective means properly, orderly, decorous, becoming; the noun in secular writings means conduct, bearing. But here "apparel." Women are apt to love fine dress; and at Ephesus the riches of some (ch. 6. 17) would lead them to dress luxuriously. The Greek in Titus 2. 3 is a more general term meaning "deportment." shamefacedness—TRENCH spells this word according to its true derivation, "shamefastness" (that which is made fast by an honourable shame); as "steadfastness" (cf. v. 11, 12). sobriety—"self-restraint." [ALFORD.] Habitual inner self-government. [TRENCH.] I prefer ELLICOTT'S translation, "sobermindedness:" the well-balanced state of mind arising from habitual self-restraint. with—Greek, in. broidered hair—lit., plaits i. e., plaited hair:

probably with the "gold and pearls" intertwined (1 Peter 3. 3). Such gaud is characteristic of the spiritual harlot (Revelation 17. 4). 10. professing—Greek, promising: engaging to follow. with good works—The Greek preposition is not the same as in v. 9; "by means of;" "through good works." Their adorning is to be effected by means of good works: not that they are to be clothed in, or with, them (Ephesians 2. 10). Works, not words in public, is their province (v. 8, 11, 12; 1 Peter 3. 1). Works are often mentioned in the Pastoral Epistles in order to oppose the loose living, combined with the loose doctrine, of the false teachers. The discharge of every-day duties is honoured with the designation, "Good works." 11. learn—not "teach" (v. 12; 1 Corinthians 14. 34). She should not even put questions in the public assembly (1 Corinthians 14. 35). with all subjection—not "usurping authority" (v. 12). She might teach, but not in public (Acts 18. 26). St. Paul probably wrote this Epistle from Corinth, where the precept (1 Corinthians 14. 34) was in force. 12. usurp authority—"to lord it over the man" [ALFORD], lit., "to be an autocrat." 13. For—Reason of the precept; the original order of creation. Adam . . . first—before Eve, who was created for him (1 Corinthians 11. 8, 9). 14. Adam was not deceived—as Eve was deceived by the serpent; but was persuaded by his wife. Genesis 3. 17, "Harkened unto . . . voice of . . . wife." But Genesis 3. 13, Eve says, "The serpent beguiled me." Being more easily deceived she more easily deceives (BENGEL) (2 Corinthians 11. 3). Last in being, she was first in sin—Indeed, she alone was deceived. The subtle serpent knew that she was "the weaker vessel." He therefore tempted her, not him. She yielded to the temptations of sense and the deceits of Satan; he, to conjugal love. Hence, in the order of God's judicial sentence, the serpent, the prime offender, stands first; the woman, who was deceived, next; and the man, persuaded by his wife, last (Genesis 3. 14-19). In Romans 5. 12, Adam is represented as the first transgressor; but there no reference is made to Eve, and Adam is regarded as the head of the sinning race. Hence, as here, v. 11, in Genesis 3. 16, woman's "subjection" is represented as the consequence of her being deceived. being deceived—The oldest MSS. read the compound Greek verb for the simple. "Having been seduced by deceit." Implying how completely Satan succeeded in deceiving her. was in the transgression—Greek, "came to be in the transgression;" became involved in the existing state of transgression, lit., "the going beyond a command:" the breach of a positive precept (Romans 4. 15). 15. be saved in child-bearing—Greek, "in (lit., through) her (lit., the) child-bearing." Through, or by, is often so used to express not the means of her salvation, but the circumstances AMIDST which it has place. Thus 1 Corinthians 3. 15, "He . . . shall be saved; yet so as by (lit., through, i. e., amidst) fire:" In spite of the fiery ordeal which he has necessarily to pass through, he shall be saved. So here, "In spite of the trial of child-bearing which she passes through (as her portion of the curse, Genesis 3. 16, 'in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children'), she shall be saved." Moreover, I think it is implied indirectly that the very curse will be turned into a condition favourable to her salvation, by her faithfully performing her part in doing and suffering what God has assigned to her, viz., child-bearing and home duties, her sphere, as distinguished from public teaching, which is not hers, but man's (v. 11, 12). In this home sphere, no ordinarily in one of active duty for advancing the kingdom of God, which contradicts the position assigned to her by God, she will be saved on the same terms as all others, viz., by living faith. Some think that there is a reference to the Incarnation "through the child-bearing" [Greek], the bearing of the child Jesus. Doubtless this is the ground of women's child-bearing in general becoming to them a blessing instead of a curse; just as in the original prophecy (Genesis 3. 15, 16) the promise of "the Seed of the woman" (the Saviour) stands in closest connection with the woman's being doomed to "sorrow" in "bringing forth children," her very child-bearing, though with sorrow, being the function assigned to her by God where the Saviour was born. This may be an ulterior reason cases of the Holy Spirit in this verse; but the primary reference required by the context is the one above given. "She shall be saved ([though] with child-bearing)," i. e., though suffering her part of the primeval curse in child-bearing; just as a man shall be saved, though having to bear his part, viz., the sweat of the brow. if they—"if the women" (plural, taken out of "the woman," v. 14, which is out for the whole sex) continue," or more lit., shall (be found at the judgment) have continued. faith and charity—the essential way to salvation (ch. 1. 5). Faith is in relation to God. Charity, to our fellow-man. Sobriety, to one's self. sobriety—"sobermindedness" (Note, v. 9, as contrasted with the unseemly forwardness reproved in v. 11). Mental receptivity and activity in family life were recognized in Christianity as the destiny of woman. One reason alleged here by Paul, is the greater danger of self-deception in the weaker sex, and the spread of errors arising from it, especially in a class of addresses in which sober reflectiveness is least in exercise. [NEANDER.] The case (Acts 21. 9) was doubtless in private, not in public.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-16. RULES AS TO BISHOPS (OVERSEERS) AND DEACONS. THE CHURCH, AND THE GOSPEL-MYSTERY NOW REVEALED TO IT, ARE THE END OF ALL SUCH RULES. 1. Translate as Greek, "Faithful is the saying." A needful preface to what follows: for the office of a bishop or overseer in Paul's day, attended as it was with hardship and often persecution, would not seem to the world generally a desirable and "good work." desire—lit., "stretch one's self forward to grasp;" aim at: a distinct Greek verb from that for "desireth." What one does voluntarily is more esteemed than what he does when asked (1 Corinthians 16. 15). This is utterly distinct from ambitious desires after office in the Church (James 3. 1). bishop—overseer: as yet identical with "presbyter" (Acts 20. 17, 28; Titus 1. 5-7). good work—lit., "honourable work." Not the honour associated with it, but the work, is the prominent thought (Acts 15. 38; Philippians 2. 30; cf. 2 Timothy 4. 5). He who aims at the office must remember the high qualifications needed for the due discharge of its functions. 2. The existence of Church organization and presbyters at Ephesus is presupposed (ch. 5. 17, 19). The institution of Church widows (ch. 5) accords with this. The directions here to Timothy, the president or apostolic delegate, are as to filling up vacancies among the bishops and deacons, or adding to their number. Fresh churches in the neighbourhood also would require presbyters and deacons. Episcopacy was adopted in apostolic times as the most expedient form of government, being most nearly in accordance with Jewish institutions, and so offering the less obstruction through Jewish prejudices to the progress of Christianity. The synagogue was governed by presbyters, "elders" (Acts 4. 8; 21. 1), called also bishops or overseers. Three among them presided as "rulers of the synagogue," answering to "bishops" in the modern sense [LIGHTFOOT, Horæ.], and one among them took the lead. AMBROSE (in Amularius de Officiis, 2. 13, and BINGHAM, Ecclesiastical Antiquities, 2. 11) says, "They who are now called bishops were originally called apostles. But those who ruled the Church after the death of the apostles had not the testimony of miracles, and were in many respects inferior. Therefore they thought it not decent to assume to themselves the name of apostles; but dividing the names, they left to presbyters the name of the presbytery, and they themselves were called bishops." "Presbyter" refers to the rank; "bishop," to the office or function. Timothy (though not having the name) exercised the power at Ephesus then, which bishops in the modern sense more recently exercised. blameless—"unexceptionable:" giving no just handle for blame. husband of one wife—Confuting the celibacy of Rome's priesthood. Though the Jews practised polygamy, yet as he is writing as to a Gentile Church, and as polygamy was never allowed among even laymen in the Church, the ancient interpretation that the prohibition here is against polygamy

in a candidate bishop is not correct. It must, therefore, mean that, though laymen might lawfully marry again, candidates for the episcopate or presbytery were better to have been married only once. As in ch. 5. 9, "wife of one man," implies a woman married but once; so "husband of one wife" here must mean the same. The feeling which prevailed among the Gentiles, as well as the Jews (cf. as to Anna, Luke 2. 36, 37), against a second marriage would, on the ground of expediency and conciliation in matters indifferent and not involving compromise of principle, account for Paul's prohibition here in the case of one in so prominent a sphere as a bishop or a deacon. Hence the stress that is laid in the context on the repute in which the candidate for orders is held among those over whom he is to preside (Titus 1. 16). The Council of Laodicea and the apostolic canons discountenanced second marriages, especially in the case of candidates for ordination. Of course second marriage being lawful, the undesirableness of it holds good only under special circumstances. It is implied here also, that he who has a wife and virtuous family, is to be preferred to a bachelor; for he who is himself bound to discharge the domestic duties mentioned here, is likely to be more attractive to those who have similar ties, for he teaches them not only by precept, but also by example (v. 4, 5). The Jews teach, a priest should be neither unmarried nor childless, lest he be unmerciful. [BENGEL.] So in the synagogue, "no one shall offer up prayer in public, unless he be married." [In Colbo, ch. 65; VITRINGA, Synagogue.] vigilant—lit., sober: ever on the watch, as sober men alone can be; keenly alive, so as to foresee what ought to be done (1 Thessalonians 5. 6-8). sober—sober-minded. of good behaviour—Greek, "orderly." "Sober" refers to the inward mind; "orderly," to the outward behaviour, tone, look, gait, dress. The new man bears somewhat of a sacred festival character, incompatible with all confusion, disorder, excess, violence, laxity, assumption, harshness, and meanness (Philippians 4. 8). [BENGEL.] apt to teach—(2 Timothy 2. 24.) 3. Not given to wine—The Greek includes besides this, not indulging in the brawling, violent conduct towards others, which proceeds from being given to wine. The opposite of "patient" or (Greek) "forbearing," reasonable to others (Note, Philippians 4. 5). no striker—with either hand or tongue: not as some teachers pretending a holy zeal (2 Corinthians 11. 20), answering to "not a brawler" or fighter (cf. 1 Kings 22. 24; Nehemiah 13. 25; Isaiah 58. 4; Acts 23. 2; 2 Timothy 2. 24, 25). not covetous—Greek, "not a lover of money," whether he have much or little (Titus 1. 7). 4. ruling—Greek, "presiding over." his own house—children and servants, as contrasted with "the church" (house) of God (v. 5, 15) which he may be called on to preside over. having his children—rather as Greek, "having children (who are) in subjection" (Titus 1. 6). gravity—propriety: reverent modesty on the part of the children. [ALFORD.] The fact that he has children who are in subjection to him in all gravity, is the recommendation in his favour as one likely to rule well the Church. 5. For—Greek, "But." the Church—rather, "a Church" or congregation. How shall he who cannot perform the less function, perform the greater and more difficult? 6. Not a novice—one just converted. This proves the Church of Ephesus was established now for some time. The absence of this rule in the Epistle to Titus, accords with the recent planting of the Church at Crete. Greek, Neophyte, lit., a young plant; luxuriantly verdant (Romans 6. 5; 11. 17; 1 Corinthians 3. 6). The young convert has not yet been disciplined and matured by afflictions and temptations. Contrast Acts 21. 16, "an old disciple." lifted up with pride—Greek, lit., "wrapt in smoke," so that, inflated with self-conceit and exaggerated ideas of his own importance, he cannot see himself or others in the true light (ch. 6. 4; 2 Timothy 3. 4). condemnation of the devil—into the same condemnation as Satan fell into (v. 7; 1 Timothy 2. 26). Pride was the cause of Satan's condemnation (Job 38. 15; Isaiah 14 12-15; John 12. 31; 16. 11; 2 Peter 2. 4; Jude 6) It cannot mean condemnation or accusation on the part of the devil. The devil may bring a re-reproach on men (v. 7), but he cannot bring them into condemnation, for he does not judge, but is judged. [BENJEL.] 7. a good report—Greek, testimony. So Paul was influenced by the good report given of Timothy to choose him as his companion (Acts 16. 2). of them which are without—from the as yet unconverted Gentiles around (1 Corinthians 5. 12; Colossians 4. 5; 1 Thessalonians 4. 12), that they may be the more readily won to the Gospel (1 Peter 2. 12), and that the name of Christ may be glorified. Not even the former life of a bishop should be open to reproach. [BENJEL.] reproach and the snare of the devil—reproach of men (ch. 5. 14) proving the occasion of his falling into the snare of the devil (ch. 6. 9; Matthew 23. 15; 2 Timothy 2. 26). The reproach continually surrounding him for former sins might lead him into the snare of becoming as bad as his reputation. Despair of recovering reputation might, in a weak moment, lead some into recklessness of living (Jeremiah 18. 12). The reason why only moral qualities of a general kind are specified is he presupposes in candidates for a bishopric the special gifts of the Spirit (ch. 4. 12) and true faith, which he desires to be evidenced outwardly; also he requires qualifications in a bishop not so indispensable in others. 8. The deacons were chosen by the voice of the people. CYPRIAN, Epistle 2. 3, says that good bishops never departed from the old custom of consulting the people. The deacons answer to the chazzan of the synagogue: the attendant ministers, or subordinate coadjutors of the presbyter (as Timothy himself was to Paul, ch. 4. 6; Philemon 13; and John Mark, Acts 13. 5). Their duty was to read the Scriptures in the Church, to instruct the catechumens in Christian truths, to assist the presbyters at the sacraments, to receive oblations, and to preach and instruct. As the chazzan covered and uncovered the ark in the synagogue, containing the law, so the deacon in the ancient Church put the covering on the communicable. (See CHRYSOSTOM, 19., Homily on Acts; THEOPHYLACT on Luke 19.; and BALSAMAN on Canon 22., Council of Laodicea.) The appointing of "the seven" in Acts 6. is perhaps not meant to describe the first appointment of the deacons of the Church. At least the chazzan previously suggested the similar order of deacons. double-tongued—lit., "of double-speech;" saying one thing to this person, and another to that person. [THEODORUS.] The extensive personal intercourse that deacons would have with the members of the Church might prove a temptation to such a fault. Others explain it, "Saying one thing, thinking another" (Proverbs 23. 19; Galatians 2. 15). I prefer the former. not greedy of filthy lucre—All gain is filthy (lit., "base") which is set before a man as a by-end in his work for God [ALFORD] (1 Peter 5. 2). The deacon's office of collecting and distributing alms would render this a necessary qualification. 9. the mystery of the faith—Holding the faith, which to the natural man remains a mystery, but which has been revealed by the Spirit to them (Romans 16. 25; 1 Corinthians 2. 7-10), in a pure conscience (ch. 1. 5, 16). ("Pure," i. e., in which nothing base or foreign is intermixed. [TITTMANN.] Though deacons were not ordinarily called on to preach (Stephen and Philip are not exceptions to this, since it was as evangelists, rather than as deacons, they preached), yet as being office-bearers in the Church, and having much intercourse with all the members, they especially needed to have this characteristic, which every Christian ought to have. 10. "And moreover," &c. [ALFORD.] be proved—not by a period of probation, but by a searching inquiry, conducted by Timothy, the ordaining president (ch. 5. 22), whether they be "blameless;" then when found so, "let them act as deacons." "Blameless;" the Greek, "unexceptionable;" as the result of public investigation unaccused. [TITTMANN.] 11. their wives—rather, "the women," i. e., the deaconesses. For there is no reason that special rules should be laid down as to the wives of the deacons, and not also as to the wives of the bishops or overseers. Moreover, if the wives of the deacons were meant, there seems no reason for the omission of "their" (not in the Greek). Also the Greek καὶ οὕτως ("even so" (the same as for "likewise," v. 8, and "in Mac-wanner," ch. 2. 9), denotes a transition to another class of persons. Further, there were doubtless deaconesses at Ephesus, such as Phoebe was at Cenchrea (Romans 16. 1, "servant," Greek, deaconess), yet no mention is made of them in this Epistle if not here; whereas, supposing them to be meant here, ch. 8. embraces in due proportion all the persons in the service of the Church. Naturally after specifying the qualifications of the deacon, Paul passes to those of the kindred office, the deaconess. "Grave" occurs in the case both. "Not slanderers" here, answers to "not double-tongued" in the deacons; so "not false accusers" (Titus 2. 3). "Sober" here answers to "not given to much wine," in the case of the deacons (v. 3). Thus it appears he requires the same qualifications in female deacons as in deacons, only with such modifications as the difference of sex suggested. PLINY, in his celebrated letter to Trajan, calls them "female ministers" faithful in all things—of life as well as faith. Trustworthy in respect to the alms committed to them and their other functions, answering to "not greedy of filthy lucre," v. 8, in the case of the deacons. 12. husbands of one wife—(Note, v. 2.) ruling their children—There is no article in the Greek, "ruling children;" implying that he regarded the having children to rule as a qualification (v. 4; Titus 1. 6). their own houses—as distinguished from "the Church of God" (Note, v. 5). In the case of the deacons, as in that of the bishops, he mentions the first condition of receiving office, rather than the special qualifications for its discharge. The practical side of Christianity is the one most dwelt on in the Pastoral Epistles, in opposition to the heretical teachers; moreover, as the miraculous gifts began to be withdrawn, the safest criterion of efficiency would be the previous moral character of the candidate, the disposition and talent for the office being presupposed. So in Acts 6. 3, a similar criterion was applied, "Look ye out among you seven men of honest report." Less stress is laid on personal dignity in the case of the deacon than in that of the bishop (Notes, cf. v. 2. 3). 13. purchase to themselves a good degree—lit., "are acquiring . . . a . . . step." Understood by many as "a higher step," i. e., promotion to the higher office of presbyter. But ambition of rising seems hardly the motive to faithfulness which the apostle would urge; besides, it would require the comparative, "a better degree." Then the past aorist participle, "they that used the office of deacon well," implies that the present verb, "are acquiring to themselves boldness," is the result of the completed action of using the diaconate well. Also, St. Paul would not probably hold out to every deacon the prospect of promotion to the presbytery in reward of his service. The idea of moving upwards in Church offices was as yet unknown (cf. Romans 12. 7, &c.; 1 Corinthians 12. 4-11). Moreover, there seems little connection between reference to a higher Church rank and the words "great boldness." Therefore, what those who have faithfully discharged the diaconate acquire for themselves is "a good standing-place" [ALFORD] (a well-grounded hope of salvation) against the day of judgment, ch. 6. 19; 1 Corinthians 8. 13, 14 (the figurative meaning of "degree" or "step," being the degree of worth which one has obtained in the eye of God [WIESINGER]); and boldness (resting on that standing-place), as well for preaching and admonishing others now (Ephesians 6. 19; a firm standing forth for the truth against error), as also especially in relation to God their coming Judge, before whom they may be boldly confident (Acts 24. 16; 1 John 2. 28; 4. 17; 3. 11; Hebrews 4. 16). in the faith—rather as Greek, "in faith," i. e., boldness resting on their own faith, which is in Christ Jesus—resting in Christ Jesus. 14. write I . . . hoping—i. e., "though I hope to come unto thee shortly" (ch. 4. 13). As his hope was not very confident (v. 15), he provides for Timothy's lengthened superintendence by giving him the preceding rules to guide him. He now proceeds to give more general instructions to him as an evangelist, having a "gift" committed to him (ch. 4. 14). shortly—Greek, "sooner" viz., than is presupposed in the preceding directions given to him. See my Introduction on this verse. This verse best suits the theory that this

I TIMOTHY III.

Epistle was not written after Paul's visit and departure from Ephesus (Acts 19. and 20.), when he had resolved to winter at Corinth after passing the summer in Macedonia (Corinthians 16. 6), but after his first imprisonment at Rome (Acts 23.); probably at Corinth, where he might have some thoughts of going on to Epirus before returning to Ephesus. [BIRKS.] 15. But if I tarry long—before coming to thee. that—i. e., I write (v. 14) "that thou mayest know," &c. behave thyself—in directing the Church at Ephesus (ch. 4. 11). the house of God—the Church (Hebrews 3. 2, 5, 6; 10. 21; 1 Peter 4. 17; 1 Corinthians 3. 16, "the temple of God;" Ephesians 2. 22). which is—i. e., inasmuch as it is. the Church—"the congregation." The fact that the sphere of thy functions is "the congregation of the living God" (who is the ever-living Master of the house, 2 Timothy 2. 19, 20, 21), is the strongest motive to faithfulness in this behaviour as president of a department of "the house." The living God forms a striking contrast to the lifeless idol, Diana of Ephesus (1 Thessalonians 1. 9). He is the fountain of "truth," and the foundation of our "trust" (ch. 4. 10). Labour directed to a particular Church is service to the one great house of God, of which each particular Church is a part, and each Christian a living stone (1 Peter 2. 5). the pillar and ground of the truth—evidently predicated of the Church, not of "the mystery of godliness" (an interpretation not started till the 16th century; so BENGEL); for after two weighty predicates, "pillar and ground," and these substantives, the third, a much weaker one, and that an adjective, "confessedly," or "without controversy great," would not come. "Pillar" is soured metaphorically of the three apostles on whom principally the Jewish Christian Church depended (Galatians 2. 9; cf. Revelation 3. 12). The Church is "the pillar of the truth," as the continued existence (historically) of the truth rests on it; for it supports and preserves the word of truth. He who is of the truth belongs by the very fact to the Church. Christ is the alone ground of the truth in the highest sense (1 Corinthians 3. 11). The apostles are foundations in a secondary sense (Ephesians 2. 20; Revelation 21. 14). The Church rests on the truth as it is in Christ; not the truth on the Church. But the truth as it is in itself is to be distinguished from the truth as it is acknowledged in the world. In the former sense it needs no pillar, but supports itself; in the latter sense, it needs the Church as its pillar, i. e., its supporter and preserver. [BAUMGARTEN.] The importance of Timothy's commission is set forth by reminding him of the excellence of "the house" in which he serves; and this in opposition to the coming heresies which Paul presently forewarns him of immediately after (ch. 4. 1). The Church is to be the stay of the truth and its conservator for the world, and God's instrument for securing its continuance on earth, in opposition to those heresies (Matthew 16. 18; 23. 20). The apostle does not recognize a Church which has not the truth, or has it only in part. Rome falsely claims the promise for herself. But it is not historical descent that constitutes a Church, but this only, that it has truth for its foundation. The absence of the latter unchurches Rome. The "pillar" is the intermediate; the "ground," or "basement" (similar to "foundation," 2 Timothy 2. 19) the final support of the building. [ALFORD.] It is no objection that, having called the Church before "the house of God," he now calls it the "pillar;" for the literal word "Church" immediately precedes the new metaphors: so the Church, or congregation of believers, which before was regarded as the habitation of God, is now, from a different point of view, regarded as the pillar upholding the truth. 16. And—following up v. 15: The pillar of the truth is the Church in which thou art required to minister; "AND (that thou mayest know how grand is that truth which the Church so upholds) confessedly (so the Greek for 'without controversy') great is the mystery of godliness: (viz.) HE WHO (so the oldest MSS. and versions read for 'God') was manifested in (the) flesh (He who) was justified in the Spirit," &c. There is set before us the whole dignity of Christ's person. If He were not essentially superhuman (Titus 2. 13), how could the apostle emphatically declare that He was manifested in (the) flesh? [TREGELLES, Printed text, Greek New Testament.] (John 1. 14; Philippians 2. 7; 1 John 1. 2; 4. 2.) Christ, in all His aspects, is Himself "the mystery of godliness." He who before was hidden "with God" was made manifest (John 1. 1, 14; Romans 16. 25, 26; Colossians 1. 26; 2 Timothy 1. 10; Titus 2. 11; 3. 4; 1 John 3. 5, 8), "Confessedly," i. e., by the universal confession of the members of "the Church," which is in this respect the "pillar" or upholder "of the truth." the mystery—the Divine scheme embodied in CHRIST (Colossians 1. 27), once hidden from, but now revealed to, us who believe. of godliness—rather, "piety;" a different Greek word expresses godliness (ch. 2. 10). In opposition to the ungodliness or impiety inseparable from error (departure from the faith "doctrines of devils," "profane fables," ch. 4. 1, 7; cf. ch. 6. 3). To the victims of such error, the "mystery of piety" (i. e., Christ Himself) remains a mystery unrevealed (ch. 4. 2). It is accessible only to "piety" (v. 9): in relation to the pious it is termed a "mystery," though revealed (1 Corinthians 2. 7-14), to imply the excellence of Him who is the surpassing essential subject of it, and who is Himself "wonderful" (Isaiah 9. 6), surpassing knowledge (Ephesians 3. 18, 19), cf. Ephesians 5. 32. The apostle now proceeds to unfold this confessedly great mystery in its details. It is not unlikely that some formula of confession or hymn existed in the Church and was generally accepted, to which Paul alludes in the words "confessedly great is the mystery," &c., (to wit) "He who was manifested," &c. Such hymns were then used (cf. Ephesians 5. 19; Colossians 3. 16). PLINY, 1. 10, Ep. 97, "They are wont on a fixed day before dawn to meet and sing a hymn in alternate responses to Christ, as being God;" and EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 5. 28. The short unconnected sentences with the words similarly arranged, and the number of syllables almost equal, and the ideas antithetically related, are characteristics of a Christian hymn. The clauses stand in parallelism; each two are connected as a pair, and form an antithesis turning on the opposition of heaven to earth; the order of this antithesis is reversed in each new pair of clauses: flesh and spirit, angels and Gentiles, world and glory; and there is a correspondence between the first and the last clause: "manifested in the flesh, received up into glory." [WIESINGER.] justified—i. e., approved to be righteous. [ALFORD.] Christ, whilst "in the flesh," seemed to be just such a one as men in the flesh, and in fact bore their sin; but by having died to sin, and having risen again, He gained for Himself and His people justifying righteousness (Isaiah 50. 8; John 16. 10; Acts 22. 14; Romans 4. 25; 6. 7, 10; Hebrews 9. 28; 1 Peter 3. 18; 4. 1; 1 John 2. 1) [BENGEL]; or rather, as the antithesis to "was manifested in the flesh" requires. He was justified in the Spirit at the same time that He was manifest in the flesh, i. e., He was vindicated as Divine "in His Spirit," i. e., in His higher nature; in contrast to "in the flesh," His visible human nature. This contrasted opposition requires "in the Spirit" to be thus explained: not "by the Spirit," as ALFORD explains it. See Romans 1. 3, 4, "Made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." So "justified" is used to mean vindicated in one's true character (Matthew 11. 19; Luke 7. 35; Romans 8. 4). His manifestation "in the flesh" exposed him to misapprehension, as though he were nothing more (John 6. 41; 7. 27). His justification, or vindication, in respect to His Spirit or higher being, was effected by ALL that manifested that higher being, His words (Matthew 7. 29; John 7. 46), His works (John 2. 11; 8. 2), by His Father's testimony at His baptism (Matthew 3. 17), and at the transfiguration (Matthew 17. 5), and especially by His resurrection (Acts 13. 33; Romans 1. 4), though not by this exclusively, as BENGEL limits it, seen of angels—Answering to "preached unto the Gentiles" (or rather "among the nations," including the Jews), on the other hand (Matthew 28. 19; Romans 16. 25, 26). "Angels saw the Son of God with us, not having seen Him before" [CHRYSOBOSTOM] "not even they had seen His Divine nature, which is not visible to any creature, but they saw Him incarnate

THEODORET] (Ephesians 8, 10; 1 Peter 1, 12; cf. Colossians 1, 16, 20). What angels came to know by seeing, the nations learned by preaching. He is a new message to the one class as well as to the other; in the wondrous union in His person of things most opposite, viz., heaven and earth, lies "the mystery." [WIESINGER.] If the English Version, "Gentiles," be retained, the antithesis will be between the angels who are so near the Son of God, the Lord of angels, and the Gentiles who were so utterly "afar off" (Ephesians 2, 17). believed on in the world—which lieth in wickedness (1 John 2, 15; 5, 19). Opposed to "glory" (John 8, 16, 17). This followed upon His being "preached" (Romans 10, 14). received up into glory—Greek, "in glory." However, English Version may be retained thus, "Received up (so as now to be) in glory," i. e., into glory (Mark 16, 19; Luke 24, 51; Acts 1, 11). His reception in heaven answers to His reception on earth by being "believed on."

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-16. PREDICTION OF A COMING DEPARTURE FROM THE FAITH: TIMOTHY'S DUTY AS TO IT: GENERAL DIRECTIONS TO HIM. The "mystery of iniquity" here alluded to, and already working (2 Thessalonians 2, 7), stands opposed to the "mystery of godliness" just mentioned (1 Timothy 3, 16). 1. Now—Greek, "But." In contrast to the "mystery of godliness," the Spirit-speaking by the prophets in the Church (whose prophecies rested on those of the Old Testament, Daniel 7, 25; 8, 23, &c.; 11, 30, as also on those of Jesus in the New Testament, Matthew 24, 11-24), and also by Paul himself, 2 Thessalonians 2, 3 (with whom accord 2 Peter 3, 3; 1 John 2, 18; Jude 18) expressly—"in plain words." This shows that he refers to prophecies of the Spirit then lying before him. in the latter times—in the times following upon the times in which he is now writing. Not some remote future, but times immediately subsequent, the beginnings of the apostasy being already discernible (Acts 20, 29): these are the forerunners of "the last days" (2 Timothy 3, 1). depart from the faith—The apostasy was to be within the Church, the faithful one becoming the harlot. In 2 Thessalonians 2, 3 (written earlier), the apostasy of the Jews from God (joining the heathen against Christianity) is the groundwork on which the prophecy rises; whereas here, in the Pastoral Epistles, the prophecy is connected with Gnostic errors, the seeds of which had already been sown in the Church [AUBERLEN] (2 Timothy 2, 18). Apollonius Tyaneus, a heretic, came to Ephesus in the lifetime of Timothy. giving heed—(Ch. 1, 4; Titus 1, 14.) seducing spirits—working in the heretical teachers. 1 John 4, 2, 3, 6, "the spirit of error," opposed to "the spirit of truth," "the Spirit" which "speaketh" in the true prophets against them. doctrines of devils—lit., "teachings of (i. e., suggested by) demons." James 3, 15, "wisdom-devilish;" 2 Corinthians 11, 15, "Satan's ministers." 2. Rather translate, "Through (lit., 'in.' the element in which the apostasy has place) the hypocrisy of lying speakers;" this expresses the means through which "some shall (be led to) depart from the faith," viz., the feigned sanctity of the seducers (cf. "deceivers," Titus 1, 10). having their conscience seared—Greek, "having their own conscience," &c., i. e., not only "speaking lies" to others, but also having their own conscience seared. Professing to lead others to holiness, their own conscience is all the while defiled. Bad consciences always have recourse to hypocrisy. As faith and a good conscience are joined (ch. 1, 5); so hypocrisy (i. e., unbelief, Matthew 24, 5, 51; cf. Luke 12, 46) and a bad conscience here. THEODORET explains like English Version, "seared," as implying their extreme insensibility; the effect of cauterizing being to deaden sensation. The Greek, however, primarily means "branded" with the consciousness of crimes committed against their better knowledge and conscience, like so many scars burnt in by a branding-iron. Cf. Titus 1, 15; & U, "condemned of himself." They are conscious of the brand within, and yet with a hypocritical show of sanctity they strive to seduce others. As "a seal" is used in a good sense (2 Timothy 2, 19), so "a brand" in a bad sense. The image is taken from the branding of criminals. 3. Sensuality leads to false spiritualism. Their own inward impurity is reflected in their eyes in the world without them, and hence their asceticism (Titus 1, 14, 15). [WIESINGER.] By a spurious spiritualism (2 Timothy 2, 18), which made moral perfection consist in abstinence from outward things, they pretended to attain to a higher perfection. Matthew 19, 10-12; cf. 1 Corinthians 7, 8, 28, 33, gave a seeming handle to their "forbidding marriage" (contrast ch. 5, 14), and the Old Testament distinction as to clean and unclean, gave a pretext for teaching to "abstain from meats" (cf. Colossians 2, 16, 17, 20-23). As these Judaizing Gnostics combined the harlot or apostate Old Testament Church with the beast (Revelation 17, 3), or Gnostic spiritualizing anti-Christianity, so Rome's Judaizing elements (ch. 4, 3) shall ultimately be combined with the open worldly-wise anti-Christianity of the false prophet or beast (ch. 6, 20, 21; Colossians 2, 8; 1 John 4, 1-3; Revelation 13, 12-15). Austerity gained for them a show of sanctity whilst preaching false doctrine (Colossians 2, 23). EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 4, 29, quotes from IRENÆUS (1, 28), a statement that Saturninus, Marcion, and the Encratites, preached abstinence from marriage and animal meats. Paul prophetically warns against such notions, the seeds of which already were being sown (ch. 6, 20; 2 Timothy 2, 17, 18). to be received—Greek, "to be partaken of." of them—lit., (created and designed) "for them," &c. Though all (even the unbelieving, Psalm 104, 14; Matthew 5, 45) are partakers in these foods created by God, "they which believe" alone fulfil God's design in creation by partaking of them with thanksgiving; as opposed to those who abstain from them, or in partaking of them, do not do so with thanksgiving. The unbelieving have not the designed use of such foods by reason of their "conscience being defiled" (Titus 1, 15). The children of God alone "inherit the earth;" for obedience is the necessary qualification (as it was in the original grant of the earth to Adam, which they alone possess. and know the truth—Explanatory and defining who are "they which believe." Translate as Greek, "And have full knowledge of the truth" (Note, Philippians 1, 9). Thus he contradicts the assumption of superior knowledge and higher moral perfection, put forward by the heretics, on the ground of their abstinence from marriage and meats. "The truth" stands in opposition to their "lies" (v. 2). 4, 5. Translate as Greek, "Because" (expressing a reason resting on an objective fact; or, as here, a Scripture quotation)—"For" (a reason resting on something subjective in the writer's mind). every creature . . . good—(Genesis 1, 31; Romans 14, 14, 20.) A refutation by anticipation of the Gnostic opposition to creation; the seeds of which were now lurking latently in the Church. Judaism (Acts 10, 11-16; 1 Corinthians 10, 25, 26) was the starting-point of the error as to meats: Oriental Gnosticism added new elements. The old Gnostic heresy is now almost extinct; but its remains in the celibacy of Rome's priesthood, and in its fasts from animal meats, enjoined under the penalty of mortal sin, remain. if . . . with thanksgiving—Meats, though pure in themselves, become impure by being received with an unthankful mind (Romans 14, 6; Titus 1, 15). 5. sanctified—"hallowed:" set apart as holy for the use of believing men: separated from "the creature," which is under the bondage of vanity and corruption (Romans 8, 19, &c.). Just as in the Lord's Supper, the thanksgiving prayer sanctifies the elements, separating them from their naturally alien position in relation to the spiritual world, and transferring them to their true relation to the new life. So in every use of the creature, thanksgiving prayer has the same effect, and ought always to be used (1 Corinthians 10, 30, 31). by the word of God and prayer—i. e., "by means of intercessory prayer" (so the Greek)—i. e., consecratory prayer in behalf of "the creature" or food—that prayer mainly consisting of "the word of God." The Apostolic Constitutions, 7, 49, give this ancient grace, almost wholly consisting of Scripture, "Blessed art thou, O Lord, who feedest me from my youth, who givest food to all flesh: Fill our hearts with joy and gladness, that we, having all sufficiency, may abound unto every good work in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom glory, honour, and might, be to thee for ever. Amen." In the case of inspired men, "the word of God" would refer to their inspired prayers (1 Kings 17. 1); but as Paul speaks in general, including uninspired men's thanksgiving for meals, the "word of God" more probably refers to the Scripture words used in thanksgiving prayers. 6. If thou put . . . in remembrance—rather as Greek, "If thou suggest to (bring under the notice of) the brethren," &c. these things—viz., the truths stated in v. 4, 5, in opposition to the errors foretold, v. 1-3. minister—"servant." nourished up—The Greek is present, not past: "Continually being nourished in" (2 Timothy 1. 5; 3. 14, 15). the words of faith—rather, ". . . of the faith" (cf. v. 12). good doctrine—"the good teaching." Explanatory of "the faith," in opposition to the "teachings of demons" (English Version, doctrines of devils, v. 1) which Timothy was to counteract. Cf. "sound doctrine" (ch. 1. 10; 6. 3; Titus 1. 9; 2. 1). whereunto thou hast attained—"the course of which thou hast followed;" hast followed along by tracing its course and accompanying it. [ALFORD.] Thou hast begun to follow up. [BENGEL.] The same Greek occurs, "Thou hast fully known" (2 Timothy 3. 10), "having had perfect understanding" (Luke 1. 8). It is an undesigned coincidence that the Greek verb is used only by Paul and Paul's companion, Luke. 7. refuse—reject, avoid, have nothing to do with (2 Timothy 2. 23; Titus 3. 10). old wives' fables—ancient myths (ch. 1. 4, 9; Titus 1. 14). They are "profane," because leading away from "godliness" or "piety" (ch. 1. 4-7; 6. 20; 2 Timothy 2. 16; Titus 1. 1, 2). exercise thyself—lit., "exercise thyself" as one undergoing training in a gymnasium. Let thy self-discipline be not in ascetical exercises as the false teachers (v. 3, 8; cf. 2 Timothy 2. 22, 23; Hebrews 5. 14; 11. 11), but with a view to godliness or "piety" (ch. 6. 11, 12). 8. but little—Greek, "profiteth to (but) a small extent." Paul does not deny that fasting and abstinence from conjugal intercourse for a time, with a view to reaching the inward man through the outward, do profit somewhat, Acts 13. 3; 1 Corinthians 7. 5, 7; 9. 23, 27 (though in its degenerate form, asceticism, dwelling solely on what is outward, v. 3, is not only not profitable but injurious). Timothy seems to have had a leaning to such outward self-discipline (cf. ch. 5. 23). Paul, therefore, whilst not disapproving of this in its due proportion and place, shows the vast superiority of godliness or piety, as being profitable not merely "to a small extent," but unto all things; for, having its seat within, it extends thence to the whole outward life of a man. Not unto one portion only of his being, but to every portion of it, bodily and spiritual, temporal and eternal. [ALFORD.] "He who has piety (which is 'profitable unto all things') wants nothing needed to his well-being, even though he be without those helps which, 'to a small extent,' bodily exercise furnishes." [CALVIN.] "Piety," which is the end for which thou art to "exercise thyself" (v. 7), is the essential thing: the means are secondary. having promise, &c.—translate as Greek, "Having promise of life, that which now is, and that which is to come." "Life" in its truest and best sense now and hereafter (2 Timothy 1. 1). Length of life now so far as it is really good for the believer; life in its truest enjoyments and employments now, and life blessed and eternal hereafter (Matthew 6. 33; Mark 10. 29, 30). "Now in this time" (Psalm 84. 11; 112.; Romans 8. 23; 1 Corinthians 3. 21, 22, "all things are yours . . . the world, life . . . things present, things to come"). Christianity, which seems to aim only at our happiness hereafter, effectually promotes it here (ch. 6. 6; 2 Peter 1. 3). Cf. Solomon's prayer and the answer (1 Kings 3. 7-13). 9. (Ch. 1. 15.) This verse (Greek), "faithful is the saying," &c., confirms the assertion as to the "promise" attached to "godliness," v. 8 and forms a prefatory introduction to v. 10 which is joined to v. 9 by "for." So 2 Timothy 2. 11. Godly men seem to suffer loss as to this life: Paul hereby refutes the notion. [BENGEL.] "God is the Saviour specially of those that believe" (v. 10), both as to "the life that now is," and also as to "the life which is to come"

(v. 8). 10. therefore—(Greek, "with a view to this." The reason why "we both" ('both' is omitted in the oldest MSS.) labour (endure hardship) and suffer reproach (some oldest MSS. read 'strive') is because we have rested, and do rest our hope, on the living (and therefore, life-giving, v. 8) God." Saviour—even in this life (v. 8). specially . . . those that believe—Their "labour and reproach" are not inconsistent with their having from the living God, their Saviour, even the present life (Mark 10. 30), "a hundred-fold now in this time . . . with persecutions", much more the life to come. If God is in a sense "Saviour" of unbelievers (ch. 2. 4, i. e., is willing to be so everlastingly, and is temporally here their Preserver and Benefactor), much more of believers. He is the Saviour of all men potentially (ch. 1. 15); of believers alone effectually. 11. These truths, to the exclusion of those useless and even injurious teachings (v. 1-3), whilst weighing well thyself, charge also upon others. 12. Let no man despise thy youth—Act so as to be respected in spite of thy youth (1 Corinthians 13. 11; Titus 2. 15); cf. "youthful" as to Timothy (2 Timothy 2. 22). He was but a mere youth when he joined St. Paul (Acts 16. 1-3). Eleven years had elapsed since then to the time subsequent to Paul's first imprisonment. He was, therefore, still young; especially in comparison with Paul, whose place he was filling; also in relation to elderly presbyters whom he should "entreat as a father" (ch. 5. 1), and generally in respect to his duties in rebuking, exhorting, and ordaining (ch. 3. 1), which ordinarily accord best with an elderly person (ch. 5. 19). be thou an example—Greek, "become a pattern" (Titus 2. 7). The true way of making men not to despise (slight, or disregard) thy youth, in word—in all that thou sayest in public and private. conversation—i. e., "behaviour:" the Old English sense of the word. in charity . . . faith—the two cardinal principles of the Christian (Galatians 5. 6). The oldest MSS. omit "in spirit." in purity—simplicity of holy motive followed out in consistency of holy action [ALFORD] (ch. 5. 22; 2 Corinthians 6. 6; James 3. 17; 4. 8; 1 Peter 1. 22). 13. Till I come—when Timothy's commission would be superseded for the time by the presence of the apostle himself (ch. 1. 3; 3. 14). reading—especially in the public congregation. The practice of reading Scripture was transferred from the Jewish synagogue to the Christian Church (Luke 4. 16-20; Acts 13. 15; 15. 21; 2 Corinthians 3. 14). The New Testament Gospel and Epistles being recognized as inspired by those who had the gift of discerning spirits, were from the first, according as they were written, read along with the Old Testament in the Church (1 Thessalonians 5. 21, 27; Colossians 4. 16). [JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology, 1. 67.] I think that whilst public reading is the prominent thought, the Spirit intended also to teach that Scripture reading in private should be "the fountain of all wisdom from which pastors ought to draw whatever they bring before their flock." [ALFORD.] exhortation—addressed to the feelings and will with a view to the regulation of the conduct. doctrine—Greek (ministerial), "teaching" or instruction. Addressed to the understanding, so as to impart knowledge (ch. 6. 2; Romans 12. 7, 8). Whether in public or private, exhortation and instruction should be based on Scripture reading. 14. Neglect not the gift—by letting it lie unused. In 2 Timothy 1. 6 the gift is represented as a spark of the Spirit lying within him, and sure to smoulder by neglect, the stirring up or keeping in lively exercise of which depends on the will of him on whom it is bestowed (Matthew 25. 18, 25, 27, 28). The charism or spiritual gift, is that of the Spirit which qualified him for "the work of an evangelist" (Ephesians 4. 11; 2 Timothy 4. 5), or perhaps the gift of discerning spirits, specially needed in his function of ordaining, as overseer. [BISHOP HINDS.] given thee—by God (1 Corinthians 12. 4, 6). by prophecy—i. e., by the Holy Spirit, at his general ordination, or else consecration, to the special see of Ephesus, speaking through the prophets God's will to give him the graces needed to qualify him for his work (ch. 1. 18; Acts 13. 1-3). with . . . laying on of . . . hands—So in Joshua's case, Numbers 27. 18-20; Deuteronomy 34. 9. The gift was connected with the sym-

bolical act of laying on hands. But the Greek "WITH" implies that the presbyter's laying on hands was the mere accompaniment of the conferring of the gift. "BY" (2 Timothy 1. 6) implies that Paul's laying on his hands was the actual instrument of its being conferred. of the presbytery—In 2 Timothy 1. 6 the apostle mentions only his own laying on of hands. But there his aim is to remind Timothy specially of the part he himself took in imparting to him the gift. Here he mentions the fact, quite consistent with the other, that the neighbouring presbyters took part in the ordination or consecration, he, however, taking the foremost part. Paul, though having the general oversight of the elders everywhere, was an elder himself (1 Peter 5. 1; 2 John 1). The Jewish council was composed of the elders of the Church (the presbytery, Luke 22. 66; Acts 22. 5), and a presiding rabbi; so the Christian Church was composed of apostles, elders, and a president (Acts 15. 16). As the president of the synagogue was of the same order as his presbyters, so the bishop was of the same order as his presbyters. At the ordination of the president of the synagogue there were always three presbyters present to lay on hands, so the early Church canons required three bishops to be present at the consecration of a bishop. As the president of the synagogue, so the bishop of the Church alone could ordain, he acting as the representative, and in the name of the whole presbytery. [VITRINGA.] So, in the Anglican Church, the bishop ordains, the presbyters or priests present joining with him in laying on hands. 15. Meditate—Greek, "Meditate CAREFULLY upon" (Psalm 1. 2; 119. 15; cf. "Isaac," Genesis 24. 63). these things—(v. 12-14.) As food would not nourish without digestion, which assimilates the food to the substance of the body, so spiritual food, in order to profit us, needs to be appropriated by prayerful meditation. give thyself wholly to—lit., "BE in these things;" let them engross thee wholly; be wholly absorbed in them. Entire self-dedication, as in other pursuits, so especially in religion, is the secret of proficiency. There are changes as to all other studies, fashionable to-day, out of fashion to-morrow; this study alone is never obsolete, and when made the all-engrossing aim sanctifies all other studies. The exercise of the ministry threatens the spirit of the ministry, unless it be sustained within. The minister must be first his own scholar before he can be another's teacher. profiting—Greek, "progress" towards perfection in the Christian life, and especially towards the fullest realization of the ideal of a Christian minister (v. 12). may appear to all—not for thy glory, but for the winning of souls (Matthew 5. 16). 16. Take heed—Give heed (Acts 3. 5). thyself, and . . . doctrine—"and unto thy teaching." The two requisites of a good pastor; His teaching will be of no avail, unless his own life accord with it; and his own purity of life is not enough, unless he be diligent in teaching. [CALVIN.] This verse is a summary of v. 12. continue in them—(2 Timothy 3. 14.) in doing this—not "by doing this," as though he could save himself by works. thou shalt . . . save thyself, and them, &c.—(Ezekiel 33. 9; James 5. 20.) In performing faithfully his duty to others, the minister is promoting his own salvation. Indeed he cannot "give heed unto the teaching" of others, unless he be at the same time "giving heed unto himself."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-25. GENERAL DIRECTIONS AS TO HOW TIMOTHY SHOULD DEAL WITH DIFFERENT CLASSES IN THE CHURCH. 1. an elder—in age; probably not an elder in the ministry; these latter are not mentioned till v. 17, "the elders that rule." Cf. Acts 2. 17, "Your old men," lit., "elders." Contrasted with "the younger men." As Timothy was admonished so to conduct himself as to give no man reason to despise his youth (ch. 4. 12); so here he is told to bear in mind his youth, and to behave with the modesty which becomes a young man in relation to his elders. "Rebuke," lit., "Strike hard upon;" Rebuke not sharply: a different word from "rebuke," 2 Timothy 4. 2. entreat—exhort. as brethren—and therefore equals; not lording it over them (1 Peter 5. 1-3). 2. with all purity—Respectful treatment of the other sex will promote "purity." 3. Honour—by setting on the Church-roll, as fit objects of charitable sustenance (v. 9, 17, 18; Acts 6. 1). So "honour" is used for support with necessaries (Matthew 15. 4, 6; Acts 28. 10). widows indeed—(v. 16.) Those really desolate not like those (v. 4) having children or relations answerable for their support, nor like those (in v. 6) "who live in pleasure;" but such as, from their earthly desolation as to friends, are most likely to trust wholly in God, persevere in continual prayers, and carry out the religious duties assigned to Church widows (v. 5). Care for widows was transferred from the Jewish economy to the Christian (Deuteronomy 14. 29; 16. 11; 24. 17, 19). 4. if any widow—not "a widow indeed," as having children who ought to support her. nephews—rather, as Greek, "descendants," or "grandchildren." [HESYCHIUS.] Nephews in old English meant grandchildren [HOOKER, Ecclesiastical Polity, 5. 20]. let them—the children and descendants. learn first—ere it falls to the Church to support them. to show piety at home—filial piety towards their widowed mother or grandmother, by giving her sustenance. lit., ". . . towards their own house." "Piety is applied to the reverential discharge of filial duties; as the parental relation is the earthly representation of God our heavenly Father's relation to us. "Their own" stands in opposition to the Church, in relation to which the widow is comparatively a stranger. She has a claim on her own children, prior to her claim on the Church; let them fulfil this prior claim which she has on them, by sustaining her and not burdening the Church. parents—Greek, (living) "progenitors," i. e., their mother or grandmother, as the case may be. "Let them learn," implies that abuses of this kind had crept into the Church, widows claiming Church support, though they had children or grandchildren able to support them. good and—The oldest MSS. omit. The words are probably inserted by a transcriber from ch. 2. 3. 5. widow indeed, and desolate—contrasted with her who has children or grandchildren to support her (v. 4). trusteth in God—Perfect tense in Greek, "Hath rested, and doth rest her hope in God." This v. 5 adds another qualification in a widow for Church maintenance, besides her being "desolate" or destitute of children to support her. She must be not one "that liveth in pleasure" (v. 6), but one making God her main hope (the accusative in Greek expresses that God is the ultimate aim whereto her hope is directed; whereas, ch. 4. 10, dative expresses hope resting on God as her present stay [WIESINGER]), and continuing instantly in prayers. Her destitution of children, and of all ties to earth, would leave her more unencumbered for devoting the rest of her days to God and the Church (1 Corinthians 7. 33, 34). Cf. also "Anna a widow," who remained unmarried after her husband's death, and "departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers day and night" (Luke 2. 36, 37). Such a one, Paul implies, would be the fittest object for the Church's help (v. 3); for such a one is promoting the cause of Christ's Church by her prayers for it. "Arduous in prayers flows from hoping confidence in God." [LEO.] in supplications and prayers—Greek, "in her supplications and prayers;" the former signifies asking under a sense of need, the latter, prayer (Notes, ch. 2. 1; Philippians 4. 6). night and day—Another coincidence with Luke (Luke 18. 7, "cry day and night"); contrast Satan's accusations "day and night" (Revelation 12. 10). 6. she that liveth in pleasure—the opposite of such a widow as is described v. 5, and therefore one utterly undeserving of Church charity. The Greek expresses wanton prodigality and excess. [TITTMANN.] The root expresses weaving at a fast rate, and so lavish excess (Note, James 5. 6). dead while she liveth—dead in the Spirit whilst alive in the flesh (Matthew 8. 22; Ephesians 5. 14). 7. these things—just now spoken (v. 5, 6). that they may be blameless—viz., the widows supported by the Church. 8. But—Reverting to v. 4, "If any (a general proposition, therefore including in its application the widow's children or grandchildren) provide not for his own (relations in general), and especially for those of his own house (in particular), he hath (practically) denied the faith." Faith without love and its works is dead; "for the subject-matter of faith is not mere opinion, but the grace and truth of God, to which he that believes gives up his spirit, as he that loves gives up his heart." [MACK.] If in any case a duty of love is plain, it is in relation to one's own relatives; to fail in so plain an obligation is a plain proof of want of love, and therefore of want of faith. "Faith does not set aside natural duties, but strengthens them." [BENGEL.] worse than an infidel—because even an infidel (or unbeliever) is taught by nature to provide for his own relatives, and generally recognizes the duty; the Christian who does not so, is worse (Matthew 5. 46, 47). He has less excuse with his greater light, than the infidel who may break the laws of nature. 9. Translate, "As a widow (i. e., of the ecclesiastical order of widowhood, a kind of female presbytery), let none be enrolled (in the catalogue) who is less than sixty years old." These were not deaconesses, who were chosen at a younger age (forty was the age fixed at the Council of Chalcedon), and who had virgins (in a later age called widows) as well as widows among them, but a band of widows set apart, though not yet formally and finally, to the service of God and the Church. Traces of such a class appear in Acts 9. 41. Dorcas herself was such a one. As it was expedient (Note, ch. 3. 2; Titus 1. 6) that the presbyter or bishop should have been but once married, so also in her case. There is a transition here to a new subject. The reference here cannot be, as in v. 8, to providing Church sustenance for them. For the restriction to widows above sixty would then be needless and harsh, since many widows might be in need of help at a much earlier age; as also the rule that the widow must not have been twice married, especially since he himself, below (v. 14), enjoins the younger widows to marry again; as also that she must have brought up children. Moreover, v. 10 presupposes some competence, at least in past times, and so poor widows would be excluded, the very class requiring charity. Also, v. 11 would then be senseless, for then their re-marrying would be a benefit, not an injury, to the Church, as relieving it of the burden of their sustentance. TERTULLIAN, De Velandis Virginibus, c. 9., HERMAS, Shepherd, B. 1. 2, and CHRYSOSTOM, Homily 81, mention such an order of ecclesiastical widowhood, each one not less than sixty years old, and resembling the presbyters in the respect paid to them, and in some of their duties; they ministered with sympathizing counsel to other widows and to orphans, a ministry to which their own experimental knowledge of the feelings and sufferings of the bereaved adapted them, and had a general supervision of their sex. Age was doubtless a requisite in presbyters, as it is here stated to have been in presbyteresses, with a view to their influence on the younger persons of their sex. They were supported by the Church, but not the only widows so supported (v. 8, 4). wife of one man—in order not to throw a stumbling-block in the way of Jews and heathen, who regarded with disfavour second marriages (Note, ch. 3. 2; Titus 1. 6). This is the force of "blameless," giving no offence, even in matters indifferent. 10. for good works—Greek, "in honourable (excellent) works;" the sphere or element in which the good report of her had place (Titus 2. 7). This answers to ch. 3. 7, as to the bishop or presbyter, "He must have a good report of them which are without." If—if, in addition to being "well reported of," she, &c. she . . . brought up children—either her own (ch. 3. 4, 12), or those of others, which is one of the "good works;" a qualification adapting her for ministry to orphan children, and to mothers of families. lodged strangers—ch. 3. 2, "given to hospitality," Titus 1. 8; in the case of presbyters. washed . . . saints' feet—after the example of the Lord (John 13. 14); a specimen of the universal spirit of humbly "by love serving one another," which actuated the early Christians. relieved the afflicted—whether by pecuniary or other relief. followed . . . good—(1 Thessalonians 5. 15; cf. instances in Matthew 25. 35, 36.) 11. younger—than sixty years old (v. 9). refuse—to take on the roll of presbyteress widows. wax wanton—lit., "over-strong" (2 Chronicles 28. 16). against Christ—rebellious against Christ, their proper Bridegroom. [JEROME.] they will—Greek, they wish; their desire is to marry again. 12. Having—Bringing on themselves, and so having to bear as a burden (Galatians 5. 10; judgment from God (cf. ch. 3. 6), weighing like a load on them. cast off their first faith—viz., pledged to Christ and the service of the Church. There could be no hardship at the age of sixty or upwards in not marrying again (end of v. 9), for the sake of serving better the cause of Christ as presbyteresses; though, to ordinary widows, no barrier existed against re-marriage (1 Corinthians 7. 39). This is altogether distinct from Rome's unnatural vows of celibacy in the case of young marriageable women. The widow-presbyteresses, moreover, engaged to remain single, not as though single life were holier than married life (according to Rome's teaching), but because the interests of Christ's cause made it desirable (Note, ch. 3. 2). They had pledged "their first faith" to Christ as presbyteress widows; they now wish to transfer their faith to a husband (cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 32, 34). 13. withal—"at the same time, moreover." learn—usually in a good sense. But these women's "learning" is idleness, trifling, and busybodies' tattle. wandering—Greek, "going about." from house to house—of the members of the Church (2 Timothy 3. 6). "They carry the affairs of this house to that, and of that to this; they tell the affairs of all to all." [THEOPHYLACT.] tattlers—lit., "trifling talkers." In 3 John 10, translated "prating." busybodies—mischievously busy; inconsiderately curious (2 Thessalonians 3. 11). Acts 19. 19, "curious," the same Greek. Curiosity usually springs from idleness, which is itself the mother of garrulity. [CALVIN.] speaking—not merely "saying." The subject-matter, as well as the form, is involved in the Greek word. [ALFORD.] which they ought not—(Titus 1. 11.) 14. younger women—rather, as ellipsis ought to be supplied, "the younger widows," viz., younger widows in general, as distinguished from the elder widows taken on the roll of presbyteresses (v. 9). The "therefore" means seeing that young widows are exposed to such temptations, "I will," or "desire," &c. (v. 11-13). The precept here that they should marry again, is not inconsistent with 1 Corinthians 7. 40 for the circumstances of the two cases were distinct (cf. 1 Corinthians 7. 28). Here re-marriage is recommended as an antidote to sexual passion, idleness, and the other evils noted v. 11-13. Of course, where there was no tendency to these evils, marriage again would not be so requisite; St. Paul speaks of what is generally desirable, and supposing there should be danger of such evils, as was likely. "He does not impose a law, but points out a remedy, to younger widows." [CHRYSOSTOM.] bear children—(Ch. 2. 15)—thus gaining one of the qualifications (v. 10) for being afterwards a presbyteress widow, should Providence so ordain it. guide—Greek, "Rule the house" in the woman's due place; not usurping authority over the man (ch. 2. 12). give none occasion—lit., "starting-point;" handle of reproach through the loose conduct of nominal Christians. the adversary—of Christianity, Jew or Gentile. Philippians 1. 28; Titus 2. 8, "He that is of the contrary part." Not Satan, who is introduced in a different relation (v. 15.) to speak reproachfully—lit., "for the sake of reproach" (ch. 3. 7; 6. 1; Titus 2. 5, 10). If the handle were given, the adversary would use it for the sake of reproach. The adversary is eager to exaggerate the faults of a few, and to lay the blame on the whole Church and its doctrines. [BENGEL.] 15. For—For in the case of some this result has already ensued; "Some (widows) are already turned aside after Satan," the seducer (not by falling away from the faith in general, but) by such errors as are stigmatized v. 11-13, sexual passion, idleness, &c., and so have given occasion of reproach (v. 14). "Satan finds some mischief still for the idle hands to do." 16. If any . . . have widows—of his family, however related to him. Most of the oldest MSS. and versions omit "man or," and read, "If any woman that believeth." But the Received text seems preferable. If, however, the weightiest authorities are to prevail, the sense will be, He was speaking of younger widows; He now says, If any believing young widow have widows related to her needing support, let her relieve them, thereby easing the Church of the burden, v. 3, 4 (there it was the children and grand children; here it is the young widow, who, in order to avoid the evils of idleness and wantonness, the result of idleness, v. 11, 13; Ezekiel 16. 49, is to be diligent in good works, such as "relieving the afflicted," v. 10, thus qualifying herself for being afterwards a widow-presbyteress. let them—rather as Greek, "let him," or "her;" "let such a one," &c. (v. 10). be charged—lit., "be burdened" with their support. widows indeed—really helpless and friendless (v. 3, 4). 17. The transition from the widow-presbyteresses (v. 9) to the presbyters here, is natural. rule well—lit., "preside well," with wisdom, ability, and loving faithfulness, over the flock assigned to them. be counted worthy of double honour—i. e., the honour which is expressed by gifts (v. 3, 18), and otherwise. If a presbyter as such, in virtue of his office, is already worthy of honour, he who rules well is doubly so [WIESINGER] (1 Corinthians 9. 14; Galatians 6. 6; 1 Thessalonians 5. 12). Not literally that a presbyter who rules well should get double the salary of one who does not rule well [ALFORD], or of a presbyteress widow, or of the deacons. [CHRYSOSTOM.] "Double" is used for large in general (Revelation 18. 6). especially they who labour in the word and doctrine—Greek, "teaching;" preaching of the word, and instruction, catechetical or otherwise. This implies that of the ruling presbyters there were two kinds, those who laboured in the word and teaching, and those who did not. Lay presbyters, so called merely because of their age, have no place here; for both classes mentioned here alike are ruling presbyters. A college of presbyters is implied as existing in each large congregation. As in ch. 3. their qualifications are spoken of, so here the acknowledgments due to them for their services. 18. the Scripture—(Deuteronomy 25. 4; quoted before in 1 Corinthians 9. 9.) the ox that treadeth out—Greek, "An ox whilst treading," &c. The labourer is worthy of his reward—or "hire;" quoted from Luke 10. 7, whereas Matthew 10. 10 has "his meat," or "food." If St. Paul extends the phrase, "Scripture saith," to this second clause, as well as to the first, he will be hereby recognizing the Gospel of St. Luke, his own helper (whence appears the undesigned appositeness of the quotation), as inspired Scripture. This I think the correct view. The Gospel according to St. Luke was probably in circulation then about eight or nine years. However, it is possible "Scripture saith" applies only to the passage quoted from Deuteronomy 25. 4; and then his quotation will be that of a common proverb, quoted also by the Lord, which commends itself to the approval of all, and is approved by the Lord and His apostle. 19. Against an elder—a presbyter of the Church. receive not—"entertain not." [ALFORD.] but before two or three witnesses—A judicial conviction was not permitted in Deuteronomy 17. 6; 19. 15, except on the testimony of at least two or three witnesses (cf. Matthew 18. 16; John 8. 17; 2 Corinthians 13. 1; 1 John 5. 6, 7). But Timothy's entertaining an accusation against any one is a different case, where the object was not judicially to punish, but to admonish; here he might ordinarily entertain it without the need of two or three witnesses; but not in the case of an elder, since the more earnest an elder was to convince gainsayers (Titus 1. 9), the more exposed would he be to vexatious and false accusations. How important then was it that Timothy should not, without strong testimony, entertain a charge against presbyters, who should, in order to be efficient, be "blameless" (ch. 3. 2; Titus 1. 6). Verses 21, 24 imply that Timothy had the power of judging in the Church. Doubtless he would not condemn any save on the testimony of two or three witnesses, but in ordinary cases he would cite them, as the law of Moses also allowed, though there were only one witness. But in the case of elders, he would require two or three witnesses before even citing them; for their character for innocence stands higher, and they are exposed to envy and calumny more than others. [BENGEL.] "Receive" does not, as ALFORD thinks, include both citation and conviction, but means only the former. 20. Them that sin—whether presbyters or laymen. rebuke before all—publicly before the Church (Matthew 18. 15-17; 1 Corinthians 5. 9-13; Ephesians 5. 11). Not until this "rebuke" was disregarded was the offender to be excommunicated. others . . . fear—that other members of the Church may have a wholesome fear of offending (Deuteronomy 13. 11; Acts 5. 11). 21. I charge thee—rather as Greek, "I adjure thee" so it ought to be translated 2 Timothy 4. 1. before—"in the presence of God." Lord—Omitted in the oldest MSS. God the Father, and Christ the Son, will testify against thee, if thou disregardest my injunction. He vividly sets before Timothy the last judgment, in which God shall be revealed, and Christ seen face to face with His angels. [BENGEL.] elect angels—an epithet of reverence. The objects of Divine electing love (1 Peter 2. 6). Not only "elect" [according to the everlasting purpose of God] in contradistinction to the reprobate angels (2 Peter 2. 4), but also to mark the excellence of the angels in general [as God's chosen ministers, "holy angels," "angels of light"], and so to give more solemnity to their testimony [CALVIN] as witnesses to Paul's adjuration. Angels take part by action and sympathy in the affairs of the earth (Luke 15. 10; 1 Corinthians 4. 9). these things—the injunctions, v. 19, 20. without preferring one before another—rather as Greek, "prejudice;" "judging before" hearing all the facts of a case. There ought to be judgment, but not prejudging. Cf. "suddenly," v. 22; also v. 24. partiality—in favour of a man, as "prejudice" is bias against a man. Some of the oldest MSS. read, "in the way of summoning (brethren) before a (heathen) judge." But Vulgate and other good authorities favour the more probable reading in English Version. 22. Lay hands—i. e., ordain (ch. 4. 14; 2 Timothy 1. 6; Titus 1. 5). The connection is with v. 19. The way to guard against scandals occurring in the case of presbyters is, be cautious as to the character of the candidate before ordaining him; this will apply to other Church officers so ordained, as well as to presbyters. Thus, this clause refers to v. 19, as next clause, "neither be partaker of other men's sins," refers to v. 20. ELLICOTT, WIESINGER, &c., understand it of receiving back into Church fellowship or absolution, by laying hands on those who had been "rebuked" (v. 20) and then excommunicated (Matthew 18. 17); v. 20 favours this. But as in ch. 4. 14, and Acts 6. 6, 13. 3; 2 Timothy 1. 6, the laying on of hands is used of ordination (cf. however as to confirmation, Acts 8. 17), it seems better to take it so here. suddenly—hastily: v. 24, 25 show that waiting for a time is salutary. neither be partaker of other men's sins—by negligence in ordaining godly candidates, and so becoming in some degree responsible for their sins. Or, there is the same transition from the elders to all in general who may sin, as in v. 19, 20. Be not a partaker in other men's sins by not "rebuking them that sin before all," as well as those that are candidates for the presbytery, as also all "that sin." keep thyself pure—"THYSELF" is emphatic. "Keep THYSELF" clear of participation in OTHER men's sin by not failing to rebuke them that sin (v. 20). Thus the transition is easy to v. 23, which is concerning Timothy personally; cf. also v. 24. 23. no longer—as a habit. This injunction to drink wine occasionally is a modification of the preceding "keep thyself pure." The presbyter and deacon were enjoined to be "not given to wine" (ch. 3. 3, 8). Timothy seems to have had a tendency to undue ascetical strictness on this point (cf. Note, ch. 4. 8; cf. the Nazarene vow, Numbers 6. 1-4; John Baptist, Luke 1. 15; Romans 14). Paul therefore modifies the preceding words, "keep thyself pure," virtually saying, "Not that I mean to enjoin that kind of purity which consists in asceticism, nay, be no longer a water-drinker," i. e., no longer drink only water, but use a little wine, as much as is needed for thy health. So ELLICOTT and WIESINGER. ALFORD thus: Timothy was of a feeble frame (Note, 1 Corinthians 16. 10, 11), and prone to timidity in his duties as overseer where vigorous action was needed; hence Paul exhorts him to take all proper means to raise his bodily condition above these infirmities. God hereby commands believers to use all due means for preserving health, and condemns by anticipation the human traditions which among various sects have denied the use of wine to the faithful. 24. Two kinds of sins are specified: those palpably manifest (so the Greek for "open beforehand" ought to be translated so it Hebrews 7. 14, it is translated "evident;" lit., "before" the eyes, i. e., notorious), further explained as "going before judgment;" and those which follow after the men "some men they, i. e., their sins, follow after"), viz., not going beforehand, loudly accusing, but hidden till they come to the judgment: so v. 25, the good works are of two classes: those palpably manifest (translate so, instead of "manifest beforehand") and "those that are otherwise," i. e., not palpably manifest. Both alike "cannot be hid;" the former class in the case of bad and good are manifest already; the latter class in the case of both are not manifest now, but shall be so at the final judgment. going before to judgment—as heralds; crying sins which accuse their perpetrator. The connection seems to me this: He had enjoined Timothy, v. 20, "Rebuke them that sin before all;" and in v. 22, "Neither be partaker of other men's sins," by ordaining ungodly men; having then by a digression at the clause, "keep thyself pure," guarded against an ascetical error of Timothy in fancying purity consisted in asceticism, and having exhorted him to use wine for strengthening him in his work, he returns to the subject of his being vigorous as an overseer in rebuking sin, whether in presbyters or people, and in avoiding participation in men's sins by ordaining ungodly candidates. He says, therefore, there are two classes of sins, as there are two classes of good works: those palpably manifest, and those not so; the former are those on which thou shouldst act decidedly at once when called on, whether to rebuke in general, or to ordain ministers in particular; as to the latter, the final judgment alone can decide; however hidden now they "cannot be hid" then. This could only be said of the final judgment (1 Corinthians 4. 5; therefore, ALFORD's reference of this verse to Timothy's judgment in choosing elders must be wrong), all judgments before then are fallible. Thus he implies, that Timothy can only be responsible if he connive at manifest, or evident sins; not that those that are otherwise shall escape judgment at last: just as in the case of good works, he can only be responsible for taking into account in his judgments those which are patent to all, not those secret good works which nevertheless will not remain hidden at the final judgment.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-21. EXHORTATIONS AS TO DISTINCTIONS OF CIVIL RANK; THE DUTY OF SLAVES, IN OPPOSITION TO THE FALSE TEACHINGS OF GAIN-SEEKERS; TIMOTHY'S PURSUIT IS TO BE GODLINESS, WHICH IS AN EVERLASTING POSSESSION; SOLEMN ADJURATION TO DO SO AGAINST CHRIST'S COMING; CHARGE TO BE GIVEN TO THE RICH. CONCLUDING EXHORTATION. 1. servants—To be taken as predicated thus, "Let as many as are under the yoke (as) slaves" (Titus 2. 9). The exhortation is natural, as there was a danger of Christian slaves inwardly feeling above their heathen masters. their own masters—The phrase their own, is an argument for submissiveness; it is not strangers, but their own masters whom they are required to respect. all honour—all possible and fitting honour; not merely outward subjection, but that inward honour from which will flow spontaneously right outward conduct (Note, Ephesians 5. 22). that the name of God—by which Christians are called. blasphemed—Heathen masters would say, What kind of a God must be the God of the Christians, when such are the fruits of His worship (Romans 2. 24; Titus 2. 5, 10)? 2. And—rather, "But." The opposition is between those Christian slaves under the yoke of heathen, and those that have believing masters (he does not use the phrase "under the yoke" in the latter case for service under believers is not a yoke). Connect the following words thus, "Let them (the slaves) not, because they (the masters) are brethren (and so equals, masters and slaves alike being Christians), despise them" (the masters). but rather, &c.—"but all the more (so much the more: with the greater good will) do them service, because they (the masters) are faithful (i. e., believers) and beloved who receive (in the mutual interchange of relative duties between master and servant; so the Greek) the same" (English Version violates Greek grammar). This

latter clause is parallel to "Because they are brethren;" which proves that "they" refers to the masters, not the servants, as TITTMANN takes it, explaining the verb in the common sense (Luke 1. 54; Acts 20. 35), "who sedulously labour for their (masters') benefit." The very term "benefit" delicately implies service done with the right motive, Christian "good will" (Ephesians 6. 7). If the common sense of the Greek verb be urged, the sense must be, "Because they (the masters) are faithful and beloved who are sedulously intent on the benefiting" of their servants. But PORPHYRY, de abstn. 1. 46, justifies the sense of the Greek verb given above, which also better accords with the context; for otherwise, the article "the benefit," will have nothing in the preceding words to explain it, whereas in my explanation above, "the benefit" will be that of the slaves' service. These things teach—(ch. 4. 11; Titus 2. 15). 3. teach otherwise—than I desire thee to "teach" (v. 2). The Greek indicative implies, he puts not a merely supposed case, but one actually existing, ch. 1. 3, "Every one who teaches otherwise," i. e., who teaches heterodoxy. consent not—Greek, "accede not to." wholesome—"sound" (ch. 1. 10): opposed to the false teachers' words, unsound through profitless science and immorality. words of our Lord Jesus—Paul's inspired words are not merely his own, but are also Christ's words. 4. He is proud—lit., "wrapt in smoke;" filled with the fumes of self-conceit (ch. 3. 6) whilst "knowing nothing," viz., of the doctrine which is according to godliness (v. 3), though arrogating pre-eminent knowledge (ch. 1. 7). dotting about—lit., "stick about;" the opposite of "wholesome" (v. 3). Truth is not the centre about which his investigations move, but mere word-strifes. questions—of controversy. strifes of words—rather than about realities (2 Timothy 2. 14). These stand with them instead of "godliness" and "wholesome words" (v. 3; ch. 1. 4; Titus 3. 9). evil surmisings—as to those who are of a different party from themselves. 5. Perverse disputings—Useless disputings. The oldest MSS. read, "lasting contests" [WIESINGER]; "incessant collisions." [ALFORD.] "Strifes of words" had already been mentioned, so that he would not be likely to repeat over the same idea (as in the English Version reading) again. corrupt minds—Greek, "of men corrupted (depraved) in mind." The inmost source of the evil is in the perverted mind (v. 4; 2 Timothy 3. 8; Titus 1. 15). destitute of the truth—(Titus 1. 14.) They had had the truth, but through want of moral integrity and of love of the truth, they were misled by a pretended deeper gnosis (knowledge) and higher ascetical holiness, of which they made a trade. [WIESINGER.] supposing, &c.—The Greek requires, "Supposing (regarding the matter in this point of view) that piety (so translated for 'godliness') is a means of gain" (i. e., a way of advancing one's worldly interests: a different Greek form, porisiva, expresses the thing gained, gain); not "that gain is godliness," as English Version, from such withdraw thyself—Omitted in the oldest MSS. The connection with v. 6 favours the omission of these words, which interrupt the connection. 6. But—Though they err in this, there is a sense in which "piety is" not merely gain, but "great means of gain:" not the gaining which they pursue, and which makes men to be discontented with their present possessions, and to use religion as "a cloak of covetousness" (1 Thessalonians 2. 5) and means of earthly gain, but the present and eternal gain which piety, whose accompaniment is contentment, secures to the soul. WIESINGER remarks that Paul observed in Timothy a tendency to indolence and shrinking from the conflict, whence he felt (v. 11) that Timothy needed cautioning against such temptation; cf. also the second Epistle. Not merely contentment is great gain (a sentiment of the heathen CICERO has, Parad. 6., "the greatest and surest riches"), but "piety with contentment;" for piety not only feels no need of what it has not, but also has that which exalts it above what it has not. [WIESINGER.] The Greek for contentment is translated "sufficiency," 2 Corinthians 9. 8. But the adjective (Philippians 4. 11) "content;" lit., "having a sufficiency in one's self" independent of others. "The Lord always supplies His people with what is necessary for them. True happiness lies in piety, but this sufficiency [supplied by God, with which moreover His people are content] is thrown into the scale as a kind of overweight" [CALVIN] (1 Kings 17. 1-16; Psalm 37. 19; Isaiah 33. 6, 16; Jeremiah 37. 21). 7. For—confirming the reasonableness of "contentment." and it is certain—Vulgate and other old versions support this reading. The oldest MSS., however, omit "and it is certain;" then the translation will be, "We brought nothing into the world (to teach us to remember) that neither can we carry anything out" (Job 1. 21; Ecclesiastes 5. 15. Therefore, we should have no gain-seeking anxiety, the breeder of discontent (Matthew 6. 25). 8. And—Greek, "But." In contrast to the greedy gain-seekers (v. 5). having—so long as we have food. (The Greek expresses "food sufficient in each case for our continually recurring wants." [ALFORD.]) It is implied that we, as believers, shall have this (Isaiah 23. 16). raiment—Greek, "covering;" according to some including a roof to cover us, i. e., a dwelling, as well as clothing. let us be therewith content—lit., "we shall be sufficiently provided;" "we shall be sufficed." [ALFORD.] 9. will be rich—Greek, "wish to be rich;" not merely are willing, but are resolved, and earnestly desire to have riches at any cost (Proverbs 28. 20, 22). This wishing (not the riches themselves) is fatal to "contentment" (v. 6). Rich men are not told to cast away their riches, but not to "trust" in them, and to "do good" with them (v. 17, 18; Psalm 62. 10). to be rich—to have more than "food and raiment." fall into temptation—not merely "are exposed to temptation," but actually "fall into" it. The falling into it is what we are to pray against, "Lead us not into temptation" (James 1. 14); such a one is already in a sinful state, even before any overt act of sin. The Greek for temptation and gain contains a play on sounds—Porasmus, Peirasmos. snare—a further step downwards (ch. 3. 7). He falls into "the snare of the devil." foolish—irrational. hurtful—to those who fall into the snare. Cf. Ephesians 4. 22, "deceitful lusts" which deceive to one's deadly hurt. lusts—With the one evil lust ("wish to be rich") many others join themselves: the one is the "root of all evils" (v. 10). which—Greek, "whatever (lusts)." drown—an awful descending climax from "fall into;" this is the last step in the terrible descent (James 1. 15). Translated "sink," Luke 5. 7. destruction . . . perdition—destruction in general (temporal or eternal), and perdition in particular, viz., that of body and soul in hell. 10. the love of money—not the money itself, but the love of it—the wishing to be rich (v. 9)—"is a root (ELICOTT and MIDDLETON: not as English Version, "the root") of all evils." (So the Greek plural.) The wealthiest may be rich not in a bad sense; the poorest may covet to be so (Psalm 62. 10). Love of money is not the sole root of evils, but it is a leading "root of bitterness" (Hebrews 12. 15), for "it destroys with, the root of all that is good" [BENGEL]; its offshoots are "temptation, a snare, lusts, destruction, perdition." coveted after—lusted after. erred from—lit., "have been made to err from the faith" (ch. 1. 19; 4. 1). pierced—(Luke 2. 35.) with . . . sorrows—"pains;" the "thorns" of the parable (Matthew 13. 22) which choke the word of "faith." "The prosperity of fools destroys them" (Proverbs 1. 32). BENGEL and WIESINGER make them the gnawings of conscience, producing remorse for wealth badly acquired; the harbingers of the future "perdition" (v. 9). 11. But thou—in contrast to the "some" (v. 10). man of God—who hast God as thy true riches (Genesis 15. 1; Psalm 16. 5; Lamentations 3. 24). Applying primarily to Timothy as a minister (cf. 2 Peter 1. 21), just as the term was used of Moses (Deuteronomy 33. 1), Samuel (1 Samuel 9. 6), Elijah, and Elisha; but, as the exhortation is as to duties incumbent also on all Christians, the term applies secondarily to him (so 2 Timothy 3. 17) as a Christian man born of God (James 1. 18; 1 John 5. 1), no longer a man of the world raised above earthly things; therefore, God's property, not his own, bought with a price, and so having parted with all right in himself: Christ's work is to be his great work; he is to be Christ's living representative. flee these things—viz., "the love of money" with its evil results (v. 9, 10). follow after righteousness—(2 Timothy 2. 22)

godliness—"piety." Righteousness is more in relation to our fellow-man; piety ("godliness") to God; faith is the root of both (Note, Titus 2. 12). love—by which "faith worketh." patience—enduring perseverance amidst trials. meekness—The oldest MSS. read, meek-spiritedness, viz., towards the opponents of the Gospel. 12. Fight the good fight—BIRKS thinks this Epistle was written from Corinth, where contests in the national games recurred at stated seasons, which will account for the allusion here as 1 Corinthians 9. 24-26. Contrast "strifes of words" (v. 4). Cf. ch. 1. 18; 2 Timothy 4. 7. The "good profession" is connected with the "good fight" (Psalm 60. 4). lay hold on eternal life—the crown, or garland, the prize of victory, laid hold of by the winner in the good fight (2 Timothy 4. 7, 8; Philippians 3. 12-14). "Fight (lit., 'strive') with such striving earnestness as to lay hold on the prize, eternal life." also—not in the oldest MSS. professed a good profession—Greek, "didst confess THE good confession," viz., the Christian confession (as the Greek word is the same in this verse as that for "confession" in v. 13, probably the profession here is the confession that Christ's kingdom is the kingdom of the truth, John 18. 36, 37), at thy being set apart to thy ministerial function (whether in general, or as overseer at Ephesus): the same occasion as is referred to in ch. 1. 18; 4. 14; 2 Timothy 1. 4. before many witnesses—who would testify against thee if thou shouldst fall away. [BENGEL.] 13. quickeneth all things—i. e., "maketh alive." But the oldest MSS. read, "preserveth alive;" as the same Greek means in Acts 7. 19; cf. Nehemiah 9. 6. He urges Timothy to faithfulness here by the present manifestation of God's power in preserving all things, as in v. 14, by the future manifestation of God's power at the appearing of Christ. The assurance that "eternal life," v. 12, will be the result of "fighting the good fight," rests on the fulness and power of Him who is the God of all life, present and to come. witnessed—It was the Lord's part to witness, Timothy's part to confess (or "profess," v. 12) "the good confession." [BENGEL.] The confession was His testimony that He was King, and His kingdom that of the truth (v. 15; Note, v. 12; Matthew 27. 11). Christ, in attesting, or bearing witness to this truth, attested the truth of the whole of Christianity. Timothy's profession, or confession, included therefore the whole of the Christian truth. 14. keep this commandment—Greek, "the commandment," i. e., the Gospel rule of life (ch. 1. 5; John 13. 34; 2 Peter 2. 21; 3. 2). without spot, unrebukeable—agreeing with "thou." Keep the commandment and so be without spot, &c. "Pure" (ch. 5. 22; Ephesians 5. 27; James 1. 27; 2 Peter 3. 14). until the appearing of . . . Christ—His coming in person (2 Thessalonians 2. 8; Titus 2. 13). Believers then used in their practice to set before themselves the day of Christ as near at hand; we, the hour of death. [BENGEL.] The fact has in all ages of the Church been certain, the time as uncertain to Paul, as it is to us; hence, v. 15, he says, "in His times;" the Church's true attitude is that of continual expectation of her Lord's return (1 Corinthians 1. 8; Philippians 1. 6, 10). 15. in his times—Greek, "His own [fitting] times" (Acts 1. 7). The plural implies successive stages in the manifestation of the kingdom of God, each having its own appropriate time, the regulating principle and knowledge of which rests with the Father (ch. 2. 6; 2 Timothy 1. 9; Titus 1. 3; Hebrews 1. 1). he shall show—"display;" an expression appropriate in reference to His "APPEARING," which is stronger than His "coming," and implies its visibility; "manifest;" make visible (cf. Acts 8. 20): "He" is the Father (v. 16). blessed—in Himself: so about to be the source of blessing to His people at Christ appearing, whence flows their "blessed hope" (ch. 1. 11; Titus 2. 13). only—(John 17. 3; Romans 16. 27; Revelation 15. 4). King of kings—Elsewhere applied also to Jesus (Revelation 1. 5; 17. 14; 19. 16). 16. Who only hath immortality—in His own essence, not merely at the will of another, as all other immortal beings. [JUSTIN MARTYR, Quæst ad Orthod., 61.] As He hath immortality, so will He give it to us who believe; to be out of Him is death. It is mere heathen philosophy that attributes to the soul indestructibility in itself, which is to be attributed solely to God's gift. As He hath life in Himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in Himself (John 5. 26). The term used in the New Testament for immortal, which does not occur, is "incorruptible." "Immortality" is found 1 Corinthians 15. 53, 54. dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto—After life comes mention of light, as in John 1. 4. That light is unapproachable to creatures except so far as they are admitted by Him, and as He goes forth to them. [BENGEI.] It is unapproachable on account of its exceeding brightness. [THEOPHYLACT.] If one cannot gaze steadfastly at the sun, which is but a small part of creation, by reason of its exceeding heat and power, how much less can mortal man gaze at the inexpressible glory of God [THEOPHYLACT, ad Autolytus] (Psalm 104. 2; 1 John 1. 5). no man hath seen—(Exodus 33. 20; John 1. 18; Colossians 1. 15; Hebrews 11. 27; 1 John 1. 12). Perhaps even in the perfect state no creature shall fully see God. Still the saints shall, in some sense, have the blessedness of seeing Him, which is denied to mere man (Matthew 5. 8; 1 Corinthians 13. 12; 1 John 3. 2; Revelation 22. 4). 17. Resuming the subject from above, v. 5, 16. The immortality of God, alone rich in glory, and of His people through Him, is opposed to the lust of money (cf. v. 14-16). From speaking of the desire to be rich, he here passes to those who are rich: 1. What ought to be their disposition; 2. what use they ought to make of their riches, and, 3. the consequences of their so using them. rich in this world—contrasted with the riches of the future kingdom to be the portion of believers at Christ's "appearing," v. 14. high-minded—often the character of the rich (see Romans 12. 16). trust—Greek, "to have their trust resting." in . . . in—rather, "upon . . . upon," as the oldest MSS. uncertain riches—rather as Greek, "the uncertainty of riches." They who rest their trust on riches, rest trust on uncertainty itself (Proverbs 23. 5). Now they belong to one person, now to another, and that which has many masters is possessed by none. [THEODORET.] living God—The best MSS. and versions omit "living." He who trusts in riches transfers to them the duty he owes to God. [CALVIN.] who giveth—Greek, "affordeth." all things richly—temporal and eternal, for the body and for the soul. In order to be truly rich, seek to be blessed of, and in, God (Proverbs 10. 22; 2 Peter 1. 8). to enjoy—Greek, "for enjoyment." Not that the heart may cleave to them as its idol and trust (ch. 4. 8). Enjoyment consists in giving, not in holding fast. Non-employment should be far removed, as from man, so from his resources (James 5. 2, 3). [BENGEI.] 18. do good—like God Himself (Psalm 119. 63; Acts 14. 17) and Christ (Acts 10. 38). TITTMANN translates, to do, or act well; as the Greek for to be beneficent is a distinct word, agathopoiain. rich in good works—so "rich in faith," which produces good works (James 2. 5). Contrasted with "rich in this world," v. 17. Lit., it is "rich in honourable (right) works." Greek kalois, ergois, are works good or right in themselves: agathois, good to another. ready to distribute—freegivers [ALFORD]; the heart not cleaving to possessions, but ready to impart to others. willing to communicate—ready contributors [ALFORD]; liberal in admitting others to share our goods in common with ourselves (Galatians 6. 6; Hebrews 13. 16). 19. Laying up in store—"therefrom (i. e., by this means [ALFORD]; but BENGEI makes the Greek apo mean laying apart against a future time), laying up for themselves as a treasure" [ALFORD] (Matthew 6. 19, 20). This is a treasure which we act wisely in laying up in store, whereas the wisest thing we can do with earthly treasures is "to distribute" them, and give others a share of them (v. 18). good foundation—(Note, ch. 3. 13; Luke 6. 43; 1 Corinthians 3. 11.) The sure reversion of the future heavenly inheritance: earthly riches scattered in faith lay up in store a sure increase of heavenly riches. We gather by scattering (Proverbs 11. 24; 13. 7; Luke 16. 9), that . . . eternal life—The oldest MSS. and versions read, "that which is really life," its joys being solid and enduring (Psalm 16. 11). The life that now is cannot be called so, its goods being unsubstantial, and itself a vapour (James 4. 14). "In order that ('with their feet so to speak on this foundation' [DE WETTE]) they may hold on that which is life indeed." 20, 21. Recapitulatory conclusion: the main aim of the whole Epistle being here summarily stated. 20. O Timothy—A personal appeal, marking at once his affection for Timothy, and his prescience of the coming heresies. keep—from spiritual thieves, and from enemies who will, whilst men sleep, sow tares amidst the good seed sown by the Son of man. that which is committed to thy trust—Greek, "the deposit" (ch. 1. 18; 2 Timothy 1. 12, 14; 2. 2). The true or sound doctrine to be taught, as opposed to the science falsely so called, which leads to error concerning the faith (v. 21). "It is not thine: it is another's property with which thou hast been entrusted: Diminish it not at all." [CHRYSOSTOM.] "That which was entrusted to thee, not found by thee; which thou hast received, not invented; a matter not of genius, but of teaching; not of private usurpation, but of public tradition; a matter brought to thee, not put forth by thee, in which thou oughtest to be not an enlarger, but a guardian; not an originator, but a disciple; not leading, but following. 'Keep,' saith he, 'the deposit;' preserve intact and inviolate the talent of the catholic faith. What has been entrusted to thee, let that same remain with thee; let that same be handed down by thee. Gold thou hast received, gold return. I should be sorry thou shouldst substitute aught else. I should be sorry that for gold thou shouldst substitute lead impudently, or brass fraudulently. I do not want the mere appearance of gold, but its actual reality. Not that there is to be no progress in religion in Christ's Church. Let there be so by all means, and the greatest progress; but then let it be real progress, not a change of the faith. Let the intelligence of the whole Church and its individual members increase exceedingly, provided it be only in its own kind, the doctrine being still the same. Let the religion of the soul resemble the growth of the body, which, though it develops its several parts in the progress of years, yet remains the same as it was essentially." [VINCENTIUS LIRINENSIS, A. D. 434.] avoiding—"turning away from" (cf. 2 Timothy 3. 4). Even as they have "turned away from the truth" (ch. 1. 6; 5. 15; 2 Timothy 4. 4). profane—(Ch. 4. 7; 2 Timothy 2. 16.) vain—Greek, "empty:" mere "strifes of words," v. 4, producing no moral fruit. oppositions—dialectic antithesis of the false teachers. [ALFORD.] WIESINGER, not so probably, "oppositions to the sound doctrine." I think it likely germs existed already of the heresy of dualistic oppositions, viz., between the good and evil principle, afterwards fully developed in Gnosticism. Contrast Paul's just antithesis (ch. 3. 16; 6. 5, 6; 2 Timothy 2. 15-23). science falsely so called—where there is not faith, there is not knowledge. [CHRYSOSTOM.] There was true "knowledge," a special gift of the Spirit, which was abused by some (1 Corinthians 8. 1; 12. 8; 14. 6). This gift was soon counterfeited by false teachers arrogating to themselves pre-eminently the gift (Colossians 2. 8, 18, 23). Hence arose the creeds of the Church, called symbols, i. e., in Greek watchwords, or a test whereby the orthodox might distinguish one another in opposition to the heretical. Perhaps here, v. 20, and 2 Timothy 1. 13, 14, imply the existence of some such brief formula of doctrine then existing in the Church; if so, we see a good reason for its not being written in Scripture, which is designed not to give dogmatic formularies, but to be the fountain whence all such formularies are to be drawn according to the exigencies of the several churches and ages. Probably thus a portion of the so called apostle's creed may have had their sanction, and been preserved solely by tradition on this account. "The creed, handed down from the apostles, is not written on paper and with ink, but on fleshy tables of the heart." [JEROME, adv. err. Johann. Hieros., ch. 9.] Thus, in the creed, contrary to the "oppositions" (the germs of which probably existed in the Church in Paul's latter days) whereby the ceons were set off in pairs, God is stated to be "the Father Almighty," or all-governing "maker of heaven and earth." [BISHOP HINDS.] 21. Which some professing—viz., professing these oppositions of science falsely so called. erred—(Note, ch. 1. 6; 2. 1

—iii., missed the mark (2 Timothy 3. 7, 8). True sagacity is inseparable from faith. grace—Greek, “the grace,” viz., of God, for which we Christians look, and in which we stand. [ALFORD.] be with thee—He restricts the salutation to Timothy, as the Epistle was not to be read in public. [BRUNEL.] But the oldest MSS. read, “be with you” and the “thee” may be a transcriber’s alteration to harmonize with 2 Timothy 4. 22; Titus 2. 15. Amen—Omitted in the oldest MSS.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

INTRODUCTION.

PLACE OF WRITING.—St. Paul, in the interval between his first and second imprisonment, after having written First Timothy from Macedonia or Corinth [BIRKS] (if we are to adopt the opinion that First Timothy was written after his first imprisonment), returned to Ephesus, as he intended, by way of Troas, where he left the books, &c. (mentioned ch. 4. 13), with Carpus. From Ephesus he went to Crete for a short visit, and returned, and then wrote to Titus. Next he went by Miletus to Corinth (ch. 4. 20), and thence to Nicopolis (Titus 3. 12), whence he proceeded to Rome. From his prison there he wrote the Second Epistle to Timothy, shortly before his martyrdom. It is not certain where Timothy was at this time. Some of the internal evidences favour the view of his having been then at Ephesus; thus the salutation of Priscilla and Aquila, who generally resided there (ch. 4. 19); also that of the household of Onesiphorus, who is stated in ch. 1. 16-18 to have ministered to Paul at Ephesus, a circumstance implying his residence there. Also, the Hymeneus of ch. 2. 17 seems to be the same as the Hymeneus at Ephesus (1 Timothy 1. 20); and probably “Alexander the coppersmith” (ch. 4. 14) is the same as the Alexander joined with Hymeneus (1 Timothy 1. 20), and possibly the same as the Alexander put forward by the Jews to clear themselves, not to befriend Paul, at the riot in Ephesus (Acts 19. 33, 34). The difficulty is, on this supposition, how to account for ch. 4. 12, 20: if Timothy was at Ephesus, why did he need to be told that Paul had sent Tychicus to Ephesus? or that Paul had left Trophimus, himself an Ephesian (Acts 21. 29), sick at Miletus, which was only thirty miles from Ephesus? See, however, the notes, ch. 4. 12, 20. Troas lay on the road to Rome from either Ephesus or Pontus, so that ch. 4. 13 will accord with the theory of either Ephesus or any other place in the north-west of Asia Minor, being Timothy’s place of sojourn at the time. Probably, he had the general superintendence of the Pauline churches in Asia Minor, in accordance with his mission combining the office of evangelist, or itinerant missionary, with that of presiding overseer. Ephesus was probably his headquarters.

TIME OF WRITING.—(1.) Paul’s first imprisonment, described in Acts 28., was much milder than that in which he was when writing Second Timothy. In the former, he had liberty to lodge in his own hired house, and to receive all comers, guarded only by a single soldier; in the latter, he was so closely confined that Onesiphorus with difficulty found him; he was chained, his friends had forsaken him, and he had narrowly escaped sentence of execution from the Roman emperor. Mediæval legends represent the Mamertine prison, or Tullianum, as the scene of his incarceration with Peter. But this is irreconcilable with the fact of Onesiphorus, Linus, Pudens, &c., having access to him. He was probably under military custody, as in his former imprisonment, though of a severer kind (ch. 1. 16-18; 2. 9; 4. 6-8, 16, 17). (2.) The visit to Troas (ch. 4. 13) can hardly have been that mentioned Acts 20. 5-7, the last before his first imprisonment; for, if it were, the interval between that visit and the first imprisonment would be seven or eight years, a period most unlikely for him to have allowed to pass without sending for his cloak and parchments, when they might have been of service to him in the interim. (3.) Paul’s leaving Trophimus sick at Miletus (ch. 4. 20), could not have been on the occasion mentioned (Acts 20. 15; for, subsequent to that, Trophimus was with Paul in Jerusalem (Acts 21. 29)). (4.) The words (ch. 4. 20), “Erastus abode at Corinth,” imply that Paul had shortly before been at Corinth, where he left Erastus. But before his first imprisonment, Paul had not been at Corinth for several years; and in the interval Timothy had been with him, so that Timothy did not need at a later period to be told about that visit (Acts 20. 2, 4). For all these reasons the imprisonment, during which he wrote Second Timothy, is shown to be his second imprisonment. Moreover, Hebrews 13. 23, 24, represents the writer (who was probably Paul) as in Italy, and at liberty. So CLEMENT OF ROME (B. 1. 5), the disciple of Paul, explicitly states, “In the east and west, Paul as a preacher instructed the whole world (i. e., the Roman empire) in righteousness, and having gone to the extremity of the west, and having borne witness before the rulers (of Rome), he so was removed from the world.” This plainly implies that he fulfilled his design (Romans 15. 24-28) of a missionary journey into Spain. The canon of the New Testament, compiled about 170 A. D. (called MURATORI’S Canon), also mentions “the journey of Paul from Rome to Spain.” See ROUTH, Reliq. Sacr., vol. 4, p. 1-12.

His martyrdom is universally said to have occurred in Nero’s reign. [EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 22; JEROME, Catalogus Scriptorum.] Five years thus seem to have elapsed between the first imprisonment, 63 A. D. (Acts 28), and his martyrdom, June 68 A. D., the last year of Nero’s reign. He was probably arrested by the magistrates in Nicopolis (Titus 3. 12) in Epirus, in the winter, on a double charge, first, of being one of the Christians who had conspired, it was alleged by Nero’s partisans, to set fire to Rome, A. D. 64; secondly, of introducing a novel and unlawful religion. His friends all left him, except Luke: Demas from “love of this present world;” the others from various causes (ch. 4. 10, 11). On the first charge he seems to have been acquitted. His liberation from his first imprisonment took place in 67 A. D., the year before the great fire at Rome, which Nero made the pretext for his persecution of the Christians. Every cruelty was heaped on them; some were crucified; some were arrayed in the skins of wild beasts and hunted to death by dogs; some were wrapped in pitch-ropes and set on fire by night to illuminate the circus of the Vatican and gardens of Nero, whilst that monster mixed among the spectators in the garb of a charioteer. But now (67 or 68 A. D.) some years had elapsed since the first excitement which followed the fire. Hence, Paul, being a Roman citizen, was treated in his trial with a greater respect for the forms of the law, and hence was acquitted (ch. 4. 17) on the charge of having instigated the Christians to their supposed acts of incendiarism before his last departure from Rome.

Alexander the coppersmith seems to have been a witness against him (ch. 4. 14.) Had he been condemned on the first charge, he would probably have been burnt alive, as the preceding martyrs were, for arson. His judge was the city Prefect CLEMENS ROMANUS specifies that his trial was (not before the emperor, but) "before the rulers." No advocate ventured to plead his cause, no patron appeared for him, such as under ordinary circumstances might have aided him, for instance, one of the powerful Æmillian house, under which his family possibly enjoyed clientship (ch. 4. 16, 17), whence he may have taken his name Paul. The place of trial was, probably, one of the great basilicas in the Forum, two of which were called the Pauline Basilicas, from L. Æmillus Paulus, who had built one and restored the other. He was remanded for the second stage of his trial. He did not expect this to come on until the following "winter" (ch. 4. 21), whereas it took place about midsummer; if in Nero's reign, not later than June. In the interim Luke was his only constant companion; but one friend from Asia, Onesiphorus, had diligently sought him and visited him in prison, undeterred by the danger. Linus, too, the future bishop of Rome, Pudens, the son of a senator, and Claudia, his bride, perhaps the daughter of a British king (note, ch. 4. 21), were among his visitors; and Tychicus, before he was sent by Paul to Ephesus (ch. 4. 12; perhaps bearing with him this Epistle).

OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE.—He was anxious to see his disciple Timothy, before his death, and that Timothy should bring Mark with him (ch. 1. 4; 4. 9, 11, 21). But feeling how uncertain it was whether Timothy should arrive in time, he felt it necessary, also, to give him by letter a last warning as to the heresies, the germs of which were then being scattered in the Churches. Hence he writes a series of exhortations to faithfulness, and zeal for sound doctrine, and patience amidst trials: a charge which Timothy seems to have needed, if we are to judge from the apostle's earnestness in urging him to boldness in Christ's cause, as though St. Paul thought he saw in him some signs of constitutional timidity (ch. 2. 2-8; 4. 1-5; 1 Timothy 5. 22, 23).

ST. PAUL'S DEATH.—DIONYSIUS, bishop of Corinth (quoted in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 25) about A. D. 170, is the earliest authority for the tradition that Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome "about the same time" as Paul, after having laboured for some time there. He calls Peter and Paul "the founders of the Corinthian and Roman Churches." The Roman presbyter, CAIUS (about A. D. 200), mentions the tradition that Peter suffered martyrdom in the Vatican. But (1.) Peter's work was among the Jews (Galatians 2. 9), whereas Rome was a Gentile Church (Romans 1. 13). Moreover, (2.) the First Epistle of Peter (1. 1; 5. 13) represents him as labouring in Babylon in Mesopotamia. (3.) The silence of St. Paul's Epistles written in Rome, negatives the tradition of his having founded, or laboured long at Rome; though it is possible he may have endured martyrdom there. His martyrdom, certainly, was not, as JEROME says, "on the same day" with that of Paul, else Paul would have mentioned Peter's being at Rome in ch. 4. 11. The legend says that Peter, through fear, was fleeing from Rome at early dawn by the Applan Way, when he met our Lord, and falling at His feet, asked, Lord, whither goest thou? to which the Lord replied, I go again to be crucified. The disciple returned penitent and ashamed, and was martyred. The Church of Domine quo vadis, on the Applan Way, commemorates the supposed fact. Paul, according to CAIUS (quoted in EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 2. 25), suffered martyrdom on the Ostian Way. So also JEROME, who gives the date, the 14th year of Nero. It was common to send prisoners, whose death might attract too much notice at Rome, to some distance from the city, under a military escort, for execution; hence the soldier's sword, not the executioner's axe, was the instrument of his decapitation. [OROSIVUS, Hist., 7. 7.] Paul appears, from Philippians 1., to have had his partisans even in the palace, and certainly must have exercised such an influence as would excite sympathy in his behalf, to avoid which the execution was ordered outside the city. Cf. TACITUS, Hist., 4. 11. The Basilica of St. Paul, first built by Constantine, now stands outside Rome on the road to Ostia: before the Reformation it was under the protection of the kings of England, and the emblem of the order of the Garter is still to be seen among its decorations. The traditional spot of the martyrdom is the The Fontane, not far from the Basilica. [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.]

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-18. ADDRESS: THANKFUL EXPRESSION OF LOVE AND DESIRE TO SEE HIM: REMEMBRANCE OF HIS FAITH AND THAT OF HIS MOTHER AND GRANDMOTHER. EXHORTATION TO STIR UP THE GIFT OF GOD IN HIM, AND NOT SHRINK FROM AFFLICTION, ENFORCED BY THE CONSIDERATION OF THE FREENESS OF GOD'S GRACE IN OUR GOSPEL CALLING, AND BY THE APOSTLE'S EXAMPLE. THE DEFECTION OF MANY: THE STEADFASTNESS OF ONE—ONESIPHORUS. 1. This Epistle is the last testament and swan-like death-song of Paul. [BENGEL.] according to the promise of life . . . in Christ—Paul's apostleship is in order to carry into effect this promise. Cf. "according to the faith . . . in hope of eternal life . . . promise," &c. (Titus 1. 1, 2). This "promise of life in Christ" (cf. v. 10; ch. 2. 8) was needed to nerve Timothy to fortitude amidst trials, and to boldness in undertaking the journey to Rome, which would be attended with much risk (v. 8). 2. my dearly beloved son—In 1 Timothy 1. 2, and Titus 1. 4, written at an earlier period than this Epistle, the expression used is in the Greek, "My genuine son." ALFORD sees in the change of expression an intimation of an altered tone as to Timothy, more of mere love, and less of confidence, as though Paul saw in him a want of firmness, whence arose the need of his stirring up afresh the faith and grace in Him (v. 6). But this seems to me not justified by the Greek word agapetos, which implies the attachment of reasoning and choice, on the ground of merit in the one "beloved," not of merely instinctive love. See FRENCH, Synonyms of New Testament. 3. I thank—Greek, "I feel gratitude to God." whom I serve from my fore- fathers—whom I serve (Romans 1. 9) as did my forefathers. He does not mean to put on the same footing the Jewish and Christian service of God; but simply to assert his own conscientious service of God as he had received it from his progenitors (not Abraham, Isaac, &c., whom he calls "the fathers," not "progenitors" as the Greek is here; Romans 9. 5). The memory of those who had gone before to whom he is about to be gathered, is now, on the eve of death, pleasant to him; hence also, he calls to mind the faith of the mother and grandmother of Timothy; as he walks in the faith of his forefathers (Acts 23. 1; 24. 14; R. 6, 7; 28. 20), so Timothy should persevere firmly in the faith of his parent and grandparent. Not only Paul, but the Jews who reject Christ, forsake the faith of their forefathers, who looked for Christ; when they accept Him, the hearts of the children shall only be returning to the faith of their forefathers (Malachi 4. 6; Luke 1. 17; Romans 11. 23, 24, 28). Probably Paul had, in his recent defence, dwelt on this topic, viz., that he was, in being a Christian, only following his hereditary faith. that . . . I have remembrance of thee—"How unceasing I make my mention concerning thee" (cf. Philemon 4). The cause of Paul's feeling thankful is, not that he remembers Timothy unceasingly in his prayers, but for what Timothy is in faith (v. 5) and graces; cf. Romans 1. 8, 9, from which supply the elliptical sentence thus, "I thank God [for thee, for God is my witness] whom I serve, &c., that (or how) without ceasing I have remembrance (or make mention) of thee." &c. night and day—(Note, 1 Timothy 5. 5.) 4. desiring—Greek, "with yearning as for one much missed," mindful of thy tears—not only at our parting (Acts 20. 37) but also often when under pious feelings. that "may %

filled with joy—to be joined with “desiring to see thee” (Romans 1. 11, 12; 15. 32). 5. When I call to remembrance, &c.—This increased his “desire to see” Timothy. The oldest MSS. read, “When I called to remembrance;” implying that some recent incident (perhaps the contrasted cowardice of the hypocrite Demas, who forsook him) had reminded him of the sincerity of Timothy’s faith. faith that is in thee—ALFORD translates, “that was in thee.” He remembers Timothy’s faith in the past as a fact; its present existence in him is only matter of his confident persuasion or hope. which—Greek, “such as.” dwelt—“made its dwelling” or abode (John 14. 23). The past tense implies they were now dead. first—before it dwelt in thee. She was the furthest back of the progenitors of Timothy whom Paul knew. mother Eunice—a believing Jewess; but his father was a Greek, i. e., a heathen (Acts 18. 1). The faith of the one parent sanctified the child (ch. 8. 15; 1 Corinthians 7. 14). She was probably converted at Paul’s first visit to Lystra (Acts 14. 6). It is an undesigned coincidence, and so a mark of truth, that in Acts 18. 1 the belief of the mother alone is mentioned, just as here praise is bestowed on the faith of the mother, whilst no notice is taken of the father. [PALEY’S Horæ Paulinæ.] and—Greek, “but,” i. e., notwithstanding appearances. [ALFORD.] persuaded that—it dwells, or it shall dwell “in thee also.” The mention of the faith of his mother and grandmother is designed as an incentive to stir up his faith. 6. Wherefore—Greek, “For which cause,” viz., because thou hast inherited, didst once possess, and I trust [? “am persuaded”] still dost possess, such unfeigned faith. [ALFORD.] stir up—lit., “rekindle,” “revive the spark of;” the opposite of “quench” or extinguish (1 Thessalonians 5. 19). Paul does not doubt the existence of real faith in Timothy, but he desires it to be put into active exercise. Timothy seems to have become somewhat remiss from being so long without Paul (ch. 2. 22). gift of God—the spiritual grace received for his ministerial office, either at his original ordination, or at his consecration to the particular office of superintending the Ephesian Church (Note, 1 Timothy 4. 14), imparting fearlessness, power, love, and a sound mind (v. 7). the putting on of my hands—In 1 Timothy 4. 14, it is “with (not by) the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.” The apostle was chief in the ordination, and to him “BY” is applied. The presbytery were his assistants; so “with,” implying merely accompaniment, is said of them. Paul was the instrument in Timothy’s ordination and reception of the grace then conferred; the presbyters were the concurrent participants in the act of ordination; so the Greek, dia and meta. So in ordinations by a bishop in our days, he does the principal act, they join in laying on hands with him. 7. For, &c.—Implying that Timothy needed the exhortation “to stir up the gift of God in him,” being constitutionally timid: “For God did not give us (so the Greek, viz., at our ordination or consecration) the spirit of fear.” The spirit which He gave us, was not the spirit of timidity (lit., cowardice, which is weakness), but of “power” (exhibited in a fearless “testimony” for Christ, v. 8). “Power is the invariable accompaniment of the gift of the Holy Ghost. Luke 24. 49; Acts 1. 8; cf. 6. 6, “full of faith and of the Holy Ghost,” with v. 8, “full of faith and power.” Fear is the result of “the spirit of bondage” (Romans 8. 15). Fear within exaggerates the causes of fear without. “The spirit of power” is the spirit of man dwelt in by the Spirit of God imparting power; this power “casteth out fear” from ourselves, and stimulates us to try to cast it out of others (1 John 4. 18). love—which moves the believer whilst “speaking the truth” with power, when giving his testimony for Christ (v. 8), at the same time to do so “in love” (Ephesians 4. 15). a sound mind—The Greek is rather, “the bringing of men to a sound mind.” [WAHL.] BENDEL supports English Version, “a sound mind,” or “sobermindedness;” a duty to which a young man like Timothy especially needed to be exhorted (ch. 2. 22; 1 Timothy 4. 12; Titus 2. 4, 6). So Paul urges him, in ch. 2. 4, to give up worldly entanglements, which as shows (Luke 8. 14) choke the word. These three gifts are preferable to any miraculous powers whatever. 8. there- fore—seeing that God hath given us such a spirit, not that of fear. Be not thou . . . ashamed—I agree with ELLICOTT, in opposition to ALFORD, that the Greek subjunctive here, with the negative, implies action completed at one time, not continued action, which the present imperative would express; thus implying that Timothy had not decidedly yet evinced such feeling of shame; though I think, Paul, amidst the desertion of others who once promised fair, and from being aware of Timothy’s constitutional timidity (Note, v. 7), felt it necessary to stir him up and guard him against the possibility of unchristian dereliction of duty as to bold confession of Christ. Shame (v. 8) is the companion of fear (v. 7); if fear be overcome, false shame flees. [BENDEL.] Paul himself (v. 12), and Onesiphorus (v. 16), were instances of fearless profession removing false shame. He presents in contrast sad instances of fear and shame (v. 15). of the testimony of our Lord—of the testimony which thou art bound to give in the cause of our Lord; he says “our,” to connect Timothy and himself together in the testimony which both should give for their common Lord. The testimony which Christ gave before Pilate (1 Timothy 6. 12, 13), is an incentive to the believer that he should, after His Lord’s example, witness a good testimony or confession. nor of me his prisoner—The cause of God’s servants is the cause of God Himself (Ephesians 4. 1). Timothy might easily be tempted to be ashamed of one in prison, especially as not only worldly shame, but great risk, attended any recognition of Paul the prisoner. be thou partaker—with me, of the Gospel—rather, as Greek, “for the Gospel,” i. e., suffered for the Gospel (ch. 2. 3-5; Philimon 13). according to the power of God—exhibited in having saved and called us (v. 9). God who has done the greater act of power (i. e., saved us), will surely do the less (carry us safe through afflictions borne for the Gospel). “Think not that thou hast to bear these afflictions by thine own power, nay it is by the power of God. It was a greater exercise of power than His making the heaven, His persuading the world to embrace salvation.” [CHRYSOSTOM.] 9. Who . . . called us—viz., God the Father (Galatians 1. 6). The having “saved us” in His eternal purpose of “grace, given us in Christ before the world began,” precedes his actual “calling” of us in due time with a call made effective to us by the Holy Spirit; therefore, “saved us” comes before “called us” (Romans 8. 28-30). holy calling—the actual call to a life of holiness. Hebrews 8. 1, “Heavenly calling” [TITTMANN, Synonyms]; whereas we were sinners and enemies (Ephesians 1. 18; 4. 1). The call comes wholly from God, and claims us wholly for God. “Holy” implies the separation of believers from the rest of the world unto God. not according to—not having regard to our works in His election and calling of grace (Romans 9. 11; Ephesians 2. 8, 9). his own purpose—The origination of salvation was of His own purpose, flowing from His own goodness, not for works of ours coming first, but wholly because of His own gratuitous, electing love. [THEODORET and CALVIN.] grace . . . given us—In His everlasting purpose, regarded as the same as when actually accomplished in due time. in Christ—believers being regarded by God as IN HIM, with whom the Father makes the covenant of salvation (Ephesians 1. 4; 3. 11). before the world began—Greek, “before the times (periods) of ages;” the enduring ages of which no end is contemplated (1 Corinthians 2. 7; Ephesians 8. 11). 10. But . . . now . . . manifest—In contrast to its concealment heretofore in the eternal purpose of God “before the world began” (v. 9; Colossians 1. 16; Titus 1. 2, 3). appearing—the visible manifestation in the flesh. abolished death—Greek, “taken away the power from death.” [TITTMANN.] The Greek article before “death,” implies that Christ abolished death, not only in some particular instance, but in its very essence, being, and idea, as well as in all its aspects and consequences (John 11. 26; Romans 8. 2, 38; 1 Corinthians 15. 26, 55; Hebrews 2. 14). The carrying out of the abolition of death into full effect is to be at the resurrection (Revelation 20. 14). The death of the body meanwhile is but temporary, and is made no account of by Christ and the apostles. brought . . . to light—making visible by the Gospe-

what was before hidden in God's purpose. life—of the Spirit, acting first on the soul here, about to act on the body also at the resurrection. immortality—Greek, "incorruptibility" of the new life, not merely of the risen body [ALFORD]. (Romans 8. 11.) through—by means of the Gospel, which brings to light the life and immortality purposed by God from eternity, but manifested now first to man by Christ, who in His own resurrection has given the pledge of His people's final triumph over death through Him. Before the Gospel revelation from God, man, by the light of nature, under the most favourable circumstances, had but a glimmering idea of the possibility of a future being of the soul, but not the faintest idea of the resurrection of the body (Acts 17. 18, 32). If Christ were not "the life," the dead could never live; if He were not the resurrection, they could never rise; had He not the keys of hell and death (Revelation 1. 18), we could never break through the bars of death or gates of hell. [BISHOP PRARSON.] 11. Whereunto—For the publication of which Gospel. I am appointed—Greek, "I was appointed." preacher—Greek, "herald," teacher of the Gentiles—(1 Timothy 2. 7.) He brings forward his own example in this verse and v. 12, as a pattern for Timothy, as a public "preacher," an "apostle," or missionary from place to place, and a "teacher" in private instructing His flock with patient perseverance. 12. For the which cause—For the Gospel cause of which I was appointed a preacher (v. 10, 11). I also suffer—besides my active work as a missionary. ELLIOTT translates, "I suffer even these things;" the sufferings attendant on my being a prisoner (v. 8, 15). I am not ashamed—neither be thou (v. 8). for—Confidence as to the future drives away shame. [BENJEL.] I know—though the world knows Him not (John 10. 14; 17. 25). whom—I know what a faithful, promise-keeping God He is (ch. 2. 13). It is not, I know how I have believed, but, I know WHOM I have believed; a feeble faith may clasp a strong Saviour. believed—rather, "trusted;" carrying out the metaphor of a depositor depositing his pledge with one whom He trusts. I am persuaded—(Romans 8. 38.) He is able—in spite of so many foes around me. that which I have committed unto him—Greek, "my deposit;" the body, soul, and spirit, which I have deposited in God's safe keeping (1 Thessalonians 5. 23; 1 Peter 4. 19). So Christ Himself in dying (Luke 23. 46). "God deposits with us His word; we deposit with God our spirit." [GROTUS.] There is one deposit [His revelation] committed by God to us, which we ought to keep (v. 13, 14) and transmit to others (ch. 2. 2); there is another committed by God to us, which we should commit to His keeping, viz., ourselves and our heavenly portion. that day—the day of His appearing (v. 18; ch. 4. 8). 13. Hold fast the form—rather as Greek, "Have (i. e., keep) a pattern of sound (Greek, healthy) words which thou hast heard from me, in faith and love." "Keep" suits the reference to a deposit in the context. The secondary position of the verb in the Greek forbids our taking it so strongly as English Version, "Hold fast." The Greek for "form" is translated "pattern" in 1 Timothy 1. 16, the only other passage where it occurs. Have such a pattern drawn from my sound words, in opposition to the unsound doctrines so current at Ephesus, avidly impressed (WAHL translates it "delineation;" the verb implies to make a lively and lasting impress) on thy mind. in faith and love—the element in which my sound words had place, and in which thou art to have the lively impression of them as thy inwardly delineated pattern, moulding conformably thy outward profession. So nearly BENJEL explains, 1 Timothy 3. 9. 14. Translate as *Greek, "That goodly deposit keep through the Holy Ghost," viz., "the sound words which I have committed to thee" (v. 13; ch. 2. 2). in us—in all believers, not merely in you and me. The indwelling Spirit enables us to keep from the robbers of the soul the deposit of His word committed to us by God. 15. all they which are in Asia—Proconsular Asia; "All who are there now, when they were in Rome (not "be" or are, but) turned from me" then; were "ashamed of my chain," in contrast to ONESIPHORUS; did not stand with me but forsook me (ch. 4. 16).

It is possible that the occasion of their turning from him was at his apprehension in Nicopolis, whither they had escorted him on his way to Rome, but from which they turned back to Asia. A hint to Timothy, now in Asia, not to be like them, but to imitate rather ONESIPHORUS, and to come to him (ch. 4. 21). Phygellus and Hermogenes—specified perhaps, as being persons from whom such pusillanimous conduct could least be expected; or, as being well known to Timothy, and spoken of before in conversations between him and Paul, when the latter was in Asia Minor. 16. The Lord give mercy—even as ONESIPHORUS had abounded in works of mercy. the house of Onesiphorus—He himself was then absent from Ephesus, which accounts for the form of expression (ch. 4. 19). His household would hardly retain his name after the master was dead, as BENJEL supposes him to have been. Nowhere has Paul prayers for the dead, which is fatal to the theory, favoured by ALFORD also, that he was dead. God blesses not only the righteous man himself, but all his household. my chain—Paul in the second, as in his first imprisonment, was bound by a chain to the soldier who guarded him. 17. found me—in the crowded metropolis. So in turn "may he find mercy of the Lord in that day" when the whole universe shall be assembled. 18. grant unto him—as well as "unto his house" (v. 16). the Lord—who rewards a kindness done to His disciples as if done to Himself (Matthew 25. 45). of—from the Lord; "the Lord" is emphatically put instead of "from Himself," for solemnity and emphasis (2 Thessalonians 3. 5). in how many things—"how many acts of ministry he rendered." unto me—Omitted in the oldest MSS., so that the "ministered" may include services rendered to others as well as to Paul. very well—rather as Greek, "Thou knowest better" (than I can tell thee, seeing that thou art more of a regular resident at Ephesus).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-26. EXHORTATIONS; TO FAITHFULNESS AS A GOOD SOLDIER OF CHRIST; ERRORS TO BE SHUNNED; THE LORD'S SURE FOUNDATION; THE RIGHT SPIRIT FOR A SERVANT OF CHRIST. 1. Thou therefore—following my example (ch. 1. 8, 12), and that of ONESIPHORUS (ch. 1. 16-18), and shunning that of those who forsook me (ch. 1. 15). my son—Children ought to imitate their father. be strong—*lit., "be invested with power." Have power, and show thyself to have it; implying an abiding state of power. in the grace—the element in which the believer's strength has place. Cf. ch. 1. 7, "God hath given us the spirit of power." 2. among—*Greek, "through," i. e., with the attestation (lit., intervention) of many witnesses, viz., the presbyters and others present at his ordination or consecration (1 Timothy 4. 14; 6. 12). commit—in trust, as a deposit (ch. 1. 14). faithful—The quality most needed by those having a trust committed to them. who—*Greek, "(persons) such as shall be competent to teach (them to) others also." Thus the way is prepared for inculcating the duty of faithful endurance (v. 3-13). Thou shouldst consider as a motive to endurance, that thou hast not only to keep the deposit for thyself, but to transmit it unimpaired to others, who in their turn shall fulfil the same office. This is so far from supporting oral tradition now, that it rather teaches how precarious a mode of preserving revealed truth it was, depending, as it did, on the trustworthiness of each individual in the chain of succession; and how thankful we ought to be that God Himself has given the written Word, which is exempt from such risk. 3. Thou therefore endure hardness—The oldest MSS. have no "Thou therefore," and read, "Endure hardship with" (me). "Take thy share in suffering." [CONYBEARE and HOWSON.] 4. "No one whilst serving as a soldier," the affairs, &c.—"the businesses of life" [ALFORD]; mercantile, or other than military. him who hath chosen him—the general who at the first enlisted him as a soldier. Paul himself worked at tent-making (Acts 18. 3). Therefore what is prohibited here is, not all other save religious occupation, but the becoming entangled, or over-engrossed therewith. 5. And—"Moreover" strive for mastery—"strive in the game"

(ALFORD); viz., the great national games of Greece. yet is he not crowned, except—even though he gain the victory. strive lawfully—observing all the conditions of both the contest (keeping within the bounds of the course and strip of his clothes) and the preparation for it, viz., as to self-denying diet, anointing, exercise, self-restraint, chastity, decorum, &c. (1 Corinthians 9. 24-27). 6. must be first partaker—The right of first partaking of the fruits belongs to him who is labouring; do not thou, therefore, relax thy labours, as thou wouldest be foremost in partaking of the reward. CONYBEARE explains "first," before the idler. 7. Consider the force of the illustrations I have given from the soldier, the contender in the games, and the husbandmen, as applying to thyself in thy ministry. and the Lord give thee, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "for the Lord will give thee understanding." Thou canst understand my meaning so as personally to apply it to thyself; for the Lord will give thee understanding when thou seekest it from Him "in all things." Not intellectual perception, but personal appropriation of the truths metaphorically expressed, was what he needed to be given him by the Lord. 8. Rather as Greek, "Remember Jesus Christ, raised from the dead." Remember Christ risen, so as to follow Him. As He was raised after death, so if thou wouldest share His risen "life," thou must now share His "death" (v. 11). The Greek perfect passive participle, implies a permanent character acquired by Jesus as the risen Saviour, and our permanent interest in Him as such. Christ's resurrection is put prominently forward as being the truth now assailed (v. 18), and the one best calculated to stimulate Timothy to steadfastness in sharing Paul's sufferings for the Gospel's sake (Note, v. 8). my Gospel—that which I always taught. of the seed of David—The one and only genealogy (as contrasted with the "endless genealogies," (1 Timothy 1. 4) worth thinking of, for it proves Jesus to be the Messiah. The absence of the article in the Greek, and this formula, "of the seed of David" (cf. Romans 1. 3), imply that the words were probably part of a recognized short oral creed. In His death He assured us of His humanity; by His resurrection, of His divinity. That He was not crucified for His own sin, appears from His resurrection; that He was crucified, shows that He bore sin, on Him, though not in Him. 9. Wherein—In proclaiming which Gospel. suffer trouble—lit., "evil." I am a sufferer of evil as though I were a doer of evil. bonds—(Ch. 1. 16.) word . . . not bound—Though my person is bound, my tongue and my pen are not (ch. 4. 17; Acts 28. 31). Or he alludes not merely to his own proclamation of the Gospel, though in chains, but to the freedom of its circulation by others, even though his power of circulating it is now prescribed (Philippians 1. 13). He also hints to Timothy, that he being free ought to be the more earnest in the service of it. 10. Therefore—Because of the anxiety I feel that the Gospel should be extended; that anxiety being implied in v. 9. endure—not merely "I passively suffer," but "I actively and perseveringly endure," and "am ready to endure patiently all things." the elect—for the sake of the Church: all the members of Christ's spiritual body (Colossians 1. 24). they . . . also—as well as myself: both God's elect not yet converted and those already so. salvation . . . glory—not only salvation from wrath, but glory in reigning with Him eternally (v. 12). Glory is the full expansion of salvation (Acts 2. 47; Romans 8. 21-24, 30; Hebrews 9. 28). So grace and glory, Psalm 84. 12. 11. Greek, "Faithful is the saying." For—For the fact is so that, "if we be dead with Him (the Greek aorist tense implies a state once for all entered into in past times at the moment of regeneration, Romans 6. 3, 4, 8; Colossians 2. 12), we shall also live with Him." The symmetrical form of "the saying," v. 11-13, and the rhythmical balance of the parallel clauses, makes it likely, they formed part of a Church hymn (Note, 1 Timothy 3. 16), or accepted formula, perhaps first uttered by some of the Christian "prophets" in the public assembly (1 Corinthians 14. 26). The phrase "faithful is the saying," which seems to have been the usual formula (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 15; 3. 1; 4. 9; Titus 3. 8) in such cases, favours this. 12. suffer—rather, as the Greek is the same as in v. 10, "if we endure (with Him)," &c. (Romans 8. 17). reign with him—The peculiar privilege of the elect Church now suffering with Christ, then to reign with Him (Note, 1 Corinthians 6. 2). Reigning is something more than mere salvation (Romans 5. 17; Revelation 3. 21; 5. 10; 20. 4, 6). deny—with the mouth. As "believe" with the heart follows, v. 12. Cf. the opposite, "confess with thy mouth" and "believe in thine heart" (Romans 10. 9, 10). he also will deny us—(Matthew 10. 33.) 13. believe not—"If we are unbelievers (lit., unfaithful), He remains faithful" (Deuteronomy 7. 9, 10). The oldest MSS. read, "For He cannot (it is an impossibility that He should) deny Himself." He cannot be unfaithful to His word that He will deny those who deny Him, though we be not faithful to our profession of faith in Him (Romans 3. 8). Three things are impossible to God, to die, to lie, and to be deceived [AUGUSTINE, Symbolism ad Catechumenos, 1. 1] (Hebrews 6. 18). This impossibility is not one of infirmity, but of infinite power and majesty. Also, indirectly, comfort is suggested to believers, that He is faithful to His promises to them; at the same time that apostates are shaken out of their self-deceiving fancy, that because they change, Christ similarly may change. A warning to Timothy to be steadfast in the faith. 14. them—those over whom thou dost preside (Titus 3. 1). charging—Greek, "testifying continually:" "adjuring them," before the Lord—(1 Timothy 5. 21.) that they strive not about words—rather, "strive with words:" "not to have a (mere) war of words" (v. 23, 24; 1 Timothy 6. 4) where the most vital matters are at stake (v. 17, 18; Acts 18. 15). The oldest MSS. put a stop at "charging them before the Lord" (which clause is thus connected with "put them in remembrance") and read the imperative, "Strive not thou in words," &c. to no profit—not qualifying "words;" but Greek neuter, in apposition with "strive in words," "a thing tending to no profit," lit., "profitable for nothing;" the opposite of "meet for the master's use" (v. 21). to the subverting—sure to subvert (overturn) the hearers: the opposite of "edifying" (building up) (2 Corinthians 13. 10). 15. Study—Greek, "Be earnest," or "diligent." to show—Greek, "present," as in Romans 12. 1. thyself—as distinguished from those whom Timothy was to charge (v. 14). approved—tested by trial: opposed to "reprobate" (Titus 1. 16). workman—Alluding to Matthew 20. 1, &c. not to be ashamed—by his work not being "approved" (Philippians 1. 20). Contrast "deceitful workers" (2 Corinthians 11. 13). rightly dividing—"rightly handling" [Vulgate]; "rightly administering" [ALFORD]; lit., cutting "straight" or "right:" the metaphor being from a father or a steward (1 Corinthians 4. 1) cutting and distributing bread among his children [VITRINGA and CALVIN] (Luke 12. 42). LXX., Proverbs 3. 6 and 11. 5, use it of "making one's way:" so BENGEL here takes Paul to mean that Timothy may make ready a straight way for "the word of truth," and may himself walk straight forward according to this line, turning neither to the right nor to the left, "teaching no other doctrine" (1 Timothy 1. 3). The same image of a way appears in the Greek for "increase" (Note, v. 16). The opposite to "rightly handling," or "dispensing," is, 2 Corinthians 2. 17, "corrupt the word of God." truth—Greek, "the truth" (cf. v. 18). 16. shun—lit., "stand above," separate from, and superior to. vain—opposed to "the truth" (v. 15). babblings—with loud voice: opposed to the temperate "word" (Titus 3. 9). increase—Greek, "advance;" lit., "strike forward:" an image from pioneers cutting away all obstacles before an advancing army. They pretend progress; the only kind of progress they make is to a greater pitch of impiety. more ungodliness—Greek, "a greater degree of impiety." 17. will eat—lit., "will have pasture." The consuming progress of mortification is the image. They pretend to give rich spiritual pasture to their disciples: the only pasture is that of a spiritual cancer feeding on their vitals. cancer—a cancer or gangrene. Hymeneus—(Note, 1 Timothy 1. 20.) After his excommunication he seems to have been re-admitted into the Church and again to have troubled it. 18. erred—Greek, "missed the aim" (Note, 1 Timothy 6. 21). is past already—has already taken place. The ginnings of the subsequent Gnostic heresy already existed. They "wrested" (2 Peter 3. 16) Paul's own words (Romans 6. 4; Ephesians 2. 6; Colossians 2. 12) "to their own destruction," as though the resurrection was merely the spiritual raising of souls from the death of sin. Cf. 1 Corinthians 15. 12, where he shows all our hopes of future glory rest on the literal reality of the resurrection. To believe it past (as the Seleucians or Heremians did, according to AUGUSTINE, Ep. 119. 55 ad Janu- scutum, sec. 4.), is to deny it in its true sense. over- throw—trying to subvert "the foundation" on which alone faith can rest secure (v. 19; cf. Titus 1. 11). 19. nevertheless—Notwithstanding the subversion of their faith, "the firm foundation of God standeth" fast (so the Greek ought to be translated). The "foundation" here is the Church [ALFORD], "the ground" or basement support "of the truth" (1 Timothy 3. 15), Christ Himself being the ultimate "foundation" (1 Corinthians 3. 11). In the steadfast standing of the Church there is involved the steadfast certainty of the doctrine in question (v. 18). Thus the "house" (v. 20) answers to the "foundation:" it is made up of the elect whom "the Lord knoweth" (acknowledgeth, recognizes, Psalm 1. 6; Matthew 7. 23; John 10. 14; 1 Corinthians 8. 3) as "His," and who persevere to the end, though others "err concerning the faith" (Matthew 24. 24; John 10. 28; Romans 10. 38, 39; 1 John 2. 19). BENGEL takes "the foundation" to be the immoveable faithfulness of God (to His promises to His elect [CALVIN]). This contrasts well with the erring from the faith on the part of the reprobate, v. 18. Though they deny the faith, God abates not His faithfulness (cf. v. 13). having—sceling that it has. [ELLIOTT.] seal—inscription: indicating ownership and destination; inscriptions were often engraved on a "foundation" stone (Revelation 21. 14). [ALFORD.] This will agree with the view that "the foundation" is the Church (Ephesians 2. 20). If it be taken God's immoveable faithfulness, the "seal" will be regarded as attached to His covenant promise, with the inscription or legend, on one side of its round surface, "The Lord knoweth (it is 'knew' in LXX., Numbers 16. 5, to which Paul here alludes, altering it for his purpose by the Spirit) them that are His;" on the obverse side, "Let every one that nameth (as His Lord, Psalm 20. 7, or preacheth in His name, Jeremiah 20. 9) Christ," &c. depart—Greek, "stand aloof," from iniquity—(Isaiah 52. 11.) In both clauses there may be an allusion to Numbers 16. 5, 26, LXX. God's part and man's part are marked out. God chooseth and knoweth His elect; our part is to believe, and by the Spirit depart from all iniquity, an unequivocal proof of our being the Lord's (cf. Deuteronomy 29. 29; Luke 13. 23-27). St. Lucian when asked by his persecutors, "Of what country art thou?" replied, "I am a Christian." "What is your occupation?" "I am a Christian." "Of what family?" "I am a Christian." [CHRYSOSTOM, Orationes, 75.] He cannot be honoured with the name Christian, who dishonours by iniquity, Christ, the Author of the name. Slandina's refreshment amidst her tortures was to say, "I am a Christian, and with us Christians no evil is done." [EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 5. 1.] Apostasy from the faith is sure soon to be followed by indulgence in iniquity. It was so with the false teachers (ch. 3. 2-8, 13). 20. in a great house—i. e., the visible professing Christian Church (1 Timothy 3. 15). Paul is speaking, not of those without, but of the [visible] family of God. [CALVIN.] So the parable of the sweep net (Matthew 13. 47-49) gathering together of every kind, good and bad: as the good and bad cannot be distinguished whilst under the waves, but only when brought to shore, so believers and unbelievers continue in the same Church, until the judgment makes the everlasting distinction. "The ark of Noah is a type of the Church; as in the former there were together the leopard and the kid, the wolf and the lamb; so in the latter, the righteous and sinners, vessels of gold and silver, with vessels of wood and earth" [JEROME, contra Luciferianos, 302] (cf. Matthew 20. 16). vessels of gold . . . silver—precious and able to endure fire. of wood and earth—worthless, fragile, and soon burnt (1 Corinthians 3. 12-15; 15. 47). some—the former. the latter, to dishonour—(Proverbs 16. 4; Romans 9. 17-23). 21. If a man . . . purge himself from these—The Greek expresses "If one (ex. gr., thou, Timothy) purify himself (so as to separate) from among these" (vessels unto dishonour). sanctified—Set apart as wholly consecrated to the Lord. and meet—Some oldest MSS. omit "and." the master—viz., of "the house:" the Lord. Paul himself was such a vessel: once one amongst those of earth, but afterwards he became by grace one of gold. prepared unto every good work—(Ch. 3. 17; Titus 3. 1.) Contrast Titus 1. 16. 23. also—Greek, "But:" in contrast to "every good work," v. 21. flee—There are many lusts from which our greatest safety is in flight (Genesis 39. 12). Avoid occasions of sin. From the abstemious character of Timothy (1 Timothy 5. 23) it is likely that not animal indulgences, but the impetuosity, rash self-confidence, hastiness, strife, and vain-glory of young men (1 John 2. 14-16), are what he is here warned against: though the Spirit probably intended the warning to include both in its application to the Church in general. youthful—Timothy was a youth (1 Timothy 4. 12). righteousness—The opposite of "iniquity," i. e., unrighteousness (v. 19; cf. 1 Timothy 6. 11). peace, with—rather put no comma, "peace with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart" (1 Timothy 1. 5; Ephesians 6. 5; Colossians 3. 22). We are to love all men, but it is not possible to be at peace with all men, for this needs community of purpose and opinion; they alone who call on the Lord sincerely [as contrasted with the false teachers who had only the form of godliness, ch. 3. 5, 8; Titus 1. 15, 16] have this community [THEODORET] (Romans 12. 18). 23. (Titus 3. 9.) unlearned—Greek, "undisciplined:" not tending to promote the discipline of faith and morals (Proverbs 5. 23). "Uninstructive:" in contrast with "instructing" (v. 25), and "wise unto salvation" (ch. 3. 15). avoid—"decline." 24. not strive—"The servant of the Lord" must imitate his master in not striving contentiously, though uncompromising in earnestly contending for the faith (Jude 3; Matthew 12. 19). gentle unto all men—"patient" (Greek, "patient in bearing wrongs") in respect to adversaries. He is to be gentle so that he may occasion no evils; patient so that he may endure evils. ap- proach to teach—Implying not only solid teaching and ease in teaching, but patience and assiduity in it. [BENGEL.] 25. instructing—Greek, "disciplining," instructing with correction, which those who deal in "uninstructive" or "undisciplined questions" need (Notes, v. 23; 1 Timothy 1. 10). those that oppose themselves—Greek, "oppositely affected:" those of a different opinion. if . . . peradventure—Greek, "if at any time." repentance—which they need as antecedent to the full knowledge (so the Greek for "acknowledgment") of the truth (1 Timothy 2. 4), their minds being corrupted (ch. 3. 8), and their lives immoral. The cause of the spiritual ignorance which prompts such "questions" is moral, having its seat in the will, not in the intellect (John 7. 17). Therefore repentance is their first need. That, not man, but God alone can "give" (Acts 5. 31). 26. recover themselves—Greek, "awaken up to soberness," i. e., from the spiritual intoxication whereby they have fallen into the snare of the devil. the snare—(Ephesians 6. 11, "the wiles of the devil;" 1 Timothy 3. 7; 6. 9.) taken captive by him at his will—so as to follow the will of "THAT" (the Greek emphatically marks Satan thus) foe. However, different Greek pronouns stand for "him" and "his;" and the Greek for "taken captive" means not "captivated for destruction," but "for being saved alive," as in Luke 5. 10, "Thou shalt catch men to save them unto life;" also there is no article before the Greek participle, which the English Version "who are taken captive," would require. Therefore, translate "That they may awake, &c., taken as saved (and willing) captives by him (the servant of the Lord, v. 24), so as to follow the will of HIM (the Lord, v. 24, or "God," v. 25). There are here two evils, the "snare" and sleep, from which they are delivered: and two goods to which they are translated, awaking and deliverance. Instead of Satan's thrall comes the free and willing captivity of obedience to Christ (2 Corinthians 10. 5). It is God who goes before giving repentance (v. 25); then the work of His servant to lowing is sure to be crowned with success, leading the convert henceforth to "live to the will of God" (Acts 22. 14; 1 Peter 4. 2).

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-17. COMING EVIL DAYS: SIGNS OF EVIL ALREADY: CONTRAST IN THE DOCTRINE AND LIFE OF PAUL, WHICH TIMOTHY SHOULD FOLLOW IN ACCORDANCE WITH HIS EARLY TRAINING IN SCRIPTURE. 1. also—Greek, "but," last days—preceding Christ's second coming (2 Peter 3. 3; Jude 18). "The latter times," 1 Timothy 4. 1, refer to a period not so remote as "the last days," viz., the long days of Pagan and Greek anti-Christianity. perilous—lit., "difficult times," in which it is difficult to know what is to be done: "grievous times," shall come—Greek, "shall be imminent;" "shall come unexpectedly." [BENGEI.] 2. men—in the professing Church. Cf. the catalogue, Romans 1. 26, &c., where much the same sins are attributed to heathen men, it shall be a relapse into virtual heathenism, with all its beast-like propensities, whence the symbol of it is "a beast" (Revelation 13. 1, 11, 12, &c.; 17. 3, 8, 11). covetous—translate, "money-loving," a distinct Greek word from that for "covetous" (Note, Colossians 3. 5). The cognate Greek substantive (1 Timothy 3. 10) is so translated, "the love of money is a (Greek, not "the") root of all evil." boasters—empty boasters [ALFORD]; boasting of having what they have not. proud—overweening; lit., showing themselves above their fellows. blasphemous—rather, "evil-speakers," revilers. disobedient to parents—The character of the times is even to be gathered especially from the manners of the young. [BENGEI.] unthankful—The obligation to gratitude is next to that of obedience to parents. unholy—irreligious [ALFORD]; inobservant of the offices of piety. 3. truce-breakers—rather as the Greek is translated Romans 1. 31, "implacable." false accusers—slanderers (1 Timothy 3. 11; Titus 2. 3). incontinent, fierce—at once both soft and hard; incontinently indulging themselves, and inhuman to others. despisers, &c.—"no lovers of good" [ALFORD]; the opposite of "a lover of good" (Titus 1. 8). 4. heady—precipitate in action and in passion. high-minded—lit., "puffed up" with pride, as with smoke blinding them. lovers of pleasure . . . God—Love of pleasure destroys the love and sense of God. 5. form—outward semblance. godliness—piety. denying—rather as Greek, "having denied," i. e., renounced. the power—the living, regenerating, sanctifying influence of it. turn away—implying that some of such characters, forerunners of the last days, were already in the Church. 6. of this sort—Greek, "of these," such as were described (v. 5). creep into—stealthily. laden with sins—(Isaiah 1. 4)—applying to the "silly women" whose consciences are burdened with sins, and so are a ready prey to the false teachers who promise ease of conscience if they will follow them. A bad conscience leads easily to shipwreck of faith (1 Timothy 1. 19). divers lusts—not only animal lusts, but passion for change in doctrine and manner of teaching; the running after fashionable men and fashionable tenets, drawing them in the most opposite directions. [ALFORD.] 7. Ever learning—some new point, for mere curiosity, to the disparagement of what they seemed to know before. the knowledge—Greek, "the perfect knowledge;" the only safeguard against further novelties. Gnosticism laid hold especially of the female sex [IRENÆUS, 1. 13. 8.]; so Roman Jesuitism. 8. Now—Greek, "But;" it is no wonder there should be now such opponents to the truth, for their prototypes existed in ancient times. [ALFORD.] Jannes . . . Jambres—Traditional names of the Egyptian magicians who resisted Moses (Exodus 7. 11, 22), derived from "the unwritten teaching of the Jews." [THEODORET.] In a point so immaterial as the names, where Scripture had not recorded them, Paul takes the names which general opinion had assigned the magicians. EUSEBIUS, Preparatio Evangelica, quotes from NUMERIUS, "Jannes and Jambres were sacred scribes (a lower order of priests in Egypt) skilled in magic." HILDEBRAND interprets Jannes from the Abyssinian language a trickster, and Jambres a juggler (Acts 13. 8). resist—"withstand

as before. They did so by trying to rival Moses' miracles. So the false teachers shall exhibit lying wonders in the last days (Matthew 24. 24; 2 Thessalonians 2. 9; Revelation 13. 14, 15). reprobate—incapable of testing the truth (Romans 1. 28). [BENGEI.] ALFORD takes passively, "not abiding the test;" rejected on being tested (Jeremiah 6. 30). 9. they shall proceed no further—though for a time (ch. 2. 16) "they shall advance or proceed (English Version, 'increase') unto more ungodliness," yet there is a final limit beyond which they shall not be able to "proceed further" (Job 38. 11; Revelation 11. 7, 11). They themselves shall "wax worse and worse" (v. 13), but they shall at last be forever prevented from seducing others. "Often malice proceeds deeper down, when it cannot extend itself." [BENGEI.] their folly—lit., "dementation;" wise though they think themselves. shall be manifest—Greek, "shall be brought forth from concealment into open day" [BENGEI.] (1 Corinthians 4. 5). as theirs . . . was—as that of those magicians was, when not only could they no longer try to rival Moses in sending boils, but the boils fell upon themselves: so as to the lice (Exodus 8. 18; 9. 11). 10. fully known—lit., "fully followed up" and traced, viz., with a view to following me as thy pattern, so far as I follow Christ; the same Greek as Luke 1. 3, "having had perfect understanding of all things." His pious mother Lois, and grandmother Eunice, would recommend him to study fully Paul's Christian course as a pattern. He had not been yet the companion of Paul at the time of the apostle's persecutions in Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra (Acts 13. 50; 14. 5, 19), but is first mentioned as such Acts 16. 1-3. However, he was "a disciple" already, when introduced to us in Acts 16. 1-3; and as Paul calls him "my own son in the faith," he must have been converted by the apostle previously; perhaps in the visit to those parts three years before. Hence arose Timothy's knowledge of Paul's persecutions, which were the common talk of the churches in those regions about the time of his conversion. The incidental allusion to them here forms an undesigned coincidence between the history and the Epistle, indicating genuineness. [PALEY'S Horæ Paulinæ.] A forger of Epistles from the Acts would never allude to Timothy's knowledge of persecutions, when that knowledge is not expressly mentioned in the history, but is only arrived at by indirect inference; also the omission of Derbe here, in the Epistle, is in minute accordance with the fact that in Derbe no persecution is mentioned in the history, though Derbe and Lystra are commonly mentioned together. The reason why he mentions his persecutions before Timothy became his companion, and not those subsequent, was because Timothy was familiar with the latter as an eyewitness, and Paul needed not to remind him of them, but the former Timothy had traced up by seeking the information from others, especially as the date and scene of them was the date and scene of his own conversion. doctrine—"teaching." manner of life—"conduct," "behaviour." purpose—The Greek is elsewhere usually used of God's "purpose." But here, as in Acts 11. 23, of Paul's determined "purpose of heart in cleaving unto the Lord." My set aim, or resolution, in my apostolic function, and in every action is, not my selfish gain, but the glory of God in Christ. long-suffering—towards my adversaries, and the false teachers; towards brethren in bearing their infirmities; towards the unconverted, and the lapsed when penitent (ch. 4. 2; 2 Corinthians 6. 6; Galatians 5. 22; Ephesians 4. 2; Colossians 3. 12). charity—Love to all men. patience—"endurance;" patient continuance in well-doing amidst adversities (v. 11; Romans 2. 7). 11. afflictions—"sufferings." which—Greek, "such as," in Antioch—of Pisidia (Acts 13. 14, 50, 51). Iconium—(Acts 14. 1-5.) Lystra—(Acts 14. 6, 19.) what—How grievous. out of . . . all . . . Lord delivered me—(Ch. 4. 17; Psalm 34. 17; 2 Corinthians 1. 10.) An encouragement to Timothy not to fear persecutions. 12. Yea, and—An additional consideration for Timothy: if he wishes to live godly in Christ he must make up his mind to encounter persecution that will—Greek, "all whose will is to live," &c. So far should persecution be from being a stumbling-block to Timothy, he should consider it a mark of the pious. So the same Greek is used of the same thing, Luke 14. 28, 33, "intending (Greek, wishing) to build a tower . . . counteth the cost." live godly in Christ—(Galatians 2. 20; Philip-plans 1. 21.) There is no godliness (Greek, "piously") or piety out of Christ. The world easily puts up with the mask of a religion which depends on itself, but the piety which derives its vigour directly from Christ is as odious to modern Christians as it was to the ancient Jews. [BEN-

 GEL.] shall suffer persecution—and will not decline it (Galatians 5. 11). BISHOP PEARSON proves the Divine origination of Christianity from its success being inexplicable on the supposition of its being of human origin. The nature of its doctrine was no way likely to command success: (1) it condemned all other religions, some established for ages; (2) it enjoins precepts ungrateful to flesh and blood, the mortifying of the flesh, the love of enemies, and the bearing of the cross; (3) it enforces these seemingly unreasonable precepts by promises seemingly incredible; not good things such as afford complacency to our senses, but such as cannot be obtained till after this life, and presuppose what then seemed impossible, the resurrection; (4) it predicts to its followers what would seem sure to keep most of the world from embracing it, persecutions. 13. Reason why persecutions must be expected, and these becoming worse and worse as the end approaches. The breach between light and darkness, so far from being healed, shall be widened. [ALFORD.] evil men—in contrast to the "godly" (v. 12). seducers—lit., "conjurers." Magical arts prevailed at Ephesus (Acts 19. 19), and had been renounced by many Ephesians on embracing Christianity: but now when Paul was writing to Ephesus, symptoms of a return to conjuring tricks appeared: an undesigned coincidence. [BURTON.] Probably sorcery will characterize the final apostasy (Revelation 13. 15; 18. 23; 22. 15). wax worse—lit., "advance in the direction of worse" (Note, v. 9). Not contradictory to that verse: there the diffusion of the evil was spoken of; here its intensity. [ALFORD.] deceiving, and being deceived—He who has once begun to deceive others, is the more easily able to recover himself from error, and the more easily embraces in turn the errors of others. [BEN-GEL.] 14. But . . . thou—Whatever they may do. Resuming the thread begun at v. 10. learned—from me and thy mother and grandmother (ch. 1. 5; 2. 2). assured of—from Scripture (v. 15). of whom—plural, not singular, in the oldest MSS., "from what teachers." Not only from me, but from Lois and Eunice. 15. from a child—lit., "from an infant." The tender age of the first dawn of reason is that wherein the most lasting impressions of faith may be made. holy Scriptures—The Old Testament taught by his Jewish mother. An undesigned coincidence with ch. 1. 5; Acts 1. 1-3. able—in themselves: though through men's own fault they often do not in fact make men savingly alive. wise unto salvation—i. e., wise unto the attainment of salvation. Contrast "folly" (v. 9). Wise also in extending it to others. through faith—as the instrument of this wisdom. Each knows Divine things only as far as his own experience in himself extends. He who has not faith, has not wisdom or salvation. which is in—i. e., rests on Christ Jesus. 16. All Scripture—Greek, "Every Scripture," i. e., Scripture in its every part. However, English Version is sustained, though the Greek article be wanting, by the technical use of the term "Scripture" being so notorious as not to need the article (cf. Greek, Ephesians 3. 15; 2. 21). The Greek is never used of writings in general, but only of the sacred Scriptures. The position of the two Greek adjectives closely united by "and," forbids our taking the one as an epithet, the other as predicated and translated as ALFORD and ELLICOTT, "Every Scripture given by inspiration of God is also profitable." Vulgate in the best MSS., favours English Version. Clearly the adjectives are so closely connected, that as surely as one is a predicate, the other must be so too. ALFORD admits his translation to be harsh, though legitimate. It is better with English Version to take it in a construction legitimate, and at the same time not harsh. The Greek, "God-inspired," is found nowhere else. Most of the New Testament books were written when Paul wrote this his latest Epistle: so he includes in the clause "All Scripture is God-inspired," not only the Old Testament, in which alone Timothy was taught when a child (v. 15), but the New Testament books according as they were recognized in the churches which had men gifted with "discerning of spirits," and so able to distinguish really inspired utterances, persons, and so their writings from spurious. St. Paul means, "All Scripture is God-inspired and therefore useful:" because we see no utility in any words or portion of it, it does not follow it is not God-inspired. It is useful, because God-inspired, not God-inspired, because useful. One reason for the article not being before the Greek, "Scripture," may be that, if it had, it might be supposed that it limited the sense to the litera grammata, "Holy Scriptures" (v. 15) of the Old Testament, whereas here the assertion is more general: "all Scripture" (cf. Greek, 2 Peter 1. 20). The translation, "all Scripture that is God-inspired is also useful," would imply that there is some Scripture which is not God-inspired. But this would exclude the appropriated sense of the word "Scripture;" and who would need to be told that "all Divine Scripture is useful" ("profitable")? Hebrews 4. 13 would, in ALFORD's view, have to be rendered, "All naked things are also open to the eyes of Him," &c.: so also 1 Timothy 4. 4, which would be absurd. [TREGELLES on Daniel.] KNAPP well defines inspiration, "An extraordinary Divine agency upon teachers whilst giving instruction, whether oral or written, by which they were taught how and what they should speak or write" (cf. 2 Samuel 23. 1; Acts 4. 25; 2 Peter 1. 21). The inspiration gives the Divine sanction to all the words of Scripture, though those words be the utterances of the individual writer, and only in special cases revealed directly by God (1 Corinthians 2. 13). Inspiration is here predicated of the writings, "all Scripture," not of the persons. The question is not how God has done it; it is as to the word, not the men who wrote it. What we must believe is that He has done it, and that all the sacred writings are everywhere inspired, though not all alike matter of special revelation; and that even the very words are stamped with Divine sanction, as Jesus used them (ex. gr., in the temptation, and John 10. 34, 35), for deciding all questions of doctrine and practice. There are degrees of revelation in Scripture, but not of inspiration. The sacred writers did not even always know the full significance of their own God-inspired words (1 Peter 1. 10, 11, 12). Verbal inspiration does not mean mechanical dictation, but "all Scripture is (so) inspired by God," that every thing in it, its narratives, prophecies, citations, the whole—ideas, phrases, and words—are such as He saw fit to be there. The present condition of the text is no ground for concluding against the original text being inspired, but is a reason why we should use all critical diligence to restore the original inspired text. Again, inspiration may be accompanied by revelation or not, but it is as much needed for writing known doctrines or facts authoritatively, as for communicating new truths. [TREGELLES.] The omission here of the substantive verb is, I think, designed to mark that, not only the Scripture then existing, but what was still to be written till the canon should be completed, is included as God-inspired. The Old Testament law was the school-master to bring us to Christ; so it is appropriately said to be "able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ:" the term wisdom being appropriated to a knowledge of the relations between the Old and New Testaments, and opposed to the pretended wisdom of the false teachers (1 Timothy 1. 7, 8). doctrine—Greek, "teaching," i. e., teaching the ignorant dogmatic truths which they cannot otherwise know. He so uses the Old Testament, Romans 1. 17. reproof—"refutation," convicting the erring of their error. Including polemical divinity. As an example of this use of the Old Testament, cf. Galatians 3. 8, 13, 16. "Doctrine and reproof" comprehend the speculative parts of divinity. Next follow the practical: Scripture is profitable for (1.) correction (Greek, "setting one right;" cf. an example, 1 Corinthians 10. 1-10) and instruction (Greek "disciplining," and ather does his child, Note, ch. 2. 25; Ephesians 6. 4; Hebrews 12. 5, 11, or "training" by instruction, warning, example, kindnesses, promises, and chastisements; cf. an example, 1 Corinthians 5. 13). Thus the whole science of theology is complete in Scripture. Since Paul is speaking of Scripture in general and in the notion of it, the only general reason why, in order to perfecting the godly (v. 17), it should extend to every department of revealed truth, must be that it was intended to be the complete and sufficient rule in all things touching perfection. See Article VI., Common Prayer Book. in—Greek, "instruction which is in righteousness," as contrasted with the "instruction" in worldly rudiments (Colossians 2. 20, 22). 17. man of God—(Note, 1 Timothy 6. 11.) perfect, thoroughly furnished—Gr., "thoroughly perfected," and so "perfect." The man of God is perfectly accoutred out of Scripture for his work, whether he be a minister (cf. ch. 4. 2 with ch. 3. 16) or a spiritual layman. No oral tradition is needed to be added.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-22. SOLEMN CHARGE TO TIMOTHY TO DO HIS DUTY ZEALOUSLY, FOR TIMES OF APOSTASY ARE AT HAND, AND THE APOSTLE IS NEAR HIS TRIUMPHANT END. REQUESTS HIM TO COME AND BRING MARK WITH HIM TO ROME, AS LUKE ALONE IS WITH HIM, THE OTHERS HAVING GONE: ALSO HIS CLOAK AND PARCHMENT: WARNS HIM AGAINST ALEXANDER: TELLS WHAT BEFELL HIM AT HIS FIRST DEFENCE: GREETINGS: BENEDICTION. 1. charge—Greek, "adjure." therefore—Omitted in the oldest MSS. the Lord Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read simply, "Christ Jesus." shall judge—His commission from God is mentioned, Acts 10. 42; his resolution to do so, 1 Peter 4. 5; the execution of his commission, here. at his appearing—The oldest MSS. read, "and" for "at;" then translate, "(I charge thee before God, &c.) and by His appearing." and his kingdom—to be set at His appearing, when we hope to reign with him. His kingdom is real now, but not visible. It shall then be both real and visible (Luke 22. 18, 30; Revelation 1. 7; 11. 15; 19. 6). Now he reigns in the midst of His enemies expecting till they shall be overthrown (Psalm 110. 2; Hebrews 10. 13). Then He shall reign with His adversaries prostrate. 2. Preach—Lit., "proclaim as a herald." The term for the discourses in the synagogue was Darascyth; the corresponding Greek term (implying dialectical style, dialogue, and discussion, Acts 17. 2, 18; 18. 4, 19) is applied in Acts to discourses in the Christian Church. JUSTIN MARTYR, Apology 2, describes the order of public worship, "On Sunday all meet, and the writings of the apostles and prophets are read; then the president delivers a discourse; after this all stand up and pray; then there is offered bread and wine and water; the president likewise prays and gives thanks, and the people solemnly assent, saying, Amen." The bishops and presbyters had the right and duty to preach, but they sometimes called on deacons, and even laymen, to preach. EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 6. 19; in this the Church imitated the synagogue (Luke 4. 17-22; Acts 13. 15, 16). be instant—i. e., urgent, earnest, in the whole work of the ministry. in season, out of season—i. e., at all seasons; whether they regard your speaking as seasonable or unseasonable. "Just as the fountains, though none may draw from them, still flow on; and the rivers, though none drink of them, still run; so must we do all on our part in speaking, though none give heed to us." [CHRYSOSTOM, Homily, 80., vol. 5., p. 221.] I think with CHRYSOSTOM, there is included also the idea of times whether seasonable or unseasonable to Timothy himself; not merely when convenient, but when inconvenient to thee, night as well as day (Acts 20. 31), in danger as well as in safety, in prison and when doomed to death as well as when at large, not only in church, but everywhere and on all occasions, whenever and wherever the Lord's work requires it. reprove—"convict," "confute." with—Greek, "in (the element in which the exhortation ought to have place) all long-suffering (ch. 2. 24, 25; 3. 10) and teaching;" cf. ch. 2. 24 "apt to teach." The Greek for "doctrine" here is di-

dache, but in ch. 3. 16 didascalía. "Didascalía" is what one receives; didache is what is communicated. [TITTMANN,] 3. they—professing Christians. sound doctrine—Greek, "the sound (Note, 1 Timothy 1. 10) doctrine" (didascalía; or "teaching," viz., of the Gospel. Presently follows the concrete, "teachers." after their own lusts—instead of regarding the will of God they dislike being interrupted in their lusts by true teachers. heap—one on another: an indiscriminate mass of false teachers. Variety delights itching ears. "He who despises sound teaching leaves sound teachers; they seek instructors like themselves." [BENGEL.] It is the corruption of the people in the first instance, that creates priestcraft (Exodus 32. 1) to themselves—such as will suit their depraved tastes; "populus vult decipi, et decipiatur," the people wish to be deceived, so let them be deceived. "Like priest, like people" (1 Kings 12. 31; Hosea 4. 9). itching—liking to hear teachers who give them mere pleasure (Acts 17. 10-21), and do not offend by truths grating to their ears. They, as it were, tickle with pleasure the levity of the multitude [CICERO], who come as to a theatre to hear what will delight their ears, not to learn [SENECA, Ep. 10. 8] what will do them good. "Itch in the ears is as bad as in any other part of the body, and perhaps worse." [SOUTH.] 4. The ear brooks not what is opposed to the man's lusts. turned—Greek, "turned aside" (1 Timothy 1. 6). It is a righteous retribution, that when men turn away from the truth, they should be turned to fables (Jeremiah 2. 19). fables—(1 Timothy 1. 4.) 5. I am no longer here to withstand these things; be thou a worthy successor of me, no longer depending on me for counsel, but thine own master, and swimming without the corks [CALVIN]; follow my steps, inherit their result, and the honour of their end. [ALFORD.] watch thou—lit., "with the wakefulness of one sober." in all things—on all occasions and under all circumstances (Titus 2. 7). endure affliction—suffer hardships. [ALFORD.] evangelist—A missionary bishop, preacher, and teacher. make full proof of—fulfil in all its requirements, leaving nothing undone (Acts 12. 25; Romans 15. 19; Colossians 4. 17). 6. Greek, "For I am already being offered;" lit., as a libation; appropriate to the shedding of his blood. Every sacrifice began with an initiatory libation on the victim's head (Note, cf. Philipplans 2. 17). A motive to stimulate Timothy to faithfulness—the departure and final blessedness of Paul; it is the end that crowns the work. [BENGEL.] As the time of his departure was indicated to Peter, so to Paul (2 Peter 1. 14). my departure—lit., "loosing anchor" (Note, Philipplans 1. 23). Dissolution. 7. "I have striven the good strife;" the Greek is not restricted to a fight, but includes any competitive contest, ex. gr., that of the race-course (1 Timothy 6. 12 [ALFORD]; 1 Corinthians 9. 24, &c.; Hebrews 12. 1, 2). kept the faith—the Christian faith committed to me as a believer and an apostle (cf. ch. 1. 14; Revelation 2. 10; 3. 10). 8. a crown—rather as Greek, "the crown." The "henceforth" marks the decisive moment; he looks to his state in a threefold aspect, (1.) The past, I have fought; (2.) the immediately present, there is laid up for me; (3.) the future, the Lord will give in that day. [BENGEL.] crown—A crown, or garland, used to be bestowed at the Greek national games on the successful competitor in wrestling, running, &c. (cf. 1 Peter 5. 4; Revelation 2. 10). of righteousness—the reward is in recognition of righteousness wrought in Paul by God's Spirit; the crown is prepared for the righteous; but it is a crown which consists in righteousness. Righteousness will be its own reward (Revelation 22. 11). Cf. Exodus 30. 30. A man is justified gratuitously by the merits of Christ through faith; and when he is so justified God accepts his works and honours them with a reward which is not their due, but is given of grace. "So great is God's goodness to men that He wills that their works should be merits, though they are merely His own gifts." [EP., POPE CELESTINE I., 12.] give—Greek, "shall award" in righteous requital as "Judge" (Acts 17. 31; 2 Corinthians 5. 10; 2 Thessalonians 1. 6, 7). in that day—not until His appearing (ch. 1. 12). The partakers of the first resurrection may receive a crown also at the last day, and obtain in that general assembly of all men, a new award of praise. The honorable sentence passed on the "brethren" of the Judge, who sit with Him on His throne, is in Matthew 25. 10, taken for granted as already awarded, when that affecting those who benefited them is being passed. [BENGEL.] The former, the elect Church who reign with Christ in the millennium, are fewer than the latter. The righteous heavenly Judge stands in contrast to the unrighteous earthly judges who condemned Paul. me—individual appropriation. Greek, "Not only to me." them that love—Greek, "have loved, and do love;" habitual love and desire for Christ's appearing, which presupposes faith (cf. Hebrews 1. 23). Cf. the sad contrast, v. 10, "having loved this present world." 9. (v. 21; ch. 1. 4, 8.) Timothy is asked to come to be a comfort to Paul, and also to be strengthened by Paul, for carrying on the Gospel work after Paul's decease. 10. Demas—once a "fellow-labourer" of Paul, along with Mark and Luke (Colossians 4. 14; Philemon 24). His motive for forsaking Paul seems to have been love of worldly ease, safety, and comforts at home, and disinclination to brave danger with Paul (Matthew 13. 20, 21, 22). CHRYSOSTOM implies that Thessalonica was his home. Galatia—One oldest MS. supports the reading "Gaul." But most oldest MSS., &c., "Galatia." Titus—He must have therefore left Crete after "setting in order" the affairs of the churches there (Titus 1. 5). Dalmatia—part of the Roman province of Illyricum on the coast of the Adriatic. Paul had written to him (Titus 3. 12) to come to him in the winter to Nicopolis (in Epirus), intending in the spring to preach the Gospel in the adjoining province of Dalmatia. Titus seems to have gone thither to carry out the apostle's intention, the execution of which was interrupted by his arrest. Whether he went of his own accord, as is likely, or being sent by Paul, which the expression "is departed" hardly accords with, cannot be positively decided. Paul here speaks only of his personal attendants having forsaken him; he had still friends among the Roman Christians who visited him (ch. 4. 21), though they had been afraid to stand by him at his trial (v. 16). 11. Take—Greek, "take up" on thy journey (Acts 20. 13, 14). John Mark was probably in, or near, Colosse, as in the Epistle to the Colossians (Colossians 4. 10), written two years before this, he is mentioned as about to visit them. Timothy was now absent from Ephesus, and somewhere in the interior of Asia Minor; hence he would be sure to fall in with Mark on his journey. he is profitable to me for the ministry—Mark had been under a cloud for having forsaken Paul at a critical moment in his missionary tour with Barnabas (Acts 15. 37-40; 13. 5, 13). Timothy had subsequently occupied the same post in relation to Paul as Mark once held. Hence Paul, appropriately here, wipes out the past censure by high praise of Mark, and guards against Timothy's making self-complacent comparisons between himself and Mark, as though he were superior to the latter (cf. Philemon 24). Demas apostatizes. Mark returns to the right way, and is no longer unprofitable, but is profitable for the Gospel ministry (Philemon 11). 12. And—Greek, "But." Thou art to come to me, but Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus to supply thy place (if thou so wiltest it) in presiding over the Church there in thy absence (cf. Titus 3. 12). It is possible Tychicus was the bearer of this Ep'istle, though the omission of "to thee" is rather against this view. 13. cloak . . . I left—Probably obliged to leave it in a hurried departure from Troas. Carpus—a faithful friend to have been entrusted with so precious deposits. The mention of his "cloak," so far from being unworthy of inspiration, is one of those graphic touches which sheds a flood of light on the last scene of Paul's life, on the confines of two worlds; in this wanting a cloak to cover him from the winter cold, in that covered with the righteousness of saints, "clothed upon with his house from heaven." [GAUSSEN.] So the inner vesture and outer garment of Jesus, Paul's master, are suggestive of most instructive thought (John 19). books—he was anxious respecting these that he might transmit them to the faithful, so that they might have the teaching of his writings when he should be gone. especially the parchments—containing perhaps some of his inspired Epistles themselves. 14. Alexander the copper-smith—or "smith" in general,

Perhaps the same as the Alexander, 1 Timothy 1. 20 (note there) at Ephesus. Excommunicated then he subsequently was restored, and now vented his personal malice because of his excommunication in accusing Paul before the Roman judges, whether of incendiarism or of introducing a new religion. See my Introduction. He may have been the Alexander put forward by the Jews in the tumult at Ephesus (Acts 19. 33, 34). reward—The oldest MSS. read "shall reward," or "requite him." Personal revenge certainly did not influence the apostle (v. 16, end). 15. our words—the arguments of us Christians for our common faith. Believers have a common cause. 16. At my first answer—i. e., "defence" in court, at my first public examination. Timothy knew nothing of this, it is plain, till Paul now informs him. But during his former imprisonment at Rome, Timothy was with him (Philippians 1. 1, 7). This must have been, therefore, a second imprisonment. He must have been set free before the persecution in A. D. 64, when the Christians were accused of causing the conflagration in Rome; for, had he been a prisoner then, he certainly would not have been spared. The tradition [EUSEBIUS, 2. 25] that he was finally beheaded, accords with his not having been put to death in the persecution, A. D. 64, when burning to death was the mode by which the Christians were executed, but subsequently to it. His "first" trial in his second imprisonment seems to have been on the charge of complicity in the conflagration; his absence from Rome may have been the ground of his acquittal on that charge; his final condemnation was probably on the charge of introducing a new and unlawful religion into Rome. stood with me—Greek, "came forward with me" [ALFORD] as a friend and advocate. may [it] not be laid to their charge—The position of "their," in the Greek, is emphatic. "May it not be laid to THEIR charge," for they were intimidated; their drawing back from me was not from bad disposition so much as from fear; it is sure to be laid to the charge of those who intimidated them. Still Paul, like Stephen, would doubtless have offered the same prayer for his persecutors themselves (Acts 7. 60). 17. the Lord—the more because men deserted me. stood with me—stronger than "came forward with me" (Greek, v. 16). strengthened—Greek, "put strength in me." by me—"through me;" through my means. One single occasion is often of the greatest moment. the preaching—"the Gospel proclamation." might be fully known—might be fully made (note, v. 5). that all the Gentiles—present at my trial, "might hear" the Gospel proclaimed then. Rome was the capital of the Gentile world, so that a proclamation of the truth to the Romans was likely to go forth to the rest of the Gentile world. I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion—viz., Satan, the roaring, devouring lion (Luke 22. 31; 1 Peter 5. 8). I was prevented falling into his snare (ch. 2. 26; Psalm 22. 21; 2 Peter 2. 9); v. 18 agrees with this interpretation, "The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work," viz., both from evil and the Evil One, as the Greek of the Lord's Prayer expresses it. It was not deliverance from Nero (who was called the lion) which he rejoiced in, for he did not fear death (v. 6-8), but deliverance from the temptation, through fear, to deny His Lord: so ALFORD. 18. And the Lord shall—Hope draws its conclusions from the past to the future. [BENGEL.] will preserve me—lit., "will save" (Psalm 22. 21) "will bring me safe to." Jesus is the Lord and the Deliverer (Philippians 3. 20; 1 Thessalonians 1. 10: He saves from evil; He gives good things. heavenly kingdom—Greek, "His kingdom which is a heavenly one." to whom, &c.—Greek, "to whom be the glory unto the ages of ages." The very hope produces a doxology: how much greater will be the doxology which the actual enjoyment shall produce! [BENGEL.] 19. Prisca and Aquila—(Acts 18. 2, 3; Romans 16. 3, 4; 1 Corinthians 16. 19, written from Ephesus, where therefore Aquila and Priscilla must then have been.) household of Onesiphorus—If he were dead at the time the "household" would not have been called "the household of Onesiphorus." He was probably absent (note, ch. 1. 16). 20. In order to depict his desertion, he informs Timothy that Erastus, one of his usual companions (Acts 19. 22, possibly the same ΚΡΑΤΙΣΤΗΣ in Romans

TITUS.

14. 23, though how he could leave his official duties for missionary journeys is not clear), stayed behind at Corinth, his native place, or usual residence, of which city he was "chamberlain," or city steward and treasurer (Romans 16. 23); and Trophimus he left behind at Miletus sick. (See on his former history, Acts 20. 4; 21. 29.) This verse is irreconcilable with the imprisonment from which he writes being the first: for he did not pass by Corinth or Miletus on his way to Rome when about to be imprisoned for the first time. As Miletus was near Ephesus, there is a presumption that Timothy was not at Ephesus when Paul wrote, or he would not need to inform Timothy of Trophimus lying sick in his immediate neighbourhood. However, Trophimus may not have been still at Miletus at the time when Paul wrote, though he had left him there on his way to Rome. Prisca and Aquila were most likely to be at Ephesus (v. 19), and he desires Timothy to salute them: so also Onesiphorus' household (ch. 1. 18). Paul had not the power of healing at will (Acts 19. 12), but as the Lord allowed him, 21. before winter—when a voyage, according to ancient usages of navigation, would be out of the question: also, Paul would need his "cloak" against the winter (v. 13). Pudens . . . Claudia—afterwards husband and wife (according to MARTIAL IV., 13; XI., 54), he a Roman knight, she a Briton, surnamed Rufina. TACITUS, Agricola, 14, mentions that territories in south-east Britain were given to a British king, Cogidunus, in reward for his fidelity to Rome, A. D. 52, whilst Claudius was emperor. In 1772 a marble was dug up at Chichester, mentioning Cogidunus with the surname Claudius, added from his patron, the emperor's name; and Pudens in connection with Cogidunus, doubtless his father-in-law. His daughter would be Claudia, who seems to have been sent to Rome for education, as a pledge of the father's fidelity. Here she was under the protection of Pomponia, wife of Aulus Plautius, conqueror of Britain. Pomponia was accused of foreign superstitions, A. D. 67 [TACITUS, Annals, 8. 32], probably Christianity. She probably was the instrument of converting Claudia, who took the name Rufina from her, that being a cognomen of the Pomponian gens (cf. Romans 16. 18, Rufus, a Christian). Pudens in Martial and in the Chichester inscription, appears as a pagan; but perhaps he or his friends concealed his Christianity through fear. Tradition represents Timothy, a son of Pudens, as taking part in converting the Britons. Linus—put third; therefore not at this time yet, as he was afterwards, bishop. His name being here inserted between Pudens and Claudia, implies the two were not yet married. "Eubulus" is identified by some with Aristobolus, who, with his converts, is said to have been among the first Evangelists of Britain. Paul himself, says CLEMENT, "visited the farthest west [perhaps Britain, certainly Spain], and was martyred under the rulers at Rome," who were Nero's vicegerents in his absence from the city. 22. Grace be with you—Plural in oldest MSS., "with you," i. e., thee and the members of the Ephesian and neighbouring churches.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO TITUS. INTRODUCTION.

GENUINENESS.—CLEMENT OF ROME quotes it (Epistola ad Corinthios, c. 2); IRENEUS (3. 3, sec. 4) refers to it as Paul's THEOPHILUS, ad Autolytus, 3., sec. 14, quotes it as Scripture. Cf. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Stromata, 1. 299; TERTULLIAN, Prescriptione Hæreticorum, 6.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.—This Epistle seems to have been written from Corinth [BIRKS], subsequently to his first imprisonment, when Paul was on his way to Nicopolis (ch. 8. 12) in Epirus, where he purposed passing the winter, shortly before his martyrdom, A. D. 67. BIRKS thinks, from the similarity of the Epistle to Titus and First Timothy, that both were written from the same place, Corinth, and at dates not widely apart; First Timothy shortly after coming to Corinth, before he had planned a journey to Epirus, the Epistle to Titus afterwards. The journey to Crete and Ephesus for the bearers of his letters would be easy from Corinth, and he could himself thence easily pass into Epirus. He had shortly before visited Crete, wherein a Church existed (though without due organization), the first foundation of which he may have partly laid at his former visit (Acts 27. 7, &c.), when on his way to his first imprisonment at Rome. That he returned to the East after his first imprisonment appears most probable from Philippians 2. 24; Philemon 22. However, there may have been seeds of Christianity sown in Crete, even before his first visit, by the Cretans who heard Peter's preaching on Pentecost (Acts 2. 11).

OCCASION OF WRITING.—Corrupt elements soon showed themselves in the Cretan Church, similar to those noticed in the Epistles to Timothy as existing in the Ephesian Church, Judaism, false pretensions to science, and practical ungodliness. Paul, on his late visit, had left Titus in Crete to establish Church government, and ordain presbyters (deacons are not mentioned). Titus had been several times employed by Paul on a mission to the Corinthian Churches, and had probably thence visited Crete, which was within easy reach of Corinth. Hence the suitability of his selection by the apostle for the superintendence of the Cretan Church. Paul now follows up with instructions by letter those he had already given to Titus in person on the qualifications of elders, and the graces becoming the old, the young, and females, and warns him against the unprofitable speculations so rife in Crete. The national character of the Cretans was low in the extreme, as EPIMENIDES, quoted in ch. 1. 12, paints it. LIVY, 44. 45, stigmatizes their avarice; POLYB- LUS, 6. 46. 9, their ferocity and fraud; and 6. 47. 5, their mendacity, so much so, that "to Cretanize" is another name for to lie: they were included in the proverbial three infamous initials K or C, "Cappadocia, Crete, Cilicia."

NOTICES OF TITUS.—It is strange that he is never mentioned by this name in Acts, and there seems none of those mentioned in that book who exactly answers to him. He was a Greek, and therefore a Gentile (Galatians 2. 1, 3), and converted by Paul (ch. 1. 4). He accompanied the apostle on the deputation sent from the Church of Antioch to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles respecting the circumcision of Gentile converts (Acts 15. 2); and, agreeably to the decree of the council there, was not circumcised. He was in company with Paul at Ephesus, whence he was sent to Corinth to commence the collection for the Jerusalem saints, and to ascertain the effect of the First Epistle on the Corinthians (2 Corinthians 7. 6-9; 8. 6; 12. 18), and there showed an unmercenary spirit. He next proceeded to Macedonia, where he joined Paul, who had been already eagerly expecting him at Troas (2 Corinthians 2. 12, 13, "Titus my brother;" 7. 6). He was then employed by the apostle in preparing the collection for the poor saints in Judea, and became the bearer of the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Corinthians 8. 16, 17, 23). Paul in it calls him "my partner and fellow-helper concerning you." His being located in Crete (Titus 1. 5) was subsequent to Paul's first imprisonment, and shortly before the second, about 67 A. D., ten years subsequent to the last notice of him in Second Corinthians, 57 A. D. He probably met Paul, as the apostle desired, at Nicopolis; for his subsequent journey into Dalmatia, thence (or else from Rome, whither he may have accompanied Paul) would be more likely, than from the distant Crete (2 Timothy 4. 10, written subsequently to the Epistle to Titus). In the unsettled state of things then, Titus' episcopal commission in Crete was to be but temporary, Paul requiring the presence of Titus with himself, whenever Artemas or Tychicus should arrive in Crete and set him free from his duties there.

Tradition represents him to have died peaceably in Crete, as archbishop of Gortyna, at an advanced age.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-13. ADDRESS: FOR WHAT END TITUS WAS LEFT IN CRETE QUALIFICATIONS FOR ELDERS: GAINSAYERS IN CRETE NEEDING REPROOF. 1. servant of God—not found elsewhere in the same connection. In Romans 1. 1 it is "servant of Jesus Christ" (Galatians 1. 10; Philip- pians 1. 1; cf. Acts 16. 17; Revelation 1. 1; 15. 8). In Romans 1. 1, there follows, "called to be an apostle," which corresponds to the general designation of the office first, "servant of God," here, followed by the special description, "apostle of Jesus Christ." The full expression of his apostolic office answers, in both Epistles, to the design, and is a comprehensive index to the contents. The peculiar form here would never have proceeded from a forger, according to the faith—rather, "for," "with a view to subserve the faith;" this is the object of my apostleship (cf. v. 4, 9; Romans 1. 5). the elect—for whose sake we ought to endure all things (2 Timothy 2. 10). This election has its ground, not in anything belonging to those thus distinguished, but in the purpose and will of God from everlasting (2 Timothy 1. 9; Romans 8. 30-33; cf. Luke 18. 7; Ephesians 1. 4; Colossians 3. 12). Acts 13. 48 shows that all faith on the part of the elect, rests on the Divine fore- ordination: they do not become elect by their faith, but receive faith, and so become believers, because they are elect. and the acknowledging of the truth—"and (for promoting) the full knowledge of the truth," i. e., the Christian truth (Ephesians 1. 13). after godliness—i. e., which belongs to piety: opposed to the knowledge which has not for its object the truth, but error, doctrinal and practical (v. 11, 16; 1 Timothy 6. 3); or even which has for its object mere earthly truth, not growth in the Divine life. "Godliness," or "piety," is a term peculiar to the pas- toral Epistles: a fact explained by the apostle having in them to combat doctrine tending to "ungodliness" (2 Timothy 2. 16; cf. ch. 2. 11, 12). 2. In hope of eternal life—Connected with the whole preceding sentence. That whereon rests my aim as an apostle to promote the elects' faith and full knowledge of the truth, is, "the hope of eter- nal life" (ch. 2. 13; 3. 7; Acts 23. 6; 24. 15; 28. 20). that cannot lie—(Romans 3. 4; 11. 29; Hebrews 6. 18.) promised before the world began—A contracted expression for "purposed before the world began (lit., before the ages of time), and promised actually in time," the promise spring- ing from the eternal purpose; as in 2 Timothy 1. 9, the gift of grace was the result of the eternal purpose "before the world began." 3. in due times—Greek, "in its own sea- sons," the seasons appropriate to it, and fixed by God for it (Acts 1. 7). manifested—implying that the "promise," v. 2, had lain hidden in His eternal purpose heretofore (cf. Colossians 1. 26; 2 Timothy 1. 9, 10). his word—equiva- lent to "eternal life" (v. 2; John 5. 24; 6. 63; 17. 3, 17). through preaching—Greek, "in preaching," or rather as ALFORD (Note, cf. 2 Timothy 4. 17), "in the (Gospel) procla- mation (the thing preached the Gospel) with which I was entrusted," according to—in pursuance of (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 1). of God our Saviour—rather as Greek, "of our Saviour God." God is predicated of our Saviour (cf. Jude 25; Luke 1. 47). Also Psalm 24. 5; Isaiah 12. 2; 45. 15, 21, LXX. Applied to Jesus, v. 4; ch. 2. 13; 3. 6; 2 Timothy 1. 10. 4. Titus, mine own son—Greek, "my genuine child" (1 Timothy 1. 2), i. e., converted by my instrumentality (1 Corinthians 4. 17; Philemon 10). after the common faith—A genuine son in respect to (in virtue of) the faith common to all the people of God, comprising in a common brotherhood Gentiles as well as Jews, therefore embracing Titus a Gentile (2 Peter 1. 1; Jude 8). Grace, mercy, and peace—"Mercy" is omitted in some of the oldest MSS. But one of the best and oldest MSS. sup- ports it (Notes, cf. 1 Timothy 1. 2; 2 Timothy 1. 2). There are many similarities of phrase in the Pastoral Epistles. the Lord Jesus Christ—The oldest MSS. read only "Christ Jesus." our Saviour—found thus added to "Christ" only in Paul's Pastoral Epistles, and 2 Peter 1. 1, 11; 2. 20; 3. 18. 5. I left thee—"I left thee behind" [ALFORD] when I left the island: not implying permanence of commission (cf. 1 Timothy 1. 8). in Crete—now Candia. set in order—rather as Greek, "that thou mightest follow up (the work begun by me) setting right the things that are wanting," which I was unable to complete by reason of the shortness of my stay in Crete. Christianity, doubtless, had long existed in Crete: there were some Cretans among those who heard Peter's preaching on Pentecost (Acts 2. 11). The number of Jews in Crete was large (v. 10), and it is likely that those scattered in the persecution of Stephen (Acts 11. 19) preached to them, as they did to the Jews of Cyprus, &c. Paul also was there on his voyage to Rome (Acts 27. 7-12). By all these in- strumentalities the Gospel was sure to reach Crete. But until Paul's later visit, after his first imprisonment at Rome, the Cretan Christians were without Church or- ganization. This Paul began, and had commissioned (before leaving Crete) Titus to go on with, and now re- minds him of that commission. ordain—rather, "ap- point," "constitute." in every city—"from city to city." as I . . . appointed thee—i. e., as I directed thee; pre- scribing as well the act of constituting elders, as also the manner of doing so, which latter includes the qualifica- tions required in a presbyter presently stated. Those called "elders" here are called "bishops," v. 7. Elder is the term of dignity in relation to the college of presbyters; bishop points to the duties of his office in relation to the flock. From the unsound state of the Cretan Christians described here, we see the danger of the want of Church government. The appointment of presbyters was de- signed to check idle talk and speculation, by setting forth the "faithful word." 6. (Notes, cf. 1 Timothy 3. 2-4.) The thing dwelt on here as the requisite in a bishop, is a good reputation among those over whom he is to be set. The immorality of the Cretan professors rendered this a necessary requisite in one who was to be a reprover; and their unsoundness in doctrine also made needful great steadfastness in the faith (v. 9, 13). having faithful children—i. e., believing children. He who could not bring his children to faith, how shall he bring others? [BENGEI.] ALFORD explains, "established in the faith." not accused—Not merely not riotous, but "not (even) ac- cused of riot" ("profligacy" [ALFORD]; "Dissolute life" [WAHL]). unruly—insubordinate; opposed to "in sub- jection" (1 Timothy 3. 4). 7. For . . . must—The empha- sis is on must. The reason why I said "blameless," is the very idea of a "bishop" (an overseer of the flock; he here substitutes for "presbyter" the term which expresses his duties) involves the necessity for such blamelessness, if he is to have influence over the flock. steward of God—The greater the master is, the greater the virtues required in His servant [BENGEI.] (1 Timothy 3. 15); the Church is God's house, over which the minister is set as a steward (Hebrews 3. 2-6; 1 Peter 4. 10, 17). Note, ministers are not merely Church officers, but God's stewards; Church gov- ernment is of Divine appointment, not self-willed—lit., "self-pleasing;" unaccommodating to others; harsh, the opposite of "a lover of hospitality" (v. 6); so Nabal (

Samuel 25.); self-loving and imperious; such a spirit would incapacitate him for leading a willing flock, instead of driving. nor given to wine—(Notes, 1 Timothy 3. 3, 8.) not given to filthy lucre—not making the Gospel a means of gain (1 Timothy 3. 3, 8). In opposition to those "teaching for filthy lucre's sake" (v. 11; 1 Timothy 6. 5; 1 Peter 5. 2). 8. lover of hospitality—needed especially in those days (Romans 12. 13; 1 Timothy 3. 2; Hebrews 13. 2; 1 Peter 4. 9; 3 John 5). Christians travelling from one place to another were received and forwarded on their journey by their brethren. lover of good men—Greek, "a lover of (all that is) good," men or things (Philippians 4. 8, 9). sober—towards one's self; "discreet;" "self-restrained" [ALFORD.] (Note, 1 Timothy 2. 9.) just—towards men. holy—towards God (Note, 1 Thessalonians 2. 10). temperate—"One having his passions, tongue, hand, and eyes, at command" [CHRYSOSTOM]; "continent." 9. Holding fast—Holding firmly to (cf. Matthew 24; Luke 16. 13). the faithful—true and trustworthy (1 Timothy 1. 15). word as he has been taught—lit., "the word (which is) according to the teaching" which he has received (cf. 1 Timothy 4. 6, end; 2 Timothy 3. 14). by—translate as Greek*, "to exhort in doctrine (instruction) which is sound;" sound doctrine or instruction is the element in which his exhorting is to have place. On "sound" (peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles), see 1 Timothy 1. 10; 6. 3. convince—rather, "reprove" [ALFORD] (v. 13). 10. unruly—"insubordinate." and—Omitted in the oldest MSS. "There are many unruly persons, vain talkers, and deceivers;" "unruly" being predicated of both vain talkers and deceivers. vain talkers—opposed to "holding fast the faithful word" (v. 9). "Vain jangling" (1 Timothy 1. 6); "foolish questions, unprofitable and vain" (ch. 3. 9). The source of the evil was corrupted Judaism (v. 14). Many Jews were then living in Crete, according to JOSEPHUS; so the Jewish leaven remained in some of them after conversion. deceivers—lit., "deceivers of the minds of others" (Greek, Galatians 6. 3). 11. mouths . . . stopped—lit., "muzzled," "bridled" as an unruly beast (cf. Psalm 32. 9). who—Greek, "(seeing that they are) such men as;" or "inasmuch as they." [ELLCOTT.] subvert . . . houses—"overthrowing" their "faith" (2 Timothy 2. 18). "They are the devil's levers by which he subverts the houses of God" [THEOPHYLACT]. for filthy lucre—(1 Timothy 3. 3, 8; 6. 5.) 12. One—Epimenides of Phæstus, or Gnossus, in Crete, about 600 B. C. He was sent for to purify Athens from its pollution occasioned by Cylon. He was regarded as a diviner and prophet. The words here are taken probably from his treatise "concerning oracles." Paul also quotes from two other heathen writers, ARATUS (Acts 17. 28) and MENANDER (1 Corinthians 15. 33), but he does not honour them so far as even to mention their names. of themselves . . . their own—which enhances his authority as a witness. "To Cretanize" was proverbial for to lie; as "to Corinthianize" was for to be dissolute. always liars—not merely at times, as every natural man is. Contrast v. 2, "God that cannot lie." They love "fables" (v. 14); even the heathen poets laughed at their lying assertion that they had in their country the sepulchre of Jupiter. evil beasts—rude, savage, cunning, greedy. Crete was a country without wild beasts. Epimenides' sarcasm was that its human inhabitants supplied the place of wild beasts. slow bellies—indolent through pampering their bellies. They themselves are called "bellies," for that is the member for which they live (Romans 16. 18; Philippians 3. 19). 13. This witness—"This testimony (though coming from a Cretan) is true." sharply—Gentleness would not reclaim so perverse offenders. that they—that those seduced by the false teachers may be brought back to soundness in the faith. Their malady is strifes about words and questions (ch. 3. 9; 1 Timothy 6. 4). 14. Jewish fables—(Notes, 1 Timothy 1. 4; 4. 7; 2 Timothy 4. 4.) These formed the transition stage to subsequent Gnosticism; as yet the error was but profitless, and not tending to godliness, rather than openly opposed to the faith. commandments of men—as to ascetic abstinence (v. 15; Mark 7. 7-9; Colossians 2. 16, 20-23; 1 Timothy 4. 3). that turn from the truth—whose characteristic is that they turn away from the truth (2 Timothy 4. 4). 15. all things—external, "are pure" in themselves; the distinction of pure and impure is not in the things, but in the disposition of him who uses them; in opposition to "the commandments of men" (v. 14), which forbade certain things as if impure intrinsically. "To the pure" inwardly, i. e., those purified in heart by faith (Acts 15. 9; Romans 14. 20; 1 Timothy 4. 3), all outward things are pure; all are open to their use. Sin alone touches and defiles the soul (Matthew 23. 28; Luke 11. 41). nothing pure—either within or without (Romans 14. 23). mind—their mental sense and intelligence. conscience—their moral consciousness of the conformity or discrepancy between their motives and acts on the one hand, and God's law on the other. A conscience and a mind defiled are represented as the source of the errors opposed in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Timothy 1. 19; 3. 9; 6. 5). 16. They profess—i. e., make a profession acknowledging God. He does not deny their theoretical knowledge of God, but that they practically know Him. deny him—The opposite of the previous "profess" or "confess" Him (1 Timothy 5. 8; 2 Timothy 2. 12; 3. 5). abominable—themselves, though laying so much stress on the contracting of abomination from outward things (cf. Leviticus 11. 10-13; Romans 2. 22). disobedient—to God (ch. 3. 3; Ephesians 2. 2; 5. 6). reprobate—rejected as worthless when tested (Notes, Romans 1. 28; 1 Corinthians 9. 27; 2 Timothy 3. 8).

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-15. DIRECTIONS TO TITUS: HOW TO EXHORT VARIOUS CLASSES OF BELIEVERS: THE GRACE OF GOD IN CHRIST OUR GRAND INCENTIVE TO LIVE GODLY. 1. But . . . thou—in contrast to the reprobate seducers stigmatized ch. 1, 11, 15, 16. "He deals more in exhortations, because those intent on useless questions needed chiefly to be recalled to the study of a holy, moral life; for nothing so effectually allays men's wandering curiosity, as the being brought to recognize those duties in which they ought to exercise themselves." [CALVIN.] speak—without restraint: contrast ch. 1. 11, "mouths . . . stopped." doctrine—"instruction" or "teaching." 2. sober—translated "vigilant," as sober men alone can be, 1 Timothy 3. 2. But "sober" here answers to "not given to wine," v. 3; ch. 1. 7. grave—"dignified;" behaving with reverent propriety. temperate—"self-restrained;" "discreet" [ALFORD] (ch. 1. 8; 1 Timothy 2. 9). faith . . . charity [love] . . . patience—combined in 1 Timothy 6. 11. "Faith, hope charity" (1 Corinthians 13. 13). "Patience," Greek, "enduring perseverance," is the attendant on, and is supported by, "hope" (1 Corinthians 13. 7; 1 Thessalonians 1. 3). It is the grace which especially becomes old men, being the fruit of ripened experience derived from trials overcome (Romans 5. 3). 3. behaviour—"deportment, as becometh holiness"—"as becometh women consecrated to God" [WAHL]; being by our Christian calling priestesses unto God (Ephesians 5. 3; 1 Timothy 2. 10). "Observant of sacred decorum." [BENGE.] not false accusers—not slanderers: a besetting sin of some elderly women. given to much wine—the besetting sin of the Cretans (ch. 1. 12). Lit., "enslaved to much wine." Addiction to wine is slavery (Romans 6. 16; 2 Peter 2. 19). teachers—in private: not in public (1 Corinthians 14. 34; 1 Timothy 2. 11, 12); influencing for good the younger women by precept and example. 4. to be sober—Greek, "self-restrained," "discreet;" the same Greek as in v. 2 "temperate." But see Note; cf. Note, 2 Timothy 1. 7. ALFORD therefore translates, "That they school [admonish in their duty] the young women to be lovers of their husbands," &c. (the foundation of all domestic happiness.) It was judicious that Titus, a young man, should admonish the young women, not directly, but through the elder women. 5. keepers at home—as "guardians of the house," as the Greek expresses. The oldest MSS. read, "Workers at home;" active in household duties (Proverbs 7. 11; 1 Timothy 5. 13). good—kind, beneficent (Matthew 20. 15; Romans 5. 7; 1 Peter 2. 18). Not churlish and negatively, whilst thrifty as housewives. obedient—rather

"submissive," as the Greek is translated, see Notes, Ephesians 5. 21, 22, 24. their own—marking the duty of subjection which they owe them, as being their own husbands (Ephesians 5. 22; Colossians 3. 18). blasphemed—"evil spoken of." That no reproach may be cast on the Gospel, through the inconsistencies of its professors (v. 8, 1); Romans 2. 24; 1 Timothy 5. 14; 6. 1). "Unless we are virtuous, blasphemy will come through us to the faith." [THEOPHYLACT.] 6. Young—Greek, "The younger men." sober-minded—self-restrained. [ALFORD.] "Nothing is so hard at this age as to overcome pleasures and follies." [CHRYSOSTOM.] 7. In—With respect to all things. thyself a pattern—though but a young man thyself. All teaching is useless, unless the teacher's example confirm his word. in doctrine—in thy ministerial teaching (showing) uncorruptness, i. e., untainted purity of motive on thy part (cf. 2 Corinthians 11. 3), so as to be "a pattern" to all. As "gravity," &c., refers to Titus himself, so "uncorruptness;" though, doubtless, uncorruptness of the doctrine will be sure to follow as a consequence of the Christian minister being of simple, uncorrupt integrity himself. gravity—dignified seriousness in setting forth the truth. sincerity—Omitted in the oldest MSS. 8. speech—discourse in public and private ministrations. he that is of the contrary part—the adversary (ch. 1. 9; 2 Timothy 2. 25), whether he be heathen or Jew. may be ashamed—put to confusion by the power of truth and innocence (cf. v. 5, 10; 1 Timothy 5. 14; 6. 1). no evil thing—in our acts, or demeanour. of you—So one of the oldest MSS. Other very old MSS. read, "of us," Christians. 9. servants—"slaves." to please them well—"to give satisfaction." [ALFORD.] To be complaisant in everything; to have that zealous desire to gain the master's good-will which will anticipate the master's wish and do even more than is required. The reason for the frequent recurrence of injunctions to slaves to subjection (Ephesians 6. 5, &c.; Colossians 3. 22; 1 Timothy 6. 1, &c.; 1 Peter 2. 18) was, that in no rank was there more danger of the doctrine of the spiritual equality and freedom of Christians being misunderstood, than in that of slaves. It was natural for the slave who had become a Christian, to forget his place and put himself on a social level with his master. Hence the charge for each to abide in the sphere in which he was when converted (1 Corinthians 7. 20-24). not answering again—in contradiction to the master: so the Greek, "not contradicting." [WAHL.] 10. Not purloining—Greek, "Not appropriating" what does not belong to one. It means "keeping back" dishonestly or deceitfully (Acts 5. 2, 3). showing—manifesting in acts. all—all possible. good—really good; not so in mere appearance (Ephesians 6. 5, 6; Colossians 3. 22-24). "The heathen do not judge of the Christian's doctrines from the doctrine, but from his actions and life." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Men will write, fight, and even die for their religion; but how few live for it! Translate, "That they may adorn the doctrine of our Saviour God," i. e., God the Father, the originating author of salvation (cf. Note, 1 Timothy 1. 1). God deigns to have His Gospel-doctrine adorned even by slaves, who are regarded by the world as no better than beasts of burden. "Though the service be rendered to an earthly master, the honour redounds to God, as the servant's good-will flows from the fear of God." [THEOPHYLACT.] Even slaves, low as is their status, should not think the influence of their example a matter of no consequence to religion: how much more those in a high position. His love in being "Our Saviour" is the strongest ground for our adorning His doctrine by our lives. This is the force of "For" in v. 11. 11. the grace of God—God's gratuitous favour in the scheme of redemption. hath appeared—Greek, "hath been made to appear," or "shine forth" (Isaiah 60. 1; Luke 1. 79), "hath been manifested" (ch. 3. 4), after having been long hidden in the loving counsels of God (Colossians 1. 26; 2 Timothy 1. 9, 10). The image is illustrated Acts 27. 20. The grace of God hath now been embodied in Jesus, "the brightness of the Father's glory," manifested as the "Sun of righteousness," "the Word made flesh." The Gospel dispensation is hence termed "the day" (2 Thessalonians 5. 5, 8: there is a double "appearing," that of "grace" here, that of "glory," v. 13; c. Romans 13. 15). Connect it not as English Version, but, "The grace . . . that bringeth salvation to all men hath appeared," or "been manifested" (1 Timothy 2. 4; 4. 10). Hence God is called "Our Saviour" (v. 10). The very name Jesus means the same. to all—of whom he enumerated the different classes (v. 2-9): even to servants; to us Gentiles, once aliens from God. Hence arises our obligation to all men (ch. 3. 2). 12. Teaching—Greek, "disciplining us." Grace exercises discipline, and is imparted in connection with disciplining chastisements (1 Corinthians 11. 32; Hebrews 12. 6, 7). The education which the Christian receives from "the grace" of God is a discipline often trying to flesh and blood: just as children need disciplining. The discipline which it exercises teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world (Greek, age, or course of things) where such self-discipline is needed, seeing that its spirit is opposed to God (ch. 1. 12, 16; 1 Corinthians 1. 20; 3. 18, 19): in the coming world we may gratify every desire without need of self-discipline, because all desires there will be conformable to the will of God. that—Greek, "in order that:" the end of the "disciplining" is "in order that . . . we may live soberly," &c. This point is lost by the translation, "teaching us." denying . . . lusts—(Luke 9. 23.) The Greek aorist expresses "denying once for all." We deny them when we withhold our consent from them, when we refuse the delight which they suggest, and the act to which they solicit us, nay, tear them up by the roots out of our soul and mind [ST. BERNARD, Serm. 11]. worldly lusts—The Greek article expresses, "the lusts of the world," "all worldly lusts" [ALFORD] (Galatians 5. 16; Ephesians 2. 3; 1 John 2. 15-17; 5. 19). The world (cosmos) will not come to an end when this present age (æon) or course of things shall end. live soberly, righteously, and godly—the positive side of the Christian character; as "denying . . . lusts" was the negative. "Soberly," i. e., with self-restraint, in relation to one's self; "righteously" or justly, in relation to our neighbour; "godly" or piously, in relation to God (not merely amiably and justly, but something higher, godly, with love and reverence toward God). These three comprise our "disciplining" in faith and love, from which he passes to hope (v. 13). 13. (Philippians 3. 20, 21.) looking for—with constant expectation (so the Greek) and with joy (Romans 8. 19). This will prove the antidote to worldly lusts, and the stimulus to "live in this present world" conformably to this expectation. The Greek is translated "waiting for" in Luke 2. 25. that—Greek, "the." blessed—bringing blessedness (Romans 4. 7, 8). hope—i. e., object of hope (Romans 8. 24; Galatians 5. 5; Colossians 1. 5). the glorious appearing—There is but one Greek article to both "hope" and "appearing," which marks their close connection (the hope being about to be realized only at the appearing of Christ). Translate, "The blessed hope and manifestation (cf. Note, v. 11) of the glory." The Greek for "manifestation" is translated "brightness," 2 Thessalonians 2. 8. As His "coming" (Greek, parousia) expresses the fact; so "brightness, appearing," or "manifestation" (epiphaneia) expresses His personal visibility when He shall come. the great God and our Saviour Jesus—There is but one Greek article to "God" and "Saviour," which shows that both are predicated of one and the same Being, "Of Him who is at once the great God and our Saviour." Also (2.) "appearing" (epiphaneia) is never by Paul predicated of God the Father (John 1. 18; 1 Timothy 6. 16), or even of "His glory" (as ALFORD explains it); it is invariably applied to CHRIST's coming, to which (at His first advent, cf. 2 Timothy 1. 10) the kindred verb "appeared" (epēphanēn), v. 11, refers (1 Timothy 6. 14; 2 Timothy 4. 1, 8). Also (3.) in the context (v. 14) there is no reference to the Father, but to Christ alone; and here there is no occasion for reference to the Father in the exigencies of the context. Also (4.) the expression "great God," as applied to Christ, is in accordance with the context, which refers to the glory of His appearing; just as "the true God" is predicated of Christ, 1 John 5. 20. The phrase occurs nowhere else in the New Testament, but often in the Old Test.

men. Deuteronomy 7. 21; 10. 17, predicated of Jehovah, who, as their manifested Lord, led the Israelites through the wilderness, doubtless the Second Person in the Trinity. Believers now look for the manifestation of His glory, inasmuch as they shall share in it. Even the Socialian explanation, making "the great God" to be the Father, "our Saviour," the Son, places God and Christ on an equal relation to "the glory" of the future appearing: a fact incompatible with the notion that Christ is not Divine, indeed it would be blasphemy so to couple any mere created being with God. 14. gave himself—"The forcible 'Himself, His whole self, the greatest gift ever given,' must not be overlooked." for us—Greek*, "in our behalf." redeem us—deliver us from bondage by paying the price of His precious blood.* An appropriate image in addressing bond servants (v. 9, 10). from all iniquity—the essence of sin, viz., "transgression of the law:" in bondage to which we were till then. The aim of His redemption was to redeem us, not merely from the penalty, but from the being of all iniquity. Thus he reverts to the "teaching" in righteousness, or disciplining effect of the grace of God that bringeth salvation (v. 11, 12). peculiar—peculiarly His own*, as Israel was of old. zealous—in doing and promoting "good works." 15. with all authority—translate*, "authoritativeness" (cf. "sharply," ch. 1. 13). let no man despise thee—Speak with such vigour as to command respect (1 Timothy 4. 12). Warn them with such authority that no one may think himself above (so the Greek Ill.) the need of admonition. [TITTMANN, Synonyms of New Testament.]

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-15. WHAT TITUS IS TO TEACH CONCERNING CHRISTIANS' BEHAVIOUR TOWARDS THE WORLD: HOW HE IS TO TREAT HERETICS: WHEN AND WHERE HE IS TO MEET PAUL. SALUTATION. CONCLUSION. 1. Put them in mind—as they are in danger of forgetting their duty, though knowing it. The opposition of Christianity to heathenism, and the natural disposition to rebellion of the Jews under the Roman empire (of whom many lived in Crete), might lead many to forget practically what was a recognized Christian principle in theory, submission to the powers that be. Diodorus Siculus mentions the tendency of the Cretans to riotous insubordination. principalities . . . powers—Greek*, "magistrates . . . authorities." to be subject—willingly* (so the Greek). to obey—the commands of "magistrates:" not necessarily implying spontaneous obedience. Willing obedience is implied in "ready to every good work." Cf. Romans 13. 3, as showing that obedience to the magistracy would tend to good works, since the magistrate's aim generally is to favour the good and punish the bad. Contrast "disobedient" (v. 8). 2. To speak evil of no man—especially, not of "dignities" and magistrates. no brawlers—"not quarrelsome," not attacking others. gentle—towards those who attack us. Yielding, considerate, not urging one's rights to the uttermost, but forbearing and kindly (Note, Philipplans 4. 5). Very different from the innate greediness and spirit of aggression towards others which characterized the Cretans. showing—in acts. all—all possible. meekness—(Note, 2 Corinthians 10. 1)—the opposite of passionate severity. unto all men—The duty of Christian conduct towards all men is the proper consequence of the universality of God's grace to all men, so often set forth in the pastoral Epistles. 3. For—our own past sins should lead us to be lenient towards those of others. "Despise none, for such wast thou also," as the penitent thief said to his fellow-thief, "Dost thou not fear God . . . seeing that thou art in the same condemnation." we—Christians. were—Contrast v. 4, "But when," sc., i. e., now: a favourite contrast in Paul's writing, that between our past state by nature, and our present state of deliverance from it by grace. As God treated us, we ought to treat our neighbour. sometimes—once. foolish—Wanting right reason in our course of living. Irrational. The exact picture of human life without grace. Grace is the sole remedy even for foolishness. disobedient—to God.

deceived—led astray. The same Greek, "out of the way, Hebrews 5. 2. servings—Greek*, "in bondage to," "serving as slaves." divers—the cloyed appetite craves constant variety. pleasures—of the flesh. malice—malignity hateful . . . hating—Correlatives. Provoking the hatred of others by their detestable character and conduct, and in turn hating them. 4. To show how little reason the Cretan Christians had to be proud of themselves, and despise others not Christians (Notes, v. 2, 3). It is to the "kindness and love of God," not to their own merits, that they owe salvation. kindness—Greek*, "goodness," "benignity," which manifests His grace. love . . . toward man—teaching us to have such "love (benevolence) toward man" (Greek, philanthropy), "showing all meekness unto all men" (v. 2), even as God had "toward man" (ch. 2. 11); opposed to the "hateful and hating" characteristics of unrenewed men, whose wretchedness moved God's benevolent kindness. of God our Saviour—Greek*, "of our Saviour God," viz., the Father (ch. 1. 3), who "saved us" (v. 5) "through Jesus Christ our Saviour" (v. 6). appeared—Greek*, "was made to appear;" was manifested. 5. Not by—Greek*, "Out of;" "not as a result springing from works," &c. of righteousness—Greek*, "in righteousness," i. e., wrought in a state of righteousness; as "deeds . . . wrought in God." There was an utter absence in us of the element ("righteousness") in which alone righteous works could be done, and so necessarily an absence of the works. "We neither did works of righteousness, nor were saved in consequence of them; but His goodness did the whole." [THEOPHYLACT.] we—emphatically opposed to "His." mercy—the prompting cause of our salvation individually: "In pursuance of His mercy." His kindness and love to man were manifested in redemption once for all wrought by Him for mankind generally; His mercy is the prompting cause for our individual realization of it. Faith is pre-supposed as the instrument of our being "saved;" our being so, then, is spoken of as an accomplished fact. Faith is not mentioned, but only God's part, as Paul's object here is not to describe man's new state but the saving agency of God in bringing about that state independent of all merit on the man's part (Note, v. 4). by—Greek*, "through;" by means of. the washing—rather, "the laver," i. e., the baptismal font, or lavatory. of regeneration—designed* to be the visible instrument of regeneration. "The apostles are wont to draw an argument from the sacraments to prove the thing therein signified, because it ought to be a recognized principle among the godly, that God does not mark us with empty signs, but by His power inwardly makes good what he demonstrates by the outward sign. Wherefore baptism is congruously and truly called the laver of regeneration. We must connect the sign and thing signified, so as not to make the sign empty and ineffectual; and yet not, for the sake of honouring the sign, to detract from the Holy Spirit what is peculiarly His" [CALVIN] (1 Peter 3. 21). Adult candidates for baptism are presupposed to have had repentance and faith (for Paul often assumes in faith and charity that those addressed are what they profess to be, though in fact some of them were not so, 1 Corinthians 6. 11), in which case baptism would be the visible "laver of regeneration" to them, "faith being thereby confirmed, and grace increased, by virtue of prayer to God" (Church of England, Article 27). Infants are charitably presumed to have received a grace in connection with their Christian descent, in answer to the believing prayers of their parents or guardians presenting them for baptism, which grace is visibly sealed and increased by baptism, "the laver of regeneration." They are presumed to be then regenerated, until years of developed consciousness prove whether they have been actually so or not. "Born of (from) water and (no 'of' in Greek) the Spirit." The Word is the remote and anterior instrument of the new birth; Baptism the proximate instrument. The Word, the instrument to the individual; Baptism, in relation to the Society of Christians. The laver of cleansing stood outside the door of the tabernacle, wherein the priest had to wash before entering the Holy Place; so we must wash in the laver of regeneration before we can enter the Church, whose members are "

royal priesthood." "Baptism by the Spirit" (whereof water-baptism is the designed accompanying seal) makes the difference between Christian baptism and that of John. As Paul presupposes the outward Church is the visible community of the redeemed, so he speaks of baptism on the supposition that it answers to its idea; that all that is inward belonging to its completeness accompanied the outward. Hence he here asserts of outward baptism whatever is involved in the believing appropriation of the Divine facts which it symbolizes, whatever is realized when baptism fully corresponds to its original design. So Galatians 3. 27; language holding good only of those in whom the inward living communion and outward baptism coalesce. "Saved us" applies fully to those truly regenerate alone; in a general sense it may include many who, though put within reach of salvation, shall not finally be saved. "Regeneration" occurs only once more in New Testament, Matthew 19. 28, i. e., the new birth of the heaven and earth at Christ's second coming to renew all material things, the human body included, when the creature, now travelling in labour-throes to the birth, shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Regeneration, which now begins in the believer's soul, shall then be extended to his body, and thence to all creation, and renewing—not "the laver" ('washing') of renewing," but "and by the renewing," &c., following "saved us." To make "renewing of the Holy Ghost" follow "the laver," would destroy the balance of the clauses of the sentence, and would make baptism the seal, not only of regeneration, but also of the subsequent process of progressive sanctification ("renewing of the Holy Ghost"). Regeneration is a thing once for all done; renewing is a process daily proceeding. As "the washing," or "laver," is connected with "regeneration," so the "renewing of the Holy Ghost" is connected with "shed on us abundantly" (v. 6). 6. Which—The Holy Ghost. he shed—Greek, "poured out;" not only on the Church in general at Pentecost, but also "on us" individually. This pouring out of the Spirit comprehends the grace received before, in, and subsequently to baptism, abundantly—Greek, "richly" (Colossians 3. 10, through Jesus Christ—the channel and Mediator of the gift of the Holy Ghost. our Saviour—Immediately; as the Father is mediately "our Saviour." The Father is the author of our salvation, and saves us by Jesus Christ. 7. That, &c.—the purpose which He aimed at in having "saved us" (v. 5), viz., "That being (having been) justified (accounted righteous through faith at our 'regeneration,' and made righteous by the daily 'renewing of the Holy Ghost') by His grace (as opposed to works, v. 5) we should be made heirs." his grace—Greek, "the grace of the former," i. e., God (v. 4; Romans 5. 15). heirs—(Galatians 3. 29.) according to the hope of eternal life—ch. 1. 2, and also the position of the Greek words, confirm English Version, i. e., agreeably to the hope of eternal life; the eternal inheritance fully satisfying the hope. BENGEL, ELLICOTT, &c., explain it, "heirs of eternal life, in the way of hope," i. e., not yet in actual possession. Such a blessed hope, which once was not possessed, will lead a Christian to practice holiness and meekness toward others, the lesson especially needed by the Cretans. 8. Greek, "faithful is the saying." A formula peculiar to the Pastoral Epistles. Here "the saying" is the statement (v. 4-7) as to the gratuitousness of God's gift of salvation. Answering to the "Amen." these things, &c. Greek, "Concerning these things (the truths dwelt on, v. 4-7; not as English Version, what follow), I will that thou affirm (insist) strongly and persistently, in order that they who have believed God (the Greek for 'believed in God' is different, John 14. 1. 'They who have learnt to credit God' in what He saith) may be careful ('solicitously sedulous'; diligence is necessary) to maintain (lit., 'to set before themselves so as to sustain') good works." No longer applying their care to "unprofitable" and unpractical speculations (v. 9); these things—These results of doctrine ("good works") are "good and profitable unto men," whereas such practical results flow from "foolish questions." See GROTIUS and WIESINGER. But ALFORD, to avoid the tautology, "these (good works) are good unto men," explains, "these truths" (v. 4-7). 9. foolish—Greek, "insipid;" producing no moral fruit. "Vain talkers." genealogies—akin to the "fables" (see Note, 1 Timothy 1. 4). Not so much direct heresy as yet is here referred to, as profitless discussions about genealogies of æons, &c., which ultimately led to Gnosticism. Synagogue discourses were termed daraschoth, i. e., discussions. Cf. "disputer of this world (Greek, dispensation)." strivings about the law—about the authority of the "commandments of men," which they sought to confirm by the law (ch. 1. 14; Note, 1 Timothy 1. 7), and about the mystical meaning of the various parts of the law in connection with the "genealogies." avoid—stand aloof from. Same Greek, as in Note, 2 Timothy 2. 16. 10. heretic—Greek heresy, originally meant a division resulting from individual self-will; the individual doing and teaching what he chose independently of the teaching and practice of the Church. In course of time it came to mean definitely "heresy" in the modern sense; and in the later Epistles it has almost assumed this meaning. The heretics of Crete, when Titus was there, were in doctrine followers of their own self-willed "questions" reprobated in v. 9, and immoral in practice. reject—decline, avoid; not formal excommunication, but, "have nothing more to do with him," either in admonition or intercourse. 11. is . . . subverted—"is become perverse." condemned of himself—He cannot say, no one told him better; continuing the same after frequent admonition he is self-condemned. "He sinneth" wilfully against knowledge. 12. When I shall send [have sent] Artemas or Tychicus—to supply thy place in Crete. Artemas is said to have been subsequently bishop of Lystra. Tychicus was sent twice by Paul from Rome to Lesser Asia in his first imprisonment (which shows how well qualified he was to become Titus' successor in Crete) Ephesians 6. 21; and in his second, 2 Timothy 4. 12. Tradition makes him subsequently bishop of Chalcedon, in Bithynia. Nicopolis—"The city of victory," called so from the battle of Actium, in Epirus. This Epistle was probably written from Corinth in the autumn. Paul purposed a journey through Cætolia and Acarnania, into Epirus, and there "to winter." See my Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles. 13. Bring . . . on their journey—Enable them to proceed forward by supplying necessaries for their journey. Zenas—the contracted form of Zenodorus, lawyer—A Jewish "scribe," who, when converted, still retained the title from his former occupation. A civil lawyer. Apollos—with Zenas, probably the bearers of this Epistle. In 1 Corinthians 16. 12, Apollos is mentioned as purposing to visit Corinth; his now being at Corinth (on the theory of Paul being at Corinth when he wrote) accords with this purpose. Crete would be on his way either to Palestine or his native place, Alexandria. Paul and Apollos thus appear in beautiful harmony in that very city where their names had been formerly the watchword of unchristian party work. It was to avoid this party rivalry that Apollos formerly was unwilling to visit Corinth, though Paul desired him. HIPPOLYTUS mentions Zenas as one of the Seventy, and afterwards bishop of Diospolis. 14. And . . . also—Greek, "But . . . also." Not only thou, but let others also of "our" fellow-believers (or "whom we have gained over at Crete") with thee. for necessary uses—to supply the necessary wants of Christian missionaries and brethren, according as they stand in need in their journeys for the Lord's cause. Cf. ch. 1. 8, "a lover of hospitality." 15. Greet—"Salute them that love us in the faith." All at Crete had not this love rooted in faith, the true bond of fellowship. A salutation peculiar to this Epistle, such as no forger would have used. Grace—Greek. "The grace," viz., of God, with you all—not that the Epistle is addressed to all the Cretan Christians, but Titus would naturally impart it to his flock.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL TO PHILEMON.

INTRODUCTION.

THE testimonies to its authenticity are—ORIGEN, Homily 19, on Jerem., vol. 1., p. 185, Ed. Huet., cites it as the cause of Paul to Philemon concerning ONESIMUS; TERTULLIAN, against Marcion, 5. 21, "The brevity of this Epistle is the sole cause of its escaping the falsifying hands of Marcion;" EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History, 3. 25, mentions it among "the universally acknowledged Epistles of the canon;" JEROME, Prooemium in Philemonem, vol. iv., p. 442, argues for it against those who objected to its canonicity on the ground of its subject being beneath an apostle to write about. IGNATIUS, Eph. 2., and Magnes. 12, seems to allude to Philemon 20. Cf. Epistle to POLYCARP (ch. 1. and 6). Its brevity is the cause of its not being often quoted by the Fathers. PALEY, Horæ Paulinæ, has shown striking proofs of its authenticity in the undesigned coincidences between it and the Epistle to the Colossians.

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.—This Epistle is closely linked with the Epistle to the Colossians. Both were carried by the same bearer, ONESIMUS (with whom, however, Tychicus is joined in this Epistle to the Colossians), Colossians 4. 9. The persons sending salutations are the same, except one, Jesus called Justus (Colossians 4. 11). In both alike Archippus is addressed (v. 2; Colossians 4. 17). Paul and Timothy stand in the headings of both. And in both Paul appears as a prisoner (v. 9; Colossians 4. 18). Hence it follows, it was written at the same time and place as the Epistle to the Colossians (which was about the same time as the Epistle to the Ephesians), viz., at Rome, during Paul's first imprisonment, A. D. 61 or 62.

OBJECT.—ONESIMUS, of Colosse ("one of you," Colossians 4. 9), slave of Philemon, had fled from his master to Rome, after having probably defrauded him (v. 18). He there was converted to Christianity by St. Paul, and being induced by him to return to his master, he was furnished with this Epistle, recommending him to Philemon's favourable reception, as being now no longer a mere servant, but also a brother in Christ. Paul ends by requesting Philemon to prepare him a lodging, as he trusted soon to be set free and visit Colosse. This Epistle is addressed also to Apphia, supposed from its domestic subject to have been Philemon's wife, and Archippus (a minister of the Colossian Church, Colossians 4. 17), for the same reason, supposed to be a near relative and inmate.

Onesimus in the Apostolical Canons (78), is said to have been emancipated by his master. The Apostolical Constitutions (7. 46) state that he was consecrated by Paul, bishop of Berea, in Macedonia, and that he was martyred at Rome. IGNATIUS, Epistola ad Ephesum, ch. 1., speaks of him as bishop of the Ephesians.

STYLE.—It has been happily termed, from its graceful and delicate urbanity, "the polite Epistle." Yet there is nothing of insincere compliment, miscalled politeness by the world. It is manly and straightforward, without misrepresentation or suppression of facts; at the same time that it is most captivately persuasive. ALFORD quotes Luther's eloquent description, "This Epistle showeth a right, noble, lovely example of Christian love. Here we see how St. Paul layeth himself out for the poor Onesimus, and with all his means pleadeth his cause with his master and so setteth himself as if he were Onesimus, and had himself done wrong to Philemon. Yet all this doeth he, not with force, as if he had right thereto, but he stripped himself of his right, and thus enforceth Philemon to forego his right also. Even as Christ did for us with God the Father, thus also doth St. Paul for Onesimus with Philemon: for Christ also stripped Himself of His right, and by love and humility enforced (?) the Father to lay aside His wrath and power, and to take us to His grace for the sake of Christ, who lovingly pleadeth our cause, and with all His heart layeth Himself out for us; for we are all His Onesimi, to my thinking."

Ver. 1-25. ADDRESS. THANKSGIVING FOR PHILEMON'S LOVE AND FAITH. INTERCESSION FOR ONESIMUS. CONCLUDING REQUEST AND SALUTATIONS. This Epistle affords a specimen of the highest wisdom as to the manner in which Christians ought to manage social affairs on more exalted principles. 1. prisoner of Jesus Christ—one whom Christ's cause has made a prisoner (cf. "In the bonds of the Gospel," v. 13). He does not call himself, as in other Epistles, "Paul an apostle," as he is writing familiarly, not authoritatively. our . . . fellow-labourer—in building up the Church at Colosse, while we were at Ephesus. See my Introduction to Colossians. 2. Apphia—The Latin "Appia." Either the wife or some close relative of Philemon. She and Archippus, if they had not belonged to his family, would not have been included with Philemon in the address of a letter on a domestic matter. Archippus—a minister of the Colossian Church (Colossians 4. 17). fellow-soldier—(2 Timothy 2. 3.) Church in thy house—In the absence of a regular Church building, the houses of particular saints were used for that purpose. Observe St. Paul's tact in associating with Philemon those associated by kindred or Christian brotherhood with his house, and not going beyond it. 4. always—Joined by ALFORD with "I thank my God." 5. Hearing—The ground of his thanksgiving. It is a delicate mark of authenticity, that he says "hearing" as to churches and persons whom he had not seen or been visited. Now Colosse, Philemon's residence, he had never yet seen. Yet v. 19 here implies that Philemon was his convert. Philemon, doubtless, was converted at Ephesus, or in some other place where he met Paul. love and faith—The theological order is first faith, then love, the fruit of faith. But he purposely puts Philemon's love in the first place, as it is to an act of love that he is exhorting him. toward . . . toward—Different Greek words: towards . . . unto. Towards implies simply direction; unto, to the advantage of. 6. That, &c.—The aim of my thanksgiving and prayers for thee is, in order thus the, &c. the communication of thy faith—the imparting of it and its fruits (viz., acts of love and beneficence: as Hebrews 13. 16, "To communicate," i. e., to impart a share) to others; or, the liberality to others flowing from thy faith (as the Greek is translated, "liberal distribution," 2 Corinthians 9. 13). effectual by—Greek, "IN:" the element in which his liberality had place, i. e., may be proved by acts in, &c. acknowledging—Greek, "the thorough knowledge," i. e., the experimental or practical recognition, of every good thing which is in you—The oldest MSS. read, "which is in us," i. e., the practical recognition of every grace which is in us Christians, in so far as we realize the Christian character. In short, that thy faith may by acts be proved to be "a faith which worketh thy love." in Christ Jesus—rather as Greek, "unto Christ Jesus," i. e., to the glory of Christ Jesus. Two of the oldest MSS. omit "Jesus." This verse answers to v. 5. "Thy love and faith toward all saints:" Paul never ceases to mention him in his prayers, in order that his faith may still further show its power in his relation to others, by exhibiting every grace which is in Christians to the glory of Christ. Thus he paves the way for the request in behalf of Onesimus. 7. For—A reason for the prayer, v. 4-6. we have—Greek, “we had.” joy and consolation—Joined in 2 Corinthians 7. 4. saints are refreshed by thee—his house was open to them. brother—put last, to conciliate his favourable attention to the request which follows. 8. Wherefore—Because of my love to thee, I prefer to “beseech,” rather than “enjoin,” or authoritatively command. I might . . . enjoin—In virtue of the obligation to obedience which Philemon lay under to Paul, as having been converted through his instrumentality. in Christ—the element in which his boldness has place. 9. for love's sake—mine to thee, and [what ought to be] thine to Onesimus. Or, that Christian love of which thou showest so bright an example (v. 7). being such an one—Explain, Being such a one as thou knowest me to be, viz., Paul (the founder of so many churches, and an apostle of Christ, and thy father in the faith) the aged (a circumstance calculated to secure thy respect for anything I request), and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ (the strongest claim I have on thy regard: if for no other reason, at least in consideration of this, through commiseration gratify me). 10. I beseech thee—Emphatically repeated from v. 9. In the Greek, the name “Onesimus” is skillfully put last, he puts first a favourable description of him before he mentions the name that had fallen into so bad repute with Philemon. “I beseech thee for my son, whom I have begotten in my bonds, Onesimus.” Scripture does not sanction slavery, but at the same time does not begin a political crusade against it. It sets forth principles of love to our fellowmen which were sure (as they have done) in due time to undermine and overthrow it, without violently convulsing the then existing political fabric, by stirring up slaves against their masters. 11. Which . . . was . . . unprofitable—By using his name Onesimus, which means profitable. Not only was he unprofitable, but positively injurious, having “wronged” his master. Paul uses a mild expression. now profitable—Without godliness a man is in no station. Profitable in spiritual, as well as in temporal things. 12. mine own bowels—as dear to me as my own heart. [ALFORD.] Cf. v. 17, “as myself.” The object of my most intense affection as that of a parent for a child. 13. I—Emphatical. I for my part. Since I had such implicit trust in him as to desire to keep him with me for his services, thou mayest. I would have retained—Different Greek from the “would,” v. 14, “I could have wished,” “I was minded” here; but “I was not willing,” &c., v. 14. in thy stead—that he might supply in your place all the services to me which you, if you were here, would render in virtue of the love you bear to me (v. 19). bonds of the Gospel—my bonds endured for the Gospel's sake (v. 9). 14. without thy mind—i. e., consent. should not be as—“should not appear as a matter of necessity, but of free will.” Had Paul kept Onesimus, however willing to gratify Paul, in fact, Philemon might be, he would have no opportunity given him of showing he was so, his leave not having been asked. 15. perhaps—speaking in human fashion, yet as one believing that God's Providence probably (for we cannot dogmatically define the hidden purposes of God in providence) overruled the past evil to ultimately greater good to him. This thought would soften Philemon's indignation at Onesimus' past offence. So Joseph in Genesis 45. 5. departed—lit., “was parted from thee:” a softening term for “ran away,” to mitigate Philemon's wrath. receive him—Greek, Have him for thyself in full possession (note, Philippians 4. 18). The same Greek as in Matthew 6. 3. for ever—in this life and in that to come

(cf. Exodus 21. 6). Onesimus' time of absence, however long, was but a short “hour” (so Greek) compared with the everlasting devotion henceforth binding him to his master. 16. No longer as a mere servant or slave (though still he is that), but above a servant, so that thou shalt derive from him not merely the services of a slave, but higher benefits: a servant “in the flesh,” he is a brother “in the Lord.” beloved, specially to me—who am his spiritual father, and who have experienced his faithful attentions. Lest Philemon should dislike Onesimus being called “brother,” Paul first recognizes him as a brother, being the spiritual son of the same God. much more unto thee—to whom he stands in so much nearer and more lasting relation. 17. a partner—in the Christian fellowship of faith, hope, and love. receive him as myself—Resuming “receive him that is mine own howels.” 18. Greek, “But if (thou art not inclined to ‘receive him’ because) he hath wronged thee:” a milder term than “robbed thee.” Onesimus seems to have confessed some such act to Paul. put that on mine account—I am ready to make good the loss to thee if required. The latter parts of v. 19, 21, imply that he did not expect Philemon would probably demand it. 19. with mine own hand—not employing an amanuensis, as in other Epistles: a special compliment to Philemon which he ought to show his appreciation of by granting Paul's request. Contrast Colossians 4. 18, which shows that the Epistle to the Colossian Church, accompanying our Epistle, had only its closing “salutation” written by Paul's own hand. albeit, &c.—lit., “that I may not say . . . not to say,” &c. thou owest . . . even thine own self—not merely thy possessions. For to my instrumentality thou owest thy salvation. So the debt which “he oweth thee” being transferred upon me (I making myself responsible for it) is cancelled. 20. let me—“Me” is emphatic: “Let me have profit (so Greek ‘for joy,’ onaimen, referring to the name Onesimus, ‘profitable’) from thee, as thou shouldst have had from Onesimus:” for “thou owest thine own self to me.” in the Lord—not in worldly gain, but in thine increase in the graces of the Lord's Spirit. [ALFORD.] my bowels—my heart. Gratify my feelings by granting this request. in the Lord—The oldest MSS. read, “in Christ.” The element or sphere in which this act of Christian love naturally ought to have place. 21. Having confidence in thy obedience—to my apostolic authority, if I were to “enjoin” it (v. 8), which I do not, preferring to beseech thee for it as a favour (v. 9). thou wilt also do more—towards Onesimus: hinting at his possible manumission by Philemon, besides being kindly received. 22. This prospect of Paul's visiting Colosse would tend to secure a kindly reception for Onesimus, as Paul would know in person how he had been treated. your . . . you—Referring to Philemon, Apphia, Archippus, and the Church in Philemon's house. The same expectation is expressed by him, Philippians 2. 23, 24, written in the same imprisonment. 23. The same persons send salutations in the accompanying Epistle, except that “Jesus Justus” is not mentioned here. Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner—he had been sent by the Colossian Church to inquire after, and minister to, Paul, and possibly was cast into prison by the Roman authorities on suspicion. However, he is not mentioned as a prisoner in Colossians 4. 12, so that “fellow-prisoner” here may mean merely one who was a faithful companion to Paul in his imprisonment, and by his society put himself in the position of a prisoner. So also “Aristarchus, my fellow-prisoner,” Colossians 4. 10, may mean. BENSON conjectures the meaning to be that on some former occasion these two were Paul's “fellow-prisoners,” not of the time. 25. be with your spirit—(Galatians 6. 18; 1 Timothy 4. 22.)

HEBREWS.

INTRODUCTION.

CANONICITY AND AUTHORSHIP.—CLEMENT OF ROME, at the end of the first century, A. D., copiously uses it, adopting its words just as he does those of the other books of the New Testament; not indeed giving to either the term "Scripture," which he reserves for the Old Testament (the canon of the New Testament not yet having been formally established), but certainly not ranking it below the other New Testament acknowledged Epistles. As our Epistle claims authority on the part of the writer, CLEMENT'S adoption of extracts from it is virtually sanctioning its authority, and this in the apostolic age. JUSTIN MARTYR quotes it as Divinely authoritative, to establish the titles "apostle," as well as "angel," as applied to the Son of God. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA refers it expressly to Paul, on the authority of PANTÆNUS, chief of the Catechetical school in Alexandria, in the middle of the second century, saying, that as Jesus is termed in it the "apostle" sent to the Hebrews, Paul, through humility, does not in it call himself apostle of the Hebrews, being apostle to the Gentiles. CLEMENT also says that Paul, as the Hebrews were prejudiced against him, prudently omitted to put forward his name in the beginning; also, that it was originally written in Hebrew for the Hebrews, and that Luke translated it into Greek for the Greeks, whence the style is similar to that of Acts. He, however, quotes frequently the words of the existing Greek Epistle as St. Paul's words. ORIGEN similarly quotes it as St. Paul's Epistle. However, in his Homilies, he regards the style as distinct from that of Paul, and as "more Grecian," but the thoughts as the apostle's; adding that the "ancients who have handed down the tradition of its Pauline authorship, must have had good reason for doing so, though God alone knows the certainty who was the actual writer" (i. e., probably "transcriber" of the apostle's thoughts). In the African Church, in the beginning of the third century, TERTULLIAN ascribes it to Barnabas. IRENÆUS, bishop of Lyons, is mentioned in EUSEBIUS, as quoting from this Epistle, though without expressly referring it to Paul. About the same period, CAIUS, the presbyter, in the Church of Rome, mentions only thirteen Epistles of Paul, whereas, if the Epistle to the Hebrews were included, there would be fourteen. So the canon fragment of the end of the second century, or beginning of the third, published by MURATORI, apparently omits mentioning it. And so the Latin Church did not recognize it as Paul's till a considerable time after the beginning of the third century. Thus, also, NOVATIAN OF ROME, CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE, and VICTORINUS, also of the Latin Church. But in the fourth century, HILARY OF POITIERS (A. D. 368), LUCIFER OF CAGLIARI (A. D. 371), AMBROSE OF MILAN (A. D. 397) and other Latins, quote it as Paul's; and the fifth Council of Carthage (A. D. 419) formally reckons it among his fourteen Epistles.

As to the similarity of its style to that of St. Luke's writings, this is due to his having been so long the companion of Paul. CHRYSOSTOM, comparing Luke and Mark, says, "Each imitated his teacher: Luke imitated Paul flowing along with more than river-fulness; but Mark imitated Peter, who studied brevity of style." Besides, there is a greater predominance of Jewish feeling and familiarity with the peculiarities of the Jewish schools apparent in this Epistle than in St. Luke's writings. There is no clear evidence for attributing the authorship to him, or to Apollos, whom ALFORD upholds as the author. The grounds alleged for the latter view are its supposed Alexandrian phraseology and modes of thought. But these are such as any Palestinian Jew might have used; and Paul, from his Hebræo-Hellenistic education at Jerusalem and Tarsus, would be familiar with Philo's modes of thought, which are not, as some think, necessarily all derived from his Alexandrian, but also from his Jewish education. It would be unlikely that the Alexandrian Church should have so undoubtingly asserted the Pauline authorship, if Apollos, their own countryman, had really been the author. The eloquence of its style and rhetoric, a characteristic of Apollos' at Corinth whereas Paul there spoke in words unadorned by man's wisdom, are doubtless designedly adapted to the minds of those whom St. Paul in this Epistle addresses. To the Greek Corinthians, who were in danger of idolizing human eloquence and wisdom, he writes in an unadorned style, in order to fix their attention more wholly on the Gospel itself. But the Hebrews were in no such danger. And his Hebræo-Grecian education would enable him to write in a style attractive to the Hebrews at Alexandria, where Greek philosophy had been blended with Judaism. The Sepuagint translation framed at Alexandria had formed a connecting link between the latter and the former; and it is remarkable that all the quotations from the Old Testament, excepting two (ch. 10. 30; 13. 5), are taken from the LXX. The fact that the peculiarities of the LXX. are interwoven into the argument, proves that the Greek Epistle is an original, not a translation; had the original been Hebrew, the quotations would have been from the Hebrew Old Testament. The same conclusion follows from the plays on similarly-sounding words in the Greek, and alliterations, and rhythmically-constructed periods. CALVIN observes, if the Epistle had been written in Hebrew, ch. 9. 15-17 would lose all its point, which consists in the play upon the double meaning of the Greek diathece, a "covenant," or a "testament," whereas the Hebrew berith means only "covenant."

Internal evidence favours the Pauline authorship. Thus the topic so fully handled in this Epistle, that Christianity is superior to Judaism, inasmuch as the reality exceeds the type which gives place to it, is a favourite one with St. Paul (cf. 2 Corinthians 3. 6-18; Galatians 3. 23-26; 4. 1-9, 21-31, wherein the allegorical mode of interpretation appears in its divinely sanctioned application—a mode pushed to an unwarrantable excess in the Alexandrian school). So the Divine Son appears in ch. 1. 3, &c., as in other Epistles of Paul (Philippians 2. 6; Colossians 1. 15-20), as the Image, or manifestation of the Deity. His lowering of Himself for man's sake similarly, cf. ch. 2. 9, with 2 Corinthians 8. 9; Philippians 2. 7, 8. Also His final exaltation, cf. ch. 2. 8; 10. 13; 12. 2, with 1 Corinthians 15. 25, 27. The word "Mediator" is peculiar to Paul alone, cf. ch. 8. 6, with Galatians 3. 19, 20. Christ's death is represented as the sacrifice for sin prefigured by the Jewish sacrifices, cf. Romans 3. 23-26; 1 Corinthians 5. 7, with Hebrews 7. to 10. The phrase, "God of Peace," is peculiar to St. Paul, cf. ch. 13. 20; Romans 15. 33; 1 Thessalonians 5. 23. Also, of ch. 2. 4, Margin, 1 Corinthians 12. 4. Justification, or "righteousness by faith," appears in ch. 11. 7; 10. 38, as in Romans 1. 17; 4. 22; 5. 1; Galatians 3. 11; Philippians 3. 9. The word of God is the "sword of the Spirit," cf. ch. 4. 12, with Ephesians 6. 17. Inexperienced Christians are children needing milk, i. e., instruction in the elements, whereas riper Christians, as full grown, require strong meat, cf. ch. 5. 12, 18; 6. 1, with 1 Corinthians 3. 1, 2; 14. 20; Galatians 4. 9; Colossians 3. 14. Salva- tion is represented as a boldness of access to God by Christ, cf. ch. 10. 19, with Romans 5. 2; Ephesians 2. 18; 3. 12. Afflictions are a fight, ch. 10. 32; cf. Philippians 1. 30; Colossians 2. 1. The Christian life is a race, ch. 12. 1; cf. 1 Corinthians 9. 24; Philippians 3. 12-14. The Jewish ritual is a service, Romans 9. 4; cf. ch. 9. 1, 6. Cf. "subject to bondage," ch. 2. 14, with Galatians 5. 1. Other characteristics of Paul's style appear in this Epistle, viz., a propensity "to go off at a word" and enter on a long parenthesis suggested by that word, a fondness for play upon words of similar sound, and a disposition to repeat some favourite word. Frequent appeals to the Old Testament, and quotations linked by "and again," cf. ch. 1. 5; 2. 12, 13, with Romans 15. 9-12. Also quotations in a peculiar application, cf. ch. 2. 8, with 1 Corinthians 15. 27; Ephesians 1. 22. Also the same passage quoted in a form not agreeing with the LXX., and with the addition "saith the Lord," not found in the Hebrew, in ch. 10. 80; Romans 12. 19.

The supposed Alexandrian (which are rather Philon-like) characteristics of the Epistle are probably due to the fact that the Hebrews were generally then imbued with the Alexandrian modes of thought of Philo, &c.; and Paul, without colouring or altering Gospel truth "to the Jews, became (in style) as a Jew, that he might win the Jews" (1 Corinthians 9. 20). This will account for its being recognized as St. Paul's Epistle in the Alexandrian and Jerusalem churches unanimously, to the Hebrews of whom probably it was addressed. Not one Greek father ascribes the Epistle to any but Paul, whereas in the Western and Latin churches, which it did not reach for some time, it was for long doubted, owing to its anonymous form, and generally less distinctively Pauline style. Their reason for not accepting it as Paul's, or indeed as canonical, for the first three centuries, was negative, insufficient evidence for it, not positive evidence against it. The positive evidence is generally for its Pauline origin. In the Latin churches, owing to their distance from the churches to whom belonged the Hebrews addressed, there was no generally received tradition on the subject. The Epistle was in fact but little known at all, whence we find it is not mentioned at all in the canon of Muratorius. When at last, in the fourth century, the Latins found that it was received as Pauline and canonical on good grounds in the Greek churches, they universally acknowledged it as such.

The personal notices all favour its Pauline authorship, viz., his intention to visit those addressed, shortly, along with Timothy, styled "our brother," ch. 13. 23; his being then in prison, ch. 13. 19; his formerly having been imprisoned in Palestine, according to English Version reading, ch. 10. 34; the salutations transmitted to them from believers of Italy, ch. 13. 24. A reason for not prefixing the name may be the rhetorical character of the Epistle which led the author to waive the usual form of epistolary address.

DESIGN.—His aim is to show the superiority of Christianity over Judaism, in that it was introduced by one far higher than the angels or Moses, through whom the Jews received the law, and in that its priesthood and sacrifices are far less perfecting as to salvation than those of Christ; that He is the substance of which the former are but the shadow, and that the type necessarily gives place to the antitype; and that now we no longer are kept at a comparative distance as under the law, but have freedom of access through the opened veil, i. e., Christ's flesh; hence he warns them of the danger of apostasy, to which Jewish converts were tempted, when they saw Christians persecuted, whilst Judaism was tolerated by the Roman authorities. He infers the obligations to a life of faith, of which, even in the less perfect Old Testament dispensation, the Jewish history contained bright examples. He concludes in the usual Pauline mode, with practical exhortations and pious prayers for them.

HIS MODE OF ADDRESS is in it hortatory rather than commanding, just as we might have expected from St. Paul addressing the Jews. He does not write to the rulers of the Jewish Christians, for in fact there was no exclusively Jewish Church; and his Epistle, though primarily addressed to the Palestinian Jews, was intended to include the Hebrews of all adjoining churches. He inculcates obedience and respect in relation to their rulers (ch. 13. 7, 17, 24); a tacit obviating of the objection that he was by writing this Epistle interfering with the prerogative of Peter the apostle of the circumcision, and James the bishop of Jerusalem. Hence arises his gentle and delicate mode of dealing with them (Hebrews 13. 22). So far from being surprised at discrepancy of style between an Epistle to Hebrews and Epistles to Gentile Christians, it is just what we should expect. The Holy Spirit guided him to choose means best suited to the nature of the ends aimed at. WORDSWORTH notices a peculiar Pauline Greek construction, Romans 12. 9, lit., "Let your love be without dissimulation, ye abhorring . . . evil, cleaving to . . . good," which is found nowhere else save Hebrews 13. 5, lit., "Let your conversation be without covetousness, ye being content with," &c. (a noun singular feminine nominative absolute, suddenly passing into a participle masculine nominative plural absolute). So in quoting Old Testament Scripture, the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes it as a Jew writing to Jews would, "God spoke to our fathers," not "It is written." So ch. 13. 18, "We trust we have a good conscience" is an altogether Pauline sentiment (Acts 23. 1; 24. 16; 2 Corinthians 1. 12; 4. 2; 2 Timothy 1. 3). Though he has not prefixed his name, he has given at the close his universal token to identify him, viz., his apostolic salutation, "Grace be with you all;" this "salutation with his own hand" he declared (2 Thessalonians 3. 17, 18) to be "his token in every Epistle;" so 1 Corinthians 16. 21, 23; Colossians 4. 18. The same prayer of greeting closes every one of his Epistles, and is not found in any one of the Epistles of the other apostles written in St. Paul's lifetime; but it is found in the last book of the New Testament Revelation, and subsequently in the Epistle of Clement of Rome. This proves that, by whomsoever the body of the Epistle was committed to writing (whether a mere amanuensis writing by dictation, or a companion of Paul by the Spirit's gift of interpreting tongues, 1 Corinthians 12. 10, transfusing Paul's Spirit-taught sentiments into his own Spirit-guided diction), Paul at the close sets his seal to the whole as really his, and sanctioned by him as such. The churches of the East, and Jerusalem, their centre, to which quarter it was first sent, received it as St. Paul's from the earliest times according to Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem (A. D. 349). JEROME, though bringing with him from Rome the prejudices of the Latins against the Epistle to the Hebrews, aggravated, doubtless, by its seeming sanction of the Novatian heresy (ch. 6. 4-6), was constrained by the force of facts to receive it as Paul's. on the almost unanimous testimony of all Greek Christians from the earliest times; and was probably the main instrument in correcting the past error of Rome in rejecting it. The testimony of the Alexandrian Church is peculiarly valuable, for it was founded by Mark, who was with Paul at Rome in his first confinement, when this Epistle seems to have been written (Colossians 4. 10), and who possibly was the bearer of this Epistle, at the same time visiting Colosse on the way to Jerusalem (where Mark's mother lived), and thence to Alexandria. Moreover, 2 Peter 3. 15, 16, written shortly before Peter's death, and like his first Epistle written by him, "the apostle of the circumcision" to the Hebrew Christians dispersed in the East, saith, "As our beloved brother Paul hath written unto you," viz., to the Hebrews; also the words added, "As also in all his Epistles," distinguish the Epistle to the Hebrews from the rest; then he further speaks of it as on a level with "other Scriptures," thus asserting at once its Pauline authorship and divine inspiration. An interesting illustration of the power of Christian faith and love: St. Peter, who had been openly rebuked by Paul (Galatians 2. 7-14), fully adopted what St. Paul wrote; there was no difference in the Gospel of the apostle of the circumcision and that of the apostle of the uncircumcision. It strikingly shows God's sovereignty that He chose as the instrument to confirm the Hebrews, Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles; and on the other hand, Peter to open the Gospel-door to the Gentiles (Acts 10. 1, &c.), though being the apostle of the Jews; thus perfect unity reigns amidst the diversity of agencies.

Rome, in the person of Clement of Rome, originally received this Epistle. Then followed a period in which it ceased to be received by the Roman churches. Then, in the fourth century, Rome retracted her error. A plain proof she is not unchangeable or infallible. As far as Rome is concerned, the Epistle to the Hebrews was not only lost for three centuries, but never would have been recovered at all but for the Eastern churches; it is therefore a happy thing for Christendom that Rome is not the Catholic Church.

It plainly was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, which would have been mentioned in the Epistle had that event gone before, cf. ch. 13. 10; and probably to churches in which the Jewish members were the more numerous, as those in Judea, and perhaps Alexandria. In the latter city were the greatest number of resident Jews next to Jerusalem. In Leontopolis, in Egypt, was another temple, with the arrangements of which, WIESELER thinks the notices in this Epistle more nearly corresponded than with those in Jerusalem. It was from Alexandria that the Epistle appears first to have come to the knowledge of Christendom. Moreover, "the Epistle to the Alexandrians," mentioned in the Canon of Muratorius, may possibly be this Epistle to the Hebrews. He addresses the Jews as peculiarly "the people of God" (ch. 2. 17; 4. 9; 13. 12), "the seed of Abraham," i. e., as the primary stock on which Gentile believers are grafted, to which Romans 11. 16-24 corresponds; but he urges them to come out of the carnal earthly Jerusalem and to realize their spiritual union to "the heavenly Jerusalem" (ch. 12. 18-23; 13. 13).

The use of Greek rather than Hebrew is doubtless due to the Epistle being intended, not merely for the Hebrew, but for the Hellenistic Jew converts, not only in Palestine, but elsewhere; a view confirmed by the use of the LXX, BENDEL thinks, probably (cf. 2 Peter 3. 15, 16, explained above), the Jews primarily, though not exclusively, addressed, were those who had left Jerusalem on account of the war and were settled in Asia Minor.

The notion of its having been originally in Hebrew arose probably from its Hebrew tone, method, and topics. It is reckoned among the Epistles, not at first generally acknowledged, along with James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. A beautiful link exists between these Epistles and the universally-acknowledged Epistles. Hebrews unites the ordinances of Leviticus with their antitypical Gospel fulfilment. St. James is the link between the highest doctrines of Christianity and the universal law of moral duty—a commentary on the Sermon on the Mount—harmonizing the decalogue law of Moses, and the revelation to Job and Elias, with the Christian law of liberty. Second Peter links the teaching of Peter with that of Paul. Jude links the earliest unwritten to the latest written Revelation. The two shorter Epistles to John, like Philemon, apply Christianity to the minute details of the Christian life, showing that Christianity can sanctify all earthly relations.

CHAPTER I.

Ver. 1-14. THE HIGHEST OF ALL REVELATIONS IS GIVEN US NOW IN THE SON OF GOD, WHO IS GREATER THAN THE ANGELS, AND WHO, HAVING COMPLETED REDEMPTION, SITS ENTHRONED AT GOD'S RIGHT HAND. The writer, though not inscribing his name, was well known to those addressed (ch. 13. 19). For proofs of Paul being the author, see my Introduction. In the Pauline method, the statement of subject and the division are put before the discussion; and at the close, the practical follows the doctrinal portion. The ardour of Spirit in this Epistle, as in 1 John, bursting forth at once into the subject (without prefatory inscription of name and greeting), the more effectively strikes the hearers. The date must have been whilst the temple was yet standing, before its destruction, 70 A. D.; some time before the martyrdom of Peter, who mentions this Epistle of Paul (2 Peter 3. 15, 16); at a time when many of the first hearers of the Lord were dead. 1. at sundry times—Greek, "in many portions." All was not revealed to each one prophet; but one received one portion of revelation, and another another. To Noah the quarter of the world to which Messiah should belong was revealed; to Abraham, the nation; to Jacob, the tribe; to David and Isalah, the family; to Micah, the town of nativity; to Daniel, the exact time; to Malachi, the coming of His forerunner, and His second advent; through Jonah, His burial and resurrection; through Isalah and Hosea, His resurrection. Each only knew in part; but when that which was perfect came in Messiah, that which was in part was done away (1 Corinthians 13. 12). in divers manners—e. g., internal suggestions, audible voices, the Urim and Thummim, dreams, and visions. "In one way He was seen by Abraham, in another by Moses, in another by Elias, and in another by Micah; Isalah, Daniel, and Ezekiel, beheld different forms" [THEODORET] (cf. Numbers 12. 6-8). The Old Testament revelations were fragmentary in substance, and manifold in form; the very multitude of prophets shows that they prophesied only in part. In Christ, the revelation of God is full, not in shifting hues of separated colour but Himself the pure light, uniting in His one person the whole spectrum (v. 3). spoke—the expression usual for a Jew to employ in addressing Jews. So St. Matthew, a Jew writing especially for Jews quotes Scripture, not by the formula, "It is written," but "said," &c. in time past—From Malachi, the last of the Old Testament prophets, for four hundred years, there had arisen no prophet, in order that the Son might be the more an object of expectation. [BENDEL.] As God (the Father) is introduced as having spoken here; so God the Son, ch. 2. 3; God the Holy Ghost, ch. 3. 7. the fathers—the Jewish fathers. The Jews of former days (1 Corinthians 10. 1). by—Greek, "IN." A mortal king speaks by his ambassador, not (as the King of kings) in his ambassador. The Son is the last and highest manifestation of God (Matthew 21. 34, 37); not merely a measure, as in the prophets, but the fulness of the Spirit of God dwelling in him bodily (John 1. 16; 3. 34; Colossians 2. 9). Thus he answers the Jewish objection drawn from their prophets Jesus is the end of all prophecy (Revelation 19. 10), and of the law of Moses (John 1. 17; 5. 46). 2. in these last days—In the oldest MSS, the Greek is, "At the last part of these days." The Rabbins divided the whole of time into "this age," or "world," and "the age to come" (ch. 2. 5; 6. 5). The days of Messiah were the transition period or "last part of these days" (in contrast to "in times past"), the close of the existing dispensation, and beginning of the final dispensation of which Christ's second coming shall be the crowning consummation. by his Son—Greek, "IN (His) Son" (John 14. 10). The true "Prophet" of God. "His majesty is set forth, (1.) Absolutely by the very name 'Son,' and by three glorious predicates, 'Whom He hath appointed,' 'By whom He made the worlds, 'Who sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high;' thus His course is described from the beginning of all things till he reached the goal (v. 2, 3). (2.) Relatively, in comparison with the angels, v. 4; the confirmation of this follows, and the very name 'Son' is proved at v. 5; the 'heirship,' v. 6-9; the 'making the worlds,' v. 10-12; the 'sitting at the right hand' of God, v. 13, 14.' His being made heir follows His sonship, and preceded His making the worlds (Proverbs 8. 22, 23; Ephesians 3. 11; as the first begotten, He is heir of the universe (v. 6), which he made instrumentally, ch. 11. 3, where "by the Word of God" answers to "by whom" (the Son of God) here (John 1. 3). Christ was "appointed" (in God's eternal counsel) to creation as an office; and the universe so created was assigned to Him as a kingdom. He is "heir of all things" by right of creation, and especially by right of redemption. The promise to Abraham that he should be heir of the world, had its fulfilment, and will have it still more fully, in Christ (Romans 4. 13; Galatians 3. 16; 4. 7). worlds—the inferior and the superior worlds (Colossians 1. 16). Lit., ages with all things and persons belonging to them; the universe, including all space and ages of time and all material and spiritual existences. The Greek implies, He not only appointed His Son heir of all things before creation, but He also (better than "also He") made by Him the worlds. 3. Who being—by pre-existent and essential being. brightness of his glory—Greek, the effulgence of His glory. "Light of (from) light." [NICENE CREED.] "Who is so senseless as to doubt concerning the eternal being of the Son? For when has one seen light without effulgence?" [ATHANASIUS against ARIUS, Orat. 2.] "The sun is never seen without effulgence, nor the Father without the Son." [THEOPHYLACT.] It is because He is the brightness, &c., and because He upholds, &c., that He sat down on the right hand, &c. It was a return to His Divine glory (John 6. 62; 17. 5; cf. Wisd. 7. 25, 26, where smaller things are said of wisdom). express image—"impress." But veiled in the flesh.

"The Sun of God in glory beams Too bright for us to scan;
But we can face the light that streams
From the mild Son of man." (2 Cor. 3. 18.)

of his person—Greek, "of His substantial essence;" hypostasis. upholding all things—Greek, "the universe." Cf. Colossians 1. 15, 17, 20, which enumerates the three facts in the same order as here. by the word—Therefore the Son of God is a Person; for He has the word. [BENGEL.] His word is God's word (ch. 11. 3). of his power—"The word" is the utterance which comes from His (the Son's) power, and gives expression to it. by himself—Omitted in the oldest MSS. purged—Greek, "made purification of . . . sins," viz., in His atonement, which graciously covers the guilt of sin. "Our" is omitted in the oldest MSS. Sin was the great uncleanness in God's sight, of which He has effected the purgation by His sacrifice. [ALFORD.] Our nature, as guilt-laden, could not, without our great High Priest's blood of atonement sprinkling the heavenly mercy-seat, come into immediate contact with God. EBERARD says, "The mediation between man and God, who was present in the Most Holy Place, was revealed in three forms: (1.) In sacrifices [typical propitiations for guilt]; (2.) in the priesthood [the agents of those sacrifices]; (3.) in the Levitical laws of purity [Levitical purity being attained by sacrifice positively, by avoidance of Levitical pollution negatively, the people being thus enabled to come into the presence of God without dying, Deuteronomy 5. 26]" (Leviticus 16). sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high—fulfilling Psalm 110. 1. This sitting of the Son at God's right hand was by the act of the father (ch. 8. 1; Ephesians 1. 20); it is never used of His pre-existing state coequal with the Father, but always of His exalted state as Son of man after His sufferings, and as Mediator for man in the presence of God (Romans 8. 34): a relation towards God and us about to come to an end when its object has been accomplished (1 Corinthians 15. 28). 4. Being made . . . better—by His exaltation by the Father (v. 3, 13): in contrast to His being "made lower than the angels" (ch. 2. 9). "Better," i. e., superior to. As "being" (v. 3) expresses His essential being: so "being made" (ch. 7. 26) marks what He became in His assumed manhood (Philippians 2. 6-9). Paul shows that His humbled form (at which the Jews might stumble) is no objection to His Divine Messiahship. As the law was given by the ministration of angels and Moses, it was inferior to the Gospel given by the Divine Son, who both is (v. 4-14) as God, and has been made, as the exalted Son of man (ch. 2. 5-18), much better than were angels. The manifestations of God by angels (and even by the angel of the covenant) at different times in the Old Testament, did not bring man and God into personal union, as the manifestation of God in human flesh does. by inheritance obtained—He always had the thing itself, viz., Sonship; but He "obtained by inheritance," according to the promise of the Father, the name "Son," whereby He is made known to men and angels. He is "the Son of God" in a sense far exalted above that in which angels are called "sons of God" (Job 1. 6; 38. 7). "The fulness of the glory of the peculiar name 'the Son of God,' is unattainable by human speech or thought. All appellations are but fragments of its glory—beams united in it as in a central sun. Revelation 19. 12. A name that no man knew but He Himself." 5. For—Substantiating His having "obtained a more excellent name than the angels." unto which—A frequent argument in this Epistle is derived from the silence of Scripture (v. 12, ch. 2. 16; 7. 3, 14). [BENGEL.] this day have I begotten thee—(Psalm 2. 7.) Fulfilled at the resurrection of Jesus, whereby the Father "declared," i. e., made manifest His Divine Sonship, heretofore veiled by His humiliation (Acts 13. 33; Romans 1. 4). Christ has a fourfold right to the title "Son of God:" (1.) By generation, as begotten of God; (2.) by commission, as sent by God; (3.) by resurrection, as "the first-begotten of the dead" (cf. Luke 20. 36; Romans 1. 4; Revelation 1. 5); (4.) by actual possession, as heir of all. [BISHOP PEARSON.] The Psalm here quoted applied primarily in a less full sense to Solomon, of whom God promised by Nathan to David, "I will be His Father and he shall be my son." But as the whole theocracy was of Messianic import, the triumph of David over Hadad-ezer and neighbouring kings (2 Samuel 8.; Psalm 2. 2, 3, 9-12) is a type of God's ultimately subduing all enemies under His Son, whom He sets (Hebrew, anointed, Psalm 2. 6) on His "holy hill of Zion," as King of the Jews and of the whole earth, the antitype to Solomon, son of David. The "I" in Greek is emphatic; I the Everlasting Father have begotten thee this day, i. e., on this day, the day of thy being manifested as My Son, "the first-begotten of the dead" (Colossians 1. 18; Revelation 1. 5), when thou has ransomed and opened heaven to thy people. He had been always Son, but now first was manifested as such in His once humbled, now exalted manhood united to His Godhead. ALFORD refers "this day" to the eternal generation of the Son: The day in which the Son was begotten by the Father is an everlasting to-day: there never was a yesterday or past time to Him, nor a to-morrow or future time: "Nothing there is to come, and nothing past, and an eternal now doth ever last" (Proverbs 30. 4; John 10. 30, 38; 16. 23; 17. 8). The communication of the Divine essence in its fulness, involves eternal generation; for the Divine essence has no beginning. But the context refers to a definite point of time, viz., that of His having entered on the inheritance (v. 4). The "bringing the first-begotten into the world" (v. 6), is not subsequent, as ALFORD thinks, to v. 5, but anterior to it (cf. Acts 2. 30-35). 6. And—Greek, "But." Not only this proves His superiority, BUT a more decisive proof is Psalm 97. 7, which shows that not only at His resurrection, but also in prospect of His being brought into the world (cf. ch. 9. 11; 10. 5) as man, in His incarnation, nativity (Luke 2. 9-14), temptation (Matthew 4. 10, 11), resurrection (Matthew 28. 2), and future second advent in glory, angels were designed by God to be subject to Him. Cf. 1 Timothy 3. 16, "Seen of angels;" God manifesting Messiah as one to be gazed at with adoring love by heavenly intelligences (Ephesians 2. 10; 1 Thessalonians 1. 9, 10; 1 Peter 3. 22). The fullest realization of His Lordship shall be at His second coming (Psalm 97. 7: 1 Corinthians 15. 24, 25; Philippians 2. 9) "Worship Him all ye gods" ("gods," i. e., exalted beings, as angels), refers to God; but it was universally admitted among the Hebrews that God would dwell, in a peculiar sense, in Messiah (so as to be in the Talmud phrase, "capable of being pointed to with the finger"); and so what was said of God was true of, and to be fulfilled in, Messiah. KIMCHI says that Psalms 83.-101. contain them the mystery of Messiah. God ruled the theocracy in and through Him. the world—subject to Christ (ch. 2. 5). As "the first-begotten" He has the rights of primogeniture (Romans 8. 29; Colossians 1. 15, 16, 18). In Denteronomy 32. 43, the LXX. have, "Let all the angels of God worship Him," words not now found in the Hebrew. This passage of the LXX. may have been in Paul's mind as to the form, but the substance is taken from Psalm 97. 7. The type David, in the Psalm 89. 27 (quoted in v. 5), is called "God's first-born, higher than the kings of the earth:" so the antitypical first-begotten, the son of David, is to be worshipped by all inferior lords, as angels ("gods," Psalm 97. 7); for He is "King of kings and Lord of lords" (Revelation 19. 16). In the Greek, "again" is transposed; but this does not oblige us, as ALFORD thinks, to translate, "When He again shall have introduced," &c., viz., at Christ's second coming; for there is no previous mention of a first bringing in; and "again" is often used in quotations, not to be joined with the verb, but parenthetically ("that I may again quote Scripture"). English Version is correct (cf. Matthew 5. 33; Greek, John 12. 39). 7. of—The Greek is rather, "In reference to the angels." spirits—or "winds:" Who employeth His angels as the winds, His ministers as the lightnings; or, He maketh His angelic ministers the directing powers of winds and flames, when these latter are required to perform His will. "Commissions them to assume the agency or form of flames for His purposes." [ALFORD.] English Version, "Maketh His angels spirits," means, He maketh them of a subtle, incorporeal nature, swift as the wind. So Psalm 18. 10, "A cherub . . . the wings of the wind." Verse 14, "ministering spirits," favours English Version here. As "spirits" implies the wind-like velocity and subtle nature of the Cherubim, so "flame of fire" expresses the burning devotion and intense all-consuming zeal of the adoring Seraphim (meaning "burning"), Isaiah 6. 1. The translation, "Maketh winds His messengers, and a flame of fire His ministers (!)," is plainly wrong. In the Psalm 104. 3, 4, the subject in each clause comes first, and the attribute predicated of it second; so the Greek article here marks "angels" and "ministers" as the subjects, and "winds" and "flame of fire," predicates. Schemoth Rabba says, "God is called God of Zebaoth (the heavenly hosts), because He does what he pleases with his angels. When He pleases, He makes them to sit (Judges 6. 11); at other times to stand (Isaiah 6. 2); at times to resemble women (Zechariah 5. 9); at other times to resemble men (Genesis 18. 2); at times He makes them 'spirits;' at times, fire." "Maketh" implies that, however exalted, they are but creatures, whereas the Son is the Creator (v. 10); not begotten from everlasting, nor to be worshipped, as the Son (Revelation 14. 7; 22. 8, 9). 8. O God—the Greek has the article to mark emphasis (Psalm 45. 6, 7). for ever . . . righteousness—Everlasting duration and righteousness go together (Psalm 45. 2; 89. 14). a sceptre of righteousness—lit., "a rod of rectitude," or "straightforwardness." The oldest MSS. prefix "and" (cf. Esther 4. 11). 9. iniquity—"unrighteousness." Some oldest MSS. read, "Lawlessness," therefore—because God loves righteousness and hates iniquity. God . . . thy God—JEROME, AUGUSTINE, &c., translate, Psalm 45. 7, "O God, thy God, hath anointed thee," whereby Christ is addressed as God. This is probably the true translation of the Hebrew there, and also of the Greek of Hebrews here; for it is likely the Son is addressed "O God," as in v. 8. The anointing here meant is not that at His baptism, when he solemnly entered on His ministry for us; but that with the "oil of gladness," or "exalting joy" (which denotes a triumph, and follows as the consequence of His manifested love of righteousness and hatred of iniquity), wherewith, after His triumphant completion of His work, He has been anointed by the Father above His fellows (not only above us, His fellow-men, the adopted members of God's family, whom "He is not ashamed to call His brethren," but above the angels, fellow-partakers in part with Him, though infinitely His inferiors, in the glories, holiness, and joys of heaven; "sons of God," and angel—"messengers," though subordinate to the Divine Angel "Messenger of the covenant"). Thus He is antitype to Solomon, "chosen of all David's many sons to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel," even as His father David was chosen before all the house of his father's sons. The image is drawn from the custom of anointing guests at feasts (Psalm 23. 5); or rather of anointing kings: not until His ascension did He assume the kingdom as Son of man. A fuller accomplishment is yet to be, when He shall be visibly the anointed King over the whole earth (set by the Father) on His holy hill of Zion, Psalm 2. 6, 8. So David, His type, was first anointed at Bethlehem (1 Samuel 16. 13; Psalm 89. 20); and yet again at Hebron, first over Judah (2 Samuel 2. 4), then over all Israel (2 Samuel 5. 3); not till the death of Saul did he enter on his actual kingdom, as it was not till after Christ's death that the Father set Him at His right hand far above all principality (Ephesians 1. 20, 21). The 45th Psalm in its first meaning was addressed to Solomon; but the Holy Spirit inspired the writer to use language which in its fulness can only apply to the antitypical Solomon, the true Royal Head of the theocracy. 10. And—In another passage (Psalm 102. 25-27) He says. in the beginning—English Version, Psalm 102. 25, "of old;" Hebrew, "before," "aforetime." LXX., "in the beginning" (as in Genesis 1. 1) answers by contrast to the end implied in "they shall perish," &c. The Greek order here (not in the LXX.) is, "Thou in the beginning, O Lord," which throws the "Lord" into emphasis. "Christ is preached even in passages where many might contend that the Father was principally intended." [BENGEL.] laid the foundation of—"firmly founded" is included in the idea of the Greek. heavens—plural: not merely one, but manifold, and including various orders of heavenly intelligences (Ephesians 4. 10). works of thine hands—the heavens, as a woven veil or curtain spread out. 11. They—The earth and the heavens in their present state and form "shall perish" (ch. 12. 26, 27; 2 Peter 3. 13). "Perish" does not mean annihilation; just as it did not mean so in the case of "the world that, being overflowed with water, perished" under Noah (2 Peter 3. 6). The covenant of the possession of the earth was renewed with Noah and his seed on the renovated earth. So it shall be after the perishing by fire (2 Peter 3. 12, 13). remainest—through (so the Greek) all changes. as . . . a garment—(Isaiah 51. 6.) 12. vesture—Greek, "an enveloping cloak." fold them up—So the LXX., Psalm 102. 26; but the Hebrew, "change them." The Spirit, by Paul, treats the Hebrew of the Old Testament, with independence of handling, presenting the Divine truth in various aspects; sometimes as here sanctioning the LXX. (cf. Isaiah 34. 4; Revelation 6. 14); sometimes the Hebrew; sometimes varying from both. changed—as one lays aside a garment to put on another. thou art the same—(Isaiah 46. 4; Malachi 3. 6.) The same in nature, therefore in covenant faithfulness to thy people. shall not fail—Hebrew, "shall not end." Israel, in the Babylonian captivity, in Psalm 102., casts her hopes of deliverance on Messiah, the unchanging covenant-God of Israel. 13. Quotation from Psalm 110. 1. The image is taken from the custom of conquerors putting the feet on the necks of the conquered (Joshua 10. 24, 25). 14. ministering spirits—Referring to v. 7, "spirits . . . ministers." They are incorporeal spirits, as God is, but ministering to Him as inferiors. sent forth—present participle: "Being sent forth" continually, as their regular service in all ages. to minister—Greek, "unto (i. e., for) ministry" for them—Greek, "on account of them," &c. Angels are sent forth on ministrations to God and Christ, not primarily to men, though for the good of "those who are about to inherit salvation" (so the Greek): the elect, who believe, or shall believe, for whom all things, angels included, work together for good (Romans 8. 28). Angels' ministrations are not properly rendered to men, since the latter have no power of commanding them, though their ministrations to God are often directed to the good of men. So the superiority of the Son of God to angels is shown. They "all," how ever various their ranks, minister; He is ministered to. They "stand" (Luke 1. 19) before God, or are "sent forth" to execute the Divine commands on behalf of them whom He pleases to save; He "sits on the right hand of the Majesty on high" (v. 3, 13). He rules; they serve.

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1-18. DANGER OF NEGLECTING SO GREAT SALVATION, FIRST SPOKEN BY CHRIST; TO WHOM, NOT TO ANGELS, THE NEW DISPENSATION WAS SUBJECTED; THOUGH HE WAS FOR A TIME HUMBLED BELOW THE ANGELS. THIS HUMILIATION TOOK PLACE BY DIVINE NECESSITY FOR OUR SALVATION. 1. Therefore—Because Christ the Mediator of the new covenant is so far (ch. 1.) above all angels, the mediators of the old covenant. the more earnest—Greek, "the more abundantly." heard—spoken by God (ch. 1. 1); and by the Lord (v. 3). let them slip—lit., "flow past them" (ch. 4. 1). 2. (Cf. v. 3.) Argument a fortiori. spoken by angels—The Mosaic law spoken by the ministration of angels (Deuteronomy 33. 2; Psalm 68. 17; Acts 7. 53; Galatians 3. 19). When it is said, Exodus 20. 1, "God spake," it is meant He spake by angels as His mouthpiece, or at least angels repeating in unison with His voice the words of the Decalogue. Whereas the Gospel was first spoken by the Lord alone. was steadfast—Greek, "was made steadfast," or "confirmed:" was enforced by penalties on those violating it. transgression—by doing evil; lit., overstepping its bounds: a positive violation of it. disobedience—by neglecting to do good: a negative violation of it. recompense—(Deuteronomy 32. 35.) 3. we—who have received the message of salvation so clearly delivered to us (cf. ch. 12. 25). so great salvation—embodied in Jesus, whose very name means salvation, including not only deliverance from foes and from death, and the grant of temporal blessings (which the law promised to the obedient), but also grace of the Spirit, forgiveness of sins, and the promise of heaven, glory, and eternal life (v. 10). which—"inasmuch as it is a salvation which began," &c. spoken by the Lord—as the instrument of proclaiming it. Not as the law, spoken by the instrumentality of angels (v. 2). Both law and Gospel came from God; the difference here referred to lay in the instrumentality by which each respectively was promulgated (cf. v. 5). Angels recognize Him as "the Lord" (Matthew 28. 6; Luke 2. 11). confirmed unto us—not by penalties, as the law was confirmed, but by spiritual gifts (v. 4). by them that heard Him—(Cf. Luke 1. 2.) Though Paul had a special and independent revelation of Christ (Galatians 1. 16, 17, 19), yet he classes himself with those Jews whom he addresses, "unto us;" for like them in many particulars (ex. gr., the agony in Gethsemane, ch. 5. 7), he was dependent for autoptic information on the twelve apostles. So the discourses of Jesus, ex. gr., the Sermon on the Mount, and the first proclamation of the Gospel kingdom by the Lord (Matthew 4. 17), he could only know by the report of the Twelve: so the saying, "It is more blessed to give, than to receive" (Acts 20. 35). Paul mentions what they had heard, rather than what they had seen, conformably with what he began with, v. 1, 2, "Spake . . . spoken." Appropriately also in his Epistles to Gentiles, he dwells on his independent call to the apostleship of the Gentiles: in his Epistle to the Hebrews, he appeals to the apostles who had been long with the Lord (cf. Acts 1. 21; 10. 41): so in his sermon to the Jews in Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13. 31); and "he only appeals to the testimony of these apostles in a general way, in order that he may bring the Hebrews to the Lord alone" [BENGEL], not to become partisans of particular apostles, as Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, and James, the bishop of Jerusalem. This verse implies that the Hebrews of the churches of Palestine and Syria (or those of them dispersed in Asia Minor [BENGEL], 1 Peter 1. 1, or in Alexandria) were primarily addressed in this Epistle; for of none so well could it be said, the Gospel was confirmed to them by the immediate hearers of the Lord: the past tense, "was confirmed," implies some little time had elapsed since this testimony by eye-witnesses. 4. them—rather, "God also [as Christ, v. 3] bearing witness to it" . . . "joining in

attestation of it." signs and wonders—performed by Christ and His apostles. "Signs" and miracles, or other facts regarded as proofs of a Divine mission; "wonders" are miracles viewed as prodigies, causing astonishment (Acts 2. 22, 33); powers are miracles viewed as evidences of superhuman power. divers miracles—Greek, "varied (miraculous) powers" (2 Corinthians 12. 12) granted to the apostles after the ascension. gifts, &c.—Greek, "distributions." The gift of the Holy Spirit was given to Christ without measure (John 3. 34), but to us it is distributed in various measures and operations (Romans 12. 3, 6, &c.; 1 Corinthians 12. 4-11). according to his own will—God's free and sovereign will, assigning one gift of the Spirit to one, and another to another (Acts 5. 32; Ephesians 1. 5). 5. For—Confirming the assertion, v. 2, 3, that the new covenant was spoken by One higher than the mediators of the old covenant, viz., angels. Translate in the Greek order, to bring out the proper emphasis, "Not the angels hath He," &c. the world to come—Implying, He has subjected to angels the existing world, the Old Testament dispensation (then still partly existing as to its framework), v. 2, the political kingdoms of the earth (Daniel 4. 13; 10. 13, 20, 21; 12. 1), and the natural elements (Revelation 9. 11; 16. 4), and even individuals (Matthew 18. 10). "The world to come" is the new dispensation brought in by Christ, beginning in grace here, to be completed in glory hereafter. It is called "to come," or "about to be," as at the time of its being subjected to Christ by the Divine decree, it was as yet a thing of the future, and is still so to us, in respect to its full consummation. In respect to the subjecting of all things to Christ in fulfilment of Psalm 8., the realization is still "to come." Regarded from the Old Testament stand-point, which looks prophetically forward to the New Testament (and the Jewish priesthood and Old Testament ritual were in force then when Paul wrote, and continued till their forcible abrogation by the destruction of Jerusalem), it is "the world to come:" Paul, as addressing Jews, appropriately calls it so, according to their conventional way of viewing it. We, like them, still pray, "Thy kingdom come;" for its manifestation in glory is yet future. "This world" is used in contrast to express the present fallen condition of the world (Ephesians 2. 2). Believers belong not to this present world-course, but by faith rise in spirit to "the world to come," making it a present, though internal, reality. Still, in the present world, natural and social, angels are mediately rulers under God in some sense: not so in the coming world: man in it, and the Son of man, man's Head, are to be supreme. Hence greater reverence was paid to angels by men in the Old Testament than is permitted in the New Testament. For man's nature is exalted in Christ now, so that angels are our "fellow-servants" (Revelation 22. 9). In their ministrations they stand on a different footing from that on which they stood towards us in the Old Testament. We are "brethren" of Christ in a nearness not enjoyed even by angels (v. 10-12, 16). 6. But—It is not to angels the Gospel kingdom is subject, BUT, &c. one . . . testified—The usual way of quoting Scripture to readers familiar with it. Psalm 8. 5-7 praises Jehovah for exalting MAN, so as to subject all the works of God on earth to him: this dignity having been lost by the first Adam, is realized only in Christ the Son of man, the Representative Man and Head of our redeemed race. Thus Paul proves that it is to MAN, not to angels, that God has subjected the "world to come." In v. 6-8, MAN is spoken of in general ("him . . . him . . . his"); then at v. 9, first JESUS is introduced as fulfilling, as man, all the conditions of the prophecy, and through death passing Himself, and so consequently bringing us men, His "brethren," to "glory and honour." What—How insignificant in himself, yet how exalted by God's grace! (Cf. Psalm 144. 3.) The Hebrew, Enosh and Ben-Adam, express man and Son of man in his weakness: "Son of man" is here used of any and every child of man: unlike, seemingly, the lord of creation, such as he was originally (Genesis 1. and 2.), and such as he is designed to be (Psalm 8.), and such as he actually is by title and shall hereafter more fully be in the person of, and in union with, Jesus, pre-eminently the Son of man (v. 9). art mindful—as of one absent. visitest—lookest after him, as one present. 7. a little—Not as BENGEL, "a little time." than the angels—Hebrew, "than God," Elohim, i. e., the abstract qualities of God, such as angels possess in an inferior form, viz., heavenly, spiritual, incorporeal natures. Man, in his original creation, was set next beneath them. So the man Jesus, though Lord of angels, when He emptied Himself of the externals of His Divinity (Note, Philippians 2. 6, 7), was in His human nature "a little lower than the angels;" though this is not the primary reference here, but man in general. crownedst him with glory and honour—as the appointed kingly vicegerent of God over this earth (Genesis 1. and 2). and didst set him over the works of thy hands—Omitted in some of the oldest MSS.; but read by others and by oldest versions: so Psalm 8. 6, "Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands." 8. (1 Corinthians 15. 27.) For in that—i. e., "For in that" God saith in the 8th Psalm, "He put the all things (so the Greek, the all things just mentioned) in subjection under him (man), He left nothing," &c. As no limitation occurs in the sacred writing, the "all things" must include heavenly, as well as earthly things (cf. 1 Corinthians 3. 21, 22). But now—as things now are, we see not yet the all things put under man. 9. But—We see not man as yet exercising lordship over all things, "but rather, Him who was made a little lower than the angels (cf. Luke 22. 43), we behold (by faith: a different Greek verb from that for 'we see,' v. 8, which expresses the impression which our eyes passively receive from objects around us; whereas, 'we behold,' or 'look at,' implies the direction and intention of one deliberately regarding something which he tries to see: so ch. 3. 19; 10. 25, Greek), viz., Jesus, on account of His suffering of death, crowned," &c. He is already crowned, though unseen by us, save by faith; hereafter all things shall be subjected to Him visibly and fully. The ground of His exaltation is "on account of His having suffered death" (v. 10; Philippians 2. 8, 9). that He by the grace of God—(Titus 2. 11; 3. 4.) The reading of ORIGEN, "That He without God" (laying aside His Divinity; or, for every being save God; or perhaps alluding to His having been temporarily "forsaken," as the Sin-bearer, by the Father on the cross), is not supported by the MSS. The "that," &c., is connected with "crowned with glory," &c., thus: His exaltation after sufferings is the perfecting or consummation of His work (v. 10) for us: without it His death would have been ineffectual; with it, and from it, flows the result that His tasting of death is available for (in behalf of, for the good of) every man. He is crowned as the Head in heaven of our common humanity, presenting His blood as the all-prevailing plea for us. This coronation above makes His death applicable for every individual man (observe the singular: not merely "for all men"), ch. 4. 14; 9. 24; 1 John 2. 2. "Taste death," implies his personal experimental undergoing of death: death of the body, and death (spiritually) of the soul, in His being forsaken of the Father. "As a physician first tastes his medicines to encourage his sick patient to take them, so Christ, when all men feared death, in order to persuade them to be bold in meeting it, tasted it Himself, though He had no need" [CHRYSOSTOM] (v. 14, 15). 10. For—Giving a reason why "the grace of God" required that Jesus "should taste death." it became him—the whole plan was [not only not derogatory to, but] highly becoming God, though unbelief considers it a disgrace. [BENGEL.] An answer to the Jews, and Hebrew Christians, whosoever, through impatience at the delay in the promised advent of Christ's glory, were in danger of apostasy, stumbling at Christ crucified. The Jerusalem Christians especially were liable to this danger. This scheme of redemption was altogether such a one as harmonizes with the love, justice, and wisdom of God. for whom—God the Father (Romans 11. 36; 1 Corinthians 8. 6; Revelation 4. 11). In Colossians 1. 16 the same is said of Christ. all things—Greek, "the universe of things," "the all things." He was for "God," the periphrasis, "Him for whom . . . by whom are all things," to mark the becomingness of Christ's suffering as the way to His being perfected" as "captain of our salvation," seeing that His is the way that pleased Him whose will and whose glory are the end of all things, and by whose operation all things exist. in bringing—The Greek is past, "Having brought as He did," viz., in His electing purpose (cf. "Ye are sons," viz. in His purpose, Galatians 4. 6; Ephesians 1. 4), a purpose which is accomplished in Jesus being "perfected through sufferings." many—(Matthew 20. 28.) "The Church" (v. 12), "the general assembly" (ch. 12. 23). sons—no longer children as under the Old Testament law, but sons by adoption. unto glory—to share Christ's "glory" (v. 8; cf. v. 7; John 17. 10, 22, 24; Romans 8. 21). Sonship, holiness (v. 11), and glory, are inseparably joined. "Suffering," "salvation," and "glory," in Paul's writings, often go together (2 Timothy 2. 10). Salvation presupposes destruction, deliverance from which for us required Christ's "sufferings." to make . . . perfect—to consummate: to bring to consummated glory through sufferings, as the appointed avenue to it. "He who suffers for another, not only benefits him, but becomes himself the brighter and more perfect." [CHRYSOSTOM.] Bringing to the end of troubles, and to the goal full of glory: a metaphor from the contests in the public games. Cf. "It is finished," Luke 24. 26; John 19. 30. I prefer, with CALVIN, understanding, "to make perfect as a completed sacrifice:" legal and official, not moral, perfection is meant: "to consecrate" (so the same Greek is translated ch. 7. 23; cf. Margin) by the finished expiation of His death, as our perfect High Priest, and so our "Captain of salvation" (Luke 13. 32). This agrees with v. 11, "He that sanctifieth," i. e., consecrates them by Himself being made a consecrated offering for them. So ch. 10. 14, 29; John 17. 19: by the perfecting of His consecration for them in His death, He perfects their consecration, and so throws open access to glory (ch. 10. 19-21; ch. 5. 9; 9. 9, accord with this sense). Captain of, &c.—lit., Prince-leader: as Joshua, not Moses, led the people into the Holy Land, so will our Joshua, or Jesus, lead us into the heavenly inheritance (Acts 13. 39). The same Greek is in ch. 12. 2, "Author of our faith." Acts 3. 15, "Prince of life" (5. 31). Preceding others by His example, as well as the originator of our salvation. 11. he that sanctifieth—Christ who once for all consecrates His people to God (Jude 1, bringing them nigh to Him as the consequence) and everlasting glory, by having consecrated Himself for them in His being made "perfect (as their expiatory sacrifice) through sufferings" (v. 10; ch. 10. 10, 14, 29; John 17. 17, 19). God in His electing love, by Christ's finished work, perfectly sanctifies them to God's service and to heaven once for all: then they are progressively sanctified by the transforming Spirit. "Sanctification is glory working in embryo; glory is sanctification come to the birth, and manifested." [ALFORD.] they who are sanctified—Greek, "they that are being sanctified" (cf. the use of "sanctified," 1 Corinthians 7. 14). of one—Father, God: not in the sense wherein He is Father of all beings, as angels; for these are excluded by the argument (v. 16); but as He is Father of His spiritual human sons, Christ the Head and elder Brother, and His believing people, the members of the body and family. Thus, this and the following verses are meant to justify his having said, "many sons" (v. 10). "Of one" is not "of one father Adam," or "Abraham," as BENGEL, &c., suppose. For the Saviour's participation in the lowness of our humanity is not mentioned till v. 14, and then as a consequence of what precedes. Moreover, "Sons of God" is, in Scripture usage, the dignity obtained by our union with Christ; and our brotherhood with Him flows from God being His and our Father. Christ's Sonship (by generation) in relation to God is reflected in the sonship (by adoption) of His brethren. he is not ashamed—though being the Son of God, since they have now by adoption obtained a like dignity, so that His majesty is not compromised by brotherhood with them (cf. ch. 11. 16). It is a striking feature in Christianity that it unites such amazing contrasts as "our brother and our God." [THOLUÆ.] "God makes of sons of men sons of God, because God hath made of the Son of God the Son of man" [ST. AU-

MUSTINE ON Psalm 2.] 12. (Psalm 22, 22.) Messiah declares the name of the Father, not known fully as Christ's Father, and therefore their Father, till after His crucifixion (John 20, 17), among His brethren ("the Church," i. e., the congregation), that they in turn may praise Him (Psalm 22, 23). At v. 22, the 22d Psalm, which begins with Christ's cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and details minutely His sorrows, passes from Christ's sufferings to His triumph, prefigured by the same in the experience of David. will Ising—as leader of the choir (Psalm 8, 2). 13. I will put my trust in him—From the LXX., Isaiah 8, 17, which immediately precedes the next quotation, "Behold, I and the children," &c. The only objection is, the following words, "and again," usually introduce a new quotation, whereas these two are parts of one and the same passage. However, this objection is not valid, as the two clauses express distinct ideas; "I will put my trust in Him" expresses His filial confidence in God as His Father, to whom He flees from His sufferings, and is not disappointed; which His believing brethren imitate, trusting solely in the Father through Christ, and not in their own merits. "Christ exhibited this 'trust,' not for Himself, for He and the Father are one, but for His own people" (v. 16). Each fresh aid given Him assured Him, as it does them, of aid for the future, until the complete victory was obtained over death and hell (Philippians 1, 16). [BENGEI.] Behold I and the children, &c.—(Isaiah 8, 18.) "Sons" (v. 10), "brethren" (v. 12), and "children," imply His right and property in them from everlasting. He speaks of them as "children" of God, though not yet in being, yet considered as such in His purpose, and presents them before God the Father, who has given Him them, to be glorified with Himself. Isaiah (meaning "salvation of Jehovah") typically represented Messiah, who is at once Father and Son, Isaiah and Immanuel (Isaiah 9, 6). He expresses his resolve to rely, he and his children, not like Ahaz and the Jews on the Assyrian king, against the confederacy of Pekah of Israel, and Rezin of Syria, but on Jehovah; and then foretells the deliverance of Judah by God, in language which finds its antitypical full realization only in the far greater deliverance wrought by Messiah, Christ, the antitypical Prophet, similarly, instead of the human confidences of His age, Himself, and with Him GOD THE FATHER'S children (who are therefore His children, and so antitypical to Isaiah's children, though here regarded as His "brethren," cf. Isaiah 9, 6, "Father;" and "His seed," 53, 10) led by Him, trust wholly in God for salvation. The official words and acts of all the prophets find their antitype in the Great Prophet (Revelation 19, 10), just as His kingly office is antitypical to that of the theocratic kings; and His priestly office to the types and rites of the Aaronic priesthood. 14. He who has thus been shown to be the "Captain (Greek, Leader) of salvation" to the "many sons," by trusting and suffering like them, must therefore become man like them, in order that His death may be efficacious for them. [ALFORD.] the children—before mentioned (v. 13); those existing in His eternal purpose, though not in actual being. are partakers of—*lit., "have [in His purpose] been partakers" all in common. flesh and blood—Greek oldest MSS. have "blood and flesh." The inner and more important element, the blood, as the more immediate vehicle of the soul, stands before the more palpable element, the flesh; also, with reference to Christ's blood-shedding with a view to which He entered into community with our corporeal life. "The life of the flesh is in the blood; it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul" (Leviticus 17, 11, 14). likewise—Greek, "in a somewhat similar manner;" not altogether in a like manner. For He, unlike them, was conceived and born not in sin (ch. 4, 15). But mainly "in like manner;" not in mere semblance of a body, as the Docetæ heretics taught. took part of—participated in. The forfeited inheritance (according to Jewish law) was ransomed by the nearest of kin; so Jesus became our nearest of kin by His assumed humanity, in order to be our Redeemer. that through death—which He could not have undergone as God, but only by becoming man. Not by almighty power but "by His death" (so the Greek) He overcame death. "Jesus suffering death overcame; Satan wielding death succumbed." [BENGEI.] As David cut off the head of Goliath with the giant's own sword where-with the latter was wont to win his victories. Coming to redeem mankind, Christ made Himself a sort of hook to destroy the devil; for in Him there was His humanity to attract the Devourer to Him, His divinity to pierce him, apparent weakness to provoke, hidden power to transfix the hungry ravisher. The Latin epigram says, "Mors mortis morti mortem nisi morte tulisset, Æternæ vitæ janua clausa foret." Had not death by death borne to death the death of Death, the gate of eternal life would have been closed. destroy—*lit., "render powerless;" deprive of all power to hurt His people. "That thou mightest still the enemy and avenger" (Psalm 8, 2). The same Greek verb is used. 2 Timothy 1, 10, "abolished death." There is no more death for believers. Christ plants in them an undying seed the germ of heavenly immortality, though believers have to pass through natural death. power—Satan is "strong" (Matthew 12, 29). of death—implying that death itself is a power which, though originally foreign to human nature, now reigns over it (Romans 5, 12; 6, 9). The power which death has Satan wields. The author of sin is the author of its consequences. Cf. "power of the enemy" (Luke 10, 19). Satan has acquired over man (by God's law, Genesis 2, 17; Romans 6, 23) the power of death by man's sin, death being the executioner of sin, and man being Satan's "lawful captive." Jesus, by dying, has made the dying His own (Romans 14, 9), and has taken the prey from the mighty. Death's power was manifest; who wielded that power, lurking beneath it, is here expressed, viz., Satan. Wisdom 2, 24, "By the envy of the devil, death entered into the world." 15. fear of death—even before they had experienced its actual power. all their lifetime—Such a life can hardly be called life. subject to bondage—*lit., "subjects of bondage;" not merely liable to it, but enthralled in it (cf. Romans 8, 15; Galatians 5, 1). Contrast with this bondage, the glory of the "sons" (v. 10). "Bondage" is defined by Aristotle, "The living not as one chooses;" "liberty," "the living as one chooses." Christ by delivering us from the curse of God against our sin, has taken from death all that made it formidable. Death, viewed apart from Christ, can only fill with horror, if the sinner dares to think. 16. For verily—Greek, "For as we all know;" "For as you will doubtless grant." Paul probably alludes to Isaiah 41, 8; Jeremiah 31, 32, LXX., from which all Jews would know well that the fact here stated as to Messiah was what the prophets had led them to expect. took not on him, &c.—rather, "It is not angels that He is helping (the present implies duration); but it is the seed of Abraham that He is helping." The verb is lit., to help by taking one by the hand, as in ch. 8, 9, "When I took them by the hand," &c. Thus it answers to "succour," v. 18, and "deliver," v. 15. "Not angels," who have no flesh and blood, but "the children," who have "flesh and blood," He takes hold of to help by "Himself taking part of the same" (v. 14). Whatever effect Christ's work may have on angels, He is not taking hold to help them by suffering in their nature to deliver them from death, as in our case. seed of Abraham—He views Christ's redemption (in compliment to the Hebrews whom he is addressing, and as enough for his present purpose) with reference to Abraham's seed, the Jewish nation, primarily not that he excludes the Gentiles (v. 9, "for every man"), who, when believers, are the seed of Abraham spiritually (cf. v. 12; Psalm 22, 22, 25, 27), but direct reference to them, such as is in Romans 4, 11, 12, 16; Galatians 3, 7, 14, 28, 29, would be out of place in his present argument. It is the same argument for Jesus being the Christ which Matthew, writing his Gospel for the Hebrews, uses, tracing the genealogy of Jesus from Abraham, the father of the Jews, and the one to whom the promises were given, on which the Jews especially prided themselves (cf. Romans 9, 4, 5). 17. Wherefore—Greek, "Whence." Found in Paul's speech, Acts 26, 19. in all things—which are incidental to manhood the being born, nourished, growing up, suffering. Sin is not in the original constitution of man, a necessary attendant of manhood, so He had no sin. it behooved him—by more necessity, considering what the justice and love of God required of Him as Mediator (cf. ch. 5. 3), the office which he had voluntarily undertaken in order to "help" man (v. 16.) his brethren—(v. 11)—"the seed of Abraham" (v. 16), and so also the spiritual seed, His elect out of all mankind. he—rather as Greek, "that He might become High Priest;" He was called so, when He was "made perfect by the things which He suffered" (v. 10; ch. 5. 8-10). He was actually made so, when He entered within the veil, from which last flows His ever-continuing intercession as Priest for us. The death, as man, must first be, in order that the bringing in of the blood into the heavenly Holy Place might follow, in which consisted the expiation as High Priest. merciful—to "the people" deserving wrath by "sins." Mercy is a prime requisite in a priest, since his office is to help the wretched and raise the fallen; such mercy is most likely to be found in one who has a fellow-feeling with the afflicted, having been so once Himself (ch. 4. 15); not that the Son of God needed to be taught by suffering to be merciful, but that in order to save us He needed to take our manhood with all its sorrows, thereby qualifying Himself, by experimental suffering with us, to be our sympathizing High Priest, and assuring us of His entire fellow-feeling with us in every sorrow. So in the main CALVIN remarks here. faithful—true to God (ch. 3. 5, 6) and to man (ch. 10. 23) in the mediatorial office which He has undertaken. High Priest—which Moses was not, though "faithful" (ch. 2). Nowhere, except in Psalm 110., Zechariah 6. 13, and in this Epistle, is Christ expressly called a Priest. In this Epistle alone His priesthood is professedly discussed; whence it is evident how necessary is this book of the New Testament. In Psalm 110., and Zechariah 6. 13, there is added mention of the kingdom of Christ, which elsewhere is spoken of without the priesthood, and that frequently. On the cross, whereon as Priest He offered the sacrifice, He had the title "King" inscribed over Him. [BENGEI.] to make reconciliation for the sins—rather as Greek, "to propitiate (in respect to) the sins;" "to expiate the sins." Strictly Divine justice is "propitiated;" but God's love is as much from everlasting as His justice; therefore, lest Christ's sacrifice, or its typical forerunners, the legal sacrifices, should be thought to be antecedent to God's grace and love, neither are said in the Old or New Testament to have propitiated God; otherwise Christ's sacrifices might have been thought to have first induced God to love and pity man, instead of (as the fact really is) His love having originated Christ's sacrifice, whereby Divine justice and Divine love are harmonized. The sinner is brought by that sacrifice into God's favour, which by sin he had forfeited; hence his right prayer is, "God be propitiated (so the Greek) to me who am a sinner" (Luke 18. 13). Sins bring death and "the fear of death" (v. 15). He had no sin Himself, and "made reconciliation for the iniquity" of all others (Daniel 9. 24). of the people—"the seed of Abraham" (v. 16); the literal Israel first, and then (in the design of God), through Israel, the believing Gentiles, the spiritual Israel (1 Peter 2. 10). 18. For—Explanation of how His being made like His brethren in all things has made Him a merciful and faithful High Priest for us (v. 17). in that—rather as Greek, "wherein He suffered Himself; having been tempted, He is able to succour them that are being tempted" in the same temptation; and as "He was tempted (tried and afflicted) in all points," He is able (by the power of sympathy) to succour us in all possible temptations and trials incidental to man (ch. 4. 16; 5. 2). He is the anti-typical Solomon, having for every grain of Abraham's seed (which were to be as the sand for number), "largeness of heart even as the sand that is on the sea-shore" (1 Kings 4. 29). "Not only as God He knows our trials, but also as man He knows them by experimental feeling."

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1-19. THE SON OF GOD GREATER THAN MOSES, WHEREFORE UNBELIEF TOWARDS HIM WILL INCUR A HEAVIER PUNISHMENT THAN BEFELL UNBELIEVING ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS. AS MOSES ESPECIALLY WAS

the prophet by whom "God in times past spake to the fathers," being the mediator of the law, Paul deems it necessary now to show that, great as was Moses, the Son of God is greater. EBRARD in ALFORD remarks, The angel of the covenant came in the name of God before Israel; Moses in the name of Israel before God; whereas the high priest came both in the name of God (bearing the name JEHOVAH on his forehead) before Israel, and in the name of Israel (bearing the names of the twelve tribes on his breast) before God (Exodus 28. 9-29, 36, 38). Now Christ is above the angels, according to chs. 1. and 2., because (1.) as Son of God He is higher; and (2.) because manhood, though originally lower than angels, is in Him exalted above them to the lordship of "the world to come," inasmuch as He is at once Messenger of God to men, and also atoning Priest-Representative of men before God (ch. 2. 17, 18). Parallel with this line of argument as to His superiority to angels (ch. 1. 4) runs that which here follows as to His superiority to Moses (ch. 3. 3): (1.) Because as Son over the house, He is above the servant in the house (v. 5, 6), just as the angels were shown to be but ministering (serving) spirits (ch. 1. 14), whereas He is the Son (v. 7, 8); (2.) because the bringing of Israel into the promised rest, which was not finished by Moses, is accomplished by Him (ch. 4. 1-11), through His being not merely a leader and lawgiver as Moses, but also a propitiatory High Priest (ch. 4. 14; 5. 10). 1. Therefore—Greek, "Whence," i. e., seeing we have such a sympathizing Helper you ought to "consider attentively" . . . "contemplate;" fix your eyes and mind on Him with a view to profiting by the contemplation (ch. 12. 2). The Greek word is often used by Luke Paul's companion (Luke 12. 24, 27). brethren—in Christ the common bond of union. partakers—"of the Holy Ghost." heavenly calling—coming to us from heaven, and leading us to heaven whence it comes. Philippians 3. 14, "the high calling;" Greek "the calling above," i. e., heavenly. the Apostle and High Priest of our profession—There is but one Greek article to both nouns, "Him who is at once Apostle and High Priest"—Apostle, as Ambassador (a higher designation than "angel"-messenger) sent by the Father (John 20. 21), pleading the cause of God with us; High Priest, as pleading our cause with God. Both His Apostleship and High Priesthood are comprehended in the one title, Mediator. [BENGEI.] Though the title "Apostle" is nowhere else applied to Christ, it is appropriate here in addressing Hebrews, who used the term of the delegates sent by the high priest to collect the temple tribute from Jews resident in foreign countries, even as Christ was Delegate of the Father to this world far off from Him (Matthew 21. 37). Hence as what applies to Him, applies also to His people, the Twelve are designated His apostles, even as He is the Father's (John 20. 21). It was desirable to avoid designating Him here "angel," in order to distinguish His nature from that of angels mentioned before, though he is "the Angel of the Covenant." The "legate of the Church" (Sheliach Tsibbur) offered up the prayers in the synagogue in the name of all, and for all. So Jesus, "the Apostle of our profession," is delegated to intercede for the Church before the Father. The words "of our profession," mark that it is not of the legal ritual, but of our Christian faith, that He is the High Priest. Paul compares Him as an Apostle to Moses; as High Priest to Aaron. He alone holds both offices combined, and in a more eminent degree than either, which those two brothers held apart. "Profession," or "confession," corresponds to God having spoken to us by His Son, sent as Apostle and High Priest. What God proclaims we confess. 2. He first notes the feature of resemblance between Moses and Christ, in order to conciliate the Hebrew Christians whom He addressed, and who still entertained a very high opinion of Moses; he afterwards brings forward Christ's superiority to Moses. Who was faithful—The Greek implies also that He still is faithful, viz., as our mediating High Priest, faithful to the trust God has assigned Him (ch. 2. 17). So Moses in God's house (Numbers 12. 7). appointed him—"made Him" HIGH PRIEST; to be supplied from the preceding context. Greek, "made;" so in ch. 5. 5; 1 Samuel 12. 6, Margin; Acts 2. 38; so the Greek rathers. Not as ALFORD, with AMBROSE and the Latins, "Created Him," i. e., as man, in His incarnation. The likeness of Moses to Messiah was foretold by Moses himself (Deuteronomy 18. 15). Other prophets only explained Moses, who was in this respect superior to them; but Christ was like Moses, yet superior. 3. For—Assigning the reason why they should "consider" attentively "Christ" (v. 1), highly as they regard Moses who resembled Him in faithfulness (v. 2). was—Greek, "has been." counted worthy of more glory—by God, when He exalted Him to His own right hand. The Hebrew Christians admitted the fact (ch. 1. 13). builded the house—Greek, "inasmuch as He hath more honour than the house, who prepared it," or "established it." [ALFORD.] The Greek verb is used purposely instead of "builded," in order to mark that the building meant is not a literal, but a spiritual house; the Church both of the Old Testament and New Testament; and that the building of such a house includes all the preparations of providence and grace needed to furnish it with "living stones" and fitting "servants." Thus, as Christ the Founder and Establisher (in Old Testament as well as the New Testament) is greater than the house so established, including the servants, He is greater also than Moses, who was but a "servant." Moses, as a servant, is a portion of the house, and less than the house; Christ as the Instrumental Creator of all things, must be God, and so greater than the house of which Moses was but a part. Glory is the result of honour. 4. Some one must be the establisher of every house; Moses was not the establisher of the house, but a portion of it (but He who established all things, and therefore the spiritual house in question, is God). Christ, as being instrumentally the Establisher of all things, must be the Establisher of the house, and so greater than Moses. 5. faithful in all his house—i. e., in all God's house (v. 4). servant—Not here the Greek for "slave," but "a ministering attendant;" marking the high office of Moses towards God, though inferior to Christ, a kind of steward. for a testimony, &c.—in order that he might in his typical institutions give "testimony" to Israel "of the things" of the Gospel "which were to be spoken afterwards" by Christ (ch. 8. 5, 8, 23; 10. 1). 6. But Christ—was and is faithful (v. 2). as a Son over his own house—rather, "over His God's, v. 4) house;" and therefore, as the inference from His being one with God, over His own house. So ch. 10. 21, "Having an High Priest over the house of God." Christ enters His Father's house as the Master [OVER it], but Moses as a servant [IN it, v. 2, 5]. [CHRYSOSTOM.] An ambassador in the absence of the king is very distinguished—in the presence of the king he falls back into the multitude. [BENGEL.] whose house are we—Paul and his Hebrew readers. One old MS., with Vulgate and LUCIFER, reads, "which house;" but the weightiest MSS. support English Version reading. the rejoicing—rather, "the matter of rejoicing." of the hope—"of our hope." Since all our good things lie in hopes, we ought so to hold fast our hopes as already to rejoice, as though our hopes were realized. [CHRYSOSTOM.] firm unto the end—Omitted in LUCIFER and AMBROSE, and in one oldest MS., but supported by most oldest MSS. 7, &c.—Exhortation from Psalm 95., not through unbelief to lose participation in the spiritual house. Wherefore—Seeing that we are the house of God if we hold fast our confidence, &c. (v. 6). Jesus is "faithful," be not ye unfaithful (v. 2, 12). The sentence beginning with "wherefore," interrupted by the parenthesis confirming the argument from Psalm 95., is completed at v. 12, "Take heed," &c. Holy Ghost saith—by the inspired Psalmist; so that the words of the latter are the words of God Himself. To-day—at length; in David's day, as contrasted with the days of Moses in the wilderness, and the whole time since then, during which they had been rebellious against God's voice; as for instance, in the wilderness (v. 8). The Psalm, each fresh time when used in public worship, by "to-day," will mean the particular day when it was, or is, used. hear—obediently. his voice—of grace. 8. Harden not your hearts—This phrase here only is used of man's own act; usually of God's act (Romans 9. 18). When man is spoken of as the agent in hardening, the phrase usually is "harden his neck," or "back" (Nehemiah 9. 17). provocation . . . temptation—Massah-meribah, translated in Margin, "temptation . . . chiding," or "strife" (Exodus 17. 1-7). Both names seem to refer to that one event, the murmuring of the people against the Lord at Rephidim for want of water. The first offence especially ought to be guarded against, and is the most severely reprov'd, as it is apt to produce many more. Numbers 20. 1-13, and Deuteronomy 33. 8, mention a second similar occasion in the wilderness of Sin, near Kadesh, also called Meribah. in the day—Greek, "according to the day of," &c. 9. When—rather, "Where," viz., in the wilderness. your fathers—The authority of the ancients is not conclusive [BENGEL.] tempted me, proved me—The oldest MSS. read, "tempted (me) in the way of testing," i. e., putting (me) to the proof whether I was able and willing to relieve them, not believing that I am so. saw my works forty years—They saw, without being led thereby to repentance, my works of power partly in affording miraculous help, partly in executing vengeance, forty years. The "forty years" joined in the Hebrew and LXX., and below, v. 17, with "I was griev'd," is here joined with "they saw." Both are true; for, during the same forty years that they were tempting God by unbelief, notwithstanding their seeing God's miraculous works, God was being griev'd. The lesson intended to be hinted to the Hebrew Christians is, their "to-day" is to last only between the first preaching of the Gospel and Jerusalem's impending overthrow, viz., FORTY YEARS; exactly the number of years of Israel's sojourn in the wilderness, until the full measure of their guilt having been filled up all the rebels were overthrown. 10. griev'd—displeas'd. Cf. "walk contrary," Leviticus 26. 24, 28. that generation—"that" implies alienation and estrangement. But the oldest MSS. read, "this." said—"griev'd," or "displeas'd," a their first offence. Subsequently when they hardened their heart in unbelief still more, He sware in His wrath (v. 11); an ascending gradation (cf. v. 17, 18). and they have not known—Greek, "But these very persons," &c.; they perceived I was displeas'd with them, yet they, the same persons, did not a whit the more wish to know my ways [BENGEL]; cf. "But they," Psalm 106. 43. not known my ways—not known practically and believ'ingly the ways in which I would have had them go, so as to reach my rest (Exodus 18. 20). 11. So—lit., "as." I swear—BENGEL remarks the oath of God preceded the forty years. not—lit., "If they shall enter, &c. (God do so to me and more also)," 2 Samuel 3. 35. The Greek is the same, Mark 8. 12. my rest—Canaan, primarily, their rest after wandering in the wilderness; still, even when in it, they never fully enjoyed rest; whence it followed, that the threat extended farther than the exclusion of the unbelieving from the literal land of rest, and that the rest promised to the believing in its full blessedness was, and is, yet future: Psalm 25. 13; 37. 9, 11, 22, 29, and Christ's own beatitude (Matthew 5. 5) all accord with this, v. 9. 12. Take heed—to be joined with "wherefore," v. 7. lest there be—Greek (indicative), "lest there shall be;" lest there be, as I fear there is; implying that it is not merely a possible contingency, but that there is ground for thinking it will be so. in any—"in any one of you." Not merely ought all in general be on their guard, but they ought to be so concerned for the safety of each one member, as not to suffer any one to perish through their negligence. [CALVIN.] heart—The heart is not to be trusted. Cf. v. 10, "They do always err in their heart." unbelief—faithlessness. Christ is faithful; therefore, saith Paul to the Hebrews, we ought not to be faithless as our fathers were under Moses. departing—apostatizing. The opposite of "come unto" Him (ch. 4. 16). God punishes such apostates in kind. He departs from them—the worst of woes. the living God—Real: the distinctive characteristic of the God of Israel, not like the lifeless gods of the heathen; therefore One whose threats are awful realities. To apostatize from Christ is to apostatize from the living God (ch. 2. 3). 13. one another—Greek, "yourselves;" let each exhort him self and his neighbour. daily—Greek, "on each day," or "day by day." while it is called To-day—whilst the "to-day" lasts (the day of grace, Luke 4. 21, before the coming of the day of glory and judgment at Christ's coming, ch. 10. 25, 37). To-morrow is the day when idle men work, and fools repent. To-morrow is Satan's to-day; he cares not what good resolutions you form, if only you fix them for to-morrow. lest . . . of you—The "you" is emphatic, as distinguished from "your fathers" (v. 9). "That from among you no one (so the Greek order is in some of the oldest MSS.) be hardened" (v. 8). deceitfulness—causing you to "err in your heart." sin—unbelief. 14. For, &c.—Enforcing the warning, v. 12. partakers of Christ—(Cf. v. 1, 6.) So "partakers of the Holy Ghost" (ch. 6. 4). hold—Greek, "hold fast," the beginning of our confidence—i. e., the confidence (lit., substantial, solid confidence) of faith which we have begun (ch. 8. 11; 12. 2). A Christian so long as he is not made perfect, considers himself as a beginner. [BENGEL.] unto the end—unto the coming of Christ (ch. 12. 2). 15. While it is said—Connected with v. 13, "exhort one another, &c., while it is said To-day:" v. 14, "for we are made partakers," &c., being a parenthesis. "It entirely depends on yourselves that the invitation of the 95th Psalm be not a mere invitation, but also an actual enjoyment." ALFORD translates, "Since (i. e., for) it is said," &c., regarding v. 15 as a proof that we must "hold . . . confidence . . . unto the end," in order to be "partakers of Christ." 16. For some—rather interrogatively, "For who was it that, when they had heard (referring to 'if ye will hear,' v. 15), did provoke (God)?" The "for" implies, Ye need to take heed against unbelief: for, was it not because of unbelief that all our fathers were excluded (Ezekiel 2. 3)? "Some," and "not all," would be a faint way of putting his argument, when his object is to show the universality of the evil. Not merely some, but all the Israelites, for the solitary exceptions, Joshua and Caleb, are hardly to be taken into account in so general a statement. So v. 17, 18, are interrogative: (1.) The beginning of the provocation, soon after the departure from Egypt, is marked in v. 16; (2.) the forty years of it in the wilderness, v. 17; (3.) the denial of entrance into the land of rest, v. 18. Note, cf. 1 Corinthians 10. 5, "with the majority of them God was displeased." howbeit—"Nay (why need I put the question?), was it not all that came out of Egypt?" (Exodus 17. 1, 2)? by Moses—by the instrumentality of Moses as their leader. 17. But—translate, "Moreover," as it is not in contrast to v. 16, but carrying out the same thought. corpses—lit., "limbs," implying that their bodies fell limb from limb. 18. to them that believed not—rather as Greek, "to them that disobeyed." Practical unbelief (Deuteronomy 1. 26). 19. they could not enter—though desiring it.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1-16. THE PROMISE OF GOD'S REST IS FULLY REALIZED THROUGH CHRIST: LET US STRIVE TO OBTAIN IT BY HIM, OUR SYMPATHIZING HIGH PRIEST. 1. Let us . . . fear—not with slavish terror, but godly "fear and trembling" (Philippians 2. 12). Since so many have fallen, we have cause to fear (ch. 8. 17-19). being left us—still remaining to us after the others have, by neglect, lost it. his rest—God's heavenly rest, of which Canaan is the type. "To-day" still continues, during which there is the danger of failing to reach the rest. "To-day," rightly used, terminates in the rest which, when once obtained, is never lost (Revelation 3. 12). A foretaste of the rest is given in the inward rest which the believer's soul has in Christ. should seem to come short of it—Greek, "to have come short of it;" should be found, when the great trial of all shall take place [ALFORD], to have fallen short of attaining the promise. The word "seem" is a mitigating mode of expression, though not lessening the reality. BENGEL and OWEN take it, Lest there should be any semblance or appearance of falling short. 2. Gospel preached . . . unto them—in type: the earthly Canaan, wherein they failed to realize perfect rest, suggesting to them that they should look beyond to the heavenly land of rest, to which faith is the avenue, and from which unbelief excludes, as it did from the earthly Canaan. the word preached—lit., "the word of hearing:" the word heard by them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard—So the Syriac and the Old Latin Versions, older than any of our MSS., and LUCIFER, read, "As the world did not unite with the hearers in faith." The word heard being the food which, as the bread of life, must pass into flesh and blood through man's appropriating it to himself in faith. Hearing alone is of as little value as undigested food in a bad stomach. [THOLUCK.] The whole of oldest extant MS. authority supports a different reading, "unmingled as they were (Greek accusative agreeing with 'them') in faith with its hearers," i. e., with its believing, obedient hearers, as Caleb and Joshua. So "hear" is used for "obey" in the context, v. 7, "To-day, if ye will hear His voice." The disobedient, instead of being blended in "the same body," separated themselves as Korah: a tacit reproof to like separatists from the Christian assembling together (ch. 10. 25; Jude 19). 3. For—Justifying his assertion of the need of "faith," v. 2. we which have believed—we who at Christ's coming shall be found to have believed. do enter—i. e., are to enter: so two of the oldest MSS. and LUCIFER and the old Latin. Two other oldest MSS. read, "Let us enter." into rest—Greek, "into the rest" which is promised in the 95th Psalm. as he said—God's saying that unbelief excludes from entrance implies that belief gains an entrance into the rest. What, however, Paul mainly here dwells on in the quotation is, that the promised "rest" has not yet been entered into. At v. 11 he again, as in ch. 3. 12-19 already, takes up faith as the indispensable qualification for entering it. although, &c.—Although God had finished His works of creation and entered on His rest from creation long before Moses' time, yet under that leader of Israel another rest was promised, which most fell short of through unbelief; and although the rest in Canaan was subsequently attained under Joshua, yet long after, in David's days, God, in the 95th Psalm, still speaks of the rest of God as not yet attained. THEREFORE, there must be meant a rest still future, viz., that which "remaineth for the people of God" in heaven, v. 8-9, when they shall rest from their works, as God did from His, v. 10. The argument is to show that by "my rest," God means a future rest, not for Himself, but for us. finished—Greek, "brought into existence," "made." 4. he spake—God (Genesis 2. 2). God did rest the seventh day—A rest not ending with the seventh day, but beginning then and still continuing, into which believers shall hereafter enter. God's rest is not a rest necessitated by fatigue, nor consisting in idleness, but is that upholding and governing of which creation was the beginning. [ALFORD.] Hence Moses records the end of each of the first six days, but not of the seventh. from all his works—Hebrew, Genesis 2. 2, "from all His work." God's "work" was one, comprehending, however, many "works." 5. in this place—In this passage of the Psalm again, it is implied that the rest was even then still future. 6. it remaineth—still to be realized. some must enter—The denial of entrance to unbelievers is a virtual promise of entrance to those that believe. God wishes not his rest to be empty, but furnished with guests (Luke 14. 23). they to whom it was first preached entered not—lit., "they who first (in the time of Moses) had the Gospel preached to them," viz., in type, as Note, v. 2. unbelief—Greek, rather "disobedience" (Note, ch. 3. 18). 7. Again—Anew the promise recurs. Translate as the Greek order is, "He limited a certain day, 'To-day.'" Here Paul interrupts the quotation by, "In (the Psalm of David saying after so long a time" (after 500 years' possession of Canaan), and resumes it by, "As it has been said before (so the Greek oldest MS., before, viz., ch. 3. 7, 15), To-day if ye hear His voice," &c. [ALFORD.] 8. Answer to the objection which might be made to his reasoning, viz., that those brought into Canaan by Joshua (so "Jesus" here means, as in Acts 7. 45) did enter the rest of God. If the rest of God meant Canaan, God would not after their entrance into that land, have spoken (or speak [ALFORD]) of another (future) day of entering the rest. 9. therefore—because God “speaks of another day” (Note, v. 8). remains—still to be realized hereafter by the “some (who) must enter therein” (v. 6), i. e., “the people of God,” the true Israel who shall enter into God’s rest (“my rest,” v. 8). God’s rest was a Sabbatism, so also will ours be. a rest—Greek, “Sabbatism.” In time there are many Sabbaths, but then there shall be the enjoyment and keeping of a Sabbath rest: one perfect and eternal. The “rest” in v. 8 is Greek “catapausis;” Hebrew, “Noah;” rest from weariness, as the ark rested on Ararat after its tossings to and fro; and as Israel, under Joshua, enjoyed at last rest from war in Canaan. But the “rest” in this v. 9 is the nobler and more exalted (Hebrew) “Sabbath” rest; lit., cessation: rest from work when finished (v. 4), as God rested (Revelation 16. 17). The two ideas of “rest” combined, give the perfect view of the heavenly Sabbath. Rest from weariness, sorrow, and sin; and rest in the completion of God’s new creation (Revelation 21. 5). The whole renovated creation shall share in it; nothing will there be to break the Sabbath of eternity; and the Triune God shall rejoice in the work of His hands (Zephaniah 3. 7). Moses, the representative of the law, could not lead Israel into Canaan: the law leads us to Christ, and there its office ceases, as that of Moses on the borders of Canaan: it is Jesus, the antitype of Joshua, who leads us into the heavenly rest. This verse indirectly establishes the obligation of the Sabbath still; for the type continues until the antitype supersedes it: so legal sacrifices continued till the great antitypical Sacrifice superseded it. As then the antitypical heavenly Sabbath rest will not be till Christ comes, our Gospel Joshua, to usher us into it, the typical earthly Sabbath must continue till then. The Jews call the future rest “the day which is all Sabbath.” 10. For—Justifying and explaining the word “rest,” or “Sabbatism,” just used (Note, v. 9). he that is entered—whosoever once enters. his rest—God’s rest: the rest prepared by God for His people. [ESTIUS.] Rather, His rest: the man’s rest: that assigned to him by God as his. The Greek is the same as that for “his own” immediately after. hath ceased—The Greek aorist is used of indefinite time, “It wont to cease,” or rather, “rest:” rests. The past tense implies at the same time the certainty of it, as also that in this life a kind of foretaste in Christ is already given [GROTIUS] (Jeremiah 6. 16; Matthew 11. 28, 29). Our highest happiness shall, according to this verse, consist in our being united in one with God, and moulded into conformity with Him as our archetype. [CALVIN.] from his own works—even from those that were good and suitable to the time of doing work. Labour was followed by rest even in Paradise (Genesis 2. 3, 15). The work and subsequent rest of God are the archetype to which we should be conformed. The argument is, He who once enters rest, rests from labours; but God’s people have not yet rested from them, therefore they have not yet entered the rest, and so it must be still future. ALFORD translates, “He that entered into his (or else God’s, but rather ‘his;’ Isaiah 11. 10, ‘His rest:’ ‘the joy of the Lord,’ Matthew 25. 21, 23) rest (viz., Jesus, our Forerunner, v. 14; ch. 6. 20, ‘The Son of God that is passed through the heavens:’ in contrast to Joshua the type, who did not bring God’s people into the heavenly rest), he himself (emphatical) rested from his works (v. 4), as God (did) from His own” (so the Greek works). The argument, though generally applying to any one who has entered his rest, probably alludes to Jesus in particular, the antitypical Joshua, who, having entered His rest at the Ascension, has ceased or rested from His work of the new creation, as God on the seventh day rested from the work of physical creation. Not that He has ceased to carry on the work of redemption, nay, He upholds it by His mediation; but He has ceased from those portions of the work which constitute the foundation, the sacrifice has been once for all accomplished. Cf. as to God’s creation rest, once for all completed, and rested from, but now still upheld (Note, v. 4). 11. Let us . . . therefore—Seeing such a promise is before us, which we may, like them, fall short of through unbelief. labour—Greek, “strive diligently.” that rest—which is still future and so glorious. Or, in ALFORD’S translation of v. 10, “That rest into which Christ has entered before” (v. 14; ch. 6. 20), fall—with the soul, not merely the body, as the rebel Israelites fell (ch. 3. 17), after the same example—ALFORD translates, “fall into the same example.” The less prominent place of the “fall” in the Greek favours this. The sense is, “lest any fall into such disobedience (so the Greek for ‘unbelief’ means) as they gave a sample of.” [GROTIUS.] The Jews say, “The parents are a sign (warning) to their sons.” 12. For—Such diligent striving (v. 11) is incumbent on us, FOR we have to do with a God whose “word” whereby we shall be judged, is heart-searching, and whose eyes are all-seeing (v. 13). The qualities here attributed to the word of God, and the whole context, show that it is regarded in its JUDICIAL power, whereby it doomed the disobedient Israelites to exclusion from Canaan, and shall exclude unbelieving so-called Christians from the heavenly rest. The written word of God is not the prominent thought here, though the passage is often quoted as if it were. Still the word of God (the same as that preached, v. 2), used here in the broadest sense, but with special reference to its judicial power, INCLUDES the word of God, the sword of the Spirit with double edge, one edge for convicting and converting some (v. 2), and the other for condemning and destroying the unbelieving (v. 14). Revelation 19. 15 similarly represents the Word’s judicial power as a sharp sword going out of Christ’s mouth to smite the nations. The same word which is saving to the faithful (v. 2) is destroying to the disobedient (2 Corinthians 2. 15, 16). The personal Word, to whom some refer the passage, is not here meant: for He is not the sword, but has the sword. This reference to Joshua appropriately follows in v. 8. quick—Greek, “living;” having living power, as “the rod of the mouth and the breath of the lips” of “the living God.” powerful—Greek, “energetic;” not only living, but energetically efficacious. sharper—“more cutting.” two-edged—sharpened at both edge and back. Cf. “sword of the Spirit . . . word of God” (Ephesians 6. 17). Its double power seems to be implied by its being “two-edged.” “It judges all that is in the heart, for there it passes through, at once punishing [unbelievers] and searching” [both believers and unbelievers]. [CHRYSOSTOM.] PHILO similarly speaks of “God passing between the parts of Abraham’s sacrifices [Genesis 15. 17, where, however, it is a ‘burning lamp’ that passed between the pieces] with His word, which is the cutter of all things: which sword, being sharpened to the utmost keenness, never ceases to divide all sensible things, and even things not perceptible to sense or physically divisible, but perceptible and divisible by the word.” Paul’s early training, both in the Greek schools of Tarsus and the Hebrew schools at Jerusalem, accounts fully for his acquaintance with Philo’s modes of thought, which were sure to be current among learned Jews everywhere, though Philo himself belonged to Alexandria, not Jerusalem. Addressing Jews, he by the Spirit sanctions what was true in their current literature, as he similarly did in addressing Gentiles (Acts 17. 28). piercing—Greek, “coming through.” even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit—i. e., reaching through even to the separation of the animal soul, the lower part of man’s incorporeal nature, the seat of animal desires, which he has in common with the brutes; cf. the same Greek, 1 Corinthians 2. 14, “the natural [animal-souled] man” (Jude 19), from the spirit (the higher part of man, receptive of the Spirit of God, and allying him to heavenly beings). and of the joints and marrow—rather, (reaching even to) “both the joints (so as to divide them) and marrow.” Christ “knows what is in man” (John 2. 25): so His word reaches as far as to the most intimate and accurate knowledge of man’s most hidden parts, feelings, and thoughts, dividing, i. e., distinguishing what is spiritual from what is carnal and animal in him, the spirit from the soul: so Proverbs 20. 27. As the knife of the Levitical priest reached to dividing parts, closely united as the joints of the limbs, and penetrated to the innermost parts, as the marrows (the Greek is plural); so the word of God divides the closely-joined parts of man's immaterial being, soul and spirit, and penetrates to the innermost parts of the spirit. The clause (reaching even to) "both the joints and marrow" is subordinate to the clause, "even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit." (In the oldest MSS., as in English Version, there is no "both," as there is in the clause "both the joints and," &c., which marks the latter to be subordinate.) An image (appropriate in addressing Jews) from the literal dividing of joints, and penetrating to, so as to open out, the marrow, by the priest's knife, illustrating the previously-mentioned spiritual "dividing of soul from spirit," whereby each (soul as well as spirit) is laid bare and "naked" before God; this view accords with v. 13. Evidently "the dividing of the soul from the spirit" answers to the "joints" which the sword, when it reaches unto, divides asunder, as the "spirit" answers to the innermost "marrow." "Moses forms the soul, Christ the spirit. The soul draws with it the body; the spirit draws with it both soul and body." ALFORD's interpretation is clumsy, by which he makes the soul itself, and the spirit itself, to be divided, instead of the soul from the spirit: so also he makes not only the joints to be divided asunder, but the marrow also to be divided (?). The Word's dividing and far-penetrating power, has both a punitive and a healing effect. discerner of the thoughts—Greek, "capable of judging the purposes." intents—rather, "conceptions" [CRELLIUS]; "ideas." [ALFORD.] As the Greek for "thoughts" refers to the mind and feelings, so that for "intents," or rather "mental conceptions," refers to the intellect. 13. creature—visible or invisible. in his sight—in God's sight (v. 12). "God's wisdom, simply manifold, and uniformly multiform, with incomprehensible comprehension, comprehends all things incomprehensible." opened—lit., "thrown on the back so as to have the neck laid bare," as a victim with neck exposed for sacrifice. The Greek perfect tense implies that this is our continuous state in relation to God. "Show, O man, shame and fear towards thy God, for no veil, no twisting, bending, colouring, or disguise, can cover unbelief" (Greek, "disobedience," v. 11). Let us, therefore, earnestly labour to enter the rest lest any fall through practical unbelief (v. 11). 14. having, therefore, &c.—Resuming ch. 2. 17. great—as being "the Son of God, higher than the heavens" (ch. 7. 26): the archetype and antitype of the legal high priest, passed into the heavens—rather, "passed through the heavens," viz., those which come between us and God, the aerial heaven, and that above the latter containing the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, &c. These heavens were the veil which our High Priest passed through into the heaven of heavens, the immediate presence of God, just as the Levitical high priest passed through the veil into the Holy of holies. Neither Moses, nor even Joshua, could bring us into this rest, but Jesus, as our Fore-runner, already spiritually, and hereafter in actual presence, body, soul, and spirit, brings His people into the heavenly rest. Jesus—the antitypical Joshua (v. 8). hold fast—the opposite of "let slip" (ch. 2. 1); and "fall away" (ch. 6. 6). As the genitive follows, the lit. sense is, "Let us take hold of our profession," i. e., of the faith and hope which are subjects of our profession and confession. The accusative follows when the sense is "hold fast." [TITTMANN.] 15. For—The motive to "holding our profession" (v. 14), viz., the sympathy and help we may expect from our High Priest. Though "great" (v. 14), He is not above caring for us; nay, as being in all points one with us as to manhood, sin only excepted, He sympathizes with us in every temptation. Though exalted to the highest heavens, He has changed His place, not His nature and office in relation to us, His condition, but not His affection. Cf. Matthew 26. 38, "Watch with me:" showing His desire in the days of His flesh for the sympathy of those whom He loved: so He now gives His suffering people His sympathy. Cf. Aaron, the type, bearing the names of the twelve tribes in the breastplate of judgment on his heart, when he entered into the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually (Exodus 28. 29). cannot be touched with the feeling of—Greek, "cannot sympathize with our infirmities:" our weaknesses, physical and moral (not sin, but liability to its assaults). He, though sinless, can sympathize with us sinners; His understanding more acutely perceived the forms of temptation than we who are weak men; His will repelled them as instantaneously as the fire does the drop of water cast into it. He, therefore, experimentally knew what power was needed to overcome temptations. He is capable of sympathizing, for He was at the same time tempted without sin, and yet truly tempted. [BENGEL.] In Him alone we have an example suited to men of every character and under all circumstances. In sympathy He adapts himself to each, as if He had not merely taken on Him man's nature in general, but also the peculiar nature of that single individual. but—nay, rather, He was (one) tempted. [ALFORD.] like as we are—Greek, "according to (our) similitude," without sin—Greek choris, "separate from sin" (ch. 7. 26). If the Greek aneu had been used, sin would have been regarded as the object absent from Christ the subject; but choris here implies that Christ, the subject, is regarded as separated from sin the object. [TITTMANN.] Thus, throughout His temptations in their origin, process and result, sin had nothing in him; He was apart and separate from it. [ALFORD.] 16. come—rather as Greek, "approach," "draw near." boldly—Greek, "with confidence," or "freedom of speech" (Ephesians 6. 19). the throne of grace—God's throne is become to us a throne of grace through the mediation of our High Priest at God's right hand (ch. 8. 1; 12. 2). Pleading our High Priest Jesus' meritorious death, we shall always find God on a throne of grace. Contrast Job's complaint (Job 23. 3-8) and Elihu's "If," &c. (Job 33. 23-28). obtain—rather, "receive." mercy—"Compassion," by its derivation (lit., fellow-feeling from community of suffering), corresponds to the character of our High Priest "touched with the feeling of our infirmities" (v. 15). find grace—Corresponding to "throne of grace." Mercy especially refers to the remission and removal of sins; grace, to the saving bestowal of spiritual gifts. [ESTIUS.] Cf. Come unto me . . . and I will give you rest (the rest received on first believing); take my yoke on you . . . and ye shall find rest (the continuing rest and peace found in daily submitting to Christ's easy yoke; the former answers to "receive mercy" here; the latter, to "find grace," Matthew 11. 28, 29). in time of need—Greek, "seasonably." Before we are overwhelmed by the temptation; when we most need it, in temptations and persecutions; such as is suitable to the time, persons, and end designed (Psalm 104. 27). A supply of grace is in store for believers against all exigencies; but they are only supplied with it according as the need arises. Cf. "in due time," Romans 5. 6. Not, as ALFORD explains, "Help in time," i. e., to-day, while it is yet open to us; the accepted time (2 Corinthians 6. 2). help—Cf. ch. 2. 18, "He is able to succour them that are tempted."

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1-14. CHRIST'S HIGH PRIESTHOOD; NEEDED QUALIFICATIONS; MUST BE A MAN; MUST NOT HAVE ASSUMED THE DIGNITY HIMSELF, BUT HAVE BEEN APPOINTED BY GOD; THEIR LOW SPIRITUAL PERCEPTIONS A BAR TO PAUL'S SAYING ALL HE MIGHT ON CHRIST'S MELCHISEDECIK-LIKE PRIESTHOOD. 1. For—Substantiating ch. 4. 15, every—i. e., every legitimate high priest; for instance, the Levitical, as he is addressing Hebrews, among whom the Levitical priesthood was established as the legitimate one. Whatever, reasons Paul, is excellent in the Levitical priests, is also in Christ, and besides excellencies which are not in the Levitical priests, taken from among men—not from among angels, who could not have a fellow-feeling with us men. This qualification Christ has, as being, like the Levitical priests, a man (ch. 2. 14, 16). Being "from men," He can be "for" (i. e., in behalf of, for the good of) men. ordained—Greek, "constituted," "appointed." both gifts—to be joined with "for sins," as "sacrifices" is (the "both . . . and" requires this); therefore not the Hebrew Mincha, unbloody offerings, but animal whole burnt offerings, spontaneously given. "Sacri-

does" are the animal sacrifices due according to the legal ordinance. [RSTIUS.] 2. Who can—Greek, "Being able;" not pleasing himself (Romans 15. 3). have compassion—Greek, "estimate mildly," "feel leniently," or "moderately towards;" "to make allowance for;" not showing stern rigour save to the obstinate (ch. 10. 28). ignorant—sins not committed in resistance of light and knowledge, but as Paul's past sin (1 Timothy 1. 13). No sacrifice was appointed for wilful sin committed with a high hand; for such were to be punished with death; all other sins, viz., ignorances and errors, were confessed and expiated with sacrifices by the high priest. out of the way—not deliberately and altogether wilfully erring, but deluded through the fraud of Satan and their own carnal frailty and thoughtlessness. infirmity—moral weakness which is sinful, and makes men capable of sin, and so requires to be expiated by sacrifices. This kind of "infirmity" Christ had not; He had the "infirmity" of body whereby He was capable of suffering and death. 3. by reason hereof—"on account of this" infirmity. he ought . . . also for himself, to offer for sins—the Levitical priest ought; in this our High Priest is superior to the Levitical. The second "for" is a different Greek term from the first; "in behalf of the people, &c., on account of sins." 4. no man—of any other family but Aaron's, according to the Mosaic law, can take to himself the office of high priest. This verse is quoted by some to prove the need of an apostolic succession of ordination in the Christian ministry; but the reference here is to the priesthood, not the Christian ministry. The analogy in our Christian dispensation would warn ministers, seeing that God has separated them from the congregation of His people to bring them near Himself, and to do the service of His house, and to minister (as He separated the Levites, Korah with his company), that content with this, they should beware of assuming the sacrificial priesthood also, which belongs to Christ alone. The sin of Korah was, not content with the ministry as a Levite, he took the sacerdotal priesthood also. No Christian minister, as such, is ever called Hiericus, i. e., sacrificing priest. All Christians, without distinction, whether ministers or people, have a metaphorical, not a literal, priesthood. The sacrifices which they offer are spiritual, not literal, their bodies and the fruit of their lips, praises continually (ch. 13. 15). Christ alone had a proper and true sacrifice to offer. The law sacrifices were typical, not metaphorical, as the Christian's, nor proper and true, as Christ's. In Roman times the Mosaic restriction of the priesthood to Aaron's family was violated. 5. glorified not himself—did not assume the glory of the priestly office of Himself without the call of God (John 8. 54). but he that said—i. e., the Father glorified Him or appointed Him to the priesthood. This appointment was involved in, and was the result of, the Sonship of Christ, which qualified Him for it. None but the Divine Son could have fulfilled such an office (ch. 10. 5-9). The connection of Sonship and priesthood is typified in the Hebrew title for priests being given to David's sons (2 Samuel 8. 18). Christ did not constitute Himself the Son of God, but was from everlasting the only-begotten of the Father. On His Sonship depended His glorification, and His being called of God (v. 10), as Priest. 6. He is here called simply "Priest;" in v. 5, "High Priest." He is a Priest absolutely, because He stands alone in that character without an equal. He is "High Priest" in respect of the Aaronic type, and also in respect to us, whom He has made priests by throwing open to us access to God. [BENGL.] "The order of Melchisedec" is explained in ch. 7. 15, "the similitude of Melchisedec." The priesthood is similarly combined with His kingly office in Zechariah 6. 13. Melchisedec was at once man, priest, and king. Paul's selecting as the type of Christ one not of the stock of Abraham, on which the Jews prided themselves, is an intimation of Messianic universalism. 7. in the days of his flesh—(Ch. 2. 14; 10. 40.) Verses 7-10 state summarily the subject about to be handled more fully in chs. 7. and 8. when he had offered—rather, "in that He offered." His crying and tears were part of the experimental lesson of obedience which He submitted to learn from the Father (when God was qualitying Him for the high priesthood). "Who is to be constricted with "learned obedience" (or rather as Greek, "His obedience;" the obedience which we all know about). This all shows that "Christ glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest" (v. 5), but was appointed thereto by the Father. prayers and supplications—Greek, "both prayers and supplications." In Gethsemane, where He prayed thrice, and on the cross, where He cried, My God, my God, &c., probably repeating inwardly all the 22d Psalm. "Prayers" refer to the mind: "supplications" also to the body [viz., the suppliant attitude] (Matthew 26. 39). [BENGL.] with strong crying and tears—The "tears" are an additional fact here communicated to us by the inspired apostle, not recorded in the Gospels, though implied. Matthew 26. 37, "sorrowful and very heavy." Mark 14. 33; Luke 22. 44, "in an agony He prayed more earnestly . . . His sweat . . . great drops of blood falling down to the ground." Psalm 22. 1 ("roaring . . . cry"), 2, 19, 21, 24; 69. 3, 10, "I wept." able to save him from death—Mark 14. 36, "All things are possible unto thee" (John 12. 27). His cry showed His entire participation of man's infirmity: His reference of His wish to the will of God, His sinless faith and obedience. heard in that he feared—There is no intimation in Psalm 22, or the Gospels, that Christ prayed to be saved from the mere act of dying. What He feared was the hiding of the Father's countenance. His holy filial love must rightly have shrunk from this strange and bitterest of trials without the imputation of impatience. To have been passively content at the approach of such a cloud would have been, not faith, but sin. The cup of death He prayed to be freed from was, not corporal, but spiritual death, i. e., the (temporary) separation of His human soul from the light of God's countenance. His prayer was "heard" in His Father's strengthening Him so as to hold fast His unswerving faith under the trial (My God, my God, was still His filial cry under it, still claiming God as His, though God hid His face), and soon removing it in answer to His cry during the darkness on the cross, "My God, my God," &c. But see below a further explanation of how He was heard. The Greek lit. is, "Was heard from His fear," i. e., so as to be saved from His fear. Cf. Psalm 22. 21, which well accords with this, "Save me from the lion's mouth (His prayer): thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns." Or what better accords with the strict meaning of the Greek noun. "in consequence of His REVERENTIAL FEAR," i. e., in that He shrunk from the horrors of separation from the bright presence of the Father, yet was reverentially cautious by no thought or word of impatience to give way to a shadow of distrust or want of perfect filial love. In the same sense ch. 12. 28 uses the noun, and ch. 11. 7 the verb. ALFORD somewhat similarly translates, "By reason of His reverent submission." I prefer "reverent fear." The word in derivation means the cautious handling of some precious, yet delicate vessel, which with ruder handling might easily be broken. [TRENCH.] This fully agrees with Jesus' spirit, "If it be possible . . . nevertheless not my will, but thy will be done;" and with the context, v. 5, "Glorified not Himself to be made an High Priest," implying reverent fear: wherein it appears He had the requisite for the office specified v. 4, "No man taketh this honour unto himself." ALFORD well says, What is true in the Christian's life, that what we ask from God, though He may not grant in the form we wish, yet He grants in His own, and that a better form, does not hold good in Christ's case; for Christ's real prayer, "not my will, but thine be done," in consistency with His reverent fear towards the Father, was granted in the very form in which it was expressed, not in another. 8. Though He WAS (so it ought to be translated: a positive admitted fact: not a mere supposition as were would imply) God's Divine Son (whence, even in His agony, He so lovingly and often cried, Father, Matthew 26. 39), yet He learned His (so the Greek) obedience, not from His Sonship, but from His sufferings. As the Son, He was always obedient to the Father's will; but the special obedience needed to qualify Him as our High Priest, He learned experimentally in practical suffering. Cf. Philippians 2. 6-8. "Equal with God, but . . . took upon Him the form of a servant, and became obedient unto death," &c. He was obedient already before His passion, but He stooped to a still more humiliating and trying form of obedience then. The Greek adage is, Pathemata mathemata, "sufferings, disciplinings." Praying and obeying, as in Christ's case, ought to go hand in hand. 9. made perfect—completed, brought to His goal of learning and suffering through death (ch. 2. 10) [ALFORD], viz., at His glorious resurrection and ascension. author—Greek, "cause." unto all . . . that obey him—As Christ obeyed the Father, so must we obey Him by faith. eternal salvation—obtained for us in the short "days of Jesus' flesh" (v. 7; cf. v. 6, "for ever," Isaiah 45. 17). 10. Greek, rather, "Addressed by God (by the appellation) High Priest." Being formally recognized by God as High Priest at the time of His being "made perfect" (v. 9). He was High Priest already in the purpose of God before His passion; but after it, when perfected, He was formally addressed so. 11. Here he digresses to complain of the low spiritual attainments of the Palestinian Christians, and to warn them of the danger of falling from light once enjoyed; at the same time encouraging them by God's faithfulness to persevere. At ch. 6. 20 he resumes the comparison of Christ to Melchisedec. hard to be uttered—rather as Greek, "hard of interpretation to speak." Hard for me to state intelligibly to you owing to your dulness about spiritual things. Hence, instead of saying many things, he writes in comparatively few words (ch. 13. 22). In the "we," Paul, as usual, includes Timothy with himself in addressing them. ye are—Greek, "ye have become dull" (the Greek, by derivation, means hard to move): this implies that once, when first "enlightened," they were earnest and zealous, but had become dull. That the Hebrew believers at JERUSALEM were dull in spiritual things, and legal in spirit, appears from Acts 21. 20-24, where James and the elders expressly say of the "thousands of Jews which believe," that "they are all zealous of the law." This was at Paul's last visit to Jerusalem, after which this Epistle seems to have been written (v. 12, Note on "for the time"). 12. for the time—considering the long time that you have been Christians. Therefore this Epistle was not one of those early written. which be the first principles—Greek, "the rudiments of the beginning of," &c. A Pauline phrase (Notes, Galatians 4. 3, 9). Ye need not only to be taught the first elements, but also "which they be." They are therefore enumerated ch. 6. 1, 2. [BENGEL.] ALFORD translates, "That some one teach you the rudiments;" but the position of the Greek tina, inclines me to take it interrogatively, "which," as English Version, Syriac, Vulgate, &c. of the oracles of God—viz., of the Old Testament: instead of seeing Christ as the end of the Old Testament Scripture, they were relapsing towards Judaism, so as not only not to be capable of understanding the typical reference to Christ of such an Old Testament personage as Melchisedec, but even much more elementary references. are become—through indolence. milk . . . not . . . strong meat—"Milk" refers to such fundamental first principles as he enumerates ch. 6. 1, 2. The solid meat, or food, is not absolutely necessary for preserving life, but is so for acquiring greater strength. Especially in the case of the Hebrews, who were much given to allegorical interpretations of their law, which they so much venerated, the application of the Old Testament types, to Christ and His High Priesthood, was calculated much to strengthen them in the Christian faith. [LIMBORCH.] 13. useth—Greek, "partaketh," i. e., taketh as his portion. Even strong men partake of milk, but do not make milk their chief, much less their sole, diet. the word of righteousness—the Gospel wherein "the righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith" (Romans 1. 17), and which is called "the ministration of righteousness" (2 Corinthians 3. 9). This includes the doctrine of justification and sanctification: the first principles, as well as the perfection, of the doctrine of Christ: the nature of the offices and person of Christ as the true Melchisedec, i. e., "King of righteousness" (cf.

Matthew 3. 15). 14. strong meat—"solid food." by reason of use—Greek, "habit." them . . . of full age—i. e., "perfect:" akin to "perfection" (ch. 6. 1). senses—organs of sense. exercised—similarly connected with "righteousness" in ch. 12. 11. to discern both good and evil—as a child no longer an infant (Isaiah 7. 16): so able to distinguish between sound and unsound doctrine. The mere child puts into its mouth things hurtful and things nutritious, without discrimination: but not so the adult Paul again alludes to their tendency not to discriminate but to be carried about by strange doctrines, in ch. 13. 2.

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 1-14. WARNING AGAINST RETROGRADING, WHICH SOON LEADS TO APOSTASY; ENCOURAGEMENT TO STEADFASTNESS FROM GOD'S FAITHFULNESS TO HIS WORD AND OATH. 1. Therefore—Wherefore: seeing that ye ought not now to be still "babes" (ch. 5. 11-14). leaving—getting further forward than the elementary "principles." "As in building a house one must never leave the foundation: yet to be always labouring in 'laying the foundation' would be ridiculous." [CALVIN.] the principles of the doctrine—Greek, "the word of the beginning," i. e., the discussion of the first principles of Christianity (ch. 5. 12). let us go on—Greek, "let us be borne forward," or "bear ourselves forward:" implying active exertion: press on. St. Paul, in teaching, here classifies himself with the Hebrew readers, or (as they ought to be) learners, and says, Let us together press forward. perfection—the matured knowledge of those who are "of full age" (ch. 5. 14) in Christian attainments. foundation of—i. e., consisting in "repentance." repentance from dead works—viz., not springing from the vital principle of faith and love toward God, and so counted, like their doer, dead before God. This repentance from dead works is therefore paired with "faith toward God." The three pairs of truths enumerated are designedly such as JEWISH believers might in some degree have known from the Old Testament, but had been taught more clearly when they became Christians. This accounts for the omission of distinct specification of some essential first principle of Christian truth. Hence, too, he mentions "faith toward God," and not explicitly faith toward Christ (though of course included). Repentance and faith were the first principles taught under the Gospel. 2. the doctrine of baptism—paired with "laying on of hands," as the latter followed on Christian baptism, and answers to the rite of confirmation in Episcopal churches. Jewish believers passed, by an easy transition, from Jewish baptismal purifications (ch. 9. 10, "washings"), baptism of proselytes, and John's baptism, and legal imposition of hands, to their Christian analogues, baptism, and the subsequent laying on of hands, accompanied by the gift of the Holy Ghost (cf. v. 4). Greek, Baptismoi, plural, including Jewish and Christian baptisms, are to be distinguished from Baptisma, singular, restricted to Christian baptism. The six particulars here specified had been, as it were, the Christian Catechism of the Old Testament; and such Jews who had begun to recognize Jesus as the Christ immediately on the new light being shed on these fundamental particulars, were accounted as having the elementary principles of the doctrine of Christ. [BENGEL.] The first and most obvious elementary instruction of Jews would be the teaching them the typical significance of their own ceremonial law in its Christian fulfilment. [ALFORD.] resurrection, &c.—held already by the Jews from the Old Testament: confirmed with clearer light in Christian teaching or "doctrine." eternal judgment—judgment fraught with eternal consequences either of joy or of woe. 3. will we do—So some of the oldest MSS. read; but others, "Let us do." "This," i. e., "Go on unto perfection." if God permit—For even in the case of good resolutions, we cannot carry them into effect, save through God "working in us both to will and to do" His good pleasure" (Philippians 2. 13). The "for" in v. 1 refers to this: I say, if God permit, for there are cases where God does not permit, ex gr., "it is impossible." 4.

Without God's blessing, the cultivation of the ground does not succeed (v. 7). 4. We must "go on toward perfection;" for if we fall away, after having received enlightenment, it will be impossible to renew us again to repentance, for those—"in the case of those." once enlightened—once for all illuminated by the word of God taught in connection with "baptism" (to which, in v. 2, as once for all done, "once enlightened" here answers), cf. Ephesians 5. 26. This passage probably originated the application of the term "illumination" to baptism in subsequent times. Illumination, however, was not supposed to be the inseparable accompaniment of baptism: thus CHRYSOSTOM says, "Heretics have baptism, not illumination: they are baptized in body, but not enlightened in soul: as Simon Magus was baptized, but not illuminated." That "enlightened" here means knowledge of the word of truth, appears from comparing the same Greek word "illuminated," ch. 10. 32, with 26, where "knowledge of the truth" answers to it. tasted of the heavenly gift—tasted for themselves. As "enlightened" refers to the sense of sight: so here taste follows. "The heavenly gift:" Christ given by the Father, and revealed by the enlightening word preached and written: as conferring peace in the remission of sins; and as the Bestower of the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 8. 19, 20). made partakers of the Holy Ghost—Specified as distinct from, though so inseparably connected with, "enlightened," and "tasted of the heavenly gift," Christ, as answering to "laying on of hands" after baptism, which was then generally accompanied with the impartation of the Holy Ghost in miraculous gifts. 5. tasted the good word of God—Distinct from "tasted OF (genitive) the heavenly gift:" we do not yet enjoy all the fulness of Christ, but only have a taste OF Him, the heavenly gift now; but believers may taste the whole word (accusative) of God already, viz., God's "good word" of promise. The Old Testament promise of Canaan to Israel typified "the good word of God's" promise of the heavenly rest (ch. 4). Therefore, there immediately follows the clause, "the powers of the world to come." As "enlightening" and "tasting of the heavenly gift," Christ, the Bread of Life, answers to FAITH: so "made partakers of the Holy Ghost," to CHARITY, which is the first fruit of the Spirit: and "tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come," to HOPE. Thus the triad of privileges answers to the Trinity, the Father, Son, and Spirit, in their respective works toward us. "The world to come," is the Christian dispensation, viewed especially in its future glories, though already begun in grace here. The world to come thus stands in contrast to course of this world, altogether disorganized because God is not its spring of action and end. By faith, Christians make the world to come a present reality, though but a foretaste of the perfect future. The powers of this new spiritual world, partly exhibited in outward miracles at that time, and then, as now, especially consisting in the Spirit's inward quickening influences, are the earnest of the coming inheritance above, and lead the believer who gives himself up to the Spirit to seek to live as the angels, to sit with Christ in heavenly places, to set the affections on things above, and not on things on earth, and to look for Christ's coming and the full manifestation of the world to come. This "world to come," in its future aspect, thus corresponds to "resurrection of the dead and eternal life" (v. 2), the first Christian principles which the Hebrew believers had been taught, by the Christian light being thrown back on their Old Testament for their instruction (Note, 1, 2). "The world to come," which, as to its "powers," exists already in the redeemed, will pass into a fully realized fact at Christ's coming (Colossians 3. 4). 6. If—Greek, "And (yet) have fallen away;" cf. a less extreme falling or declension, Galatians 5. 4, "Ye are fallen from grace." Here an entire and wilful apostasy is meant; the Hebrews had not yet so fallen away; but he warns them that such would be the final result of retrogression, if, instead of "going on to perfection," they should need to learn again the first principles of Christianity (v. 1). to renew them again—they have been "once" (v. 4) already renewed, or made anew, and now they need to be "renewed" over "again." crucify to themselves the Son of God—"are crucifying to themselves" Christ, instead of, like Paul, crucifying the world unto them by the cross of Christ (Galatians 6. 14). So in ch. 10. 23, "trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith . . . sanctified, an unholy thing." "The Son of God," marking His dignity, shows the greatness of their offence. put him to an open shame—lit., "make a public example of" Him, as if He were a malefactor suspended on a tree. What the carnal Israel did outwardly, those who fall away from light do inwardly, they virtually crucify again the Son of God; "they tear him out of the recesses of their hearts where He had fixed His abode, and exhibit Him to the open scoffs of the world as something powerless and common." [BLEEK in ALFORD.] The Montanists and Novatians used this passage to justify the lasting exclusion from the Church of those who had once lapsed. The Catholic Church always opposed this view, and readmitted the lapsed on their repentance, but did not rebaptize them. This passage implies that persons may be in some sense "renewed," and yet fall away finally; for the words, "renew again," imply that they have been, in some sense, not the full sense, ONCE RENEWED by the Holy Ghost; but certainly not that they are "the elect," for these can never fall away, being chosen unto everlasting life (John 10. 28). The elect abide in Christ, hear and continuously obey His voice, and do not fall away. He who abides not in Christ, is cast forth as a withered branch; but he who abides in Him becomes more and more free from sin; the wicked one cannot touch him; and he by faith overcomes the world. A temporary faith is possible, without one thereby being constituted one of the elect (Mark 4. 16, 17). At the same time it does not limit God's grace, as if it were "impossible" for God to reclaim even such a hardened rebel so as yet to look on Him whom he has pierced. The impossibility rests in their having known in themselves once the power of Christ's sacrifice, and yet now rejecting it; there cannot possibly be any new means devised for their renewal afresh, and the means provided by God's love they now, after experience of them, deliberately and continuously reject; their conscience being seared, and they "twice dead" (Jude 12), are now past hope, except by a miracle of God's grace. "It is the curse of evil eternally to propagate evil." [THOLUCK.] "He who is led into the whole (?) compass of Christian experiences, may yet cease to abide in them; he who abides not in them, was, at the very time when he had those objective experiences, not subjectively true to them; otherwise there would have been fulfilled in him, 'Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance' (Matthew 13. 12), so that he would have abided in them and not have fallen away." [THOLUCK.] Such a one was never truly a Spirit-led disciple of Christ (Romans 8. 14-17). The sin against the Holy Ghost, though somewhat similar, is not identical with this sin; for this sin may be committed by those outside the Church (as in Matthew 12. 24, 31, 32); this, only by those inside. 7. the earth—rather as Greek (no article), "land," which drinketh in—Greek, "which has drunk in;" not merely receiving it on the surface. Answering to those who have enjoyed the privilege of Christian experiences, being in some sense renewed by the Holy Ghost; true alike of those who persevere and those who "fall away." the rain that cometh oft upon it—not merely falling over it, or towards it, but falling and resting upon it so as to cover it (the Greek genitive, not the accusative). The "oft" implies, on God's part, the riches of His abounding grace ("coming" spontaneously, and often); and, on the apostate's part, the wilful perversity whereby he has done continual despite to the oft-repeated motions of the Spirit. Cf. "How often," Matthew 23. 37. The rain of heaven falls both on the elect and the apostates. bringeth forth—as the natural result of "having drunk in the rain." See above. herbs—provender, meet—fit. Such as the master of the soil wishes. The opposite of "rejected," v. 8. by whom—rather as Greek, "for (i. e., on account of) whom," viz., the lords of the soil; not the labourers, as English Version, viz., God and His Christ (i.

Corinthians 3. 9) The heart of man is the earth; man is the dresser; herbs are brought forth meet, not for the dresser, by whom, but for God, the owner of the soil, for whom it is dressed. The plural is general, the owners whosoever they may be; here God, receiveth—"partaketh of." blessing—fruitfulness. Contrast God's curse causing unfruitfulness, Genesis 3, 17, 18; also spiritually (Jeremiah 17. 5-8). from God—Man's use of means is vain unless God bless (1 Corinthians 3. 6, 7). 8. that which—rather as Greek (no article), "But if it (the 'land' v. 7) bear;" not so favourable a word as "bringeth forth," v. 7, said of the good soil. briers—Greek, "thistles." rejected—after having been tested; so the Greek implies. Reprobate . . . rejected by the Lord. nigh unto cursing—on the verge of being given up to its own barrenness by the just curse of God. This "nigh" softens the severity of the previous "It is impossible," &c. (v. 4, 6). The ground is not yet actually cursed. whose—"of which (land) the end is unto burning," viz., with the consuming fire of the last judgment; as the land of Sodom was given to "brimstone, salt, and burning" (Deuteronomy 29. 23); so as to the ungodly (Matthew 3. 10, 12; 7. 19; 13. 30; John 15. 6; 2 Peter 3. 10). Jerusalem, which had so resisted the grace of Christ, was then nigh unto cursing, and in a few years was burned. Cf. Matthew 22. 7, "Burned up their city;" an earnest of a like fate to all wilful abusers of God's grace (ch. 10. 26, 27). 9. we are persuaded—on good grounds; the result of proof. Cf. Romans 15. 14, "I myself am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye are full of goodness." A confirmation of the Pauline authorship of this Epistle. beloved—Appositely here introduced; LOVE to you prompts me in the strong warnings I have just given, not that I entertain unfavourable thoughts of you; nay, I anticipate better things of you, Greek, "the things which are better;" that ye are not thorn-bearing, or nigh unto cursing, and doomed unto burning, but heirs of salvation in accordance with God's faithfulness (ch. 6. 10). things that accompany—Greek, "things that hold by," i. e., are close unto "salvation." Things that are linked unto salvation (cf. v. 19). In opposition to "nigh unto cursing," though—Greek, "if even we thus speak." "For it is better to make you afraid with words, that ye may not suffer in fact." 10. not unrighteous—not unfaithful to His own gracious promise. Not that we have any inherent right to claim reward; for (1.) a servant has no merit, as he only does that which is his bounden duty; (2.) our best performances bear no proportion to what we leave undone; (3.) all strength comes from God; but God has promised of His own grace to reward the good works of His people (already accepted through faith in Christ); it is His promise, not our merits, which would make it unrighteous were He not to reward His people's works. God will be no man's debtor. your work—your whole Christian life of active obedience. labour of love—The oldest MSS. omit "labour of," which probably crept in from 1 Thessalonians 1. 3. As "love" occurs here, so "hope," v. 11, "faith," v. 12; as in 1 Corinthians 13. 13: the Pauline triad. By their love he sharpens their hope and faith. ye have showed—(Cf. ch. 10. 32-34.) toward his name—your acts of love to the saints were done for His name's sake. The distressed condition of the Palestinian Christians appears from the collection for them. Though receiving bounty from other churches, and therefore not able to minister much by pecuniary help, yet those somewhat better off could minister to the greatest sufferers in their Church in various other ways (cf. 2 Timothy 1. 18). St. Paul, as elsewhere, gives them the utmost credit for their graces, whilst delicately hinting the need of perseverance, a lack of which had probably somewhat begun to show itself. 11. And—Greek, "But." desire—Greek, "earnestly desire." The language of fatherly affection, rather than command. every one of you—Implying that all in the Palestinian churches had not shown the same diligence as some of those whom he praises in v. 10. "He cares alike for great and small, and overlooks none." "Every one of them," even those diligent in acts of LOVE v. 10), needed to be stimulated to persevere in the same diligence with a view to the full assurance of HOPE unto the end. They needed, besides love, patient perseverance, resting on hope and faith (ch. 10. 36; 13. 7). Cf. "the full assurance of faith," ch. 10. 22; Romans 4. 21; 1 Thessalonians 1. 5. unto the end—the coming of Christ. 12. be not—Greek, "become not." In ch. 5. 11, he said, "Ye have become dull (Greek, slothful) of hearing;" here he warns them not to become "slothful" absolutely, viz., also in mind and deed. He will not become slothful who keeps always the end in view; hope is the means of ensuring this. followers—Greek, "imitators;" so in Ephesians 5. 1, Greek; 1 Corinthians 11. 1. patience—Greek, "long-suffering endurance." There is the long-suffering patience, or endurance of love, 1 Corinthians 13. 4, and that of faith, v. 15. them who . . . inherit the promises—Greek, ". . . who are inheriting," &c.; to whom the promises are their inheritance. Not that they have actually entered on the perfect inheritance, which ch. 11. 13, 39, 40 explicitly denies, though doubtless the dead in Christ have, in the disembodied soul, a foretaste of it; but "them (enumerated in ch. 11) who in every age have been, are, or shall be, inheritors of the promises;" of whom Abraham is an illustrious example (v. 13). 13. For—Confirming the reasonableness of resting on "the promises" as infailibly sure, resting as they do on God's oath, by the instance of Abraham. "He now gives consolation, by the oath of God's grace, to those whom, in chs. 3. and 4., he had warned by the oath of God's 'wrath'. The oath of wrath did not primarily extend its force beyond the wilderness; but the oath of grace is in force for ever." [BENGE.] 14. multiplying . . . multiply—Hebraism for superabundantly multiply. thee—The increase of Abraham's seed is virtually an increase of himself. The argument here refers to Abraham himself as an example; therefore Paul quotes Genesis 22. 17, "thee," instead of "thy seed." 15. so—thus relying on the promise. 16. for confirmation—not to be joined, as English Version, to "an oath;" but to "an end." [ALFORD.] I prefer, "The oath is to them, in respect to confirmation (of one's solemn promise or covenant; as here, God's), an end of all contradiction" (so the Greek is translated, ch. 12. 3), or "gainsaying." This passage shows, (1.) an oath is sanctioned even in the Christian dispensation as lawful; (2.) that the limits to its use are, that it only be employed where it can put an end to contradiction in disputes, and for confirmation of a solemn promise. 17. Wherein—i. e., Which being the case among men, God, in accommodation to their manner of confirming covenants, superadded to His sure word His oath; the "Two immutable things" (v. 18). willing . . . counsel—Greek, "willing . . . will;" words akin. Expressing the utmost benignity. [BENGE.] more abundantly—than had He not sworn. His word would have been amply enough; but, to make assurance doubly sure, He "interposed with an oath" (so the Greek). Lit., He acted as Mediator, coming between Himself and us, as if He were less, while He swears, than Himself by whom He swears [for the less among men usually swear by the greater]. Dost thou not yet believe, thou that hearest the promise? [BENGE.] heirs of promise—not only Abraham's literal, but also his spiritual, seed (Galatians 3. 29). 18. immutable—translate, as in v. 17, "unchangeable." impossible . . . to lie—"ever to lie;" this is the force of the Greek aorist [ALFORD]. His not being able to deny Himself is a proof, not of weakness, but of strength incomparable. consolation—under doubts and fears, and so "encouragement," lit., exhortation. fled for refuge—as if from a shipwreck. Or, as one fleeing to one of the six cities of refuge. Kadesh, i. e., holy, implies the holiness of Jesus, our Refuge. Shechem, i. e., shoulder, the government is upon his shoulder (Isaiah 9. 6). Hebron, i. e., fellowship, believers are called into the fellowship of Christ. Bezer, i. e., a fortress, Christ is so to all who trust in Him. Ramoth, i. e., high, for Him hath God exalted with His right hand (Acts 5. 31). Goian, i. e., joy, for in Him all the saints are justified and shall glory. lay hold upon the hope—i. e., the object of our hope, as upon a preservative from sinking. set before us—as a prize for which we strive; a new image, viz., the race-course (ch. 12. 1, 2). 19. Hope is found represented on coins by an anchor. sure and steadfast—

more in respect to us; steadfast, or "firm" [ALFORD], in itself. Not such an anchor as will not keep the vessel from tossing, or an anchor unsound or too light. [THEOPHYLACT.] which entereth into that [i. e., the place] within the veil—Two images beautifully combined: I. The soul is the ship: the world the sea; the bliss beyond the world, the distant coast; the hope resting on faith, the anchor which prevents the vessel being tossed to and fro; the encouraging consolation through the promise and oath of God, the cable connecting the ship and anchor. II. The world is the fore-court; heaven, the Holy of holies; Christ, the High Priest going before us, so as to enable us, after Him, and through Him, to enter within the veil. ESTIUS explains, As the anchor does not stay in the waters, but enters the ground hidden beneath the waters, and fastens itself in it, so hope, our anchor of the soul, is not satisfied with merely coming to the vestibule, i. e. is not content with merely earthly and visible goods, but penetrates even to those which are within the veil, viz., to the Holy of holies, where it lays hold on God Himself, and heavenly goods, and fastens on them. "Hope, entering within heaven, hath made us already to be in the things promised to us, even whilst we are still below, and have not yet received them; such strength hope has, as to make those that are earthly to become heavenly." "The soul clings, as one in fear of shipwreck, to an anchor, and sees not whither the cable of the anchor runs—where it is fastened; but she knows that it is fastened behind the veil which hides the future glory." veil—Greek, catapetasma; the second veil which shut in the Holiest place. The outer veil was called by a distinct Greek term, calurisma; "the second (i. e., the inner) veil." 20. The absence of the Greek article requires ALFORD'S translation, "Where, AS forerunner for us (i. e., in our behalf), entered Jesus" [and is now: this last clause is implied in the "where" of the Greek, which implies being in a place: "whither" is understood to "entered," taken out of "where:" whither Jesus entered, and where He is now]. The "for us" implies that it was not for Himself, as God, He needed to enter there, but as our High Priest, representing and introducing us, His followers, opening the way to us, by His intercession with the Father, as the Aaronic high priest entered the Holiest place once a year to make propitiation for the people. The first-fruits of our nature are ascended, and so the rest is sanctified. Christ's ascension is our promotion; and whither the glory of the Head has preceded, thither the hope of the body, too, is called. We ought to keep festival day, since Christ has taken up and set in the heavens the first-fruit of our lump, that is, the human flesh. [CHRYSOSTOM.] As John Baptist was Christ's forerunner on earth, so Christ is ours in heaven.

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1-28. CHRIST'S HIGH PRIESTHOOD AFTER THE ORDER OF MELCHISEDEC SUPERIOR TO AARON'S. 1. this Melchisedec—(Ch. 6. 20; Psalm 110. 4.) The verb does not come till v. 3, "abideth." king . . . priest—Christ unites these offices in their highest sense, and so restores the patriarchal union of these offices. Salem—Jerusalem, i. e., seeing peace; others make Salem distinct, and to be that mentioned (Genesis 33. 18; John 3. 23). the most high God—called also "Possessor of heaven and earth" (Genesis 14. 19, 22). This title of God, "the Most High," handed down by tradition from the primitive revelation, appears in the Phœnician god "Eilon," i. e., Most High. It is used to imply that the God whom Melchisedec served is THE TRUE GOD, and not one of the gods of the nations around. So it is used in the only other cases in which it is found in the New Testament, viz., in the address of the demoniac, and the divining damsel constrained to confess that her own gods were false, and God the only true God. who met Abraham—in company with the king of Sodom (Genesis 14. 17, 18). slaughter—perhaps defeat, as ALFORD translates. So Genesis 14. 17 (cf. 15.) may be translated. Arloch, king of Ellasar, lived and reigned after the disaster [BENGL.] However, if Chedorlaomer, and Amraphel, and Tidal, were slain, though Arloch survived "slaughter of the kings" would be correct. blessed him—as priest he first blessed Abraham on God's part, next he blessed God on Abraham's part: a reciprocal blessing. Not a mere wish, but an authoritative and efficacious intercession as a priest. The Most High God's prerogative as "Possessor of heaven and earth," is made over to Abraham; and Abraham's glory, from his victory over the foe, is made over to God. A blessed exchange for Abraham (Genesis 14. 19, 20). 2. gave—Greek, "apportioned" assigned as his portion. tenth . . . of all—viz., the booty taken. The tithes given are closely associated with the priesthood: the mediating priest received them as a pledge of the giver's whole property being God's; and as he conveyed God's gifts to man (v. 1, "blessed him"), so also man's gifts to God. Melchisedec is a sample of how God preserves, amidst general apostasy, an elect remnant. The meeting of Melchisedec and Abraham is the connecting link between the two dispensations, the patriarchal, represented by Melchisedec, who seems to have been specially consecrated by God as a KING-PRIEST, the highest form of that primitive system in which each father of a household was priest in it, and the Levitical, represented by Abraham, in which the priesthood was to be limited to one family of one tribe and one nation. The Levitical was parenthetical, and severed the kingdom and priesthood; the patriarchal was the true forerunner of Christ's, which, like Melchisedec's, unites the kingship and priesthood, and is not derived from other man, or transmitted to other man; but derived from God, and is transmitted in God to a never-ending perpetuity. Melchisedec's priesthood continueth in Christ for ever. For other points of superiority, see v. 16-21. Melchisedec must have had some special consecration above the other patriarchs, as Abraham, who also exercised the priesthood, else Abraham would not have paid tithe to him as to a superior: his peculiar function seems to have been, by God's special call, KING-priest; whereas no other patriarch-priest was also a God-consecrated king. first being—Paul begins the mystical explanation of the historical fact (allegorical explanations being familiar to Jews), by mentioning the significancy of the name. righteousness—not merely righteous: so Christ. Hebrew Malchi means king: Tzedek, righteousness. King of Salem—not only his own name, but that of the city which he ruled, had a typical significance, viz., peace. Christ is the true Prince of peace. The peace which He brings is the fruit of righteousness. 3. Without father, &c.—Explained by "without genealogy" (so the Greek is for "without descent"), cf. v. 3, i. e., his genealogy is not known; whereas a Levitical priest could not dispense with the proof of his descent. having neither beginning of days nor end of life—viz., history not having recorded his beginning nor end, as it has the beginning and end of Aaron. The Greek idiom expressed by "without father," &c., one whose parentage was humble or unknown. "Days" mean his time of discharging his function. So the eternity spoken of in Psalm 110. 4 is that of the priestly office chiefly. made like—it is not said that he was absolutely "like." Made like, viz., in the particulars here specified. Nothing is said in Genesis of the end of his priesthood, or of his having had in his priesthood either predecessor or successor, which, in a typical point of view, represents Christ's eternal priesthood, without beginning or end. Aaron's end is recorded; Melchisedec's not: typically significant. "The Son of God" is not said to be made like unto Melchisedec, but Melchisedec to be "made like the Son of God." When ALFORD denies that Melchisedec was made like the Son of God in respect of his priesthood, on the ground that Melchisedec was prior in time to our Lord, he forgets that Christ's eternal priesthood was an archetypal reality in God's purpose from everlasting, to which Melchisedec's priesthood was "made like" in due time. The Son of God is the more ancient, and is the archetype: cf. ch. 8. 5, where the heavenly things are represented as the primary archetype of the Levitical ordinances. The epithets, "without father, &c., beginning of days nor end, abideth continually," belong to

Melchisedec only in respect to his priesthood, and in so far as he is the type of the Son of God, and are strictly true of Him alone. Melchisedec was, in his priesthood, "made like" Christ, as far as the imperfect type could represent the lineaments of the perfect archetype. "The portraits of a living man can be seen on the canvas, yet the man is very different from his picture." There is nothing in the account, Genesis 14., to mark Melchisedec as a superhuman being: he is classed with the other kings in the chapter as a living historic personage: not as ORIGEN thought, an angel; nor as the Jews thought, Shem, son of Noah; nor as CALMET, Enoch; nor as the Melchisedekites, that he was the Holy Ghost; nor as others, the Divine Word. He was probably of Shemitic, not Canaanite origin: the last independent representative of the original Shemitic population, which had been vanquished by the Canaanites, Ham's descendants. The greatness of Abraham then lay in hopes: of Melchisedec, in present possession. Melchisedec was the highest and last representative of the Noahic covenant, as Christ was the highest and ever-enduring representative of the Abrahamic. Melchisedec, like Christ, unites in himself the kingly and priestly offices, which Abraham does not. ALFORD thinks the epithets are, in some sense, strictly true of Melchisedec himself; not merely in the typical sense given above; but that he had not, as mortal men have, a beginning or end of life (?). A very improbable theory, and only to be resorted to in the last extremity, which has no place here. With Melchisedec, whose priesthood probably lasted a long period, the priesthood and worship of the true God in Canaan ceased. He was first and last king-priest there, till Christ, the antitype; and therefore his priesthood is said to last for ever, because it both lasts a long time, and lasts as long as the nature of the thing itself (viz., his life, and the continuance of God's worship in Canaan) admits. If Melchisedec were high priest for ever in a literal sense, then Christ and he would now still be high priests, and we should have two instead of one (!). THOLUCK remarks, "Melchisedec remains in so far as the type remains in the antitype, in so far as his priesthood remains in Christ." The father and mother of Melchisedec, as also his children, are not descended from Levi, as the Levitical priests (v. 6) were required to be, and are not even mentioned by Moses. The wife of Aaron, Elisheba, the mother from whom the Levitical priests spring, is mentioned: as also Sarah, the original mother of the Jewish nation itself. As man, Christ had no father; as God, no mother. 4. consider—not merely see, but weigh with attentive contemplation, the fact. also—"To whom (as his superior) Abraham even paid tithe (went so far as to pay tithe) of (consisting of, lit., from) the best of the spoils" (lit., the top of the heap; whether of corn, the first-fruits of which, taken from the top, used to be consecrated to God; or of spoils, from the top of which the general used to take some portion for consecration to God, or for his own use). He paid "tithes of ALL," and those tithes were taken out of the topmost and best portion of the whole spoils. the patriarch—in the Greek emphatically standing at the end of the whole sentence: And this payer of tithe being no less a personage man "the patriarch," the first forefather and head of our Jewish race and nation. See Note, v. 3, on Melchisedec's superiority as specially consecrated king-priest, above the other patriarch-priests. 5. sons of Levi—viz., those alone who belonged to the family of Aaron, to whom the priesthood was restricted. Tithes originally paid to the whole tribe of Levi, became at length attached to the priesthood, according to the law—sanctioned by Jehovah (ch. 8. 19). of their brethren—with whom, in point of natural descent, they are on a level. though, &c.—though thus on a level by common descent from Abraham, they yet pay tithe to the Levites, whose brethren they are. Now the Levites are subordinate to the priests; and these again to Abraham, their common progenitor; and Abraham to Melchisedec. "How great" (v. 4) then, must this Melchisedec be in respect to his priesthood, as compared with the Levitical, though the latter received tithes! and how unspcakably great must "the Son of God" be, to whom, as the sacerdotal archetype (in God's purpose) Melchisedec was made like! Thus compare the "consider," v. 4, in the case of Melchisedec, the type, with the "consider" (Greek, contemplate attentively, Note, ch. 8. 1, a stronger word than here) in the case of Christ, the archetype. 6. he whose descent is not counted from them—not from "the sons of Levi," as those "who receive the priesthood." This verse explains "without descent" (Greek genealogy in both verses, v. 3). He who needs not as the Levitical priests, to be able to trace his genealogy back to Levi. received—Greek, "hath received tithes," blessed—Greek, "hath blessed." The perfect tense implies that the significance of the fact endures to the present time. him that had—"the possessor of the promises," Abraham's peculiar distinction and designation. Paul exalts Abraham in order still more to exalt Melchisedec. When Christ is the subject, the singular "promise" is used. "The promises" in the plural, refer to God's promise of greatness to himself and his seed, and of the possession of Canaan, twice repeated before the blessing of Melchisedec. As the priests, though above the people (v. 7) whom it was their duty to "bless," were yet subordinate to Abraham; and as Abraham was subordinate to Melchisedec, who blessed him, Melchisedec must be much above the Levitical priests. 7. The principle that the blesser is superior to him whom he blesses, holds good only in a blessing given with Divine authority; not merely a prayerful wish, but one that is divinely efficient in working its purport, as that of the patriarchs on their children; so Christ's blessing, Luke 24. 51; Acts 3. 26. 8. Second point of superiority: Melchisedec's is an enduring, the Levitical a transitory, priesthood. As the law was a parenthesis between Abraham's dispensation of promise of grace, and its enduring fulfilment at Christ's coming (Romans 5. 20, Greek, "The law entered as something adventitious and by the way"): so the Levitical priesthood was parenthetical and temporary, between Melchisedec's typically-enduring priesthood, and its antitypical realization in our ever-continuing High Priest, Christ. here—in the Levitical priesthood. there—in the priesthood after the order of Melchisedec. In order to bring out the typical parallel more strongly, Paul substitutes He of whom it is witnessed that he liveth, for the more untypical, "He who is made like to Him that liveth." Melchisedec "liveth" merely in his official capacity, his priesthood being continued in Christ. Christ, on the other hand, is, in His own person, "ever-living after the power of an endless life" (v. 16, 25). Melchisedec's death not being recorded, is expressed by the positive term "liveth," for the sake of bringing into prominence the antitype, Christ, of whom alone it is strictly and perfectly true, "that He liveth." 9. as I may so say—to preclude what he is about to say being taken in the mere literal sense; I may say that, virtually, Levi, in the person of his father Abraham, acknowledged Melchisedec's superiority, and paid tithes to him. who receiveth tithes—(Cf. v. 5.) in Abraham—Greek, "by means of (by the band of) Abraham:" through Abraham. "Paid tithes," lit., "hath been tithed," i. e., been taken tithes of. 10. in the loins of his father—i. e., forefather Abraham. Christ did not, in this sense, pay tithes in Abraham, for He never was in the loins of an earthly father. [ALFORD,] Though, in respect to His mother, He was "of the fruit of (David's, and so of) Abraham's loins," yet, being supernatural, without human father, conceived, as He is above the natural law of birth, so is He above the law of tithes. Those alone born in the natural way, and so in sin, being under the curse, needed to pay tithe to the priest, that he might make propitiation for their sin. Not so Christ, who derived only his flesh, not also the taint of the flesh, from Abraham. BENJEL remarks, The blessings which Abraham had before meeting Melchisedec were the general promises, and the special one of a natural seed, and so of Levi; but the promises under which Christ was comprehended, and the faith for which Abraham was so commended, followed after Abraham's meeting Melchisedec, and being blessed by him: to which fact Genesis 14. 1, "After these things," calls our attention thus explains why Christ, the supernatural seed, is not included as paying tithes through Abraham to Melchisedec. 11. perfection—absolute: “the bringing of man to his highest state, viz., that of salvation and sanctification.” under it—The reading in the oldest MSS. is, “Upon it (i. e., on the ground of it as the basis, the priest having to administer the law, Malachi 2:7; it being presupposed) the people (ch. 9:19, ‘all the people’) hath received the law” (the Greek is perfect, not aorist; implying the people was still observing the law). what further need—(Ch. 8:7.) For God does nothing needless. another—rather as Greek, “that a different priest (one of a different order) should arise” (anew, v. 15). not be called—Greek, “not be said (to be) after the order of Aaron,” i. e., that, when spoken of in the Psalm 110:4, “He is not said to be (as we should expect, if the Aaronic priesthood was perfect) after the order of Aaron.” 12. For—The reason why Paul presses the words “after the order of Melchisedec” in Psalm 110:4, viz., because these presuppose a change or transference of the priesthood, and this carries with it a change also of the law (which is inseparably bound up with the priesthood, both stand and fall together, v. 11). This is his answer to those who might object, What need was there of a new covenant? 13. Confirming the truth that a change is made of the law (v. 12), by another fact showing the distinctness of the new priesthood from the Aaronic. these things—(Psalm 110:4)—pertaineth—Greek, “hath partaken of” (the perfect tense implies the continuance still of His manhood). another—“a different tribe” from that of Levi. 14. evident—lit., “manifest before the eyes” as a thing indisputable; a proof that whatever difficulties may now appear, then Jesus Christ’s genealogy laboured under none. our Lord—the only place where this now common title occurs without “Jesus,” or “Christ,” except 2 Peter 3:15. sprang—as a plant, and a branch. Judah—Genesis 49:10; Luke 1:27, 89 (Hebron of Judah, where Lightfoot thinks Jesus was conceived); 2:4, 5; Revelation 5:5. of which tribe . . . priesthood—“in respect to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priests” (so the oldest MSS. read, nothing to imply that priests were to be taken from it). 15. Another proof that the law, or economy, is changed, viz., forasmuch as Christ is appointed Priest, ‘not according to the law of a carnal (i. e., a mere outward) commandment,” but “according to the power of an indissoluble (so the Greek) life.” The 110th Psalm appoints Him “for ever” (v. 17). The Levitical law required a definite carnal descent. In contrast stands “the power;” Christ’s spiritual, inward, living power of overcoming death. Not agreeably to a statute is Christ appointed, but according to an inward living power. it—the change of the law or economy, the statement (v. 12, 18). far more—Greek, “more abundantly.” for that—“seeing that,” lit., “ψ,” so Romans 5:10. after the similitude of Melchisedec—answering to “after the order of Melchisedec” (ch. 5:10). The “order” cannot mean a series of priests, for Melchisedec neither received his priesthood from, nor transmitted it to, any other mere man; it must mean “answering to the office of Melchisedec.” Christ’s priesthood is similar to Melchisedec’s in that it is “for ever” (v. 16, 17). another—rather as Greek, “a different.” 16. carnal . . . endless—mutually contrasted. As “form” and “power” are opposed, 2 Timothy 3:5; so here “the law” and “power,” cf. Romans 8:3, “The law was weak through the flesh;” and v. 18, “weakness.” “The law” is here not the law in general, but the statute as to the priesthood. “Carnal,” as being only outward and temporary, is contrasted with “endless,” or, as Greek, “indissoluble.” Commandment is contrasted with “life.” The law can give a commandment, but it cannot give life (v. 19). But our High Priest’s inherent “power,” now in heaven, has in Him “life for ever;” ch. 9:14, “through the eternal Spirit;” ch. 7:25, “able” . . . “ever liveth” (John 5:26). It is in the power of His resurrection life, not of His earthly life, that Christ officiates as a Priest. 17. For—Proving His life to be “endless” or indissoluble (v. 16). The emphasis is on “for ever.” The oldest MSS. read, “He is testified of, that Thou art,” &c. 18. there is—Greek, “there takes place,” according to Psalm 110:4. disannulling—a repealing. of the commandment—ordaining the Levitical priesthood. And, as the Levitical priesthood and the law are inseparably joined, since the former is repealed, the latter is so also (Note, v. 11). going before—the legal ordinance introducing and giving place to the Christian, the antitypical and permanent end of the former. weakness and unprofitableness—The opposite of “power” (v. 16). 19. For, &c.—Justifying his calling the law weak and unprofitable (v. 18). The law could not bring men to true justification or sanctification before God, which is the “perfection” that we all need in order to be accepted of Him, and which we have in Christ. nothing—not merely “no one,” but “nothing.” The law brought nothing to its perfected end; everything in it was introductory to its antitype in the Christian economy, which realizes the perfection contemplated; cf. “unprofitableness,” v. 18. Did—rather connect with v. 18, thus, “There takes place (by virtue of Psalm 110:4) a repealing of the commandment (on the one hand), but (on the other) a bringing in afterwards (the Greek expresses that there is a bringing in of something over and above the law; a super-inducing, or accessions of something new, viz., something better than the good things which the pre-existing law promised [WAHL] of a better hope,” not one weak and unprofitable, but, as elsewhere the Christian dispensation is called, “everlasting,” “true,” “the second,” “more excellent,” “different,” “living,” “new,” “to come,” “perfect.” Cf. ch. 8:6, bringing us near to God, now in spirit, hereafter both in spirit and in body. we draw nigh unto God—the sure token of “perfection.” Weakness is the opposite of this filial confidence of access. The access through the legal sacrifices was only symbolical and through the medium of a priest; that through Christ is immediate, perfect, and spiritual. 20. Another proof of the superiority of Christ’s Melchisedec-like priesthood: the oath of God gave a solemn weight to it which was not in the law-priesthood, which was not so confirmed. he was made Priest—rather supply from v. 22, which completes the sentence begun in this verse, v. 21 being a parenthesis. “Inasmuch as not without an oath He was made surety of the testament (for, &c.), of so much better a testament hath Jesus been made the surety.” 21. Translate in the Greek order, “For they indeed (the existing legal priests) without the (solemn) promise on oath (so the Greek [TITTMANN]) are made priests.” by him—God, unto him—the Lord, the Son of God (Psalm 110:1). not repent—never change His purpose. after the order of Melchisedec—Omitted in some oldest MSS., contained in others. 22. surety—ensuring in His own person the certainty of the covenant to us. This He did by becoming responsible for our guilt, by sealing the covenant with His blood, and by being openly acknowledged as our triumphant Saviour by the Father, who raised Him from the dead. Thus He is at once God’s surety for man, and man’s surety for God, and so Mediator between God and man (ch. 8:6). better—Ch. 8:6; 13:20, “everlasting.” testament—sometimes translated “covenant.” The Greek term implies that it is appointed by God, and comprises the relations and bearings partly of a covenant, partly of a testament: (1.) the appointment made without the concurrence of a second party, of somewhat concerning that second party; a last will or testament, so in ch. 9:16, 17; (2.) a mutual agreement in which both parties consent. 23. Another proof of superiority; the Levitical priests were many, as death caused the need of continually new ones being appointed in succession. Christ dies not, and so hath a priesthood which passes not from one to another. were—Greek, “are made.” many—one after another; opposed to His “unchangeable (that does not pass from one to another) priesthood” (v. 24). not suffered to continue—Greek, “hindered from permanently continuing,” viz., in the priesthood. 24. he—emphatic; Greek, Himself So in Psalm 110:4, “Thou art a priest;” singular, not priests, “many.” continueth—Greek, simple verb, not the compound as in v. 23. “Remaineth,” viz., in life. unchangeable—Greek, “hath His priesthood unchangeable;” not passing from one to another, intransmissible.

Therefore no earthly so-called apostolic succession of priests are His vicegerents. The Jewish priests had successors in office, because "they could not continue by reason of death." But this man, because He liveth ever, hath no successor in office, not even Peter (1 Peter 5. 1). 25. Wherefore—Greek, "Whence;" inasmuch as "He remaineth for ever." also—as a natural consequence flowing from the last, at the same time a new and higher thing. [ALFORD.] save—His very name JESUS (v. 22) meaning Saviour—to the uttermost—altogether, perfectly, so that nothing should be wanting afterwards for ever. [TITTMANN.] It means "in any wise," "utterly," in Luke 13. 11. come unto God—by faith. by him—through Him as their mediating Priest, instead of through the Levitical priests. seeing he ever liveth—resuming "He continueth ever," v. 24; therefore "He is able to the uttermost;" He is not, like the Levitical priest, prevented by death, for "He ever liveth" (v. 23). to make intercession—There was but the one offering on earth once for all. But the intercession for us in the heavens (v. 26) is ever continuing, whence the result follows, that we can never be separated from the love of God in Christ. He intercedes only for those who come unto God through Him, not for the unbelieving world (John 17. 9). As samples of His intercession, cf. the prophetical descriptions in the Old Testament. "By an humble omnipotency (for it was by His humiliation that He obtained all power), or omnipotent humility, appearing in the presence, and presenting His postulations at the throne of God. [BISHOP PEARSON.] He was not only the offering, but the priest who offered it. Therefore, He has become not only a sacrifice, but an intercessor; His intercession being founded on His voluntary offering of Himself without spot to God. We are not only then in virtue of His sacrifice forgiven, but in virtue of the intercession admitted to favour and grace. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] 26. such—as is above described. The oldest MSS. read, "also." "For to us (as *sinner*s; emphatical) there was also becoming (besides the other excellencies of our High Priest) such an High Priest." holy—pious—a distinct Greek word from that for holy, which latter implies consecration towards God; perfectly answering God's will in reverent piety (Psalm 16. 10). harmless—lit., "free from evil" and guile, in relation to Himself. undefiled—not defiled by stain contracted from others, in relation to men. Temptation, to which He was exposed, left no trace of evil in Him. separate—rather, "separated from sinners," viz., in His heavenly state as our High Priest above, after He had been parted from the earth, as the Levitical high priest was separated from the people in the sanctuary (whence he was not to go out), Leviticus 21. 12. Though justifying through faith the ungodly, He hath no contact with them as such. He is lifted above our sinful community, being "made higher than the heavens," at the same time that He makes believers as such (not as sinners), "to sit together (with Him) in heavenly places" (Ephesians 2. 6). Just as Moses on the mount was separated from and above the people, and alone with God. This proves Jesus is God. "Though innumerable lies have been forged against the venerable Jesus, none dared to charge Him with any intemperance." [ORIGEN.] made—Jesus was higher before (John 17. 5), and as the God-MAN was made so by the Father after His humiliation (cf. ch. 1. 4). higher than the heavens—for "He passed through (so the Greek) the heavens" (ch. 4. 14). 27. daily—"day by day." The priests daily offered sacrifices (ch. 9. 6; 10. 11; Exodus 29. 38-42). The high priests took part in these daily-offered sacrifices only on festival days; but as they represented the whole priesthood, the daily offerings are here attributed to them; their exclusive function was to offer the atonement "once every year" (ch. 9. 7), and "year by year continually" (ch. 10. 1). The "daily" strictly belongs to Christ, not to the high priests, "who needeth not daily, as those high priests (year by year, and their subordinate priests daily), to offer," &c. offer up—The Greek term is peculiarly used of sacrifices for sin. The high priest's double offering on the day of atonement, the bullock for himself, and the goat for the people's sins had its counterpart in the two lambs offered daily by the ordinary priests. this he did—not "died first for His own sins ~~and~~ then the people's," but for the people's only. The negation is twofold: He needeth not to offer (1) daily; nor (2) to offer for His own sins also; for He offered Himself a spotless sacrifice (v. 26; ch. 4. 15). The sinless alone could offer for the sinful. once—rather as Greek, "once for all." The sufficiency of the one sacrifice to atone for all sins for ever, resulted from its absolute spotlessness. 28. For—Reason for the difference stated in v. 27, between His one sacrifice and their oft-repeated sacrifices, viz., because of His entire freedom from the sinful infirmity to which they are subject. He needed not, as they, to offer for His own sin; and being now exempt from death and "perfected for evermore," He needs not to REPEAT His sacrifice. the word—"the word" confirmed by "the oath," which—which oath was after the law, viz., in Psalm 110. 4, abrogating the preceding law-priesthood. the son—contrasted with "men." consecrated—Greek, "made perfect" once for all, as in ch. 2. 10; 5. 9, Notes. Opposed to "having infirmity," As consecrated as a perfected priest by His perfected sacrifice, and consequent anointing and exaltation to the right hand of the Father.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1-13. CHR. ST, THE HIGH PRIEST IN THE TRUE SANCTUARY, SUPERSADING THE LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD; THE NEW RENDERS OBSOLETE THE OLD COVENANT. 1. the sum—rather, "the principal point;" for the participle is present, not past, which would be required if the meaning were "the sum." "The chief point in (or, 'in the case,' so the Greek, ch. 9. 10, 15, 17) the things which we are speaking," lit., "which are being spoken." such—so transcendently pre-eminent, viz., in this respect, that "He is set on the right hand of," &c. Infinitely above all other priests in this one grand respect, He exercises His priesthood IN HEAVEN, not in the earthly "holiest place" (ch. 10. 12). The Levitical high priests, even when they entered the Holiest place once a year, only stood for a brief space before the symbol of God's throne; but Jesus sits on the throne of the Divine Majesty in the heaven itself, and this for ever (ch. 10. 11, 12). 2. minister—The Greek term implies priestly ministry in the temple. the sanctuary—Greek, "the holy places;" the Holy of holies. Here the heavenly sanctuary is meant. the true—the archetypal and antitypical, as contrasted with the typical and symbolical (ch. 9. 24). Greek alethinos (used here) is opposed to that which does not fulfil its idea, as for instance, a type; alethes, to that which is untrue and unreal, as a lie. The measure of alethes is reality; that of alethinos, ideality. In alethes the idea corresponds to the thing; in alethinos, the thing to the idea. [KALMIS in ALFORD.] tabernacle—(Ch. 9. 11.) His body. Through His glorified body as the tabernacle, Christ passes into the heavenly "Holy of holies," the immediate immaterial presence of God, where He intercedes for us. This tabernacle in which God dwells, is where God in Christ meets us who are "members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones." This tabernacle answers to the heavenly Jerusalem, where God's visible presence is to be manifested to His perfected saints and angels, who are united in Christ the Head; in contradistinction to His personal invisible presence in the Holy of holies unapproachable save to Christ. John 1. 14, "Word . . . dwelt among us," Greek, "tabernacled." pitched—Greek, "fixed" firmly. not man—as Moses (1. 5). 3. For—Assigning his reason for calling him "minister of the sanctuary" (v. 2). somewhat—He does not offer again His once for all completed sacrifice. But as the high priest did not enter the Holy place without blood, so Christ has entered the heavenly Holy place with His own blood. That "blood of sprinkling" is in heaven. And is thence made effectual to sprinkle believers as the end of their election (1 Peter 1. 2). The term "consecrate" as a priest, is lit., to fill the hand, implying that an offering is given into the hands of the priest, which it is his duty to present to God. If a man be a priest, he must have some gift in his hands to offer. Therefore, Christ, as a priest, has His blood as His oblation to offer before God

4. Implying that Christ's priestly office is exercised in heaven, not in earth; in the power of His resurrection life, not of His earthly life. For—The oldest MSS. read, "accordingly then." If, &c.—"if He were on earth, He would not even (so the Greek) be a priest" (cf. ch. 7. 13, 14); therefore, certainly, could not exercise the high priestly function in the earthly Holy of holies. seeing that, &c.—"since there are" already, and exist now (the temple service not yet being set aside, as it was on the destruction of Jerusalem), "those (the oldest MSS. omit 'priests') who offer the (appointed) gifts according to (the) law." Therefore, His sacerdotal "ministry" must be "in the heavens," not on earth (v. 1). "If His priesthood terminated on the earth, He would not even be a priest at all." [BENGEL.] I conceive that the denial here of Christ's priesthood on earth, does not extend to the sacrifice on the cross which He offered as a priest on earth; but applies only to the crowning work of His priesthood, the bringing of the blood into the Holy of holies, which He could not have done in the earthly Holy of holies, as not being an Aaronic priest. The place (the heavenly Holy of holies) was as essential to the atonement being made as the oblation (the blood). The body was burnt without the gate; but the sanctification was effected by the presentation of the blood within the sanctuary by the high priest. If on earth, He would not be a priest in the sense of the law of Moses ("according to the law" is emphatic). 5. Who—viz., the priests. serve unto the example—not "after the example," as BENGEL explains. But as in ch. 13. 10, "serve the tabernacle," i. e., do it service: so "serve (the tabernacle which is but) the outline and shadow." The (Greek for "example" is here taken for the sketch, copy, or suggestive representation of the heavenly sanctuary, which is the antitypical reality and primary archetype. "The mount" answers to heaven, ch. 12. 22. admonished—The Greek especially applies to Divine responses and commands. to make—perfectly: so the Greek. See—Take heed; accurately observing the pattern, that so thou mayest make, &c. saith he—God. the pattern—an accurate representation, presented in vision to Moses, of the heavenly real sanctuary. Thus the earthly tabernacle was copy of a copy; but the latter accurately representing the grand archetypal original in heaven (Exodus 25. 40). 6. now—not time; but "as it is." more excellent ministry—than any earthly ministry. by how much—in proportion as. Mediator—Coming between us and God, to carry into effect God's covenant with us. "The messenger (angel) of the covenant," which—Greek, "one which" [ALFORD]: inasmuch as being one which, &c. established—Greek, "enacted as a law." So Romans 3. 27, "law of faith;" and 8. 2; 9. 31, apply "law" to the Gospel covenant. It is implied hereby, the Gospel is founded on the law, in the spirit and essence of the latter. upon—resting upon. better promises—enumerated v. 10, 11. The Old Testament promises were mainly of earthly, the New Testament promises, of heavenly blessings: the exact fulfilment of the earthly promises was a pledge of the fulfilment of the heavenly. "Like a physician who prescribes a certain diet to a patient, and then when the patient is beginning to recover, changes the diet, permitting what he had before forbidden; or as a teacher gives his pupil an elementary lesson at first, preparatory to leading him to a higher stage:" so RABBI ALBO in his Ikkarim. Cf. Jeremiah 7. 21, 22, which shows that God's original design in the old covenant ritual system was, that it should be pedagogical, as a schoolmaster leading and preparing men for Christ. 7. Same reasoning as in ch. 7. 11. faultless—perfect in all its parts, so as not to be found fault with as wanting anything which ought to be there: answering all the purposes of a law. The law in its morality was blameless, Greek amomos; but in saving us it was defective, and so not faultless, Greek amemptos. should no place have been sought—as it has to be now; and as it is sought in the prophecy (v. 8-11). The old covenant would have anticipated all man's wants, so as to give no occasion for seeking something more perfectly adequate. Cf. on the phrase "place . . . sought," ch. 12. 17. 8. finding fault with them—the people of the old covenant, who were not made "faultless" by it (v. 7); and whose disregard of God's covenant made Him to 'regard them not' (v. 9). The law is not in itself blamed, but the people who had not observed it. he saith—(Jeremiah 31. 31-34; cf. Ezekiel 11. 19; 36. 25-27.) At Rama, the headquarters of Nebuzaradan, whither the captives of Jerusalem had been led, Jeremiah uttered this prophecy of Israel's restoration under another David, whereby Rachel, weeping for her lost children, shall be comforted; literally in part fulfilled at the restoration under Zerubbabel, and more fully to be hereafter at Israel's return to their own land; spiritually fulfilled in the Gospel covenant, whereby God forgives absolutely His people's sins, and writes His law by His Spirit on the hearts of believers, the true Israel. "This prophecy forms the third part of the third trilogy of the three great trilogies into which Jeremiah's prophecies may be divided: Jeremiah 21.-25., against the shepherds of the people; 26.-29., against the false prophets; 30. and 31., the book of restoration." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] Behold, the days come—The frequent formula introducing a Messianic prophecy. make—Greek, "perfect;" "consummate." A suitable expression as to the new covenant, which perfected what the old could not (cf. end of v. 9, with end of v. 10). Israel . . . Judah—therefore, the ten tribes, as well as Judah, share in the new covenant. As both shared the exile, so both shall share the literal and spiritual restoration. 9. Not according to—very different from, and far superior to, the old covenant, which only "worked wrath" (Romans 4. 15) through man's "not regarding" it. The new covenant enables us to obey by the Spirit's inward impulse producing love because of the forgiveness of our sins. made with—rather as Greek, "to:" the Israelites being only recipients, not co-agents [ALFORD] with God. I took them by the hand—as a father takes his child by the hand to support and guide his steps. "There are three periods: (1.) that of the promise; (2.) that of the pedagogical instruction; (3.) that of fulfilment." [BENGEL.] The second, that of the pedagogical pupilage, began at the exodus from Egypt. I regarded them not—English Verston, Jeremiah 31. 32, translates, "Although I was an husband unto them." St. Paul's translation here is supported by LXX., Syriac, and GESENIUS, and accords with the kindred Arabic. The Hebrews regarded not God, so God, in righteous retribution, regarded them not. On "continued not in my covenant," SCHELLING observes: The law was in fact the mere ideal of a religious constitution: in practice, the Jews were throughout, before the captivity, more or less polytheists, except in the time of David, and the first years of Solomon [the type of Messiah's reign.] Even after the return from Babylon, to idolatry, there succeeded what was not much better, formalism and hypocrisy (Matthew 12. 43). The law was (1.) a typical picture, tracing out the features of the glorious Gospel to be revealed; (2.) it had a delegated virtue from the Gospel, which ceased, therefore, when the Gospel came. 10. make with—Greek, "make unto." Israel—Comprising the before disunited (v. 8) ten tribes kingdom, and that of Judah. They are united in the spiritual Israel, the elect Church, now: they shall be so in the literal restored kingdom of Israel to come. I will put—lit., "(I) giving." This is the first of the "better promises" (v. 6). mind—their intelligent faculty. in—rather, "on their hearts." Not on tables of stone as the law (2 Corinthians 3. 3). write—Greek, "inscribe." I will be to them a God, &c.—Fulfilled first in the outward kingdom of God. Next, in the inward Gospel kingdom. Thirdly, in the kingdom at once outward and inward, the spiritual being manifested outwardly (Revelation 21. 3). Cf. a similar progression as to the priesthood (1.) Exodus 19. 6; (2.) 1 Peter 2. 5; (3.) Isaiah 61. 6; Revelation 1. 6. This progressive advance of the significance of the Old Testament institutions, &c., says THOLUCK, shows the transparency and prophetic character which runs throughout the whole. 11. Second of the "better promises" (v. 6). they shall not—"they shall not have to teach." [ALFORD.] his neighbour—So Vulgate reads; but the oldest MSS. have "his (fellow) citizen." brother—a closer and more endearing relation than fellow-citizen. From the least to the greatest—Greek, “from the little one to the great one.” Zechariah 12. 8, “He that is feeble among them shall be as David.” Under the old covenant, the priest’s lips were to keep knowledge, and at his mouth the people were to seek the law: under the new covenant, the Holy Spirit teaches every believer. Not that the mutual teaching of brethren is excluded whilst the covenant is being promulgated; but when once the Holy Spirit shall have fully taught all the remission of their sins and inward sanctification, then there shall be no further need of man teaching his fellow-man. Cf. 1 Thessalonians 4. 9; 5. 1, an earnest of that perfect state to come. On the way to that perfect state every man should teach his neighbour. “The teaching is not hard and forced, because grace renders all teachable; for it is not the ministry of the letter, but of the spirit (2 Corinthians 3. 6). The believer’s firmness does not depend on the authority of human teachers. God Himself teaches.” [BENJEL.] The New Testament is shorter than the Old Testament, because, instead of the details of an outward letter law, it gives the all-embracing principles of the spiritual law written on the conscience, leading one to spontaneous instinctive obedience in outward details. None save the Lord can teach effectually, “know the Lord.” 12. For, &c.—The third of “the better promises” (v. 6). The forgiveness of sins is, and will be, the root of this new state of inward grace and knowledge of the Lord. Sin being abolished, sinners obtain grace. I will be merciful—Greek, “propitious;” the Hebrew “salach” is always used of God only in relation to men. and their iniquities—Not found in Vulgate, Syriac, Coptic, and one oldest Greek MS.; but most oldest MSS. have the words (cf. ch. 10. 17). remember no more—Contrast the law, ch. 10. 3. 13. he—God. made . . . old—“hath (at the time of speaking the prophecy) antiquated the first covenant.” From the time of God’s mention of a new covenant (since God’s words are all realities) the first covenant might be regarded as ever dwindling away, until its complete abolition on the actual introduction of the Gospel. Both covenants cannot exist side by side. Mark how verbal inspiration is proved in Paul’s argument turning wholly on the one word “NEW” (covenant), occurring but once in the Old Testament. that which decayeth—Greek, “that which is being antiquated,” viz., at the time when Jeremiah spake. For in Paul’s time, according to his view, the new had absolutely set aside the old covenant. The Greek for (Kaine) New (Testament) implies that it is of a different kind and supersedes the old: not merely recent (Greek, nea). Cf. Hosea 3. 4, 5.

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1-26. INFERIORITY OF THE OLD TO THE NEW COVENANT IN THE MEANS OF ACCESS TO GOD: THE BLOOD OF BULLS AND GOATS OF NO REAL AVAIL: THE BLOOD OF CHRIST ALL-SUFFICIENT TO PURGE AWAY SIN, WHENCE FLOWS OUR HOPE OF HIS APPEARING AGAIN FOR OUR PERFECT SALVATION. 1. Then verily—Greek, “accordingly then.” Resuming the subject from ch. 8. 5. In accordance with the command given to Moses, “the first covenant had,” &c. had—not “has,” for as a covenant it no longer existed, though its rites were observed till the destruction of Jerusalem. ordinances—of Divine right and institution. service—worship. a worldly sanctuary—Greek, “its (lit., the) sanctuary worldly,” mundane: consisting of the elements of the visible world. Contrasted with the heavenly sanctuary. Cf. v. 11, 12, “not of this building,” v. 24. Material, outward, perishing (however precious its materials were), and also defective religiously. In v. 2-5, “the worldly sanctuary” is discussed; in v. 6, &c., the “ordinances of worship.” The outer tabernacle the Jews believed, signified this world; the Holy of holies, heaven. JOSEPHUS calls the outer, divided into two parts, “a secular and common place,” answering to “the earth and sea;” and the inner holiest place, the third part, appropriated to God and not accessible to men. 2. Defining “the worldly tabernacle” a tabernacle—“the tabernacle.” made—built and furnished. the first—the anterior tabernacle. candlestick . . . table—Typifying light and life (Exodus 25. 31-39). The candlestick consisted of a shaft and six branches of gold, seven in all, the bowls made like almonds, with a knop and a flower in one branch. It was carried in Vespasian’s triumph, and the figure is to be seen on Titus’ arch at Rome. The table of shittim wood, covered with gold, was for the shew-bread (Exodus 25. 23-30). shew-bread—lit., “the setting forth of the loaves,” i. e., the loaves set forth: “the show of the bread.” [ALFORD.] In the outer holy place: so the Eucharist continues until our entrance into the heavenly Holy of holies (1 Corinthians 11. 26). which, &c.—“which (tabernacle) is called the holy place,” as distinguished from “the Holy of holies.” 3. And—Greek, “But.” after—behind: within. second veil—There were two veils or curtains, one before the Holy of holies (catapetasma), here alluded to, the other before the tabernacle door (calumna), called—as opposed to “the true.” 4. golden censer—The Greek must not be translated “altar of incense,” for it was not in “the holiest” place “after the second veil,” but in “the holy place;” but as in 2 Chronicles 26. 19. and Ezekiel 8. 11, “censer;” so Vulgate and Syriac. This GOLDEN censer was only used on the day of atonement (other kinds of censers on other days), and is therefore associated with the holiest place, as being taken into it on that anniversary by the high priest. The expression “which had,” does not mean that the golden censer was deposited there, for in that case the high priest would have had to go in and bring it out before burning incense in it; but that the golden censer was one of the articles belonging to, and used for, the yearly service in the holiest place. He virtually supposes (without specifying) the existence of the “altar of incense” in the anterior holy place, by mentioning the golden censer filled with incense from it: the incense answers to the prayers of the saints; and the altar though outside the holiest place, is connected with it (standing close by the second veil, directly before the ark of the covenant), even as we find an antitypical altar in heaven. The rending of the veil by Christ has brought the antitypes to the altar, candlestick, and shew-bread of the anterior holy place into the holiest place, heaven. In 1 Kings 6. 22, Hebrew, the altar is said to belong to the oracle or holiest place (cf. Exodus 30. 6). ark—of shittim wood, i. e., acacia. Not in the second temple, but in its stead was a stone basement (called “the stone of foundation”), three fingers high. pot—“golden,” added in the LXX., and sanctioned by Paul. manna—An omer, each man’s daily portion. In 1 Kings 8. 9; 2 Chronicles 5. 10, it is said there was nothing in the ark of Solomon’s temple save the two stone tables of the law put in by Moses. But the expression that there was nothing THEN therein save the two tables, leaves the inference to be drawn that formerly there were the other things mentioned by the Rabbis and by Paul here, the pot of manna (the memorial of God’s providential care of Israel) and the rod of Aaror the memorial of the lawful priesthood, Numbers 17. 3, 5, 7, 10). The expressions “before the Lord,” Exodus 16. 32, and “before the testimony,” Numbers 17. 10, thus mean, “IN the ark.” “In,” however, may be used here (as the corresponding Hebrew word) as to things attached to the ark as appendages, as the book of the law was put “in the side of the ark,” and so the golden jewels offered by the Philistines (1 Samuel 6. 8). tables of the covenant—(Deuteronomy 9. 9; 10. 2.) 5. over it—over “the ark of the covenant,” cherubim—representing the ruling powers by which God acts in the moral and natural world. See my Note, Ezekiel 1. 6; 10. 1. Hence sometimes they answer to the ministering angels; but mostly to the elect redeemed, by whom God shall hereafter rule the world and set forth His manifold wisdom: redeemed humanly combining in, and with itself, the highest forms of subordinate creaturely life; not angels. They stand on the mercy seat, and on that ground become the habitation of God from which His glory is to shine upon the world. They expressly say, Revelation 5. 2-25, τις οὐκ ἔσθω αὐτῶν. They are there distinguished from the angels, and are associated with the elders. They were of one piece with the mercy-seat, even as the Church is one with Christ: their sole standing is on the blood-sprinkled mercy-seat; they gaze down at it as the redeemed shall for ever; they are "the habitation of God through the Spirit." of glory—The cherubim were bearers of the Divine glory, whence, perhaps, they derive their name. The Shekinah, or cloud of glory, in which Jehovah appeared between the cherubim over the mercy-seat, the lid of the ark, is doubtless the reference. THOLUCK thinks the twelve loaves of the show-bread represent the twelve tribes of the nation, presented as a community before God consecrated to Him [just as in the Lord's Supper believers, the spiritual Israel, all partaking of the one bread, and becoming one bread and one body, present themselves before the Lord as consecrated to Him, 1 Corinthians 10. 16, 17]; the oil and light, the pure knowledge of the Lord, in which the covenant people are to shine [the seven (lights), implying perfection]; the ark of the covenant, the symbol of God's kingdom in the old covenant, and representing God dwelling among His own; the ten commandments in the ark, the law as the basis of union between God and man; the mercy-seat covering the law and sprinkled with the blood of atonement for the collective sin of the people, God's mercy [in Christ] stronger than the law; the cherubim, the personified [redeemed] creation, looking down on the mercy-seat, where God's mercy, and God's law, are set forth as the basis of creation. mercy-seat—Greek, "the propitiatory;" the golden cover of the ark, on which was sprinkled the blood of the propitiatory sacrifice on the day of atonement; the footstool of Jehovah; the meeting-place of Him and His people. we cannot—conveniently: besides what met the eye in the sanctuary, there were spiritual realities symbolized which it would take too long to discuss in detail, our chief subject at present being the priesthood and the sacrifices. "Which" refers not merely to the cherubim, but to all the contents of the sanctuary enumerated, v. 2-5. 6. The use made of the sanctuary so furnished by the high priest on the anniversary of atonement. ordained—arranged. always—twice at the least every day, for the morning and evening care of the lamps, and offering of incense (Exodus 30. 7, 8). went—Greek, "enter:" present tense. 7. once every year—The tenth day of the seventh month. He entered within the veil on that day twice at least. Thus "once" means here on the one occasion only. The two, or possibly more, entrances on that one day were regarded as parts of the one whole. not without blood—(Ch. 8. 3.) offered—Greek, "offers." errors—Greek, "ignorances:" "inadvertent errors." They might have known, as the law was clearly promulgated, and they were bound to study it; so that their ignorance was culpable (cf. Acts 3. 17; Ephesians 4. 18; 1 Peter 1. 14). Though one's ignorance may mitigate one's punishment (Luke 12. 48), it does not wholly exempt from punishment. 8. The Holy Ghost—Moses himself did not comprehend the typical meaning (1 Peter 1. 11, 12). signifying—by the typical exclusion of all from the holiest, save the high priest once a year. the holiest of all—heaven, the anti-type. the first tabernacle—the anterior tabernacle, representative of the whole Levitical system. While it (the first tabernacle, and that which represents the Levitical system) as yet "has a standing" (so the Greek, i. e., has continuance: lasts), the way to heaven (the antitypical "holiest place") is not yet made manifest (cf. ch. 10. 19, 20). The Old Testament economy is represented by the holy place, the New Testament economy by the Holy of holies. Redemption, by Christ, has opened the Holy of holies (access to heaven by faith now, ch. 4. 16; 7. 19, 25; 10. 19, 22; by sight hereafter, Isaiah 33. 24; Revelation 11. 19; 21. 2, 3) to all mankind. The Greek for "not yet" (me po) refers to the mind of the Spirit: the Spirit intimating that men should not think the way was yet opened. [TITTMANN.] The Greek negative, ou po, would deny the fact objectively: me po, denies the thing subjectively. 9. Which—"The which," viz., anterior tabernacle: "as being that which was," &c. [ALFORD.] figure—Greek, "parabolic:" a parabolic setting forth of the character of the Old Testament. for—"in reference to the existing time. The time of the temple worship really belonged to the Old Testament, but continued still in Paul's time and that of his Hebrew readers. "The time of reformation" (v. 10) stands in contrast to this, "the existing time;" though, in reality, "the time of reformation," the New Testament time, was now present and existing. So "the age to come," is the phrase applied to the Gospel, because it was present only to believers, and its fulness even to them is still to come. Cf. v. 11, "good things to come." in which—tabernacle, not time, according to the reading of the oldest MSS. Or translate, "According to which" parabolic representation, or figure. were—Greek, "are." gifts—unbloody oblations. could not—Greek, "cannot:" are not able. him that did the service—any worshipper. The Greek is latreuein, serve God, which is all men's duty; not leitourgein, to serve in a ministerial office. make perfect—perfectly remove the sense of guilt, and sanctify inwardly through love. as pertaining to the conscience—"in respect to the (moral-religious) consciousness." They can only reach as far as the outward flesh (cf. "carnal ordinances," v. 10, 13, 14). 10. Which—sacrifices. stood—consisted in [ALFORD]; or, have attached to them only things which appertain to the use of foods, &c. The rites of meats, &c., go side by side with the sacrifices [THOLUCK and WAHL], cf. Colossians 2. 16. drinks—(Leviticus 10. 9; 11. 4.) Usage especially to the law added many observances as to meats and drinks. washings—(Exodus 29. 4.) and carnal ordinances—One oldest MS., Syriac and Coptic, omit "and." "Carnal ordinances" stand in apposition to "sacrifices" (v. 9). Carnal (outward, affecting only the flesh) is opposed to spiritual. Contrast "flesh" with "conscience" (v. 13, 14). imposed—as a burden (Acts 15. 10, 28) continually pressing heavy. until the time of reformation—(Greek, "the season of rectification," when the reality should supersede the type (ch. 8. 8-12). Cf. "better," v. 23. 11. But—in contrast to "could not make . . . perfect" (v. 9). Christ—The Messiah, of whom all the prophets foretold; not "Jesus" here. From whom the "reformation" (v. 10), or rectification, emanates, which frees from the yoke of carnal ordinances, and which is being realized gradually now, and shall be perfectly in the consummation of "the age (world) to come." "Christ . . . High Priest," exactly answers to Leviticus 4. 5, "the priest that is anointed." an—rather, "having come forward (cf. ch. 10. 7, a different Greek word, picturesquely presenting Him before us) as High Priest." The Levitical priests must therefore retire. Just as on the day of atonement, no work was done, no sacrifice was offered, or priest was allowed to be in the tabernacle while the high priest went into the holiest place to make atonement (Leviticus 16. 17, 29). So not our righteousness, nor any other priest's sacrifice, but Christ alone atones; and as the high priest before offering incense had on common garments of a priest, but after it wore his holy garments of "glory and beauty" (Exodus 28.) in entering the holiest, so Christ entered the heavenly holiest in His glorified body. good things to come—Greek, "the good things to come," ch. 10. 1; "better promises," ch. 8. 6; the "eternal inheritance," v. 15; 1 Peter 1. 4; the "things hoped for," ch. 11. 1. by a tabernacle—Joined with "He entered." Translate, "Through the . . . tabernacle" (of which we know). [ALFORD.] As the Jewish high priest passed through the anterior tabernacle into the holiest place, so Christ passed through heaven into the inner abode of the unseen and unapproachable God. Thus, "the tabernacle" here is the heavens through which He passed (Note, ch. 4. 14). But "the tabernacle" is also the glorified body of Christ (Note, ch. 8. 2), "not of this building" (not of the mere natural "creation, but of the spiritual and heavenly, the new creation"), the Head of the mystical body the Church. Through this glorified body He passes into the heavenly holiest place (v. 24), the immaterial, unapproachable presence of God, where He intercedes for us. His glorified body, as the meeting-place of God and all Christ's redeemed, and the angels, answers to the heavens through which He passed, and passes. His body is opposed to the tabernacle, as His blood to the blood of goats, &c. greater

--as contrasted with the small dimensions of the earthly anterior tabernacle. more perfect—Effective in giving pardon, peace, sanctification, and access to closest communion with God (cf. v. 9; ch. 10. 1). not made with hands—but by the Lord Himself (ch. 8. 2). 12. Neither—“Nor yet.” by—“through;” as the means of His approach. goats . . . calves—Not a bullock, such as the Levitical high priest offered for himself, and a goat for the people, on the day of atonement (Leviticus 16. 6, 15), year by year; whence the plural is used, goats . . . calves. Besides the goat offered for the people the blood of which was sprinkled before the mercy-seat, the high priest led forth a second goat, viz., the scapegoat; over it he confessed the people's sins, putting them on the head of the goat, and sent as the sin-bearer into the wilderness out of sight, implying that the atonement effected by the goat sin offering (of which the ceremony of the scapegoat is a part, and not distinct from the sin offering, consisted in the transfer of the people's sins on the goat, and their consequent removal out of sight. The translation of sins on the victim usual in other expiatory sacrifices being omitted in the case of the slain goat, but employed in the case of the goat sent away, proved the two goats were regarded as one offering. [ARCHBISHOP MAGEE.] Christ's death is symbolized by the slain goat; His resurrection to life by the living goat sent away. Modern Jews substitute in some places a cock for the goat as an expiation, the sins of the offerers being transferred to the entrails, and exposed on the house-top for the birds to carry out of sight, as the scapegoat did; the Hebrew for man and cock being similar, Gebher. [BUXTORF.] by—“through,” as the means of His entrance; the key unlocking the heavenly Holy of holies to Him. The Greek is forcible, “through THE blood of His own” (cf. v. 23). once—“once for all,” having obtained—having thereby obtained; lit., “found for Himself,” as a thing of insuperable difficulty to all save Divine Omnipotence, self-devoting zeal, and love, to find. The access of Christ to the Father was arduous (ch. 6. 7). None before had trodden the path. eternal—The entrance of our Redeemer, once for all, into the heavenly holiest place, secures eternal redemption to us; whereas the Jewish high priest's entrance was repeated year by year, and the effect temporary and partial. “On redemption,” cf. Matthew 20. 28; Ephesians 1. 7; Colossians 1. 14; 1 Timothy 2. 5; Titus 2. 14; 1 Peter 1. 19.

13-23. PROOF OF, AND ENLARGEMENT ON, THE “ETERNAL REDEMPTION” MENTIONED, v. 12. For His blood, offered by Himself, purifies not only outwardly, as the Levitical sacrifices on the day of atonement, but inwardly unto the service of the living God (v. 13, 14). His death is the inaugurating act of the new covenant, and of the heavenly sanctuary (v. 15-23). His entrance into the true Holy of holies is the consummation of His once for all offered sacrifice of atonement (v. 24, 26); henceforth, His reappearance alone remains to complete our redemption (v. 27, 28). 13. if—as we know is the case; so the Greek indicative means. Argument from the less to the greater. If the blood of mere brutes could purify in any, however small a degree, how much more shall inward purification, and complete and eternal salvation, be wrought by the blood of Christ, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead? ashes of an heifer—(Numbers 19. 16-18.) The type is full of comfort for us. The water of separation, made of the ashes of the red heifer, was the provision for removing ceremonial defilement whenever incurred by contact with the dead. As she was slain without the camp, so Christ (cf. ch. 13. 11; Numbers 19. 3, 4). The ashes were laid by for constant use; so the continually cleansing effects of Christ's blood, once for all shed. In our wilderness journey we are continually contracting defilement by contact with the spiritually dead, and with dead works, and need therefore continual application to the antitypical life-giving cleansing blood of Christ, whereby we are afresh restored to peace and living communion with God in the heavenly holy place. the unclean—Greek, “those defiled” on any particular occasion. purifying—Greek, “purify.” the flesh—their effect in themselves extended no further. The law had a carnal and a spiritual aspect; carnal, as an instrument of the Hebrew polity, God, then King, accepting, in minor offences, expiatory victims instead of the sinner, otherwise doomed to death; spiritual, as the shadow of good things to come (ch. 10. 1). The spiritual Israelite derived, in partaking of these legal rights, spiritual blessings not flowing from them, but from the great antitype. Ceremonial sacrifices released from temporal penalties and ceremonial disqualifications; Christ's sacrifice releases from everlasting penalties (v. 12), and moral impurities on the conscience disqualifying from access to God (v. 14). The purification of the flesh (the mere outward man) was by “sprinkling;” the washing followed by inseparable connection (Numbers 19. 19). So justification is followed by renewing. 14. offered himself—The voluntary nature of the offering gives it especial efficacy. He “through the eternal Spirit,” i. e., His Divine Spirit (Romans 1. 4, in contrast to His “flesh,” v. 3; His Godhead, 1 Timothy 3. 16; 1 Peter 3. 18), “His inner personality” [ALFORD], which gave a free consent to the act, offered Himself. The animals offered had no spirit or will to consent in the act of sacrifice; they were offered according to the law; they had a life neither enduring, nor of any intrinsic efficacy. But He from eternity, with His Divine and everlasting Spirit, concurred with the Father's will of redemption by Him. His offering began on the altar of the cross, and was completed in His entering the holiest place with His blood. The eternity and infinitude of His Divine Spirit (cf. ch. 7. 16) gives eternal (“eternal redemption,” v. 12, also cf. v. 15) and infinite merit to His offering, so that not even the infinite justice of God has any exception to take against it. It was “through His most burning love, flowing from His eternal Spirit,” that He offered Himself. [GECOLAMPADIUS.] without spot—the animal victims had to be without outward blemish; Christ on the cross was a victim inwardly and essentially stainless (1 Peter 1. 19). purge—purify from fear, guilt, alienation from Him, and selfishness, the source of dead works (v. 22, 23). your—The oldest MSS. read “our.” Vulgate, however, supports English Version reading. conscience—moral religious consciousness. dead works—all works done in the natural state, which is a state of sin, are dead; for they come not from living faith in, and love to “the living God” (ch. 11. 6). As contact with a dead body defiled ceremonially (cf. the allusion, “ashes of an heifer,” v. 13), so dead works defile the inner consciousness spiritually. to—so as to serve. The ceremonially unclean could not serve God in the outward communion of His people; so the unrenewed cannot serve God in spiritual communion. Man's works before justification, however lifelike they look, are dead, and cannot therefore be accepted before the living God. To have offered a dead animal to God would have been an insult (cf. Malachi 1. 8), much more for a man not justified by Christ's blood to offer dead works. But those purified by Christ's blood in living faith do serve (Romans 12. 1), and shall more fully serve God (Revelation 22. 3). living God—therefore requiring living spiritual service (John 4. 24). 15. for this cause—Because of the all-cleansing power of His blood, this fits Him to be Mediator (ch. 8. 6, ensuring to both parties, God and us, the ratification) of the new covenant, which secures both forgiveness for the sins not covered by the former imperfect covenant or testament, and also an eternal inheritance to the called. by means of death—rather, as Greek, “death having taken place.” At the moment that His death took place, the necessary effect is, “the called receive the (fulfilment of the) promise” (so Luke 24. 49 uses “promise;” ch. 6. 15; Acts 1. 4); that moment divides the Old from the New Testament. The “called” are the elect “heirs,” “partakers of the heavenly calling” (ch. 3. 1). redemption of . . . transgressions . . . under . . . first testament—the transgressions of all men from Adam to Christ, first against the primitive revelation, then against the revelations to the patriarchs, then against the law given to Israel, the representative people of the world. The “first testament” thus includes the whole period from Adam to Christ, and not merely that of the covenant with Israel, which was a concentrated representation of the covenant made with (or the first testam- will given to) ranked by sacrifice, down from the fall to redemption. Before the inheritance by the New Testament (for here the idea of the "INHERITANCE," following as the result of Christ's "death," being introduced, requires the Greek to be translated testament, as it was before covenant) could come in, there must be redemption of (i. e., deliverance from the penalties incurred by) the transgressions committed under the first testament, for the propitiatory sacrifices under the first testament reached only as far as removing outward ceremonial defilement. But in order to obtain the inheritance which is a reality, there must be a real propitiation, since God could not enter into covenant-relation with us so long as past sins were unexpiated; Romans 8. 24, 25, "a propitiation . . . His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past." the promise—to Abraham. might—Greek, "may receive," which previously they could not (ch. 11. 39, 40). 16. A general axiomatic truth; it is "a testament;" not the testament. The testator must die before his testament takes effect (v. 17). This is a common meaning of the Greek noun dialthece. So in Luke 22. 29, "I appoint (by testamentary disposition; the cognate Greek verb diallthemai) unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me." The need of death before the testamentary appointment takes effect, holds good in Christ's relation as MAN to us; of course not in God's relation to Christ. be—lit., "be borne;" "be involved in the case;" be inferred; or else, "be brought forward in court," so as to give effect to the will. This sense (testament) of the Greek dialthece here does not exclude its other secondary senses in the other passages of the New Testament: (1.) a covenant between two parties; (2.) an arrangement, or disposition, made by God alone in relation to us. Thus, Matthew 26. 28 may be translated, "Blood of the covenant;" for a testament does not require blood shedding. Cf. Exodus 24. 8 (covenant), which Christ quotes, though it is probable He included in sense "testament" also under the Greek word dialthece (comprehending both meanings, "covenant" and "testament"), as this designation strictly and properly applies to the new dispensation, and is rightly applicable to the old also, not in itself, but when viewed as typifying the new, which is properly a testament. Moses (Exodus 24. 8) speaks of the same thing as [Christ and] Paul. Moses, by the term "covenant," does not mean aught save one concerning giving the heavenly inheritance typified by Canaan after the death of the Testator, which he represented by the sprinkling of blood. And Paul, by the term "testament," does not mean aught save one having conditions attached to it, one which is at the same time a covenant (POLI, Synopsis); the conditions are fulfilled by Christ, not by us, except that we must believe, but even this God works in His people. THOLUCK explains, as elsewhere, "covenant . . . covenant . . . mediating victim;" the masculine is used of the victim personified, and regarded as mediator of the covenant; especially as in the new covenant a MAN (Christ) took the place of the victim. The covenanting parties used to pass between the divided parts of the sacrificed animals; but, without reference to this rite, the need of a sacrifice for establishing a covenant sufficiently explains this verse. Others, also, explaining the Greek as "covenant," consider that the death of the sacrificial victim represented in all covenants the death of both parties as unalterably bound to the covenant. So in the redemption-covenant, the death of Jesus symbolized the death of God (?) in the person of the mediating victim, and the death of man in the same. But the expression is not "there must be the death of both parties making the covenant," but singular, "of Him who made (aorist, past time; not 'of Him making') the testament." Also, it is "death," not "sacrifice" or "slaying." Plainly, the death is supposed to be past (aorist, "made"); and the fact of the death is brought (Greek) before court to give effect to the will. These requisites of a will, or testament, concur here: 1. A testator; 2. heirs; 3. goods; 4. the death of the testator; 5. the fact of the death brought forward in court. In Matthew 26. 28 two other requisites appear: witnesses, the disciples; and a seal, the sacrament of the Lord's supper, the sign of His blood wherewith the testament is primarily sealed. It is true the heir is ordinarily the successor of him who dies and ceases to have the possession. But in this case Christ comes to life again, and is Himself (including all that He hath), in the power of His now endless life, His people's inheritance; in His being Heir (ch. 1. 2), they are heirs. 17. after—lit., "over," as we say "upon the death of the testators;" not as THOLUCK, "on the condition that slain sacrifices be there," which the Greek hardly sanctions otherwise—"seeing that it is never availing." [ALFORD. BENGEL and LACHMANN read with an interrogation, "Since, is it ever in force (surely not) while the testator liveth?" 18. Whereupon—rather, "Whence," dedicated—"inaugurated." The Old Testament strictly and formally began on that day of inauguration. "Where the disposition, or arrangement, is ratified by the blood of another, viz., of animals, which cannot make a covenant, much less make a testament, it is not strictly a testament; where it is ratified by the death of him that makes the arrangement, it is strictly, Greek dialthece, Hebrew berith, taken in a wider sense, a testament" [BENGEL]; thus, in v. 18, referring to the old dispensation, we may translate, "the first (covenant);" or better, retain "the first (testament)," not that the old dispensation, regarded by itself, is a testament, but it is so when regarded as the typical representative of the new, which is strictly a Testament. 19. For—Confirming the general truth, v. 16. spoken . . . according to the law—strictly adhering to every direction of "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Ephesians 2. 15). Cf. Exodus 24. 8, "Moses told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments; and all the people answered with one voice," &c. the blood of calves—Greek, "the calves," viz., those sacrificed by the "young men" whom he sent to do so (Exodus 24. 5). The "peace offerings" there mentioned were "of oxen" (LXX., 'little calves'), and the "burnt offerings" were probably (though this is not specified), as on the day of atonement, goats. The law in Exodus sanctioned formally many sacrificial practices in use by tradition, from the primitive revelation long before. with water—Prescribed, though not in Exodus 24., yet in other purifications, as ex. gr., of the leper, and the water of separation which contained the ashes of the red heifer. scarlet wool, and hyssop—Ordinarily used for purification. Scarlet or crimson, resembling blood: it was thought to be a peculiarly deep, fast dye, whence it typified sin (Note, Isaiah 1. 18). So Jesus wore a scarlet robe, the emblem of the deep-dyed sins He bore on Him, though He had none in Him. Wool was used as imbibing and retaining water; the hyssop, as a bushy, tufty plant (wrapt round with the scarlet wool), was used for sprinkling it. The wool was also a symbol of purity (Isaiah 1. 18). The Hyssopus officinalis grows on walls, with small lancet-formed woolly leaves, an inch long, with blue and white flowers, and a knotty stalk about a foot high. sprinkled . . . the book—viz., out of which he had read "every precept:" the book of the testament or covenant. This sprinkling of the book is not mentioned in Exodus 24. Hence BENGEL translates, "And (having taken) the book itself (so Exodus 24. 7), he both sprinkled all the people, and (v. 21) moreover sprinkled the tabernacle." But the Greek supports English Version. Paul, by inspiration, supplies the particular specified here, not in Exodus 24. 7. The sprinkling of the roll (so the Greek for "book") of the covenant, or testament, as well as of the people, implies that neither can the law be fulfilled, nor the people be purged from their sins, save by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ (1 Peter 1. 2). Cf. v. 33, which shows that there is something atypical to the Bible in heaven itself (cf. Revelation 20. 12). The Greek, "itself," distinguishes the book itself from the "precepts" in it which be "spake." 20. Exodus 24. 8, "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord has made with you concerning all these words." The change is here made to accord with Christ's inauguration of the new testament, as recorded by St. Luke 22. 20, "This cup (is) the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you:" the only Gospel in which the "is" has to be supplied. Luke was Paul's companion, which accounts for the use responsibility, as here too "is" has to be supplied. testament—(Note, v. 16, 17.) The Greek diatheke means both testament and covenant: the term "covenant" better suits the old dispensation, though the idea testament is included, for the old was one in its typical relation to the new dispensation, to which the term "testament" is better suited. Christ has sealed the testament with His blood, of which the Lord's Supper is the sacramental sign. The testator was represented by the animals slain in the old dispensation. In both dispensations the inheritance was bequeathed: in the new by One who has come in person and died; in the old by the same one, only typically and ceremonially present. See ALFORD'S excellent Note. enjoined unto you—commissioned me to ratify in relation to you. In the old dispensation the condition to be fulfilled on the people's part is implied in the words, Exodus 24. 8, "(Lord made with you) concerning all these words." But here Paul omits this clause, as he includes the fulfilment of this condition of obedience to "all these words" in the new covenant, as part of God's promise, in ch. 8. 8, 10, 12, whereby Christ fulfils all for our justification, and will enable us by putting His Spirit in us to fulfil all in our now progressive, and finally complete sanctification. 21. Greek, "And, moreover, in like manner." The sprinkling of the tabernacle with blood is added by inspiration here to the account in Exodus 30. 25-30; 40. 9, 10, which mentions only Moses' anointing the tabernacle and its vessels. In Leviticus 8. 10, 15, 30, the sprinkling of blood upon Aaron and his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the altar, is mentioned as well as the anointing, so that we might naturally infer, as JOSEPHUS has distinctly stated, that the tabernacle and its vessels were sprinkled with blood as well as being anointed: Leviticus 16. 16, 19, 20, 33, virtually sanctions this inference. The tabernacle and its contents needed purification (2 Chronicles 29. 21). 22. almost—to be joined with "all things," viz., almost all things under the old dispensation. The exceptions to all things being purified by blood are, Exodus 19. 10; Leviticus 15. 5, &c.; 16. 26, 28; 22. 6; Numbers 31. 22-24. without—Greek, "apart from." shedding of blood—shed in the slaughter of the victim, and poured out at the altar subsequently. The pouring out of the blood on the altar is the main part of the sacrifice (Leviticus 17. 11), and it could not have place apart from the previous shedding of the blood in the slaying. Paul has, perhaps, in mind here, Luke 22. 20, "This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is shed for you." is—Greek, "takes place:" comes to pass. remission—of sins: a favourite expression of Luke, Paul's companion. Properly used of remitting a debt (Matthew 6. 12; 18. 27, 32); our sins are debts. On the truth here, cf. Leviticus 5. 11-13, an exception because of poverty, confirming the general rule. 23. patterns—"the suggestive representations;" the typical copies (Note, ch. 8. 5). things in the heavens—the heavenly tabernacle and the things therein. purified with these—with the blood of bulls and goats. heavenly things themselves—the archetypes. Man's sin had introduced an element of disorder into the relations of God and His holy angels in respect to man. The purification removes this element of disorder, and changes God's wrath against man in heaven (designed to be the place of God's revealing His grace to men and angels) into a smile of reconciliation. Cf. "peace in heaven" (Luke 19. 38.) "The uncreated heaven of God, though in itself untroubled light, yet needed a purification in so far as the light of love was obscured by the fire of wrath against sinful man." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] Contrast Revelation 12. 7-10. Christ's atonement had the effect also of casting Satan out of heaven (Luke 10. 18; John 12. 31; cf. ch. 2. 14). Christ's body, the true tabernacle (notes, ch. 8. 2; 9. 11), as bearing our imputed sin (2 Corinthians 5. 21), was consecrated (John 17. 17, 19) and purified by the shedding of His blood to be the meeting-place of God and man. sacrifice—The plural is used in expressing the general proposition, though strictly referring to the one sacrifice of Christ once for all. Paul implies, that His one sacrifice, by its matchless excellency, is equivalent to the Levitical many sacrifices. It, though but one, is manifold in its effects and applicability to many. 24. Resumption more fully of the thought, "He entered in once into the holy place," v. 12. He has in v. 13, 14, expanded the words "by His own blood," v. 12; and in v. 15-23, he has enlarged on "an High Priest of good things to come." not . . . into . . . holy places made with hands—as was the Holy of holies in the earthly tabernacle (note, v. 11). figures—copies "of the true" holiest place, heaven, the original archetype (ch. 8. 5). into heaven itself—the immediate presence of the invisible God beyond all the created heavens, through which latter Jesus passed (note, ch. 4. 14; 1 Timothy 6. 16). now—ever since His ascension in the present economy (cf. v. 26). to appear—TO PRESENT HIMSELF; Greek, "to be made to appear." Mere man may have a vision through a medium, or veil, as Moses had (Exodus 33. 18, 20-23). Christ alone beholds the Father without a veil, and is His perfect image. Through seeing HIM only can we see the Father. in the presence of God—Greek, "to the face of God." The saints shall hereafter see God's face in Christ (Revelation 22. 4); the earnest of which is now given (2 Corinthians 3. 18). Aaron, the Levitical high priest for the people, stood before the ark and only saw the cloud, the symbol of God's glory (Exodus 28. 30). for us—in our behalf as our Advocate and Intercessor (ch. 7. 25; Romans 8. 34; 1 John 2. 1). "It is enough that Jesus should show Himself for us to the Father: the sight of Jesus satisfied God in our behalf. He brings before the face of God no offering which has exhausted itself, and, as only sufficing for a time, needs renewal; but He himself is in person, by virtue of the eternal Spirit, i. e., the imperishable life of His person, now and for ever freed from death, our eternally present offering before God." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] 25. As in v. 24, Paul said, it was not into the typical, but the true sanctuary, that Christ is entered; so now he says, that His sacrifice needs not, as the Levitical sacrifices did, to be repeated. Construe, "Nor yet did He enter for this purpose that He may offer Himself often," i. e., present Himself in the presence of God, as the high priest does (Paul uses the present tense, as the legal service was then existing), year by year, on the day of atonement, entering the Holy of holies. with—it, "in." blood of others—not his own, as Christ did. 26. then—in that case. must . . . have suffered—rather as Greek "It would have been necessary for Him often to suffer" in order to "offer" (v. 25), or present Himself often before God in the heavenly holiest place, like the legal high priests making fresh renewals of this high priestly function. He would have had, and would have often to suffer. His oblation of Himself before God was once for all (i. e., the bringing in of His blood into the heavenly Holy of holies); and therefore the preliminary suffering was once for all. since the foundation of the world—The continued sins of men, from their first creation, would entail a continual suffering on earth, and consequent oblation of His blood in the heavenly holiest place, since the foundation of the world, if the one oblation "in the fulness of time" were not sufficient. PHILO, de Mon., p. 637, shows that the high priest of the Hebrews offered sacrifices for the whole human race. "If there had been greater efficacy in the repetition of the oblation, Christ necessarily would not have been so long promised, but would have been sent immediately after the foundation of the world to suffer, and offer Himself at successive periods." [GROTIUS.] now—as the case is. once—for all; without need of renewal. Rome's fiction of an UNBLOODY sacrifice in the mass, contradicts her assertion that the blood of Christ is present in the wine; and also confutes her assertion that the mass is propitiatory; for, if unbloody, it cannot be propitiatory; for without shedding of blood there is no remission (v. 22). Moreover, the expression "once" for all here, and in v. 28, and ch. 10. 10, 12, proves the falsity of her view that there is a continually-repeated offering of Christ in the Eucharist or mass. The offering of Christ was a thing once done that it might be thought of for ever (Note, cf. ch. 10. 12). in the end of the world—Greek, "at the consummation of the ages;" the winding up of all the previous ages from the foundation of the world; to be for owed by a new age (ch. 1, 1, 2). The last age, beyond which no further age is to be expected before Christ's speedy second coming, which is the complement of the first coming; lit., "the ends of the ages;" Matthew 28, 20 is lit., "the consummation of the age," or world (singular; not as here, plural, ages). Cf. "the fulness of times," Ephesians 1, 10. appeared—Greek, "been manifested" on earth (1 Timothy 3, 16; 1 Peter 1, 20). English Version has expounded three distinct Greek verbs, by translating all alike, v. 24, 26, 28, "appear." But, in v. 24, it is "to present Himself," viz., before God in the heavenly sanctuary; in v. 26, "been manifested" on earth; in v. 28, "shall be seen" by all, and especially believers. put away—abolish; doing away sin's power as well by delivering men from its guilt and penalty, so that it should be powerless to condemn men, as also from its yoke, so that they shall at last sin no more. sin—Singular number; all the sins of men of every age are regarded as one mass laid on Christ. He hath not only atoned for all actual sins, but destroyed sin itself. John 1, 29, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin (not merely the sins: singular, not plural) of the world." by the sacrifice of himself—Greek, "by (through) His own sacrifice;" not by "blood of others" (v. 25). ALFORD loses this contrast in translating, "By his sacrifice." 27. as—Inasmuch as. it is appointed—Greek, "it is laid up (as our appointed lot)," Colossians 1, 5. The word "appointed" (so Hebrew "Seth" means) in the case of man, answers to "anointed" in the case of Jesus; therefore "the Christ," i. e., the anointed, is the title here given designedly. He is the representative man; and there is a strict correspondence between the history of man and that of the Son of man. The two most solemn facts of our being are here connected with the two most gracious truths of our dispensation, our death and judgment answering in parallelism to Christ's first coming to die for us, and His second coming to consummate our salvation. once—and no more. after this the judgment—viz., at Christ's appearing, to which, in v. 28, "judgment" in this verse is parallel. Not "after this comes the heavenly glory." The intermediate state is a state of joyous, or else agonizing and fearful expectation of "judgment;" after the judgment comes the full and final state of joy or else woe. 28. Christ—Greek, "THE Christ;" the representative MAN; representing all men, as the first Adam did. once offered—not "often," v. 25; just as "men," of whom He is the representative Head, are appointed by God once to die. He did not need to die again and again for each individual, or each successive generation of men, for He represents all men of every age, and therefore needed to die but once for all, so as to exhaust the penalty of death incurred by all. He was offered by the Father, His own "eternal Spirit" (v. 14) concurring; as Abraham spared not Isaac, but offered him, the son himself unresistingly submitting to the father's will (Genesis 22). to bear the sins—Referring to Isaiah 53, 12, "He bare the sins of many," viz., on Himself; so "bear" means, Leviticus 24, 15; Numbers 5, 31; 14, 34. The Greek is lit. to bear up (1 Peter 2, 24). "Our sins were laid on Him. When, therefore, He was lifted up on the cross, He bare up our sins along with Him." [BENGE.] many—not opposed to all, but to few. He, the One, was offered for many; and that once for all (cf. Matthew 20, 28). appear—rather, as Greek, "be seen." No longer in the alien "form of a servant," but in His own proper glory. without—apart from . . . separate from . . . "sin." Not bearing the sin of many on Him as at His first coming (even then there was no sin on Him). That sin has been at His first coming once for all taken away, so as to need no repetition of His sin offering of Himself (v. 26). At His second coming He shall have no more to do with sin. look for him—with waiting expectation even unto the end (so the Greek). It is translated "wait for" in Romans 8, 19, 23; 1 Corinthians 1, 7, which see. unto salvation—to bring in completed salvation; redeeming then the body which is as yet subject to the bondage of corruption. Hence, in Philipplians 3, 20 he says, "we look for THE SAVIOUR." Note, Christ's prophetic office, as the Divine Teacher, was especially exercised during His earthly ministry; His priestly is now from His first to His second coming; His kingly office shall be fully manifested at, and after, His second coming.

CHAPTER X.

Ver. 1-39. CONCLUSION OF THE FOREGOING ARGUMENT. THE YEARLY RECURRING LAW SACRIFICES CANNOT PERFECT THE WORSHIPPER, BUT CHRIST'S ONCE-FOR-ALL OFFERING CAN. Instead of the daily ministry of the Levitical priests, Christ's service is perfected by the one sacrifice, whence He now sits on the right hand of God as a Priest-King, until all His foes shall be subdued unto Him. Thus the new covenant (ch. 8, 8-12) is inaugurated, whereby the law is written on the heart, so that an offering for sin is needed no more. Wherefore we ought to draw near the Holiest in firm faith and love; fearful of the awful results of apostasy; looking for the recompense to be given at Christ's coming. 1. Previously the oneness of Christ's offering was shown; now is shown its perfection as contrasted with the law sacrifices. having—Inasmuch as it has but "the shadow, not the very image," i. e., not the exact likeness, reality, and full revelation, such as the Gospel has. The "image" here means the archetype (cf. ch. 9, 24), the original, solid image [BENGE.] realizing to us those heavenly verities, of which the law furnished but a shadowy outline before. Cf. 2 Corinthians 3, 13, 14, 18; the Gospel is the very setting forth by the Word and Spirit of the heavenly realities themselves, out of which it (the Gospel) is constructed. So ALFORD. As Christ is "the express image (Greek, impress) of the Father's person" (ch. 1, 3), so the Gospel is the heavenly verities themselves manifested by revelation—the heavenly very archetype, of which the law was drawn as a sketch, or outline copy (ch. 8, 5). The law was a continual process of acted prophecy, proving the Divine design that its counterparts should come; and proving the truth of those counterparts when they came. Thus the imperfect and continued expiatory sacrifices before Christ foretold, and now prove the reality of, Christ's one perfect atypical expiation. good things to come—(ch. 9, 11)—belonging to "the world (age) to come." Good things in part made present by faith to the believer, and to be fully realized hereafter in actual and perfect enjoyment. LESSING says, "As Christ's Church on earth is a prediction of the economy of the future life, so the Old Testament economy is a prediction of the Christian Church." In relation to the temporal good things of the law, the spiritual and eternal good things of the Gospel are "good things to come." Colossians 2, 17 calls legal ordinances "the shadow," and Christ "the body." never—at any time (v. 11). with those sacrifices—rather, "with the same sacrifices. year by year"—This clause in the Greek refers to the whole sentence, not merely to the words "which they the priests offered" (Greek, "offer"). Thus the sense is, not as English Version, but, the law year by year, by the repetition of the same sacrifices, testifies its inability to perfect the worshippers, viz., on the YEARLY day of atonement. The "daily" sacrifices are referred to, v. 11. continually—Greek, "continuously." Implying that they offer a toilsome and ineffectual "continuous" round of the "same" atonement-sacrifices recurring "year by year." perfect—fully meet man's needs as to justification and sanctification (Note, ch. 9, 9). comers thereunto—those so coming unto God, viz., the worshippers (the whole people) coming to God in the person of their representative, the high priest. 3. For—If the law could, by its sacrifices, have perfected the worshippers. they—the sacrifices. once purged—if they were once for all cleansed (ch. 7, 27). conscience—"consciousness of sin" (ch. 9, 9). 3. But—So far from those sacrifices ceasing to be offered (v. 2). in, &c.—in the fact of their being offered, and in the course of their being offered on the day of atonement. Contrast v. 17. a remembrance—a recalling to mind by the high priest's confession, on the day of atonement, of the sins both of each past year and of all former years, proving that the expiatory sacrifices of former years were not felt by men's consciences to have fully atoned for former sins; in fact, the expiation and remission were only legal and typical (v. 4, 11). The

scape remission, on the contrary, is so complete, that sins are "remembered no more" (v. 17) by God. It is useless to "forget" this once-for-all purgation, and to fear on account of "former sins" (2 Peter 1. 9). The believer, once for all bathed, needs only to "wash" his hands and "feet" of soils, according as he daily contracts them, in Christ's blood (John 13. 10). 4. For—Reason why, necessarily, there is a continually recurring "remembrance of sins" in the legal sacrifices (v. 3). Typically, "the blood of bulls," &c., sacrificed, had power; but it was only in virtue of the power of the one real antitypical sacrifice of Christ; they had no power in themselves; they were not the instrument of perfect vicarious atonement, but an exhibition of the need of it, suggesting to the faithful Israelite the sure hope of coming redemption, according to God's promise. take away—"take off." The Greek, v. 11, is stronger, explaining the weaker word here, "take away utterly." The blood of brutes could not take away the sin of man. A MAN must do that (Notes, ch. 9. 12-14). 5. Christ's voluntary self-offering, in contrast to those inefficient sacrifices, is shown to fulfil perfectly "the will of God" as to our redemption by completely atoning "for (our) sins." Wherefore—Seeing that a nobler than animal sacrifices was needed to "take away sins," when he cometh—Greek, "coming." The time referred to is the period before His entrance into the world, when the inefficiency of animal sacrifices for expiation had been proved. [THOLUCK.] Or, the time is that between Jesus' first dawning of reason as a child, and the beginning of His public ministry, during which, being ripened in human resolution, He was intently devoting Himself to the doing of His Father's will. [ALFORD.] But the time of "coming" is present; not "when He had come," but "when coming into the world;" so, in order to accord with ALFORD'S view, "the world" must mean His PUBLIC ministry: when coming, or about to come, into public. The Greek verbs are in the past: "sacrifice, &c., thou didst not wish, but a body thou didst prepare for me;" and, "Lo, I am come." Therefore, in order to harmonize these times, the present coming, or about to come, with the past, "A body thou didst prepare for me," we must either explain as ALFORD, or else, if we take the period to be before His actual arrival in the world (the earth) or incarnation, we must explain the past tenses to refer to God's purpose, which speaks of what He designed from eternity as though it were already fulfilled. "A body thou didst prepare in thy eternal counsel." This seems to me more likely than explaining "coming into the world," coming into public, or entering on His public ministry. David, in Psalm 40. (here quoted), reviews his past troubles and God's having delivered him from them, and his consequent desire to render willing obedience to God as more acceptable than sacrifices; but the Spirit puts into his mouth language finding its partial application to David, and its full realization only in the Divine Son of David. "The more any son of man approaches the incarnate Son of God in position, or office, or individual spiritual experience, the more directly may his holy breathings in the power of Christ's Spirit be taken as utterances of Christ Himself. Of all men, the prophesying of Israel resembled and foreshadowed Him the most." [ALFORD.] a body hast thou prepared me—Greek, "thou didst fit for me a body." "In thy counsels thou didst determine to make for me a body," to be given up to death as a sacrificial victim." [WAHL.] In the Hebrew, Psalm 40. 6, it is "mine ears hast thou opened," or "dug." Perhaps this alludes to the custom of bores the ear of a slave who volunteers to remain under his master when he might be free. Christ's assuming a human body, in obedience to the Father's will, in order to die the death of a slave (ch. 2. 14), was virtually the same act of voluntary submission to service as that of a slave suffering his ear to be bored by his master. His willing obedience to the Father's will is what is dwelt on as giving especial virtue to His sacrifice (v. 7, 9, 10). The preparing, or fitting of a body for Him, is not with a view to His mere incarnation, but to His expiatory sacrifice (v. 10), as the contrast to "sacrifice and offering" requires, cf. also Romans 7. 4; Epistles 2. 16;

Colossians 1. 22. More probably "opened mine ears" means opened mine inward ear, so as to be attentively obedient to what God wills me to do, viz., to assume the body He has prepared for me for my sacrifice, so Job, Margin, 33. 16; 36. 10 (doubtless the boring of a slave's ear was the symbol of such willing obedience); Isaiah 50. 5, "The Lord God hath opened mine ear," i. e., made me obediently attentive as a slave to his master. Others somewhat similarly explain, "Mine ears hast thou dugged," or "fashioned," not with allusion to Exodus 21. 6, but to the true office of the ear—a willing, submissive attention to the voice of God (Isaiah 50. 4, 5). The forming of the ear implies the preparation of the body, i. e., the incarnation; this secondary idea, really in the Hebrew, though less prominent, is the one which Paul uses for his argument. In either explanation the idea of Christ taking on Him the form, and becoming obedient as a servant, is implied. As He assumed a body in which to make His self-sacrifice, so ought we present our bodies a living sacrifice (Romans 12. 1). 6. burnt offerings—Greek, "whole burnt offerings." thou hast had no pleasure—as if these could in themselves atone for sin: God had pleasure in (Greek, "approved," or "was well pleased with") them, in so far as they were an act of obedience to His positive command under the Old Testament, but not as having an intrinsic efficacy such as Christ's sacrifice had. Contrast Matthew 3. 17. 7. I come—rather, "I am come" (Note, v. 5). "Here we have the creed, as it were, of Jesus: 'I am come to fulfil the law, Matthew 5. 17; to preach, Mark 1. 38; to call sinners to repentance, Luke 5. 32; to send a sword, and to set men at variance, Matthew 10. 34, 35; I came down from heaven to do the will of Him that sent me, John 6. 38, 39 (so here, Psalm 40. 7, 8); I am sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, Matthew 15. 24; I am come into this world for judgment, John 9. 39; I am come that they might have life, and might have it more abundantly, John 10. 10; to save what had been lost, Matthew 18. 1. to seek and to save that which was lost, Luke 19. 10; cf. 1 Timothy 1. 15; to save men's lives, Luke 9. 56; to send fire on the earth, Luke 12. 49; to minister, Matthew 20. 28; as "the Light," John 12. 46; to bear witness unto the truth, John 18. 37.' See, reader, that thy Saviour obtain what He aimed at in thy case. Moreover, do thou for thy part say, why thou art come here? Dost thou, then, also, do the will of God? From what time? and in what way?" [BENGEL.] When the two goats on the day of atonement were presented before the Lord, that goat was to be offered as a sin offering on which the lot of the Lord should fall; and that lot was lifted up on high in the hand of the high priest, and then laid upon the head of the goat which was to die; so the hand of God determined all that was done to Christ. Besides the covenant of God with man through Christ's blood, there was another covenant made by the Father with the Son from eternity. The condition was, "If He shall make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed," &c. (Isaiah 53. 10). The Son accepted the condition, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." [BISHOP PEARSON.] Oblation, intercession, and benediction, are His three priestly offices. in the volume, &c.—*id., "the roll:" the parchment MS. being wrapped around a cylinder headed with knobs. Here, the Scripture "volume" meant is the 40th Psalm. "By this very passage 'written of me,' I undertake to do thy will [viz., that I should die for the sins of the world, in order that all who believe may be saved, not by animal sacrifices, v. 6, but by my death]." This is the written contract of Messiah (cf. Nehemiah 9. 38), whereby He engaged to be our surety. So complete is the inspiration of all that is written, so great the authority of the Psalms, that what David says is really what Christ then and there said. 8. he—Christ, sacrifice, &c.—The oldest MSS. read, "sacrifices and offerings" (plural). This verse combines the two clauses previously quoted distinctly, v. 5, 6, in contrast to the sacrifice of Christ with which God was well pleased. 9. Then said he—"At that time (viz., when speaking by David's mouth in the 40th Psalm) He hath said." The rejection of the legal sacrifices involves, as its concomitant, the voluntary offer of Jesus to make the self-sacrifice with which God is well pleased (for, indeed, it was God's own "will" that He came to do in offering it: so that this sacrifice could not but be well pleasing to God). I come—"I am come." take away—"sets aside the first," viz., "the legal system of sacrifices" which God wills not. the second—"the will of God" (v. 7, 9) that Christ should redeem us by His self-sacrifice. 10. By—Greek, "IN." So "in," and "through," occur in the same sentence, 1 Peter i. 22, "Ye have purified your souls IN obeying the truth through the Spirit." Also, 1 Peter i. 5, in the Greek. The "IN (fulfilment of) which will" (cf. the use of IN, Ephesians i. 6, "wherein [in which grace] He hath made us accepted in the Beloved"), expresses the originating cause; "THROUGH the offering . . . of Christ," the instrumental or mediatory cause. The whole work of redemption flows from "the will" of God the Father, as the First Cause, who decreed redemption from before the foundation of the world. The "will" here (boulema) is His absolute sovereign will. His "good will" (eudokia) is a particular aspect of it. are sanctified—once for all, and as our permanent state (so the Greek). It is the finished work of Christ in having sanctified us (i. e., having translated us from a state of unholy alienation into a state of consecration to God, having "no more conscience of sin," v. 2) once for all and permanently, not the process of gradual sanctification, which is here referred to. the body—"prepared" for Him by the Father (v. 5). As the atonement, or reconciliation, is by the blood of Christ (Leviticus 17. 11), so our sanctification (consecration to God, holiness and eternal bliss) is by the body of Christ (Colossians 1. 22). ALFORD quotes the Book of Common Prayer Communion Service, "that our sinful bodies may be made clean by His body, and our souls washed through His most precious blood." once for all—(Ch. 7. 27; 9. 12, 26, 28; 10. 12, 14.) 11. And—A new point of contrast; the frequent repetition of the sacrifices. priest—The oldest MSS. read, "high priest." Though he did not in person stand "daily" offering sacrifices, he did so by the subordinate priests of whom, as well as of all Israel, he was the representative head. So "daily" is applied to the high priests (ch. 7. 27). standeth—the attitude of one ministering; in contrast to "sat down on the right hand of God," v. 12, said of Christ; the posture of one being ministered to as a king. which—Greek, "the which," i. e., of such a kind as. take away—utterly; lit., strip off all round. Legal sacrifices might, in part, produce the sense of forgiveness, yet scarcely even that (Note, v. 4); but entirely to strip off one's guilt they never could. 12. this man—Emphatic (ch. 3. 3). for ever—joined in English Version with "offered one sacrifice;" offered one sacrifice, the efficacy of which endures for ever; lit., continuously (cf. v. 14). "The offering of Christ, once for all made, will continue the one and only oblation for ever; no other will supersede it." [BENGEL.] The mass, which professes to be the frequent repetition of one and the same sacrifice of Christ's body, is hence disproved. For not only is Christ's body one, but also His offering is one, and that inseparable from His suffering (ch. 9. 26). The mass would be much the same as the Jewish sacrifices which Paul sets aside as abrogated, for they were anticipations of the one sacrifice, just as Rome makes masses continuations of it, in opposition to Paul's argument. A repetition would imply that the former once-for-all offering of the one sacrifice was imperfect, and so would be dishonouring to it (v. 2, 18). Verse 14, on the contrary, says, "He hath PERFECTED FOR EVER them that are sanctified." If Christ offered Himself at the last supper, then He offered Himself again on the cross, and there would be two offerings; but Paul says there was only one, once for all. Cf. Note, ch. 9. 26. English Version is favoured by the usage in this Epistle, of putting the Greek "for ever" after that which it qualifies. Also "one sacrifice for ever," stands in contrast to "the same sacrifices oftentimes" (v. 11). Also, 1 Corinthians 15. 25, 28, agrees with v. 12, 13, taken as English Version, not joining, as ALFORD does, "for ever" with "sat down," for Jesus is to give up the mediatorial throne "when all things shall be subdued unto Him," and not to sit on it for ever. 13. expecting—"waiting." Awaiting the execution of His Father's will, that all His foes should be subjected to Him. The Son waits till the Father shall "send Him forth to triumph over all His foes." He is now sitting at rest (v. 12), invisibly reigning, and having His foes virtually, by right of His death, subject to Him. His present sitting on the unseen throne is a necessary preliminary to His coming forth to subject His foes openly. He shall then come forth to a visibly-manifested kingdom and conquest over his foes. Thus He fulfils Psalm 110. 1. This agrees with 1 Corinthians 15. 23-28. He is, by His Spirit and His providence, now subjecting His foes to Him in part (Psalm 110). The subjection of His foes fully shall be at His second advent, and from that time to the general judgment (Revelation 19. and 20.); then comes the subjection of Himself as Head of the Church to the Father (the mediatorial economy ceasing when its end shall have been accomplished), that God may be all in all. Eastern conquerors used to tread on the necks of the vanquished, as Joshua did to the five kings. So Christ's total and absolute conquest at His coming is symbolized. be made his footstool—lit., "be placed (rendered) footstool of His feet." his enemies—Satan and Death, whose strength consists in "sin;" this being taken away (v. 12), the power of the foes is taken away, and their destruction necessarily follows. 14. For—The sacrifice being "for ever" in its efficacy (v. 12) needs no renewal. "For," &c. them that are sanctified—rather as Greek, "them that are being sanctified." The sanctification (consecration to God) of the elect (1 Peter 1. 2) believers is perfect in Christ once for all (Note, v. 10). (Contrast the law, ch. 7. 19; 9. 9; 10. 1.) The development of that sanctification is progressive. 15. The Greek has "moreover," or "now," is a witness—of the truth which I am setting forth. The Father's witness is given ch. 5. 10. The Son's, ch. 10. 5. Now is added that of the Holy Spirit, called accordingly "the Spirit of grace," v. 29. The testimony of all Three leads to the same conclusion (v. 18). for after that he had said, &c.—The conclusion to the sentence is in v. 17, "After He had said before, This is the covenant that I will make with them (with the house of Israel, ch. 8. 10; here extended to the spiritual Israel), &c., saith the Lord; I will put (lit., giving, referring to the giving of the law; not now as then, giving into the hands, but giving) my laws into their hearts (mind, ch. 8. 10) and in their minds (hearts, ch. 8. 10); I will inscribe (so the Greek) them (here he omits the addition quoted in ch. 8. 10, 11, I will be to them a God, &c., and they shall not teach every man his neighbour, &c.), and (i. e., after He had said the foregoing, HE THEN ADDS) their sins, &c., will I remember no more." The great object of the quotation here is, to prove that, there being in the Gospel covenant "REMISSION of sins" (v. 17), there is no more need of a sacrifice for sins. The object of the same quotation in ch. 8. 8-18 is to show that, there being a "NEW covenant," the old is antiquated. 18. where remission of these is—as there is under the Gospel covenant (v. 17). "Here ends the finale (ch. 10. 1-18) of the great tripartite arrangement (ch. 7. 1-25; 7. 26 to 9. 12; 9. 13 to 10. 18) of the middle portion of the Epistle. Its great theme was Christ a High Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. What it is to be a high priest after the order of Melchisedec is set forth, ch. 7. 1-25, as contrasted with the Aaronic order. That Christ, however, as High Priest, is Aaron's antitype in the true holy place, by virtue of His self-sacrifice here on earth, and Mediator of a better covenant, whose essential character the old only typified, we learn, ch. 7. 26 to 9. 12. And that Christ's self-sacrifice, offered through the Eternal Spirit, is of everlasting power, as contrasted with the unavailing cycle of legal offerings, is established in the third part, ch. 9. 13 to 10. 18; the first half of this last portion [ch. 9. 13-23], showing that both our present possession of salvation, and our future completion of it, are as certain to us as that He is with God, ruling as a Priest and reigning as a King, once more to appear, no more as a bearer of our sins, but in glory as a Judge. The second half, ch. 10. 1-18, reiterating the main position of the whole, the High Priesthood of Christ, grounded on His offering of Himself—its kingly character its eternal accomplishment of its end, confirmed by Psalm 40 and 110, and Jeremiah 31." [DELITZSCH in ALFORD.] 19. Here begins the third and last division of the Epistle: our

and now whilst waiting for the Lord's second advent. Resumption and expansion of the exhortation (ch. 4. 14-18; cf. v. 23, 28 here) wherewith he closed the first part of the Epistle, preparatory to his great doctrinal argument, beginning ch. 7. 1. boldness—"free confidence," grounded on the consciousness that our sins have been forgiven. to enter—lit., "as regards the entering," by—Greek, "in;" it is in the blood of Jesus that our boldness to enter is grounded. Cf. Ephesians 3. 12, "In whom we have boldness and access with confidence." It is His having once for all entered as our Forerunner (ch. 6. 20) and High Priest (v. 21), making atonement for us with His blood, which is continually there (ch. 12. 24) before God, that gives us confident access. No priestly caste now mediates between the sinner and his Judge. We may come boldly with loving confidence, not with slavish fear, directly through Christ, the only mediating Priest. The minister is not officially nearer God than the layman; nor can the latter serve God at a distance or by deputy, as the natural man would like. Each must come for himself, and all are accepted when they come by the new and living way opened by Christ. Thus all Christians are, in respect to access directly to God, virtually high priests (Revelation 1. 6). They draw nigh in and through Christ, the only proper High Priest (ch. 7. 25). 20. which—The antecedent in the Greek is "the entering;" not as English Version, "way." Translate, "Which (entering) He has consecrated (not as though it were already existing, but has been the first to open, INAUGURATED as a new thing; Note, ch. 9. 18, where the Greek is the same) for us (as) a new (Greek, recent; recently opened, Romans 16. 25, 26) and living way" (not like the lifeless way through the law offering of the blood of dead victims, but real, vital, and of perpetual efficacy, because the living and life-giving Saviour is that way. It is a living hope that we have, producing not dead, but living, works). Christ, the first-fruits of our nature, has ascended, and the rest is sanctified thereby. "Christ's ascension is our promotion; and whither the glory of the Head hath preceded, thither the hope of the body, too, is called." [Luo.] the veil—As the veil had to be passed through in order to enter the holiest place, so the weak, human suffering flesh (ch. 5. 7) of Christ's humanity (which veiled His Godhead) had to be passed through by Him in entering the heavenly holiest place for us; in putting off His rent flesh, the temple veil, its type, was simultaneously rent from top to bottom (Matthew 27. 51). Not His body, but His weak suffering flesh, was the veil; His body was the temple (John 2. 19). 21. High Priest—As a different Greek term (archiereus) is used always elsewhere in this Epistle for "High Priest," translate as Greek here, "A Great Priest;" one who is at once King and "Priest on His throne" (Zechariah 6. 13); a royal Priest, and a priestly King. house of God—the spiritual house, the Church, made up of believers, whose home is heaven, where Jesus now is (ch. 12. 22, 28). Thus, by "the house of God," over which Jesus is, heaven is included in meaning, as well as the Church, whose home it is. 23. (Ch. 4. 16; 7. 19.) with a true heart—without hypocrisy; "in truth, and with a perfect heart;" a heart thoroughly imbued with "the truth" (v. 26). full assurance—(Ch. 6. 11)—With no doubt as to our acceptance when coming to God by the blood of Christ. As "faith" occurs here, so "hope," and "love," v. 23, 24. sprinkled from—i. e., sprinkled so as to be cleansed from. evil conscience—a consciousness of guilt unatoned for, and uncleansed away (v. 2; ch. 9. 9). Both the hearts and the bodies are cleansed. The legal purifications were with blood of animal victims and with water, and could only cleanse the flesh (ch. 9. 13, 21). Christ's blood purifies the heart and conscience. The Aaronic priest, in entering the holy place, washed with water (ch. 9. 19) in the brazen laver. Believers, as priests to God, are once for all washed in BODY (as distinguished from "hearts") at baptism. As we have an immaterial, and a material nature, the cleansing of both is expressed by "hearts" and body, "the inner and the outer man; so the whole man, material and immaterial. The baptism of the body, however, is not the mere putting away of material filth, nor an act operating by intrinsic efficacy, but the sacramental seal, applied to the outer man, of a spiritual washing (1 Peter 3. 21) "Body" (not merely "flesh," the carnal part, as 2 Corinthians 7. 1) includes the whole material man, which needs cleansing, as being redeemed, as well as the soul. The body, once polluted with sin, is washed, so as to be fitted like Christ's holy body, and by His body, to be spiritually a pure and living offering. On the "pure water," the symbol of consecration and sanctification, cf. John 19. 34; 1 Corinthians 6. 11; 1 John 5. 6; Ezekiel 36. 25. The perfects "having . . . hearts sprinkled . . . body (the Greek is singular) washed," imply a continuing state produced by a once-for-all accomplished act, viz., our justification by faith through Christ's blood, and consecration to God, sealed sacramentally by the baptism of our body. 23. Ch. 3. 6, 14; 4. 14. profession—Greek, "confession." our faith—rather as Greek, "OUR HOPE;" which is indeed faith exercised as to the future inheritance. Hope rests on faith, and at the same time quickens faith, and is the ground of our bold confession (1 Peter 3. 15). Hope is similarly (v. 22) connected with purification (1 John 3. 3). without wavering—without declension (ch. 3. 14), "steadfast unto the end." he—God is faithful to his promises (ch. 6. 17, 18; 11. 11; 12. 26, 28; 1 Corinthians 1. 9; 10. 13; 1 Thessalonians 5. 24; 2 Thessalonians 3. 3; see also Christ's promise, John 12. 26), but man is too often unfaithful to his duties. 24. Here, as elsewhere, hope and love follow faith; the Pauline triad of Christian graces. consider—with the mind attentively fixed on "one another" (Note, ch. 3. 1), contemplating with continual consideration the characters and wants of our brethren, so as to render mutual help and counsel. Cf. "consider," Psalm 41. 1, and ch. 12. 15, "(All) looking diligently lest any fall of the grace of God." to provoke—Greek, "with a view to provoking unto love," instead of provoking to hatred, as is too often the case. 25. assembling of ourselves together—The Greek, episunagoge, is only found here and 2 Thessalonians 2. 1 (the gathering together of the elect to Christ at His coming, Matthew 24. 31). The assembling or gathering of ourselves for Christian communion in private and public, is an earnest of our being gathered together to Him at His appearing. Union is strength; continual assemblies together beget and foster love, and give good opportunities for "provoking to good works," by "exhorting one another" (ch. 3. 13). IGNATIUS says, "When ye frequently, and in numbers meet together, the powers of Satan are overthrown, and his mischief is neutralized by your like-mindedness in the faith." To neglect such assemblies together might end in apostasy at last. He avoids the Greek term synagoge, as suggesting the Jewish synagogue meetings (cf. Revelation 2. 9). as the manner of some is—"manner," i. e., habit, custom. This gentle expression proves he is not here as yet speaking of apostasy. the day approaching—This, the shortest designation of the day of the Lord's coming, occurs only in 1 Corinthians 3. 13; a confirmation of the Pauline authorship of this Epistle. The Church being in all ages kept uncertain how soon Christ is coming, the day is, and has been, in each age, practically always near; whence, believers have been called on always to be watching for it as nigh at hand. The Hebrews were now living close upon one of those great types and foretastes of it, the destruction of Jerusalem (Matthew 24.), "the bloody and fiery dawn of the great day; that day is the day of days, the ending day of all days, the settling day of all days, the day of the promotion of time into eternity, the day which, for the Church, breaks through and breaks off the night of the present world" (DELITZSCH in ALFORD). 26. Cf. on the 23 and following verses, ch. 6. 4, &c. There the warning was that if there be not diligence in progressing a falling off will take place, and apostasy may ensue: here it is, that if there be lukewarmness in Christian communion, apostasy may ensue. if we sin—Greek present participle: if we be found sinning, i. e., not isolated acts, but a state of sin. [ALFORD.] A violation not only of the law, but of the whole economy of the New Testament (v. 28, 29). willingly—presumptuously, Greek "willingly." After receiving "full knowledge (so the Greek, cf. 1 Timothy 2. 4) of the truth," by having been "enlightened," and by having

'tasted' a certain measure even of grace of "the Holy Ghost" (the Spirit of truth, John 14. 17; and "the Spirit of grace," v. 29): to fall away (as "sin" here means, ch. 3. 12, 17; cf. ch. 6. 6) and apostatize (ch. 3. 12) to Judaism or infidelity, is not a sin of ignorance, or error ("out of the way," the result) of infirmity, but a deliberate sinning against the Spirit (v. 29; ch. 5. 2): such sinning, where a consciousness of Gospel obligations not only was, but is present: a sinning presumptuously and perseveringly against Christ's redemption for us, and the Spirit of grace in us. "He only who stands high can fall low. A lively reference in the soul to what is good is necessary in order to be thoroughly wicked; hence, man can be more reprobate than the beasts, and the apostate angels than apostate man." [THOLUCK.] remaineth no more sacrifice—For there is but ONE Sacrifice that can atone for sin; they, after having fully known that sacrifice, deliberately reject it. 27. a certain—au extraordinary and indescribable. The indefiniteness, as of something peculiar of its kind, makes the description the more terrible (cf. Greek, James 1. 18). looking for—"expectation:" a later sense of the Greek. ALFORD strangely translates, as the Greek usually means elsewhere, "reception." The transition is easy from "giving a reception to" something or some one, to looking for. Contrast the "expecting" (the very same Greek as here), v. 13, which refutes ALFORD. fiery indignation—lit., "zeal of fire." Fire is personified: glow or ardour of fire, i. e., of Him who is "a consuming fire." devour—continually. 28. Cf. ch. 2. 2, 3; 12. 25. despised—"set at naught" [ALFORD]: utterly and heinously violated, not merely some minor detail, but the whole law and covenant, as ex. gr., by idolatry (Deuteronomy 17. 2-7). So here apostasy answers to such an utter violation of the old covenant. died—Greek, "dies:" the normal punishment of such transgression, then still in force. without mercy—lit., mercies: removal out of the pale of mitigation, or a respite of his doom. under—on the evidence of. 29. sorer—Greek, "worse," viz., "punishment" (lit., vengeance) than any mere temporal punishment of the body. suppose ye—an appeal to the Hebrews' reason and conscience. thought worthy—by God at the judgment. trodden under foot the Son of God—by "wilful" apostasy. So he treads under foot God Himself who "glorified His Son as an high priest" (ch. 5. 5; 6. 6). an unholy thing—lit., "common," as opposed to "sanctified." No better than the blood of a common man, thus involving the consequence that Christ, in claiming to be God, was guilty of blasphemy, and so deserved to die! wherewith he was sanctified—for Christ died even for him. "Sanctified," in the fullest sense, belongs only to the saved elect. But in some sense it belongs also to those who have gone a far way in Christian experience, and yet fall away at last. The higher such a one's past Christian experiences, the deeper his fall. done despite unto—by repelling in fact: as "blasphemy" is despite in words (Mark 3. 29). "Of the Jews who became Christians and relapsed to Judaism, we find from the history of URIEL ACOSTA, that they required a blasphemy against Christ. They applied to Him epithets used against Molech the adulterous branch," &c. [THOLUCK.] the Spirit of grace—the Spirit that confers grace. "He who does not accept the benefit, insults Him who confers it. He hath made thee a son: wilt thou become a slave? He has come to take up His abode with thee; but thou art introducing evil into thyself." [CHRYSOSTOM.] "It is the curse of evil eternally to propagate evil: so, for him who profanes the Christ without him, and blasphemes the Christ within him, there is subjectively no renewal of a change of mind (ch. 6. 6), and objectively no new sacrifice for sins" (ch. 10. 26). [THOLUCK.] 30. him—God, who enters no empty threats. vengeance belongeth unto me—Greek, "To me belongeth vengeance:" exactly according with Paul's quotation, Romans 12. 19, of the same text. Lord shall judge his people—in grace, or else anger, according as each deserves: here, "judge," so as to punish the reprobate apostate; there, "judge," so as to interpose in behalf of, and save His people (Deuteronomy 32. 36). 31. fearful . . . to fall into the hands, &c. —It is good like David to fall into the hands of God, rather than man, when one does so with filial faith in his father's love, though God chastises him. "It is fearful" to fall into His hands as a reprobate and presumptuous sinner doomed to His just vengeance as Judge (v. 27). living God—therefore able to punish for ever (Matthew 10. 28). 32. As previously he has warned them by the awful end of apostates, so here he stirs them up by the remembrance of their own former faith, patience, and self-sacrificing love. So Revelation 2. 3, 4. call to remembrance—habitually: so the present tense means. illuminated—"enlightened:" come to "the knowledge of the truth" (v. 26) in connection with baptism (Note, ch. 6. 4). In spiritual baptism, Christ, who is "the Light," is put on. "On the one hand, we are not to sever the sign and the grace signified where the sacrifice truly answers its design; on the other, the glass is not to be mistaken for the liquor, nor the sheath for the sword." [BENGEL.] light of—i. e., consisting of afflictions. 33. The persecutions here referred to seem to have been endured by the Hebrew Christians at their first conversion, not only in Palestine, but also in Rome and elsewhere, the Jews in every city inciting the populace and the Roman authorities against Christians. gazing-stock—as in a theatre (so the Greek): often used as the place of punishment in the presence of the assembled multitudes. Acts 19. 29; 1 Corinthians 4. 9. "Made a theatrical spectacle to the world." ye became—of your own accord: attesting your Christian sympathy with your suffering brethren. companions of—sharers in affliction with. 34. ye had compassion on me in my bonds—The oldest MSS. and versions omit "me," and read, "Ye both sympathized with those in bonds (answering to the last clause of v. 33; cf. ch. 13. 3, 23; 6. 10), and accepted (so the Greek is translated ch. 11. 35) with joy (James 1. 2; joy in tribulations, as exercising faith and other graces, Romans 5. 3; and the exercise of the coming glory, Matthew 5. 12) the plundering of your (own) goods" (answering to the first clause of v. 33). in yourselves—The oldest MSS. omit "in;" translate, "Knowing that ye have for (or to) yourselves." better—a heavenly (ch. 11. 16). enduring—not liable to spoiling. substance—possession: peculiarly our own, if we will not cast away our birth-right. 35-37. Consequent exhortation to confidence and endurance, as Christ is soon coming. Cast not away—implying that they now have "confidence," and that it will not withdraw of itself, unless they "cast it away" wilfully (cf. ch. 3. 14). which—Greek, "the which:" inasmuch as being such as. hath—present tense: it is as certain as if you had it in your hand (v. 37) It hath in reversion. recompense of reward—of grace not of debt: a reward of a kind which no mercenary self-seeker would seek: holiness will be its own reward; self-devoting unselfishness for Christ's sake will be its own rich recompense (Note, ch. 2. 2; 11. 26). 36. patience—Greek, "waiting endurance," or "enduring perseverance:" the kindred Greek verb in the LXX., Habakkuk 2. 3, is translated, "Wait for it" (cf. James 5. 7). after ye have done the will of God—"that whereas ye have done the will of God" hitherto (v. 32-35), ye may now show also patient, persevering endurance, and so "receive the promise," i. e., the promised reward: eternal life and bliss commensurate with our work of faith and love (ch. 6. 10-12). We must not only do, but also suffer (1 Peter 1. 19). God first uses the active talents of His servants; then polishes the other side of the stone, making the passive graces shine, patience, meekness, &c. It may be also translated, "That ye may do the will of God, and receive," &c. [ALFORD]: patience itself is a further and a persevering doing of "God's will;" otherwise it would be profitless and no real grace (Matthew 7. 21). We should look, not merely for individual bliss now and at death, but for the great and general summation of bliss of all saints, both in body and soul. 37, 38. Encouragement to patient endurance by consideration of the shortness of the time till Christ shall come, and God's rejection of him that draws back, taken from Habakkuk 2. 3, 4. a little while—(John 16. 16.) he that shall come—lit., "the Comer." In Habakkuk, it is the vision that is said to be about to come. Christ, being the grand and ultimate sub-
